Dean tapped the rim of the folder against the counter with a nod. Right she was; they had almost an hour drive and the afternoon was getting on. Not to mention, Dean's plan kind of relied on their so-called 'clown' actually being around the carnival for them to take care of. He remembered the guy killed at night, but it wouldn't hurt to scope the area out and they definitely wanted to be there well ahead of his next planned kill. Dean handed the folder to Sam, who'd give him a reminder read-through while they drove (and fill himself in on things Dean either hadn't mentioned or didn't remember).

"I could go with you," Jo suddenly said, edging forward against the bar a little too tellingly, expression trying for nonchalant but missing. "If you guys need an extra hand?"

Dean opened his mouth to respond, Sam shooting him a questioning look, but Ellen beat them both.

"You have responsibilities here," she admonished, the look in her eye and the tone of her voice making it pretty clear this wasn't the first time they'd talked about this. It probably wasn't the first time they'd talk about it today. Dean had been present for some of those 'talks' and they usually involved more screaming than talking.

"Mom-"

"No, Jo. You're not going and that's that." Ellen might as well have physically put her foot down, for the overwhelming sense of finality in her words. Jo, arms crossed and face reddening in anger, didn't look like she was going to accept that lying down. "I'm sure the Winchesters can handle it."

Sam and Dean exchanged an awkward glance. That was their cue to go. Dean used the folder to tap Jo on the shoulder as they slipped passed. He kept his voice low and apologetic as he said, "Next time," but he knew he would have found a way to keep Jo out of the hunt same as Ellen.

He knew better, though, when it came down to it. Jo was going to start hunting, and soon, no matter what he or her mother had to say about it.

-o-o-o-

The carnival was just like Dean remembered it. Noisy, filled with screaming kids and the smell of stale peanuts, greasy food, and old hay. He was not disappointed in the slightest that they wouldn't be hanging around this one for long.

"Okay, but it's not really a clown, right?" Sam asked, apparently continuing their conversation from the bar that Dean never had finished. When his older brother didn't answer again, he grabbed his arm, stopping him. The kid actually looked nervous and Dean was loving every second of it. "Tell me it's not actually a clown, Dean."

"Oh, it gets worse." The older Winchester offered a sympathetic smile. "The clown was abused as a kid. Never got enough hugs. The only way we were able to send him on was for you to give him one, giant, Samsquatch squeeze."

By the last word, Dean was barely even trying to keep a straight face and Sam glared at him with every fiber of his being. He didn't even manage fifteen seconds before he was cracking up.

"It's the blind guy with the throwing knives. He's a Rakshasa." Dean managed the words between full-hearted laughs, doubled over by his own shenanigans even as he waved in the Rakshasa's direction, tossing daggers over by the fun house. "Man, your face!"

Sam looked stormy, at best, a forehead free of wrinkles screamed high danger levels. "That's not funny, Dean."

"'Course you'd think that; you didn't see your face."

-o-o-o-

When he'd remembered the clown case was up-and-coming, Dean hadn't actually known what flavor of monster the blind dude was. There were way too many years of hunts between then and now for that knowledge to stick around. But knowing he liked to play dress up, ate mommies and daddies, and could go invisible (yeah, like Dean was likely to forget that funhouse of friggin' horrors), was enough to get him started. There'd been something about bugs, too, which helped. Even if Dean didn't remember what exactly, it helped narrow things down once he'd gotten a list going of possible monsters that fit the bill.

Which was why he and Sam were now armed with brass daggers, waiting just outside the carnival grounds after hours to take down a supernatural knife-thrower who didn't know they were coming this time. Not aware of hunters in the area or any new faces around the carnival, the not-so-blind guy (dressed in Sam's worst nightmare) was easy to catch off his guard on the dirt road that lead away from the back gate. Dean managed not to tease his brother for the way he stiffened – and glanced at Dean no less than three nervous times – when the clown suddenly rounded the bend and they had a stare off in the middle of the road.

The Mexican stand-off was not very Mexican and not very standoffish. The Rakshasha charged before Dean had even gotten the dramatic music going in his head.

-o-o-o-

He couldn't stop the grin stretched across his face if he wanted to, and oh, Dean definitely didn't want to.

"Like a little girl," he giggled, probably for the fourth time in half as many minutes. Sam glared at him something fierce and definitely pissy over the top of the Impala. Dean just laughed louder, opening the driver side door and climbing in. "I've heard girls scream less like girls, Sam."

The struggle had been brief. The clown hadn't known who he was dealing with, clearly. Sam took an elbow to the face, Dean skirted a throwing knife by less than an inch, but it ended with a clown dead on the ground, dagger sticking out of his chest.

Sam's doing, which his brother figured was probably pretty cathodic for the coulrophobic kid. All in all, a clean, quick kill, case closed. They'd be in and out in under seven hours, and five of that had been waiting around for the Rakshasha to leave the carnival in search of his next meal.

Dean couldn't have been happier to book it back to his Baby and slide inside before anyone happened by a pile of polka-dotted fabric, ruffles, and a clown wig in middle of the road, sans a body. It looked like someone had taken out some anger management on a piece of nineteen-seventy's couch upholstery. Rakshasha's died weird, man. At least they didn't have to deal with burying a body. He supposed they could have taken the time to toss the clothes, but it's not like anyone was going to call the cops on some discarded carnival dress-up.

By the time they got to the car, Dean was practically whistling. Playing roadie last time had not been one of his fonder memories, and he was beyond happy to be leaving the carnival behind with its cloying smell of peanuts, old straw, and animal piss. Sam, face red and murder still in his eyes (which had Dean cackling yet, even if that murder was definitely aimed in his direction currently), didn't bother answering the last of his brother's taunts.

God, he hated clowns.

"Tell me that's the only one."

Dean raised his eyebrows as he revved his baby's engine, spun the Impala around, and pulled back out onto the main road. He knew what Sam was asking (the kid knew Rakshasha's were lone wolves) and wondered how best to put it.

"Last one for now, probably not forever. How do you feel about exploding rainbow glitter?"

-o-o-o-

The Roadhouse door closed behind them and Dean breathed in deep. Ah, peanuts, stale beer, and good old human piss. Home sweet home.

"Joanna Beth Harvelle, don't you walk away from your mother!"

Complete with family feuding.

Sam and Dean exchanged harried looks, barely over the threshold of the bar and considering sneaking back out before they'd been spotted. But it was late – late enough that the only customers of the bar were passed out drunk on its horizontal surfaces (Ash, pool table, what else was new) – and Dean had kind of been hoping to crash the night there rather than find a motel. In another lifetime, Ellen had offered spare beds to them before. He figured the offer probably stood across time.

Now both Winchesters were kinda wishing they'd called her from the road and let her know long-distance that the clown was toast and all was right in the world (or, as right as it ever was.)

"When are you gonna listen to me, Mom? I could have helped them today – I should have helped them today!" Jo spun back around and Dean winced, realizing just what this fight was about. Not that the fights between these two women were ever about anything else. Still, he'd kind of hoped. He'd heard enough of these in his previous life to know exactly where they led. "Better yet, I could have handled that hunt on my own!"

Ellen was fuming, and both men could see the fear fueling that anger, clear as day. "You want to go and get yourself killed on some dusty back road, you find a different roof over your head, young lady. I won't allow it under mine."

"Maybe I will!" Jo bit out in rapid-fire, snapping back at the finality of her mother's sharp words. "I'm not a child. I want to go, I'm gone."

"You want to go somewhere, why don't you try goin' back to school!"

Dean knew better than to get in the middle of this. He did. But still…

"I didn't belong there! I was the freak with a knife collection!"

"Ellen-"

Both Harvelle woman turned in surprise at the presence of the two hunters, having been a little preoccupied to notice their arrival. Ellen cleared her throat, wiping her hands on her bar apron and trying for a smile in their direction. Jo just crossed her arms over her chest angrily and made no such attempt to cover up her ire.

"Bad time, boys," Ellen bit out, clearly still pissed off, though the tilt at the corner of her mouth softened the blow.

"Yes, ma'am." Sam, ever the peacekeeper, placating hands raised up, one of them landing on Dean's shoulder. A clear nudge to leave this be.

Ellen's eyes lost a little more of their edge and she sighed. Forcing normalcy into her tone, she asked, "No more clown?"

Sam smiled weakly, trying to play along for their sake. "No more clown."

Dean, an expert on avoiding conversations he absolutely did not want to have, knew he should let this one go. But as he glanced over at that fiery young woman, his friend, full of passion and fury and life, he found that he just couldn't. "Ellen, she's gonna go off on her own, either way. It'd be a hell of a lot safer to have a home to come back to, someone ready to patch her up."

It was the wrong thing to say. Which Dean kind of knew – had definitely known – but there wasn't any other way to say it.

The older Harvelle woman's eyes shuttered into something dangerous, something mama-bearish that any halfway intelligent man with semi-decent survival instincts would know to run the hell away from. "Over my dead body," she bit out, and Dean flinched so violently Sam picked up on it right away. "And not to be rude, but you barely know us. This is a family matter; you got no business interfering."

It hurt. It hurt so damn bad, for so many reasons, in so many ways. Dean had that immediate sinking feeling he always got, particularly this past year, when he realized he'd made things worse again. And she was right. In this timeline, in this world, Ellen had known them for all of two months, and spoken to them only a handful of times.

The Dean Winchester that should be standing in front of her didn't know them. Which pretty much just sucked for the Dean Winchester actually standing there.

"Dean," Sam muttered beside him, hand dropping to his elbow and tugging at his jacket. An even stronger suggestion they should leave.

"Maybe you're right," the older Winchester choked out, doing his damnedest to sound normal. To sound like his insides weren't cement and crumbling into pieces somewhere down by his boots. "I'm sorry."

Sam tugged on his arm again and Dean went without a fight.

As they left, they heard Jo turn to her mother, arms crossed over her chest and a pointed look in her eye as she spat, "Nice."

-o-o-o-

It didn't take long for Sam to ask. Dean knew he would, and was already working on a response he didn't want to give but knew he owed. Unfortunately, his mouth wasn't on track with his brain and he ended up shaking his head when nothing came out.

"You can't keep doing this," Sam replied, but he didn't sound angry. He sounded tired, pitying. Angry would have been better. "I'm not trying to start a fight, Dean, but you gotta talk to someone. It doesn't have to be me, but someone."

When Dean didn't answer right away – that whole mouth-to-brain thing still putting up one hell of a fight – Sam continued. "I mean, yeah, it might actually help if you talk to me, so we can be on the same page..."

Which, fair point.

"It's not gonna happen this time." Oh, great, now his mouth had things to say. And they were the wrong things. "I won't let it, so why tell you about it?"

Sometimes, Dean really wondered where his tongue got the nerve to work without his say so. Sometimes, Dean also wanted to bash his head into the nearest solid, vertical surface. Had he not just agreed with himself that Sam deserved answers? Had he not, less than a week ago, told Sam they'd figure out how to stop keeping secrets?

"How are we supposed to stop it, if I don't even know what it is?"

Again, point.

Dean tightened his grip on Baby's leather as he harshly – too harshly – put the car into gear and pulled away from the Roadhouse. He prayed to no one (it wasn't something to bother Cas with, and no one else out there worth praying to) that Jo wouldn't do anything stupid because of what he'd said. That time would keep things the friggin' same in their favor for once.

"Jo starts hunting on her own, Ellen can't stop her. And later…" Dean let out a haggard sigh, running a hand down his face tiredly. It never failed to remind Sam of the extra decade weighing on his brother's soul. "They go with us on a suicide mission. Pretty sure the only reason Ellen came was because she sure as hell couldn't stop Jo, and no way was she letting her go alone."

Just saying it caused his chest muscles to tighten. He rubbed absently at the aching warmth in his sternum, wondering if this one was all him or if Cas had just as unpleasant memories of that night. He'd been the one to spend most of the evening with the women. A drinking game, if Dean remembered right, and they'd nearly run Bobby's house dry trying to get the angel drunk.

God, his chest ached.

"We were gonna stop Lucifer from raising Death. Shoot him in the head with the Colt and kill the son of a bitch devil once and for all." He heard Sam's sharp inhale, an inhale of hope, and Dean's anger flared further. It wasn't fair, the shit that had happened, the shit that might happen, and his job to tell his kid brother all of it. "It doesn't work. Turns out, there are five things that gun can't kill."

Dean pulled onto the interstate, keeping his eyes on the road as he continued, anger and guilt and decade old grief eating at him. "Jo got nabbed by a hellhound. Ellen went out with her to buy us time. And it was all for nothing."

Talking about it now, even years later, felt just as damn painful as that day. Dean didn't think he'd ever said it out loud before.

"Dean…" Sam sighed, rubbing at the bridge of his nose as he tried to frame the never-ending mess that was time travel within his own reference of understanding. Hunting, he knew. Running away from home and a family that wanted a different life for you, those things he could start with. The rest of it – the lost friends and an apocalypse...– well, he supposed he'd have to get there eventually. "Look, just because you have knowledge and a new found talent for advice-"

"Hey!"

"-doesn't mean people will listen." Sam angled him with a pointed, but understanding look. "Sometimes people have to make mistakes for themselves, no matter who tells them how it will work out. No matter how right that person may be. Sometimes we have to learn the hard way in order to learn at all."

Dean silenced for a moment, before growling low in his throat. Sure, he could see his brother's point, but what a pain in the ass! What was the point of time travel if people weren't going to let you change anything to start with? It was bad enough Time was working against him, his friends shouldn't be adding to the problem.

"Yeah, well, we know it's gonna happen this time," Dean said, loudly, clearing his throat before his brother could get anymore sentimental or comforting on him. Even if the comfort was appreciated (silently, of course). "So no matter if Jo goes off on her own, we won't take them on a suicide mission. No hellhounds, no bomb, Ellen and Jo keep breathing."

Beside him, his brother turned those pitying, puppy dog eyes back out the front window with a weak grimace, and Dean was grateful he didn't try and push it any further.

"Yeah." Sam's fingers were tight on the door handle, as white-knuckled and worried as Dean's own for a family he barely knew but really wanted to. "Yeah, we'll make sure of it."

-o-o-o-

The TV was on low in the motel room, a constant stream of character dialogue, commercials, and late night news casters that had been running straight for three weeks now. The steady noise didn't quite drown out the clacking of keys coming from the bed, where a laptop was spread out among piled blankets, scattered books, and yet another pair of mutilated jeans. Nor did it hide the jiggle of the lock and knob on the door before it opened on silent hinges.

The single occupant of the room – Sam's mystery woman and Hell's guest to an Apocalypse – didn't react as Azazel and another man filed into the room. The second was tall, broad chested in a tight black t-shirt, with dark blonde hair and cold eyes.

"Who's this?" She didn't bother looking up from the computer, continuing to type away. She didn't bother hiding her distaste, either.

"This here is Tom," Azazel answered as he crossed the room and set a plastic bag full of something rectangular and of decent weight down on the edge of the mattress. The woman spared it a glance, but nothing more. "My boy."

Tom smiled, all teeth and black eyes. She snorted.

"Demon." The word was like sludge along the bottom of a barrel. "What is it doing here?"

"He's here to babysit you." Azazel spared her a tight-lipped smile, holding a calming hand out to his side as his son got a little agitated with the creature's blatant disrespect. "And to get you anything you need."

Glowing green eyes finally flicked their way. "Need?"

"It's time to earn your keep." The demon's pale gaze dropped pointedly to the bag. "First task: reconnaissance."

The woman leaned over the top of her laptop to snag the plastic handles, pulling it towards her with a tight frown. "And the rest?"

"Will come in time."

She delved inside the plastic for only a moment, pulling out a paperback book quite unlike the others scattered throughout the room. It was smaller, for one, the print finer and cover more colorful. The frown tightened. "What is this?"

"It's called a book," Tom spoke for the first time, baring his teeth in what he probably thought was a smile. "You do know how to read, don't you? Or should we fetch you another professor?"

Her glare locked on his and the woman narrowed her eyes. "Only the bad words. Filth. Scum of the Earth. Petulant turd. I still require practice."

The demon just grinned.

"Tom will get you the rest when you've finished with those." Azazel nodded towards the bag and its remaining contents. There were four more books inside. "Read up. You'll be meeting Sam soon and I expect your performance to be perfect."

The yellow-eyed demon swept out of the room, leaving his child behind. Ignoring the remaining presence, the woman turned the book over in her hands, eyebrows raising at the two men illustrated on the cover. One of them was shirtless, long blonde hair blowing in a painted wind, as they stood in front of a black car.

Across the top, the title read, 'Supernatural'.

-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-

Chapter End Notes

Season 2.1:Okay, so maybe not the most exciting start, but the next seven chapters are pretty jam-packed, to say the least. (I'm actually pretty sure it's going to be the next fifteen - poor boys will not be getting a break anytime soon - I just haven't gotten that far yet :P And knowing me, my estimate is conservative, as always (verbose. as. fuck.))

Tom: There was a demon at the end of the first season that Azazel identified as his boy but Dean shot him with the Colt before he ever had a line. Weird thing was, the demon was named in the script (only non-speaking character to be so that I've seen). I thought… huh, I wonder if Tom had more of a story once upon a time, and it just got cut from the final edit. Well, I can work with that!

Welcome to the Island, Tom (aka replacement Meg)! Let's see how long he survives this time around :D

Up Next: A case of severed heads and cow mutilation strikes déjà vu gold for Dean, so the boys head for Montana. Too bad they aren't the only hunter to catch wind of the case, though…

Next chapter will be up on Sunday! Please review and remind me there's interest in this story, as it is what keeps me going :)

Chapter 60: Season 2: Chapter 27

Chapter Notes

A/Ns: Ooookay guys. This is me, giving you all a courtesy heads-up: please remember that I do not do well with silence. Between the two sites, 1400 people get an e-mail that this story updates (which is... so, soooo damn cool) But when only one percent of those people review across both sites, my mind supplies aaaall sorts of reasons. Like...Okay, clearly the April Fools joke pissed you all off? The last chapter absolutely sucked? Then I end up making excuses for you, because that's my depression talking, not reality: it was an irregular posting day and a weekday to boot, maybe not everyone has gotten a chance to read it, maybe because I deleted a chapter and reposted it, the site didn't send out e-mails? I do try not to be the depressed-paranoid-slightly-manic mess of a human being that I actually am, but having so few readers willing to put in the effort of a simple comment when I spent a month and a half getting season 2.1 ready isn't helping

I will never hold this story hostage for reviews; I think that behavior absolutely sucks. But I will be fair and upfront with you guys: silence makes me think I've done poorly and is an immediate downer for me. I can not and do not write when I'm down. Basic equation is: without people telling me they enjoy this story, I just don't end up writing it. Without you guys supporting me, the story just wouldn't exist. I'm a people-pleaser and an attention whore, a lovely combination that means I only do shit if I can see it makes other people happy (which in turns leaves me puffing out chest feathers and preening like a damn peacock)

I know these sites do not let you "like" individual chapters, so you guys can seriously just write "like button pushed!" in a review now and then, and the message that you are out there enjoying will be received!

Those That Have Reviewed: I am sorry you keep having to read such things, but know they are not meant for you. And please do not apologize for not having reviewed every chapter or feel bad in the slightest. I do not expect a review every chapter; it is simply very hard to know so many people read this story and so few are willing to let me know my work is enjoyed. But those of you who have are, quite literally, the reason this story is still going. And I mean tha, 100%. I am not a self motivated person. This story, this chapter, is for you guys.

Chapter Warnings: We've got severed heads and mutilated cows, Dean's now naming his Deja vu, and Time isn't giving the Winchester's even an inch. For extra measure, let's throw in a little Lilith and some more of Demon Tom being an ass because that, as we all know, is exactly what a demon named Tom would do.

See the end of the chapter for more notes

-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-

The Road So Far (This Time Around)

Season 2: Chapter 27

-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-

The Impala door closed with the satisfying creak of well-loved metal, and Dean turned to look at court house in front of them. He gave Sam a wry look as they headed up white stone staircase of the mostly brick building that also housed the Sheriff's office.

"So two severed heads and a dozen cases of cow mutilation. And that sounded familiar?" Sam opened the front door, Dean entering first with a shrug.

"Not really much to go on. Could be half the cases we work, could be brand new. We'll just have to see." He'd told Sam as much that morning, as the kid read the newspaper aloud, circling potentials. The town had sounded familiar, and the particulars of the case not unfamiliar. It wasn't quite the sense of déjà vu he usually looked for when picking which direction to go next, but it was something. "Still think FBI would be faster."

"We don't need to go full-felony," Sam argued (not for the first time, likely not the last either), keeping his voice low as they passed the administrator's desk and headed for signs to the Sheriff. "Reporters raise fewer eyebrows and can get enough information to at least get us started."

Dean's brow pinched, that same not-unfamiliar tingling in his gut. He was starting to think of it as his spidey sense, only from the future. AKA: his timey sense. Sam had not been as amused, practically face-palming in the front seat, stuck in the car with his brother who had taken fifteen solid minutes of excited rambling about déjà vu not being unlike a tingling supernatural sixth sense, before landing on 'timey sense' of all things. God help him.

"Gentlemen," the sheriff greeted them with a nod after the front desk gal escorted them into his office. Sam responded in kind, introducing him and his brother as reporters from some newspaper, but Dean was too busy staring at the man's mustache.

It was… well, it was something.

"Oh, we've definitely been here before," he muttered into his brother's shoulder, body half turned away to keep his voice quiet. Sam nudged him back to front and center because, well, not exactly subtle there, Dean. The Sheriff was watching them with narrowed eyes.

"What newspaper did you say you worked for?"

"World Weekly-" Sam's arm across Dean's chest shut him right up.

"Weekly World News," his younger brother corrected, the 'Why me?' bitchface going strong (an offshoot, subcategory of #6, 'Am I really related to you?'). He gave the LEO a grimace of a smile. "He's new."

"And probably not long employed." Dean offered a hundred watt grin of his own. "Now, what can you tell us about the recent cow mutilation?"

-o-o-o-

"Well, he was friendly." They were climbing back into the Impala after getting all but kicked out of the Sheriff's office. "I always love when we – we – get lectured about how Satanism doesn't exist. Give it four years, buddy. You'll be singing a different tune!"

Sam ignored his brother shouting at the driver side window and the brick building beyond. He pulled up the case information they'd printed out that morning, staring at the autopsy report. "Coroner's office isn't far. Maybe we'll have more luck there."

"Yeah, yeah." Dean put the car into drive and pulled out onto the street. It took a second – about four minutes and three turns, actually – but eventually he realized Sam was staring at him. "What?"

"You said we've done this before?"

Dean shrugged one shoulder a little defensively. "Did you somehow miss the Sheriff's face caterpillar? Can't say we run into that every day. But hey, he's probably not the only Montana man with an impressive 'stache. And I'm not picking up anything major on the Timey Senses-"

"Don't call them that-"

"-so maybe, maybe not. Why?"

"Nothing," Sam returned lightly, going back to the paperwork. "It's just, I didn't give you the address for the coroner."

Dean slid the gear shift into park even as Sam said it. His brother blinked at him, the Impala idling outside the town morgue. The older Winchester leaned forward, staring up at the building sign through the windshield. "Whoa. Well…that's freaky."

"Little bit." Sam climbed out and Dean scrambled to follow.

"I'm telling you, Sam. Super powers!"

"Yup," Sam answered in that easy way that meant the little bitch was being sarcastic as hell. "If there ever comes the need to find dead people in Red Lodge, Montana, you're the man for the job."

Dean flipped him off as they entered the morgue.

-o-o-o-

"Son of a bitch." The man from the future (not that that fact was helping him much at the moment) pulled back from the severed head of a girl, propped in a plastic bin sitting on one of the autopsy tables. "She's a vamp."

Sam was giving the entire setup hazarded looks from the three feet away, a hand wrapped around his stomach and complexion a bit green around the gills. Honestly, Dean's comfort around a severed head was giving Sam just as much pause as the appendage itself. His brother had just shrugged at the first look sent his way. Ten years was a lot of cases with dead bodies and missing parts.

"That, uh, that changes things," Sam muttered, surprised, as he shuffled over a little cautiously. He took the tongue depressor out of Dean's hand and lifted the girl's lip again to stare at the small, almost unnoticeable holes in her gums.

"You think?"

"Was the other vic a vampire too?" Sam set the depressor aside, expression thoughtful, the green fading from his face as curiosity and a case took over. One dead vamp could be a coincidence. But two meant a hunter, and twelve cases of cow mutilation meant a nest.

"Don't remember." Dean shook his head. They had no way of knowing, now. That body had been cremated well before they got to town.

Sam leaned against the edge of the table, watching his brother closely. "Those spider senses picking anything up yet?"

The phrasing may have been sarcastic, but the question itself wasn't.

"Yeah. Nothing good." Dean stared at the decapitated vampire as his stomach started stirring unhappily. This was familiar as hell, yet he still couldn't place it. He wished those twisting knots that spelled nothing but trouble would spell something more helpful so his brain could get on the same page as his déjà vu.

-o-o-o-

They hit up the local dive bar next to scout for unfriendly faces, or anyone who'd noticed something like that lately. They kept an eye out for the hunter variety, but Dean didn't spot anyone he knew, and hunters did know how to blend in when they wanted to. He didn't see anyone who stood out as a vamp, either. Not that those were that much easier to spot than hunters. The bartender offered up a couple suspects – hippies on a farm at the edge of town – after Sam offered him some monetary incentive.

Dean's déjà vu got worse.

"We've got company." Sam said it quietly, but Dean already knew. He'd already sensed the eyes on them as they left the bar. The feeling hadn't gone away, more than a block down the road.

The two brothers communicated in perfect silence, barely a physical sign of the conversation that passed between them. As they rounded a corner, they both broke into a run to make it to the next corner before whatever was following them caught up. Dean was expecting a vamp, so when Sam tackled Gordon Walker – the hunter drawing up short, spinning around in search of his disappearing prey – Dean was taken completely by surprise.

Son of a bitch. No wonder he was having déjà vu.

"Show us your teeth!" Sam barked, shoving the hunter by the shoulder. His back hit the wall and Sam kept him there, arm pressed across his chest.

Dean was the one with the knife pressed to the hunter's throat, body acting on auto-pilot even while his brain froze up. But now he didn't know whether to pull back or finish the damn job. Gordon caused them a hell of a lot of trouble once upon a time, and ended up a hunt himself after trying to kill Sammy, who knew how many times. Trouble was an understatement, and Dean didn't take kindly to anyone who had it out for his brother, least of all this asshole.

Still, killing a hunter in cold blood wasn't a great idea, and it hadn't been so long ago for Dean that that kind of murderous bloodthirst sang through his veins like heroine. He wasn't eager to go back there. So he pulled away, sheathing the knife.

"He's not a vampire, Sammy. He's a hunter."

Gordon, arms raised and cool as a cucumber, fixed narrowed eyes on the older Winchester. "You know me? Cuz I don't know you."

Dean didn't answer right away, lip twitching with indecision. Knowing that any lie of who they were would only cause them more grief when Gordon actually found out, he said, "Dean Winchester. This's my brother, Sam."

Sam hesitated for a moment, glancing back at his brother with raised brows and getting an imperceptible nod in return, before he pulled off of the other hunter. Gordon huffed in disbelief, lowering his arms with a little chuckle. He straightened his jacket.

"Sam and Dean Winchester. Well, I'll be damned." He shook his head with a stronger chuckle. "You know, I met your old man once? Hell of a guy. Great hunter." Gordon lowered his head, eyes still locked on the two brothers. He probably meant it as consolation. All Dean saw was a threat. "I heard he passed. I'm sorry."

"Yeah, thanks." Dean cut him off before he could keep going, the dismissiveness in his tone standing out particularly strong to Sam, who was eyeing him warily. But Dean was utterly unimpressed with anything this son of a bitch had to say, to hell with the fact that he actually came across like a decent guy. Dean knew he wasn't, and had been fooled by it once already. How he'd ever thought of Gordon Walker as anything but a creep, he sure as shit didn't know now. "You the one taking out the vamps in the area?"

He knew he was, but after all this time, the man from the future was more than competent at this game.

"Yep. Been here two weeks."

"Did you check out the Barker Barn?" Sam asked, still unsure of Dean's cold disposition, but they had a job to do all the same and he knew how to follow his brother's lead. He'd pry answers out of him later.

Meanwhile, it took quite a lot of restraint on Dean's part not to tell him to stop talking to Gordon entirely. That asshole shouldn't even know Sammy's name, let alone be talking to him. But it would be a hell of a lot more suspicious than just dismissiveness were Dean to call him out on it. So the older Winchester gritted his teeth and stayed quiet, trying to remember how this went the first time.

They had ended up in a bar together, Sam calling it quits while Dean and Gordon got all chummy. Bastard.

"It's a bust," Gordon answered, a wry smile in Sam's direction. "Just a bunch of hippie freaks. Though they could kill you with that patchouli smell alone."

Sam, frowning, glanced at Dean. He just shook his head as minimally as possible. Gordon was a damn good hunter, though, even if he was also the scum of humanity. So he picked up on the silent conversation between the brothers.

"Look, I got this one covered, fellas." Gordon gave them a toothy grin. "Don't get me wrong, it's a real pleasure meetin' you, but I've been on this thing over a year. I killed a fang back in Austin, tracked the nest all the way up here. I'll finish it."

"We could help," Sam offered even as Dean opened his mouth to tell him sure-fucking-thing, hope you go and get yourself killed there buddy. He closed his jaw tight enough to hear his teeth squeak in his skull. Damnit.

"Thanks, but, uh, I'm kind of a go-it-alone type of guy." Gordon was still smiling, despite the growing tension between the three.

"You know what?" Dean cut in quickly, before Sam could say anything more. Maybe a little too quickly – both Sam and Gordon seemed a little started by it – but screw it. He was ending this now. "So are we. You seem to have this handled."

He gave Sam a pointed look – smile tight and eyes telling him to shut-the-fuck-up-and-play-along. Sam frowned in response, but Dean could tell he'd follow the lead. So he turned back to Gordon with as friendly a smile as he could muster. "We'll leave you to it. Besides, I hear there's a Chupacabra two states over. Maybe we'll check that out instead."

Even as he said it, Dean thought, 'what?' But that was about as much thought as he gave it. Wouldn't be the first time he'd spewed lines like he was reading a script his conscious mind didn't remember. The joys of re-living the same days over again a decade later.

"Uh, okay," Sam said a little uncertainly against the heavy silence suddenly between them. Gordon's eyes were locked on Dean, a tight frown making him look dangerous. Sam glanced back and forth between them, but he stuck his hand out in an attempt to salvage whatever this was. "It was nice meeting you. Good luck with the hunt."

"Yeah…" Gordon hesitated for a moment, eyes darting back to Dean again, before he smiled at Sammy and returned the hand shake. "You too. Have fun with that Chupacabra."

Dean grabbed Sam by the shoulder and nudged him back the way they came. He didn't bother with a farewell, hoping they never saw Gordon Walker again.

-o-o-o-

The vampire hunter watched both Winchesters walk away, continuing down the street they'd first been on when he'd followed them from the bar. He'd been expecting hunters, though to be honest vampires hadn't been ruled out either. He hadn't expected them to be the Winchester boys, though. Hadn't expected meeting them to feel so…off, either.

And what Dean had said there, at the end. Gordon had just been about to open his mouth and say the same damn thing. He'd meant it as a joke – what was a little pissing contest between hunters now, anyway? – but the older Winchester had said it first. And not just a random, tossed-on-the-wind insult. Dean had used the damn same words – word for word – that he'd had been about to say himself.

Gordon watched the two of them walk away, an uneasy feeling in his gut. He didn't know what the hell was going on, but he knew one thing for sure. He trusted his gut, and it sure as hell didn't trust the Winchesters.

-o-o-o-

As soon as they were back in the car, Sam was on him.

"What was that about? That was one of the few hunters we've ever met outside of Dad's contacts!" Sam sounded pissy, but Dean knew him better. He was more worried than anything else. "Why rush off? We could have helped him with the nest."

Dean was shaking his head before his brother was finished. "Not this one, Sammy. Gordon's bad news. We want nothing to do with him."

He glanced in the side mirror, looking for any signs that the hunter had followed them. He hadn't sensed anyone tailing them again, but he didn't trust Gordon Walker and he didn't trust Time as far as he could throw either of them (and considering one of them was a friggin' unattainable physics concept, that wasn't very friggin' far).

"We should get out of town tonight." And not stop at a motel like they'd been planning. Gordon could go and get himself killed by one of those vamps, for all Dean cared. Hell, he was half hoping for it. Would sure save them a lot of future pain. "Trust me on this one."

It was clear by the slant of Sam's eyes that he was going to need more explanation than that (and Dean would give it) but he didn't argue as he started up the car and pointed them away from Red Lodge, Montana.

-o-o-o-

It was later that night and two towns over, settling into a motel for the night, that Sam finally figured out why leaving Gordon Walker to his hunt bothered him so much.

"We can't always run."

Dean looked up at the words, delivered evenly. Sam wasn't looking for a fight, but he knew it could escalate into one easily enough, especially if they kept doing it.

"You said we let one of the vampires go last time. Because her nest was only killing cows. If Gordon finishes the hunt, she's dead. That's on us; we should have stayed."

"Sam, she was a vamp." Dean held his hand up before Sam started talking over him. "I know things aren't always black and white, alright? She may not have deserved to die, but her nest was still calling a hell of a lot of attention to themselves. That's on them, not us."

"And the next time?" When the older Winchester just frowned, Sam continued, "The next time we're on a hunt you know ends badly, are we just going to keep running? Cas said we had to stay on the timeline-"

"Screw the damn timeline!" Dean was shaking his head. "Gordon tried to kill you in that timeline, damnit. Multiple times, and he got damn close to succeeding! That same timeline wants you dead, Sam, or did you forget? So no, I'm not putting you and Gordon Walker in the same state if I can help it. If Time wants to say the same, she's going to have to work for this one."

All good points, Sam could concede, but he had a point too. After all, what if that vampire they had saved went on to do something important? It could be something as minor as convincing one more vampire to go human-free. One more vampire they didn't face in the future. Maybe the vampire that finally took one of them down. Or someone they cared about. Or someone else vital to the future.

Time was a pond full of thousands of ripples. They couldn't afford to keep making more.

"We can't always run, Dean."

His brother sighed, scrubbing at his short hair. "I know, alright? We pick our battles. But this is one of them."

"Alright," Sam answered after a pause, yielding because he had every intention of keeping his brother to that compromise. It didn't sit right with him that they turned tail as soon as they knew a battle wouldn't go their way, and he had the feeling Dean wasn't planning on changing that strategy any time soon.

They were better men than that. Better hunters. If they were going to stop an apocalypse, they would have to be.

-o-o-o-

As luck would have it, Gordon Walker did not get killed by vampires that night. It had been one hell of a close call though. Close enough he'd even thought, for just the briefest of moments, maybe he should have taken Sam on his offer to team up. He'd shaken off the thought just as soon as the vampire who nearly took his head off was alleviated of his own.

He cleaned the rest of the nest out by dawn, burning the bodies and making sure none had escaped like in Austin. Then he packed up and left town, looking for his next hunt. A couple weeks of travel and killing eventually landed him close enough to the Roadhouse for a stop, and low and behold, it was poker night. He figured, sure, he could do with a little more cash on the side – the werewolf two states back and cost him a pretty penny in silver before he'd gone down.

They were several hands in, Gordon already on the up in both money and his companions' ire, when he casually dropped the Winchester name. It sparked a new round of conversation, a couple of the boys telling tall tales about run-ins with John. One man that Gordon didn't know well enough to trust stood up for him. Another muttered something dark that wasn't quite catchable.

"What about his boys?" Gordon asked, again keeping his tone carefree. "I met them a couple weeks back. They offered a team-up. Think I should have taken it?"

Anyone who knew Gordon Walker would have thought it a weird question. He didn't do team-ups. But these men didn't. Or had a drink too many in them to notice.

A couple more stories got passed around – rumors mostly. Only one of them had actually interacted with John's boys. He'd kept them pretty tucked away, was the overall consensus. It wasn't the kind of information Gordon was looking for and he'd just about called it a bust when someone new spoke up.

"Dean's psychic." The voice hadn't come from their table, and Gordon snapped a sharp gaze to the man sitting just behind them, nursing a drink of his own. He was pretty far gone already, hiccupping into the beer as he took another sip.

"Bullshit." Steve Wandell – the man who had spoken in John's defense – glanced at the others for support. "Dean Winchester ain't no psychic."

"Heard Ellen say it herself," the man grumbled defensively, glaring their way. "Handed her a hunt – thing was confusing as shit – and she straight up called him 'bout it. He already knew all 'bout the damn thing. Couple hours later, Dean Winchester strolls in like he owns the place."

The poker table fell quiet as the men glanced at one another in shock.

"Well, shit," Ramsey Masters – a dunce of a man, but build like a brick shithouse – shook his head in disbelieve. "No wonder he hid those boys away. Bet John didn't want that getting out."

The conversation turned to the hypocrisy of a hunter like that having a psychic for a son, how that must have put John's boxers in one hell of a twist and that the boy was lucky to be alive at all. Gordon stopped listening. The others didn't even notice that he wasn't laughing along.

"I fold."

The vamp hunter pushed back from the table amid minor outcry. Sort of cheap to walk out when you had everyone's money, after all. He tossed a couple of bills back onto the pile, pocketing the rest. On his way out he offered Ellen a wave and Jo a wink which wasn't returned. It never was, but he didn't mind much.

He left the Roadhouse, tossing his keys in the air as he went, a whistle on his lips and Dean Winchester on his mind.

-o-o-o-

Lilith was pouring over maps of North America, more specifically the four potential Hell Gates located across the continent. Azazel was correct; Fossil Butte Cemetery was their best option. It was the most accessible, the best positioned for getting demons into hosts quickly and efficiently, and there were at least two dozen seals primed and ready in the United States. Not to mention the entrance of Lucifer's cage this century had lined up on the east coast of the country.

One of the States' hell gates was clearly the superior choice for their plan.

If Fossil Butte fell, the backup was the one in Arizona. It was still within the boundaries of the country, so they wouldn't need to worry about getting hundreds of possessed humans across borders. But it was a tricky one to open, with multiple factors needing to line up perfectly and the timing damn close. Lilith had her best people on it, but still their success rested entirely on things outside their control.

The Canadian and Mexican Gates were the backups of their backups, and Hell's Princess was really hoping it didn't come to that. The gate in southern Wyoming would be so much easier. Which was probably why Samuel Colt had built a fucking hundred square mile devil's trap around it.

"I want forces on both backup gates, but put the larger contingent at Oaxaca." Her lieutenant shuffled the papers around at her command, writing a quick note down before he pulled out a detailed map of the Hell Gate located in southern Mexico.

"It's a long distance to travel, and that border will be harder to cross in mass without calling attention to ourselves," he commented blandly. Lilith didn't have a particular like or dislike of this soldier. He was good with the paperwork, fast to answer her commands and see her will done, and didn't seem terrified of her in the slightest. Which was probably what let him point out flaws in her plans without getting his head removed.

Useful, but it still pissed her off.

"The Slave River Gate may be closer, but it's in the middle of nowhere," she bit back, the challenge in her words more or less a reminder to him who was in charge. Not that he ever questioned it. Another thing that pissed her off. "We need available hosts. Line the men up for Oaxaca."

He jotted down another note in silence, gathered the maps in a shuffle, and peeled an entirely different paper off the top of the stack he'd been carrying when he entered the room. "The newest report from Azazel."

She took it harshly. That yellow eyed bastard hadn't checked in by blood for weeks now, and she was starting to take it personally. As she read the report, she went from being affronted to full fury.

"He's lost the Winchesters again?!"

Her lieutenant didn't even blink. He took the paper back. "Only the ability to track them. They appear to have warded themselves. Azazel has not been able to enter Sam Winchester's dreams in some time. It is unclear if he has found a way to ward his mind or is simply not sleeping."

"I told him he was pushing Sam too hard with the blood!" She let out a howl of rage, kicking at the base of the rock-formed table and scuffing her little white shoe. They should have sent in Ruby. She wouldn't have messed this up so royally. "Get me our best demon for tracking humans. We'll find them the old fashion way."

"So…" her man finally hesitated, raising a bland eyebrow. "I'll summon Crowley, then?"

The Princess let out another enraged shriek, but braced against the rock table rather than break the entire thing in two like she wanted. He had a point, even if she was loathe to admit it. God, she hated that bastard. There was just something so… slimy about him, even for a demon. And lazy. And entitled! But…he did have all the connections they needed and the time he spent topside as the King of the Crossroads (a title he had given himself)meant he was the best of those in high command to utilize human's ever developing technology.

"Yes, fine, whatever." She kicked the rock again for good measure. "And tell Azazel to move up his timetable. Now. I am done playing games with these hunters!"

Her lieutenant excused himself with a dip of his head and she went back to studying the gate just outside Gallup, Arizona. She was pretty sure the damn pagans had sealed that one up, if the level of tricks and riddles hiding the damn thing was any indication. Nuisances, the lot of them. But she had her best, the girl she'd been ready to set on Sam, hunting down the last of the Hopi gods and guardians, looking for an answer.

Another hour or so passed before Crowley was knocking on the smoldering stone entrance to their war room. She waved him in without even looking up.

"I need a way to track the Winchesters." As he opened his mouth, likely to deliver a rivetingly unhelpful and sarcastic comment, she clarified, "A human way."

"Have you tried microchipping them? It's all the rage with lost pets these days." He rolled on the balls of his feet, hands in his pockets and she considered breaking every last one of his fingers.

"A realistic option, Crowley. Now." Her snippiness never seemed to affect him much. Unlike her lieutenant, whose calm was unbreakable, Crowley just didn't seem to give a crap. It always rubbed her the wrong way. She wasn't stupid; the demon in front of her was intelligent. One of the more intelligent among the High Command. He just didn't seem to care about applying it for anything more than irritating the rest of them.

She didn't trust that either. No demon was passive.

"Do you have a number we could track?" he asked instead, shrugging half-heartedly. "Cellphones have GPS nowadays. It's quite easy, if you have the right people in your pocket. We just need a number to call, love."

She chewed on the inside of her lip, annoyed. She didn't need the obvious answers. "We tried that; there are no numbers registered under their real names. They have to be using aliases. And we can't tap their friends' phones to wait for them to call. Most of them have warding on their landlines."

And no cellphones under their names, either. Damn paranoid, tax-evading hunters.

Crowley hummed, a thoughtful look crossing his face. Lilith raised her eyebrows at him and he gave her a tight lipped smile. "Hmm, I think I recall reading something in the prophet's work. Wasn't a number left in John Winchester's voicemail – one of the early books? You know, I believe there was..."

She hadn't gotten to read them herself – they had a hard enough time keeping their own paperwork from bursting into flames down here – but she'd personally slit the throats of the eleven demons she'd put on the task for missing that.

"It'll be a one-time shot, of course," Crowley continued. "Once they figure it out, Dean will surely change numbers."

"Do it," Lilith commanded with a nod. "Get Azazel the results."

He gave a mock little bow, and Lilith decided to put off ordering his assassination for at least another week. Damn demon always seemed to provide the right amount of information just when she was absolutely at her limit and would suffer him no longer. Slimy bastard probably did it on purpose.

-o-o-o-

The woman looked up from her book as Tom's cell phone rang. The demon pulled it out of his pocket with a taunting smile her way, which she returned with a sneer. He flipped the thing open and pressed it to his ear.

"Hello?" His tone remained neutral, and the woman could not hear the other side of the conversation. So it was with some surprise that Tom lowered the device, said, "It's for you," and tossed it to her.

She caught it with a fumble, having to hastily drop the last of the Supernatural series, and practically snapping the device shut in the meanwhile. She shot him a glare, raising the phone to her ear, but there was nothing.

"Your sense of humor leaves so much to be desired." The woman snapped the phone shut and picked her book back up. She had no intention of returning the mobile device to the demon and far more interest in what happened with the reaper and the hospital.

"Oh, you have to dial first," he interrupted her reading again with a shark-toothed grin. "Don't you know how phones work?"

She glared at him, neither of them blinking since neither of them had the need, until she flipped the stupid thing back open. He was well aware she'd never actually used one before.

He smiled widely. "866-907-3235."

The number sounded vaguely familiar, which the woman found curious. She had no experience calling anyone (the phone in the motel had been conveniently disabled shortly before the Professor was brought in) and the only numbers she had heard since came from the television, and those were rare. Somehow, she doubted her babysitter was having her call one of those.

She pushed the buttons without taking her furious green eyes off of the demon, raising the phone to her ear. "And who am I calling?"

Tom didn't answer, but the owner of the number she dialed did. "Hello?"

The woman kept narrowed eyes on the smirking demon. "Hello."

"…Yeah? Who is this?" the man on the other end, suspicion now in his voice, sounded annoyed.

"Who's this?" she parroted blandly, still eyeing her keeper, who seemed content to lean back in the motel chair, crossing his arms behind his head. She was pretty sure she had seen this conversation occur on television. It had been funny then.

"Look, lady, you called me."

"Did I?"

Tom chanced a glance at his watch.

"Yeah, you did. Now what the hell do you want?"

The demon watched the seconds tick by before he gave her a thumbs up and then swirled his pointer finger in the air. She was unfamiliar with the gesture, but got the gist.

"Must be a wrong number." She pulled the phone from her ear and pressed the end call. The woman tossed the phone back to the demon, unimpressed. "What was the purpose of that?"

"Oh, just finding a wayward sheep." He sat up from his relaxed position, looking down at the phone like he expected a call. Sure enough, a moment later it started ringing. He flipped it open without so much as looking at the number. "Got it? Great. We'll see you there."

He stood, stretched his arms over his head until his back gave a loud pop, and then bent over to the duffle bag at his feet that he had brought with him the day before. He pulled a new set of fabrics out along with a pair of ridiculous looking things that the woman could only assume were shoes, given their vague foot-like shape, if one ignored the six inch spikes protruding from the heel. She'd seen such nonsense on the television, and had wondered how the women (and that one man on that one very weird show she'd stumbled upon) had managed to walk in them.

"Get dressed, Princess." Tom tossed her the pile. "It's time to meet your Prince Charming."

Chapter End Notes

> Dean's number: I take anything mentioned in the show as being written in the books. Apparently, while I was not part of the fandom in those first two years, the number listed in John's voicemail for Dean was an actual number the show set up that you could call, which went to a voicemail of Dean telling John to call them if he got this. It was eventually disabled, but I thought that was pretty damn cool. Gotta love those guys, they always go

all out for the fans :D

High Heels Bit: Okay, so that last paragraph was supposed to have an additional line at the very end about actresses in high heels, but I had to remove it due to chronology. However, I loved the line so much (and it gives more info about our mystery woman) that I think you all should get to have it anyway:

"One actress had even run in a pair, chased by a large, lizard-like beast that apparently represented a dinosaur (if she had correctly understood the plot) but looked nothing like the actual creatures she'd once seen roam the earth."

I was so excited to put it in there because that seen in Jurassic World cracked me up and also because feathered dinosaurs for the win! But I couldn't because that movie didn't release until 2015. I actually didn't catch that until my third read through :P

P.S. Since we're talking about chronology (and mistakes), a reviewer brought attention long long ago (and I've been so bad about getting back to people) to my use of Twilight jokes. S/He was correct that the movies did not come out until 2008 but by 2006 the books were in full swing and gaining mass popularity. So I figured it was fairly safe to keep using those jokes, as I can only imagine vampire hunters (Dean particularly) would find the idea of sexualized teenage sparkly vampires worth laughing about.

Keep keeping me on my toes, guys! I get stuff wrong all the time (and barely catch most of it last minute. Looking at you and those terrifying red heels, Bryce Howard!)

P.P.S. I've kind of been assuming that you all either enjoy my little A/N rants and behind-the-scenes tidbits or just skip them if they're not your thing. But maaaybe someone should tell me if they're annoying, because I can also cut them out. As if the A/N rambles at the start of each chapter weren't hint enough, I am a little bit of a chatterbox. (Just a little ;P)

Reviews: "Like button pushed!" There, you can even copy and paste it now :P Come on, guys, Gordon Walker thinks Dean is the psychic this time around! That means he's gonna try and kill HIM, not Sam, and Dean has no idea it's coming!!! Yell at me about it! I've got chest feathers that need preening! XD

Chapter 61: Season 2: Chapter 28

Chapter Notes

A/Ns: Whelp, I feel both vindicated and like a jerk. I appreciate those who piped up in regards to my request for comments/like buttons! I also knew (I really, really did, in the part of my brain that isn't lying to me all the time) that there were probably reasons for the silence. Good reasons, even. The best reason, though, didn't occur to me at all. I'm sorry for getting cranky at you guys for not reviewing when a decent chunk of you were busy re-reading the story . That's, uh, that's a pretty damn good reason. My bad, y'all.

Keep "pushing" that like button now and then, please! :D

Chapter References: If you do not recall the unofficial deal/ truce/"I'll scratch your back, you give me a hand job" partnership the boys entered into with Crowley, refresher course can be found in chapter 51. Season 2: Chapter 18. All you really need to remember from it is that last bit, though ;D

Chapter Warnings: The boys are drinking beer and playing pool while Hell's making its first, second, and third counter play, and Crowley's lining himself up for a hand job. :D

See the end of the chapter for more notes

-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-

The Road So Far (This Time Around)

Season 2: Chapter 28

-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-

The bar was noisy for a Thursday night, but being one of only a handful of bars in town – a college town, mid-summer, no less – and certainly the dive-iest of those establishments, meant there was almost always a particular clientele available for drinking and billiards. And tonight, Dean and Sam were taking advantage of that.

The older Winchester slid back into his chair with two pints and a grin from ear to ear.

"Did you get anything other than the bartender's number?" Sam, droll as always, asked with a sardonic eyebrow. Dean pffted.

"I'll have you know, I'm a professional." And he was. A thirty-something professional in a twenty-something body that still occasionally (more than occasionally) thought it was a teens-something body. Seriously, he'd had to crank one out that morning. Even late twenty-something was ridiculous. So he waved the napkin in front of his brother's face, the bartender's number written in fresh blue ink. "I got her number professionally."

"In case she 'remembers anything useful'?" Sam's tone said pretty clearly what he thought of that, and Dean pfft'ed again.

"You're no fun." He leaned forward into the table, chest coming close to the foam-topped glasses of beer. "You remember fun, Sammy? It's that thing you do, with girls?"

"That's sex, Dean."

"They're synonyms." The older Winchester looked personally offended, pushing his brother's drink across the table to him.

Sam rolled his eyes, taking his beer and casting eyes around the bar again far too nervously for Dean's taste. "You remember why we're actually here?"

It was the older Winchester's turn roll his eyes, but he supposed Sammy had a point. Despite the cute (and promisingly loose) bartender, they were out on a Thursday night indulging in alcohol and (maybe) women, and for once the reason wasn't a celebration of a hunt well done.

-o-o-o-

-Twelve Hours Earlier-

The knock on the motel room door was not exactly expected, but it wasn't a surprise either. It was late enough for housekeeping to start making rounds and Dean had made a pretty pointed comment to the manager on their way in last night that their towel quality left much to be desired. Like, four inches of coverage and about a half inch of thickness.

The face that greeted Dean when he opened the door, absentmindedly rubbing at his chest as he did so, was a surprise.

"Morning, Squirrel. Where's Moose?"

Well, at least that explained the aching sternum.

Sam, fresh out of the shower with only a towel around his waist, nearly dropped his toothbrush from his mouth as he came out of the bathroom in time to see Dean standing in front of the open door with none other than the King of the Crossroads smiling way too charmingly on their stoop at nine in the morning.

"Ah. There he is. And he comes with a view."

Sam definitely, definitely, didn't blush. The demon, however, grinned that much wider, and Sam's forehead did that 'Danger, warning, abort, abort!' bit where it smoothed completely out and brown eyes turned murderous. But his cheeks were still dotted that lovely shade of red and the King of the Crossroads wagered, eh, worth it.

"Crowley?" Dean asked incredulously, like he thought maybe his eyes were tricking him. As Sam hastily went for a clean set of clothes, Dean leaned out into the corridor, looking left and right like he expected to find Ashton Kutcher and a camera crew. "What the hell are you doing here?"

The demon, after checking the floor and ceiling for any tricksy devils traps, invited himself into the room. With an annoyed look and a sweepingly sarcastic gesture, Dean closed the door behind him.

"You ask for my number, but you don't even call. Really, Dean, I'm insulted." Crowley eyed the heavily fish-themed décor of their most recent crash pad as Dean crossed his arms over his still-aching chest, thoroughly unimpressed. Not like Crowley had actually given them a number to call. (Not that Dean would have called, anyway.)

"Well, this is homey." The demon turned to face them, hands in his pockets. "Azazel is looking for you."

"Tell us something we don't know," Dean said as Sam also replied, "Because we went off grid."

"Oh, but it does come with such nice surround sound." Crowley raised a hand to tap his ear mockingly before strolling about the small room, poking at this and that. It was hard to say which brother rolled his eyes harder. Ignoring them both, the demon settled at the little kitchenette, where Dean's cell phone and their duffel of weapons lay open on the table. The demon felt both hunters tense behind him, so close to so many things that could kill them easily. It was Crowley's turn to roll his eyes – though he did enjoy their oh-so-delectable fear and distrust – and he reached out to tap a finger loudly on the phone casing. "Not off grid enough, it would seem."

He gave them a pointed look and Dean frowned, brain turning over as Crowley's hint found home base.

"Shit," he grumbled, and Sam sent him a questioning look. "That woman who called. The 'wrong number'?"

Dean remembered thinking it was weird. He hadn't recognized the number or the voice, which had been slightly accented. An odd one Dean couldn't place. Something vaguely Jewish, but like middle-eastern, old-time Hebrew Jewish, not Larry David with his putz and his schmucks and his bald-headed American Jew glory. Nothing worth reporting to Sam, especially once Dean decided the whole thing was weird but not outlandish. He'd written it off as nothing more and the brothers had gone on with their day.

The hunter now turned to Crowley. Realization dawned on Sam's face as the older Winchester asked, a little miffed, "That was one of yours?"

The King of the Crossroads shrugged. "Azazel's, not mine. I'm just the messenger. Speaking of, I am going to have to give him something, so..." Crowley mockingly spread his arms in a regal, sweeping gesture. "I'm here as a courtesy heads up. This is me, scratching your back, boys."

Sam grimaced as he recalled the rest of the saying Crowley had mutilated that night at the crossroads. The demon just grinned, all smarmy. He swiped Dean's phone off the table, punching a couple of the keys before tossing it to its owner.

"I'll call when I want that return favor."

Crowley sent a wink Sam's way, enjoying as the brunette definitely didn'tblush again. Dean caught the phone with yet another unimpressed glare (Crowley had been right, he was going to see that look a lot now that they were 'partners') and glanced down at the device. The demon had entered his number under the name 'The King'. Dean rolled his eyes yet again, but Crowley was already gone.

Sam eyed his brother and the phone in his hand like it might detonate. If Crowley was telling the truth – and what could he possibly gain from lying about this? – then Azazel would be on his way shortly, and that meant nothing good for them. For Sam. "What do you want to do?"

The man from the future stared down at the small screen for a minute, long enough for it to darken, before he tightened his fingers around the plastic. His brother's lecture about running away was still pretty fresh in his mind. "We trap the room. Leave the phone here, spend the day on the hunt, like we would if we didn't know. Tonight we'll waste time at a bar."

And when they came back, maybe they'd have a yellow eyed bastard caught in their snare.

-o-o-o-

-Present-

Dean eyed his moody brother before he leaned back in his seat, using it as a convenient move to scan the crowd around them. No one seemed particularly suspicious. No one watching them. Dean had hoped Azazel – or whatever flunky he sent after them now that Meg had eaten a bullet – would either fall into their trap at the motel or realize they weren't home and wait for them there. But, he supposed, one of the reasons they'd kept to strictly public places today was in case they were followed. The college town wasn't huge, and while it might not have been easy to find any one random person among the several thousand living here, hunters weren't all that hard to locate when they were on a hunt.

Court houses, public libraries, cemeteries, morgues, the cheap motels. And bars.

Still, no one stood out, and Dean didn't see any point in wasting the evening just because demons might be on their tail again. He wished he could get Sam to loosen up a little, though. Kid was wound tighter than a girdle on a Baptist minister's wife at an all-you-can-eat pancake breakfast. And yeah, alright, he had some fair reasons to be that high-strung. But Dean also knew from experience that stressing about the shit-storm perpetually about to rain down on them didn't change when or where that raincloud dumped.

Besides, they were supposed to be playing innocent, here. Acting normal. Blending in. Sitting there, externally brooding and internally panicking wasn't exactly the ticket.

"I'm gonna go make some cash," Dean announced, grabbing his beer and standing up from the table. Sam eyed him like he was crazy. "Next rounds on you. And try to relax, will you? You look more suspicious than anyone else in here! Fidgeting like a tween who forgot his fake."

Sam watched, mildly insulted and trying to stop his anxious movements, as Dean lumbered off to the billiards table. He watched the first game, his brother setting the stage as the out-of-towner well on his way to being drunk. Sam idly traced the logo on his pint glass and worked on not glancing around the bar every ten seconds. Dean was right; a demon would be crazy enough to approach them in this public a space.

But the younger Winchester didn't trust Azazel to be sane, either.

Realizing he was doing nothing but warming the beer, Sam finished it in a single chug – it was more Dean's flavor profile anyway and not particularly strong – and headed for the bar for something that might take the edge off. He wasn't a fan of that page in his brother's book, but he couldn't seem to lose the nervous twitch of his fingers or the way his gaze jerked to every loud sound in the crowded bar. Maybe a little liquid courage would help him do as Dean said and relax.

He waited at the bar for his drink – something stronger than Dean's pick but nothing to lose his wits over in case there was a demon waiting for them back at the motel – when he realized the guy next to him was staring. Sam glanced over, but there was nothing particularly remarkable (or suspicious) about the blonde. Except maybe his choice in strappingly tight black t-shirts. Sam gave him a grimace (the kind of smile that said 'stop smiling at me before I punch you') and angled away from him none-too-subtly. He felt the guy's gaze on him another moment longer, long enough for Sam to consider muttering 'Christo' under his breath just to be sure, but then the bartender returned with his drink and he, thankfully, left the bar and Mr-I-Wear-Shirts-Two-Sizes-Too-Small behind.

Only to crash right into someone. Sam winced at the sound of breaking glass and the cold slosh of a drink splashing over his hands.

"Shit!”

He looked down at the person whom he'd crashed into (who had crashed into him?) and had to look a lot further down than he anticipated.

"Shit, I am so sorry."

It was a woman, and she was short. Well, everyone was short compared to Sam, as his brother reminded him often. But she was particularly short, top of her blonde head not quite making his shoulder as she swapped the broken cocktail glass in her hand for the napkin that had been wrapped around it. Sam didn't even realize he was bleeding until she'd taken his free hand and started dabbing at the small cut just above his thumb. Her drink must not have been particularly strong – the alcohol dripping off his fingers didn't even sting.

"Shit," she swore again.

Sam couldn't help but laugh. Her fingers were warm on his, almost tingling, actually, and the hunter felt tension ease out of his shoulders and away from his mind like a handful of water he couldn't hold onto. As she dabbed at the cut, he received a glare – probably for laughing – but there was no heat in it, and it made him grin wider.

She had blue eyes to go with her blonde hair, and the immediate reminder of Jess threatened Sam's smile. The love of his life had glared at him like that, too. Only, she'd done it from about six inches higher.

The woman's grip still tingled and he laughed again, the painful thoughts drifting away like the rest of that handful of water. He felt lighter than he had in days. Too light to question it, actually. Maybe he'd grabbed a stronger beer than he'd thought.

"It's alright." He set his glass back down on the bar behind him, ignoring Mr. Tight Shirt, who was watching their commotion. Sam took the broken glass out of her hand and set it on the bar as well, even as she kept the napkin pressed to his injured one. "No harm."

"You're bleeding. I think that counts as at least some level of harm."

She had an accent; it was subtle, but Sam was used to picking up things about people quickly. Yiddish, maybe, though he was hardly an expert ear. It was unique, whatever it was.

The woman pulled the napkin away, examining the cut which had already slowed to a sluggish smear. She seemed to think about it for a moment before she relinquished his hand. "I suppose you'll live."

"I sure hope so." Sam chuckled, reaching back for his beer and shaking the last of her spilled drink off his fingers, ignoring the cut. It was minor – practically nothing – after all. "Can I get you a replacement?"

"Shouldn't I be buying you a drink?" The sass in her tone was nothing short of adorable, as was the way she crossed her arms over her chest, stance wide like all five feet, two inches of her were ready to fight him on it. The hunter had a feeling she'd kick his ass if he voiced as much, though. He also entertained the thought she might even succeed.

Short, but fierce, Sam noted with a grin.

"Mine didn't spill," he countered teasingly, raising the glass in a toast. It wasn't until he was taking a sip that he realized, with a mental jolt, he was flirting. That was what people did, in bars, at night, when they randomly bumped into each other, wasn't it? It was with a second jolt Sam realized he didn't feel nearly as bad about that as he thought he would.

He shouldn't though, should he? He wasn't cheating on Jess because she wasn't waiting on him. Because he wasn't coming back. And there was nothing wrong with a little flirting. It's not like he had any intention of turning this into something more. Just…enjoying himself, was all. Loosening up, like Dean said.

Plus, it was a good distraction from his current worries, which…didn't seem so worrisome right at that moment. Maybe his brother had been right; he just needed to relax. A distraction to get his mind off what he couldn't do anything about.

An… aesthetically pleasing distraction, he wasn't too shy to admit. She was cute: stout and curvy, in a tight black skirt and a sequined top that dipped low on a modest chest. Sam actually thought she looked uncomfortable in the shirt, like maybe it itched. He sympathized, even if he found it amusing. He particularly liked the pair of sneakers on her feet and what looked like some sketchily drawn eyeliner on her features which she'd tried to rub off instead of fix. Like she'd given up getting ready for the night halfway through the process. He could appreciate that in a girl.

"I'm Sam," he introduced himself, sticking out his "injured" hand.

The woman had a firm grip that matched her eyes and stance, but soft skin, and opened her mouth. Whatever she said in reply, however, was lost in the din as billiard balls smacked loudly into one another with a sharp break. Dean's triumphant cry of success – among a racket of anger – blocked out just about any other sound in the bar. Sam looked over at the pool table, where his brother was wearing the grin that usually got him punched or thrown out of places like this. More often than not with a wad of cash in his pocket.

The younger Winchester shook his head and turned back to the woman in front of him, trying to decipher what he'd made out through the noise. "Sorry, did you say 'Stephanie'?"

The corner of her mouth crooked up at him like he'd missed the inside of a particularly good joke. Before he could ask what that laugh might be, she said, "Call me Steph."

He nodded and glanced over his shoulder at the bar, Mr. Tight shirt no longer paying them any attention and the bartender off at the other end. Her broken glass had been taken away. "Are you sure I can't get you something?"

That smile turned more genuine. "No, but thanks. I was on my way out when I bumped into you. I should get going, actually. It was nice to meet you, Sam."

"Yeah, you too, Steph." Realizing that was that, with Stephanie already turning towards the door, Sam started forward a step and awkwardly tacked on, "Maybe I'll see you again? Uh, around town, I mean?"

'Jesus, just ask for her number, ya wuss!'

God, he was bad at this. He was really bad at this if his inner Dean was the one giving him advice. Granted, he hadn't had to deal with flirting in years. As is brother would tell anyone who would listen, he'd never been that great at it to start with.

She laughed and now he was certain she was making fun of him. "Maybe you will."

Still, he didn't really mind as she winked at him playfully and headed for the door. His hand was still tingling and he couldn't help the grin, despite his obvious fumble and overall awkwardness. Ah well, she'd been nice enough to meet. A good distraction, however temporary. He watched her disappear amid the bar crowd, then headed back to his table, drink in hand and worries temporarily forgotten in lieu of blonde hair, blue eyes, and a wicked smirk.

-o-o-o-

As Sam Winchester worked his way back through the establishment, the woman watched from the far end of the bar, path to the front door abandoned as she tracked the boy's progress. She glanced down at the cocktail napkin still in her hand, dotted red with his blood. False blue eyes glowed green for only a moment as she lifted the paper to her lips and sucked on the still fresh life force.

-o-o-o-

Dean got back to their table not long after Sam, neither bruised nor thrown out for once, with a fresh wad of cash in his hand. "Barely even had to shark them!" he announced gleefully, stealing Sam's beer and taking a hearty sip, much to his brother's protest. "Locals were over confident all on their own."

The older Winchester paused in sliding the glass back Sam's way, eyes narrowed on the kid. He had a goofy grin on his face and, even as he shook his head, he glanced over his shoulder towards the bar. Dean's eyebrows climbed towards his hair.

"I know that look. Did you get her number?" He scanned the place immediately, looking for whatever hottie got that stupid smile back on his brother's face. Sam just glared and Dean scrunched up his nose in defense. "What? Come one, are you gonna be celibate the rest of your life? It's been, like, ten months!"

"Eight and a half, Dean."

Green eyes narrowed as he eyed his brother up and down. "How are you even still alive?"

Sam rolled his eyes. "Excuse me for not getting over the love of my life on a schedule more convenient for you."

Dean baulked, but it was mostly for show. He didn't bother digging back at his brother. Truth was, he may be twenty-seven years old again, but in actually, he was pushing the big 4-0 and he knew it. Even damn fine at thirty-eight and plenty capable of gettin' some (and unashamed to own it), Dean really hadn't gone after women like he used to. Not since Lisa.

'Yeah,' he thought, watching his brother with more understanding than he cared to admit. 'I feel you, kid.'

Of course, that didn't stop him from beaming the trademark Dean Winchester, 100-watt, I-am-your-older-brother-and-I-live-to-tease you smile. "So, did you get the standard seven, or did she give you a little five-digit action behind the bar?"

Ultimately, Sam decided his brother was missing a little bruising after all.

-o-o-o-

When the back door of the bar opened, the older man leaning against the side paneling in his worn jeans and farmer's flannel looked up from idly picking his finger nails. His eyes slitted yellow as a blonde haired, blue-eyed woman exited the bar, reaching up to silver charm hanging around her neck as she spotted him. Azazel pushed off the side of the bar with an expectant grin. "So what do you think? Some grade-A material right there, no?"

She yanked the necklace off, little silver charm dangling in the street light. Blonde hair bled into black, pale skin darkened to brown, and pretty blue eyes were overcome by an angry, glowing green. The woman chucked the jewelry at the demon, who caught it with a lazy smile, looking at the clever little thing.

"His blood has something foul in it." She crossed her arms over her chest, glare full of an unknown accusation.

Azazel pocketed the necklace. "Is it going to be a problem?"

Her eyes narrowed further, but his expression gave nothing away. "No. He is compatible."

"Great." Azazel started up a whistle as he turned his back to the bar and started across the parking lot.

"You realize this is not how it is done." The demon paused at the acerbic words, looking over his shoulder at the woman, her stance wide, hands fisted. "The ritual has never been performed on an adult."

Azazel turned fully around now, regarded her with a cant of his head, before he strolled almost nonchalantly into her personal space.

"Are you saying you can't do it?" His eyes flashed yellow as he loomed over her. "Because if you can't hold up your end of the bargain..."

"I am saying," she ground out between clenched teeth, "it has never been done before."

Azazel raised his hand and, were they human, it might be easy to misinterpret his intentions. A passerby might think he was readying to slap her. Instead, the demon twisted his wrist in an elegant little swirl and the thin gold chain from the motel reformed, this time around her neck, a length of slack dipping between them to connect to his wrist in a delicate little loop.

Those green eyes glowed fiercely, but she did not retaliate.

"I am sure I don't need to remind you of our deal, Princess." The demon lowered his hand, the little chain jingling. "You do as I say, you stay topside. If not, you got back into your hole."

"You going to drag me back yourself, demon?" She spat the word at him, fists tightening. Not that he had anything to fear from so mundane a weapon, or, indeed, any weapon she possessed. But, then, he hadn't sought her out for a weapon.

"Oh, I won't need to. A well placed rumor here, a little whisper there. I'm sure news of your freedom would reach those pesky uncles of yours in no time at all."

She might have hid it well, but Azazel was good at recognizing fear, and the woman reeked of it, soaked in fury as it was. Finally, she finally looked away. "I can do it."

"Great!" Azazel turned and started across the parking lot once more. Behind him, the woman frowned and did not move.

"Am I not binding him tonight?"

The demon didn't pause this time, already impatient as it was, and popped the last consonant as he answered, "Nope!"

"Why not?"

Azazel let out an aggravated and dramatized sigh. He stopped once more and turned back to the infuriating woman, though he maintained the space between them this time. More often than not when dealing with her, the demon wished he could strangle the creature to death. If he approached her now, the temptation might just be too strong.

They should have raised one of her siblings. If only Lilith had known where any of them had been buried instead.

"I don't believe questions were included in our deal."

Green eyes narrowed, that fear that had been so sweetly pungent moments before now cleverly hidden behind ferocity. She closed the distance between them, coming within his space, this time. He could appreciate the gall.

"Neither was my silence."

With that, she pushed past him and away from the bar, leading the way. Azazel grinned something feral, and decided maybe, just this once, he could strangle her after all. It's not like she'd die from it. The demon followed almost lazily until he'd caught up (his current host had significantly longer legs). He grabbed her by the elbow and then they were no longer outside.

He deposited her on the motel bed, enjoying the way she yelped as she nearly bounced clean off. Azazel unwound the chain from his wrist, securing it around the foot of the nightstand once more. With another wave, it disappeared from her neck and reformed around her ankle.

"Task number two is to watch the Winchesters. From afar." Picking the last of the Supernatural books off the bed, he tossed it into her lap just as she resettled on the mattress. He waggled a pointer finger at her. "No getting close, and no binding."

"How am I supposed to do that without the bond?" she spat back, tossing the book onto the covers. "They're hunters, and I am not invisible. They're going to notice."

Azazel just grinned, all teeth. "I'm sure you'll figure something out."

With that, he turned and headed for the door, reveling in the fury radiating off of her. He supposed if he couldn't kill her, he could at least infuriate her as much as she did him. He left the motel room to something between a growl and a shriek from the creature, who scooped up the book and chucked it at after him. The Supernatural novel hit the back of the door as it closed behind him.

The woman sunk back onto the bed, crossing her arms and cursing the demon aloud in every language that she knew. It took a good long minute. She knew many languages. As she finally simmered, green eyes drifted down to the book, bent open and laying haphazardly in front of the door.

Huh, she thought, staring at the innocuous little thing. There was an idea.

-o-o-o-

The ringing coming from his jacket was hard to hear over the din of the bar, but Tom could feel it vibrating where his coat hung on the back of the bar seat. The demon set down the cocktail glass he was admiring, broken and jagged from the hit it had taken earlier that evening. Blood still stained one side, drying from where it had pierced Sam Winchester's skin. Tom grinned at it as he pulled out the phone, placing it to his ear without checking the number. Only one person had it, after all.

"Father."

"Tail the Winchesters." Azazel's voice was tinny through the speaker, particularly difficult to hear amid the noises around him, especially if one was human. But Tom was not. The demon glanced over his shoulder, spying the brothers at their table across the bar. "Don't engage and don't get caught. We're too close to the finish line to drag anyone's ass back out'a Hell. You get exorcised, you get left."

"It won't be a problem; I tagged their car. I can follow them from the motel."

"Unless they find the tracker." Azazel's voice was cold, unimpressed. "Do not underestimate them. Your sister made that mistake."

"I'm not her." Tom picked up the glass, tilting it and watching the now-matte blood change colors in the dim light. "And I have Sam Winchester's blood."

He could hear his father's grin and the pride in his voice. Finally. "That's my boy."

Tom hung up the call and finished his drink. He grabbed his coat, threw it on over the too-tight black t-shirt his vessel had chosen the day Tom had chosen him, and left the bar just behind the Winchesters, careful to keep his distance.

-o-o-o-

They got back to the motel close to eleven. The brothers were careful, expecting an ambush, but none presented. It was eerily quiet: entirely too still. The door to their room had been opened, the thin wire Dean placed between the door and the frame as he'd closed it that morning was now on the ground, but there was no demon inside. Either Azazel hadn't entered, or he'd used a human flunky to investigate the room.

Nothing was out of place, and if their wire trap hadn't shown that someone had, at the very least, opened the door, Dean would be lulled into a false sense of security by how damn untouched the room was. But he wasn't that naïve anymore.

They took the chip out of his phone, broke it in two and chucked the whole thing. Then the boys packed, loaded up the Impala, and left town. They'd call another hunter from the road to finish the case there.

As they drove away, they were careful to make sure they weren't being followed.

-o-o-o-

A rough thirty-two hours later, Chuck Shurley trudged tiredly to his front door way too early in the morning to answer a persistent knocking. He was expecting his mail lady, who always had a sharp, rapping knock, about as demanding and patient as the rest of her. He was not, however, expecting to open his front door to an equally severe looking woman whom he had never seen before in his life. She had blonde hair, blue eyes, and a business card in one hand.

"Good morning, Mr. Shurley, my name is Stephanie. Your publisher sent me."

-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-

Chapter End Notes

A/Ns: Hehehe, I'm so excited about this, guys. Not only is so much stuff happening - stuff that has been planned for two friggin' years now - but this story needed more Chuck in it ;D

Up Next: Chuck and 'Stephanie' have a chat, we finally get to learn our mystery lady's real name, and God is not a happy camper about it. Meanwhile, Sam and Dean pull one over on Tom, unaware he's ready to pull one right back, as they head for Guthrie, Oklahoma to investigate a couple of suspicious suicides.

Chapter 62: Season 2: Chapter 29

Chapter Notes

A/Ns: We're posting early! That's right, bitches, it's a holiday weekend, I had plenty of time to get this chapter edited, and I am too excited about it to wait until Sunday. Happy Easter Present to us!

Reviews: your comments last chapter were AWESOME. Someone got awfully close to guessing what our mystery lady might be, for starters :D Btw, about that; I'm really happy you guys are taking stabs and guesses (and no stress if you aren't/don't have one). It helps me gauge how I'm doing with the hints and the like. Also, I should tell you that you're not actually supposed to be able to guess what she is. I am doing that on purpose, in case any of you are getting frustrated or thinking you all should be able to come up with this answer. It is definitely meant to be a dangled-on-a-string type of mystery. Second, someone straight up asked why the bitch hadn't been smote by an archangel yet, showing up on Chuck's door like that (okay, so, I'm paraphrasing, but that's totally the tone I heard in my head). To which I say, yesssssss. The answer to that incredibly legitimate and relevant question is in this chapter, it just so happens ;)

Speaking Of: Welcome to the second of two-plot-twists-that-makes-this-author-incredibly-nervous! The first was Fem!Cas, but it's this one I spent more time debating. I knew I was turning Cas female as soon as I realized I couldn't keep Jimmy as a vessel; it just sucked knowing I'd lose some people to that choice. But this one I could have avoided and deliberately chose not to. See, I usually don't do OCs of any kind, good or evil. (Angela was actually an accident. I never planned for her to be a character, she just sort of…kept happening.) I think my dislike stems from so many being poorly written or unnecessary to the story, and I project my dislike of them onto all readers, convincing myself no one wants or likes to read OCs. Now, I know that's not actually true, and additionally, I am 90% positive I can write a good character who's properly integrated into a story, but… I don't know, the stigma just remained. It took months of debating before I decided, fuck it, I think I've got a cool character on my hands and I want to share that with you. Plus, you know, it's Supernatural, so… I can always just kill off a female character unexpectedly and on absolutely no one's request!

(Looking at you, there, Charlie. And Jo. And Ellen. Eileen. Kaia. God damn. Okay, forget my nervousness, this show needs more women who don't die on us, damnit!)

((You stay the hell away from Jody Mills, Supernatural Writers, or I will knife you!))

(((Disclaimer: All death threats made by the entity known as "the author" or while under the alias "Silence" or "no good dirty rotten" are entirely works of fiction, arguably intended as 'jokes' made by an unfortunate fangirl suffering delusions of comedic genius)))

See the end of the chapter for more notes

-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-

The Road So Far (This Time Around)

Season 2: Chapter 29

-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-

Tom swung his legs back and forth like an unattended child, reading off the information they'd gathered so far. "Carver Edlund's real name is Chuck Shurley. Here's his address and number, as well as the info we have on his Publisher. She's a waste of time though; you're going to have to weasel your way in on your own."

The woman looked up with a frown, even as she accepted several notecards the demon handed her. "This would be far easier if we put someone else in her place. Can one of you hell spawn not simply possess her?"

"Gee, thanks, Sherlock. We hadn't thought of that," Tom deadpanned before rolling his eyes. "Not only is Ms. Siege warded, her entire office is as well. Turns out-" he picked up one of the Supernatural books and tossed it her way, voice dripping with derision- "she's a fan. A paranoid fan. Sending in a human agent got us nowhere. Apparently Mr. Edlund is 'very private,' so you're on your own."

She set the book aside and finished pulling on the blazer he had brought her that morning. Tom regarded her with something between skepticism and disdain. Heavily leaning more towards the latter.

"You can lie, right?"

The look she leveled his way was an insulted one, and he showed off his pearly whites in response.

"To Chuck Shurley?" She grabbed the small silver charm off the motel dresser and slipped it around her neck. Black hair became blonde, green became blue, and suddenly standing in the room was a fairly professional looking, Caucasian woman. "Surely, I can."

The demon groaned. "Don't do that. Ever again."

She rolled her shoulder and fingered the charm around her neck, glancing at it in the mirror attached to the dresser. "Do you know which of the Archangels guards the prophet?"

Tom raised an eyebrow at her in the reflection. "Does it matter?"

"If it is Gabriel or Raphael, this warding may be enough. They were never particularly observant."

"And if it's Michael?"

She settled the necklace back against her skin. "My chances of getting through the day not smote by lightning significantly decrease."

Tom regarded her with a curious look on his face. "Could he do it?"

"Smite me? He's an archangel."

"Kill you."

The woman paused, meeting the demon's gaze in the mirror, the narrow slant of her eyes clearly wondering why he asked. The silence passed between them, heavy and challenging and unbroken, before she turned away from the mirror, the question going unanswered. She crossed back to the bed where she sat and reached down to put on the sneakers she had worn to the bar.

"Ah-ah-ah! Making you look presentable was a pain in the ass; you are not ruining my hard work." Tom jumped down from the kitchenette table, reaching beneath it for a shoebox that he tossed her way. The glare she threw right back once she opened the lid was nothing short of what he'd already prepared for. "You're wearing them."

She pulled out the pair of high heels. "I already told you, I can't walk in them."

"They're pumps. Anyone could walk in them," Tom argued back, having absolutely no clue why his father had wasted breath warning him not to underestimate her. Or why they needed her at all, actually. Up until and including this very moment, she had been nothing but a useless thorn in their sides.

As she violently threw the box onto the bed and started tearing the rolled up balls of paper out of the toes, Tom dug into his jacket pocket. "Last thing: ID and business cards. Sam already thinks your name is Stephanie, so we went with that. Can't exactly use your real one; it's a bit dated, even for the 'Apple' and 'Chandelier' freaks today."

The woman didn't understand half of what came out of his mouth but, then again, this demon did delight in reminding her that everything she knew came from a television set or the internet. She hobbled over to him, one foot already strapped into the 'pump',and ripped the small, plastic identification card out of his hand. It had a photo of her – or the version the warded necklace provided – and the surname the demon had chosen.

The one he'd said would be a perfect fit.

Once she read it, she immediately chucked the thing back at his forehead and hobbled off to put her other ridiculous shoe on.

-o-o-o-

When Chuck opened his front door that morning, clad in not much but a coffee-stained t-shirt, a robe, and a pair of boxers two days old, he was expecting his harried mailwoman with another batch of mis-delivered packages or letters lacking the correct stampage. He and his mail lady didn't get on very well. Their feud was one of suburban legend, to go down in the songs of fishwives everywhere. Or so Chuck let himself believe every time he had to face the tired, overpowering woman who reminded him more of a large toad preparing to swallow him whole than a human being with a sucky job and three difficult children at home.

He was not expecting to open the door to a woman that was most definitely not his mail lady, although she appeared to be equally unimpressed with him. She stood in a stiff suit and heels that brought her maybe to Chuck's nose, bun of crisp blonde hair on the top of her head as strict as the blue-eyed glare she leveled at him. She might have been stunning in a natural sort of way – completely out of his league, he admitted easily – if it wasn't for the blatant expression of distaste plastered on her face and the way she looked like she wanted to climb out of that blazer and blouse combo, possibly to set it on fire to the soundtrack of something Hans Zimmer would write.

Basically, there was not an inch of this woman that did not intimidate the hell out of the poor man whose stoop she chose to grace that morning.

But there was a moment – a single solitary second amid Chuck's initial surprise, then panic, followed by the flush of heat that slickened his palms and the edges of his hairline, wrapping up with potentially epileptic nervousness, before ending, damn near anti-climatically, with well-learned resignation – when Chuck Shurley was not Chuck Shurley anymore. For just that moment, something far older stood in the doorway and stared at the thing on his front step, introducing herself. This ancient being had a penetrating gaze older than time itself, and his face, which looked shockingly similar to Chuck Shurley's, was caught between genuine surprise and terrible anger.

Then the moment was gone, and it was just a human writer, lonely alcoholic, and despondent prophet once more standing in his open door, staring at the woman as he tried not to confuse his tongue with his brain and his brain with his tongue. The source of his tongue-tied brain saw none of this, busy digging into her black and silver embossed purse that seemed about as ill-fitting to her as the outfit. She pulled out a business card.

"Good morning, Mr. Shurley. My name is Stephanie." She held out the card with the brusque efficiency of someone serving a subpoena. Chuck swallowed heavily. He took the card after almost fumbling it twice. "I'm an editorial assistant, here to help you with your newest 'Supernatural' novel. Your publisher sent me."

He stared at the paper in his hand, having not heard much past 'good morning,' since his focus was primary on untangling the jumbled communication line between his neurons and his lips. Chuck blinked at the embossed words running neatly across the card, and his mouth finally took over where his brain was failing him.

"Wait, you're serious?" He glanced back up at the woman with an incredulous look. "Your name is really Stephanie Meyer?"

The tight lip smile she sent him was anything but friendly. "I didn't pick it."

"Uh…" Chuck chuckled weakly, before realizing that she was not laughing along. "Yeah, that's…that's unfortunate. Especially in this industry."

"I'm aware. Someone out there thinks they're very funny."

"Um…" The writer blinked, feeling entirely left out of a joke that he was also pretty sure he didn't want in on. "Right…uh, well, come on in. My- my publisher sent you?"

He stepped to the side so she could enter his house, closing the front door behind her. Chuck gestured nervously for her to follow as he led the way into his living room. She only tripped once on her way, glaring down at her shoes in a manner that made Chuck infinitely grateful he was not them. Once in the room, he had to quickly toss several articles of dirty laundry off the couch, belatedly noticing the numerous half-drunk liquor bottles and takeout boxes scattered on just about every other surface in the room.

God, he really needed to get a life. Preferably a better, less embarrassing one.

Luckily for him, Ms. Meyer didn't seem to care. She set aside a dirty sock that he'd missed and settled herself onto the couch easily enough. "She didn't tell you? Hold on, I have her number here. We can give her a call."

The woman was back to digging through that awful purse and Chuck waved her off, not wanting to be a nuisance by not believing her. It's not like there was any other reason a beautiful woman would sit in his ramshackle house and put up with him at eight in the morning.

"Oh, no, that's okay. I know I'm a bit behind schedule." He looked around awkwardly for a second chair, but entertaining company wasn't exactly a common occurrence for him. "The, uh, the new book just isn't…er, writing itself like the others."

Clumsily, Chuck started to clear a space on the coffee table, scattering empty Red Bull cans and liquor bottles and hastily stacking dishes to the side until he had room enough to perch awkwardly on the edge. He tucked his hands in his lap, then beneath his thighs, then back in his lap, twiddled his thumbs together and hoped he wasn't making a complete fool of himself. He was fairly certain that, too, was a fool's hope.

"Well, that's what I'm here for." The woman attempted a smile, her tone not unkind, but somehow neither seemed right on her. "Keep you on track, read your rough drafts and provide feedback, motivation:

whatever you need."

"Right, that, uh… that sounds… good." Chuck rubbed the back of his neck nervously. "So, um, you've read them, then?"

"The books?" The woman seemed thrown by the question. "Oh, I've read a couple. They're…good."

She barely got the word out without chocking on it and any semblance of patience God had left, hiding behind Chuck's nervousness, was gone. He rolled His eyes and Chuck was no longer Chuck.

"Okay, that's enough." God snapped His fingers and the woman went limp against the back of the couch. He scooted forward on the coffee table, His knees bumping hers, but His expression remained deadly serious. "What are you doing here?"

Her fingers curled slowly against the cushions and the woman blinked heavily. She was fighting it; He could feel her struggle not to answer. God sighed heavily, stood, and crossed the small space between them.

"You really are his child, aren't you?" He sat down beside her, one hand settling on her forearm, the other waving over her head and body. She went completely boneless against the couch, held upright only by his presence beside her. Blue eyes flickered green despite the spell cleverly wrapped in her necklace, both so blank they seemed nearly lifeless.

"Who raised you from the pit?"

Her mouth moved reflexively. "The demon Azazel."

"And how did he find you?"

"The demon Lilith."

God almost rolled His eyes, a bit of Chuck unintentionally bleeding through. "And how did she find you?"

"I don't know."

He was hardly satisfied by that answer, but the current line of questioning sure didn't seem to be getting them anywhere. So God switched tactics. "Why are you here?"

Hell wasn't supposed to know of the existence of the Prophet yet, at least not as a writer. Certainly not as someone they were bold enough to approach, considering the archangel guarding him twenty-four-seven. The multiple break-ins over the past several months had not gone unnoticed by God, even if they had by Chuck. Lucky for both of them, Chuck had accidentally misfiled the first drafts of the story, still suffering from his first-ever brainstorming migraine. Hell's house invader – a clever human thief one of the crossroads demons likely had on a string – walked away with a USB full of an impressive, if not pitiable, porn collection labeled 'Supernatural Stories'.

The Winchester Gospels, meanwhile, sat pretty and safe in the untouched 'porn' folder on Chuck's desktop. Given Dean was one of the main characters, Chuck had found his initial misfiling amusing and hadn't bothered correcting it.

"Answer the question," God nudged her arm. "Why are you here?"

"To follow Sam Winchester."

Chuck's eyebrows went up, and for a moment He forgot to be God. He was genuinely surprised for a second time that morning, which simply didn't happen to all-knowing beings very often, you know.
"Wait, this is Hell's backup plan? Dean's changing things left and right, and you are their answer?"

He laughed and looked away in amazement, before He really started to think over it. The woman didn't respond, either not having an answer or His spell giving her a pass since He wasn't actually expecting one. Chuck leaned back, putting His arm across the back of the couch. "Well, that could backfire spectacularly. For either party."

They sat in silence, the woman slumped beside Him while God stared off at nothing in particular, chewing on His lip (a pure Chuck thing that He'd accidentally picked up over the last thirty years or so). His eyes slid sideways to the plot twist currently sitting on his couch.

"I do kind of want to see that…"

But He didn't want the scales to tip from where they sat now, either. Despite Dean Winchester's misgivings, He was doing what He could to help. God sat up and turned back towards Hell's little home wrecker, contemplating what to do. He could send her back to that hole Azazel dug her out of, add a couple extra layers of warding to make sure no one ever freed her again, and be done with it. Or He could wait it out, see how Time decided to deal with the new player on their board.

His gaze slid down to her hands, where her fingers started curling again. A futile but stubborn-headed fight against His will. Truly, she was her father's creation.

God knew what He probably should do, but He hadn't yet decided what He was going to do. So He settled a hand over those twitching fingers, stilling the movement, and asked a question He did not anticipate liking the answer to.

"Tell me; what are you going to do, Persephone?"

He could feel the struggle in her voice, the ache in every not-muscle she didn't actually possess. All just clever spell work and artistic talent. The woman – Persephone – turned her head, barely visible panic in those heavily glazed eyes that met His own.

"Who…are….you?"

-o-o-o-

"-and then I was thinking maybe not a witch, but a demon. Ultimately I decided, why not both! And I'll name her Ruby. Get it?"

Persephone blinked, taking a deep breath as if she hadn't in quite some time. She'd been… she'd been thinking… of what?

"Ms. Meyer?"

She blinked again and looked up to the face of Chuck Shurley, seated on the coffee table across from her, fidgeting nervously.

"Sorry, I'm probably boring you to death."

"No." Persephone sat up straighter, clearing her throat and hoping it cleared the cobwebs from her mind as well. She'd been thinking something, only moments ago… angry about something, maybe? She cleared her throat again and shook her head. "Not at all, Mr. Shurley. I assure you, it takes much more than boredom to kill me."

"Chuck."

"I'm sorry?"

The author cleared his own throat a little nervously. "You can call me Chuck."

"Steph," she conceded as well with a smile that was definitely the least intimidating thing she'd done so far. "Now, Chuck, what were you saying?"

"I was just…talking about Sam?"

"Oh." A smile lit her face again and the tension she hadn't even known was in the room bled out of it. She folded her hands in her lap. "Then please, continue."

Chuck smiled shyly back, and if there was something a little older in his eye – a little dangerous and a little mischievous – the woman didn't seem to notice.

-o-o-o-

The following morning when 'Stephanie' showed up at his door again (still way too early, even for a god), the blazer-blouse combo remained but she was wearing a far more comfortable-looking pair of jeans. The third time, her hair was down and there were sneakers on her feet. By the fourth, Chuck was starting to feel a lot less intimidated around the intimidating woman.

-o-o-o-

"Son of a bitch." Dean let out a low growl as he all but fell on his ass getting the tracker loose from Baby's under carriage. He glared at the small device, little green light blinking cheerfully from the small square of technology and just pissing himself off all the more. He tossed the thing up to his brother. "You were right."

Sam looked down at the small thing as he caught it, honestly surprised that it was nothing more than your average, human tracking device. He didn't know what he'd been expecting (something supernatural, or a maybe normal device adapted using something supernatural?) but it was mundane after all.

"Coming here was a good call," he said, offering Dean a hand up off the dusty ground. Bobby, standing next to them, had his arms crossed over his chest and an unhappy look on his face. The younger Winchester gave him a grateful look for the home base he seemed always willing to provide, however grumpily. "Demons already know how often we stop here. Good a place as any to 'lose' a tracking device."

Bobby just harrumphed, but it wasn't like he was unused to Winchesters bringing crap down on his house.

"I don't know, man," Dean countered, taking the blinking thing back from the younger Winchester, tossing it in his palm. "This is getting out of hand. Tracing our phones, breaking into the motel room, tagging my car? They're getting too aggressive. I don't like it."

Bobby snorted, calling both brothers' attention. He uncrossed his arms. "What did you expect? It ain't like demons woke up one morning and thought, let's mess with the Winchesters today. This is the apocalypse we're talking about, ya idjits! That takes planning, years of it. And here you come along, a kink in the blueprints they probably ironed every wrinkle out of a century ago, and now they can't find you boys on top of it all? Of course they're getting aggressive."

Dean bristled under the accusations, although he knew Bobby didn't mean a single one of them like that. "Well, what are we supposed to do about it? Let them find us? Find Sam? We can't, Bobby. So how do we stop them? How do we fix this?"

The older hunter shrugged, eyes wide in that apologetic way they took on whenever his boys asked questions he didn't have the answers to. "I don't think you can. Other than-"

"-sticking to the damn timeline." Dean clenched his fist around the stupid tracker, tilting his head back to stare at the sky and curse out God one more time. It was practically a habit by now. "I know."

"So…" Sam glanced between the two of them. "A case, then?"

His brother sighed, dropping his head back down. "Yeah, a case." At least until they figured out what the hell to do about Hell. "Whatdya got?"

Bobby shrugged one shoulder. "There's been a couple suicides in Guthrie. Weird-ass stuff. Was in the paper this morning."

"Guthrie it is," Dean said with about as much enthusiasm as a heart attack. He dropped the small tracker into the dust, lifting his boot to crush it when Sam took an aborted step forward, arm raised hastily to stop his brother.

"Wait," he said and Dean did. "I have a better idea."

-o-o-o-

Sam darted between trucks, trying to be as inconspicuous as possible (which meant it was really more a stroll among the trucks but, whatever). The boys had stopped at the first gas station outside of Souix Falls that was large enough to fit their needs. Namely, filled with truckers on the long haul across country.

The young Winchester pulled up short, stepping out of the way of a passing trucker. He nodded to the man, going for his innocent-civilian-out-for-a-stroll-in-the-parking-lot smile. The man gave him a weird look, but dipped his ball-capped head in return before disappearing into the general store attached to the pumps.

Sam pushed on until he spotted an eighteen wheeler with North Carolina plates and a logo for 'Transcontinental Shipments' printed on the side. Perfect. It was probably headed for the coast, and still had a ways to go yet. With any luck, the driver was on his way out for delivery, which meant he would not only continue on for another half of the country, but turn around and drive back, as well.

Casting a furtive look around the truck stop, Sam leaned over and slapped the tracker on the inside of the cab's front wheel well. The little green light blinked away in the dark arch, unnoticeable once he straightened back up. Task complete, the hunter glanced around again, making sure he hadn't been noticed, before hustling it back to where the Impala was parked.

-o-o-o-

"Alright, tell me about this hunt we're walking into," Dean said from the driver's seat, hand digging around in a bag of Doritos placed between the two. No reason not to pick up some road-tripping supplies when stopping to plant a tracker on some poor, unsuspecting trucker. They were on their way to Guthrie now, hopefully without a demonic tail, where a line-up of apparent suicides had the local newspapers speculating the crap out of conspiracy theories.

"There've been three deaths so far, two of them suicides, one homicide. Bobby was right, though, they are weird." Sam shuffled papers in the passenger seat, having forgone his laptop since they would be on the road for a while and even his hackery wasn't up to task for creating magical wi-fi signals out of thin air. "The first was a Dr. Jennings. Walked into a gun shop, shot the owner with a turkey rifle and then turned it himself."

"A real life Private Pyle. Great."

"Yeah, well, this wasn't some tormented war vet," Sam countered. "The doc has no priors, no history of violence or suicidal tendencies, and the town seems genuinely rattled. By all accounts, he was a 'nice guy.'"

"Yeah, a 'nice guy' who walked into a gun shop and shot up the customers. Next."

Sam spared his brother a reproachful look, but continued on regardless. "Holly Beckett, also ruled a suicide. The second one in a ten block radius, which is probably what made the local newspaper decide it was a story. No criminal record, no known symptoms of depression, same as the doctor. She was single, forty-one, and two days ago pulled up to a gas station and… set herself on fire."

Dean's eyebrows rose and he glanced Sam's way in surprise. The younger brother's first thought was, 'yeah, Bobby warned us they were weird,' but as that same brow plummeted into a frown Sam recognized, he paused, brain stuttering for a second.

"Wait, does that- is this a case we worked?"

The frown deepened, and Dean rubbed at his chest absently. "Maybe."

"Maybe?" Sam didn't see how a woman covering herself in gasoline and using the cigarette lighter from her own car as an incendiary could possibly come with any maybes. When Dean's frown persisted but no explanation was forthcoming, Sam hesitated, and then asked, "…Timey Senses acting up?"

Dean actually laughed and dropped his arm from his chest, never having noticed he was rubbing at it in the first place. "Ha! I knew I'd get you to call it that. Admit it. It's a cool name."

"It is absolutely not a cool name." Sam shook his head, but leveled his brother with a more solemn follow-up look. "Seriously, man, what's going on?"

The frown came back, but Dean at least answered this time. "I, uh… it sounds familiar. Real familiar. As in, I remember being at the gas station."

Sam pursed his lips, but didn't find that particularly troubling. At least, not their normal level of troubling. He looked down at the picture of Holly Beckett staring up at him and caught a glimpse of the passing interstate signage out of his periphery. They wouldn't get into Guthrie until the early hours of the morning, but they weren't that far out, either. "Uh, well, we're on our way, and it's only a couple hours out-"

"No, I mean, I was there right after she went up; whole place still smelled like burnt flesh." Dean wrinkled his nose, wringing one hand on the steering wheel. "That article's from yesterday, which means last time we were there already. I mean, maybe it was a different case and I'm just confusing the two, but…"

He couldn't actually recall the events surrounding him being at the gas station. He remembered phoning Sam, though, and asking why the hell his vision hadn't given them more heads up. Sammy hadn't had a vision about any of this, though. They were just following some newspaper leads, this time around.

"But," Sam picked up where he'd left off, "how many people set themselves on fire at a gas station."

"Exactly." Dean rubbed at his chest again, the familiar tightness stretching across his pecs a fairly common occurrence these days. Usually when a demon was about or things weren't going their way. And there certainly wasn't a demon anywhere near them right now. "I don't know, man. If I was there first time around, then our timing's off. And that's never a good thing."

It didn't take a genius, or a psychic, or even a man from the future, to know where both their minds immediately went. Straight to Max Miller and the mess they'd gotten into – and everything it had cost them – right after they showed up on a hunt where things hadn't been lining up.

-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-

Chapter End Notes

A/Ns: So. Friggin'. Excited! Like, excited enough I'm having trouble waiting a full week to post chapters :D From here on out, no one in this little tale is getting a break anytime soon. Our poor Season 2.1 has to make up in action and plot-forwarding what 2.0 had in chatter and development. So. Friggin'. Excited.

Stephanie Meyer: I honestly couldn't help myself. Her name was always going to be 'Stephanie' because what else would you hear if you misheard "Persephone" said in a crowded bar? And her going to Chuck as someone in the publishing industry? Ha! Yeah, her last name was a given from the start. Tom's an asshole XD

God before Chuck: So, the scarily observant of you might be wondering "why did she bother capitalizing all of those He's and His's when she didn't do that for the conversation between Dean and God?" Okay, honestly if you actually picked up on that, you're really freaky and I'm definitely looking at you funny, but also I appreciate you :D Anyhoo, head-cannon here is that God can slip back into his Old Testament self/habits. And when He's back to being that Old Testament dick, before He took a sabbatical and learned to play the guitar, He gets capitalized pronouns :P

Persephone: Bring on the slew of "huh, wasn't really expecting that" peppered among the "…who?" and some spattering of "Uh, wait a sec, Silence, that's not- I mean it doesn't quite…well, some liberties, I suppose, but still mostly…no?" Of which, to all, I reply: "hehehe };-] " Would I be a no good dirty rotten author any other way? I think not.

Fun Fact #82: The human thief Hell sent in to Chuck's Publisher's office and into his house to steal his files? Totally Bella.

Up Next: As you might have guessed right along with the boys, things are not going down as they should in Guthrie, Oklahoma. Baby's getting driven off the road, Weber's an insane asshole (okay, no change there), Andy's in some major trouble, Dean's remembering just why they call him a Jedi but lamenting the fact he's a piss-poor communicator, Sam's all sorts of confused and freaked out (okay, so no real change to any of these things, actually...), and Yellow Eyes is all up in a different pair of brothers, for once.

Chapter 63: Season 2: Chapter 30

Chapter Notes

A/Ns: I just want you to know how much I love you guys. What did I want to do after seeing Endgame today? Nothing but read Avengers fanfiction aaaaaaall night long. What did I do instead? Edited this chapter because you all deserve a weekend that not only starts with Endgame but also comes with a chapter update. That's real love right there (and humility and modesty too, if you didn't pick up on that ;)

Reviews: I think even if you all hadn't offered up some of the damn best, most amazing, heart-warming, chest-feather-puffing comments I've ever received, I'd still love you all enough to forfeit Avengers fanfiction for a night. But, just so you all know, that like button might be broke form how hard you all pushed it. I'm running out of chest-feathers, I preened so hard (...why did that sound dirty?)

Jokes aside, thank you, guys. I really, really appreciate the love :)

Original Timeline Reference: In general, I don't spend a lot of time in this story describing how episodes went originally, but this particular chapter/episode is more barren of first-time clues than usual. You'll get a bare bones synopsis of the original episode (2.05 Simon Said) somewhere in this chapter, but that's pretty much it. Can you still read/understand/enjoy without more in-depth memory/knowledge? I think so (although I'm not exactly an objective source, here…) Still, it's not a bad idea to refresh your memory for the full effect (reading a synopsis online should be enough if you don't have time for or access to an episode re-watch)

If you're too lazy to do that (no judgement, I feel you, you are my people) or I've turned you into too much of a junkie to even for a second postpone your weekly intake of time travel hijinks… just remember that Andy Gallagher can control people with his voice and he tends to ask them to give him things, like half-drank coffees and Impalas.

Chapter Warnings: Andy's asking for things. Like half-drank coffees and Impalas. He's also not where he's supposed to be, but, then again, who has been lately?

See the end of the chapter for more notes

-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-

The Road So Far (This Time Around)

Season 2: Chapter 30

-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-

It was well past dark when they got to Guthrie, Oklahoma. They were still in the outskirts, cruising with the windows down in the warm summer night air, the town just starting to populate the black around them with scattered porch lights and yellow-lit windows. Guthrie had a decent sized population, at least in relation to many of the towns hunters passed through, but the road was empty and the night quiet. The oncoming headlights were the first Dean had seen in a while.

They were also swerving.

"What the hell-" Dean's grumble turned into a shout of surprise as the oncoming car didn't stay in its oncoming lane. He cursed, yanking Baby to the right, barely missing the swerving vehicle as it flew past. It was a van, and Dean's eyes went wide as a Viking queen – sword in hand, mounted on a polar bear – flashed past.

Son of a bitch.

"I know that van!" he exclaimed, more out of surprise than on purpose. Dean slammed on the breaks and his brother lurched in the passenger seat, grabbing onto the dash.

From behind came a loud crunch of metal and a heavy thud. Dean flipped half in his seat to look out the back window, Sammy doing the same. The van had swerved off the side of the road, likely an overcorrection from nearly crashing into them. There was a minor drainage ditch between the road and the tree line, where the van had come to an unfortunate stop. Steam was rising from the bent hood, the entire front of the car crunched in around the trunk of a tree.

Dean threw Baby into reverse, spinning the wheel until he'd cleared enough room to pull a u-urn. They crept up on the van, slowly because Dean sure didn't remember this ever happening. While his brain was telling him the owner of that van was a friendly, that sure as hell didn't mean the current driver was. Sam kept glancing between the vehicle, so far silent in the night, and his brother.

The van door creaked open loudly, bent as it was on its hinges, and swung closed a time and a half before the driver got it all the way open. It was a kid – an unassuming man maybe Sam's age – in a robe and jeans and a t-shirt, short brown hair a complete mess. He looked like he ought to be stumbling out of bed, not an auto crash (which might actually explain the crash in the first place). The man staggered out onto the road, clearly dazed, a line of blood running down the side of his face.

"Yeah, yeah!" Dean exclaimed suddenly with a smile that seemed completely inappropriate given the circumstances. Sam's eyebrows went up as his brother brought the car to a stop a half dozen feet from the crashed van. The driver spotted them, and Dean turned to his brother even as the kid lurched their way. "It's the Star Wars guy!"

Sam just stared at his brother incredulously.

"It's the- you know-" Dean waved two fingers in the air, "'-these are not the droids you're looking for' guy! Crap, what was his name?"

Sam's bitchface (a variant of #1: 'You're not making any sense, Dean') didn't let up, clearly failing to decipher what the hell his brother was trying to say. Dean's hand was already on the door to get out and help – Sammy a little more cautious about the whole situation – when the man from the future suddenly remembered just why it was they called this kid the Star Wars guy.

Oh no.

Baby!

Dean turned to his brother, suddenly wide-eyed and Sam straightened, forehead smoothing out at the one-eighty in his brother's eyes. Not to mention the desperate tone as he suddenly pleaded, "Don't let him take the Impala."

Sam blinked and went immediately into alert mode, the man approaching now a threat and not a friend. But he didn't have time to get out more than a confused, "What?" before Andy was on them. The kid hit the driver side of the vehicle, fingers curling around the window frame.

"Get out."

"Okay." Dean smiled, nodded, and then was getting out of the car.

"What the hell- Dean!" Sam scrambled for his brother, but Dean was already out, holding the door open for the bleeding kid to clamber inside. Dean shut the door for him, still smiling a tight, goofy grin.

"You too," the kid aimed at Sam, barely even paying attention to him and Sam thought 'who the hell does this guy think he is' as he drew his gun.

"Yeah, I don't think so."

That was finally enough to grab Andy's attention, and he all but threw himself against the driver side door at the sight of the gun. His arms flailed, hands raised in a meager and futile shield. Blood dripped into his too-wide eyes from that cut on his forehead.

"What the hell! I said get out of the car!" His gaze bounced between the gun to the man behind it, clear panic on his face. "Drop the gun! Why aren't you putting it down?!"

Sam's arm didn't move an inch and his expression remained deadly. He glanced at Dean, who was busy babbling to the kid to calm down, it's fine, they're the good guys.

"Yeah," Sam said past a tight jaw to the kid still pressed against the door, clearly expecting him to obey vocal commands alone. The hunter didn't need much more than that and the Star Wars reference to clue in to what this man could do. "I don't seem to be listening. Now who the hell are you?"

"Me?" Andy flinched back, glancing frantically between the two brothers. "Who the hell are you guys?"

"We're hunters," Dean answered and Sam stared up at him. "We kill monsters – bad ones – and we're going to start and stop the apocalypse-"

"Dean!" Sam's bark did nothing for his brother, who still had that tight smile stretched across his face, nodding his head like he understood. "Stop."

"I'm trying," Dean answered through teeth clenched in that placating grin.

Andy was staring at him too, wide-eyed, and that was when he spotted Dean's gun, tucked in his jeans. Dean caught his gaze and glanced down right at the same time as he realized where this was going.

"Wait, kid, you don't want to-"

"Draw your gun and shoot yourself if he shoots me."

Sam cried out as Dean immediately drew his gun and put it to his head, hammer drawn back. The younger Winchester jerked forward viciously, the barrel of his own gun less than a foot away from the kid, who had nowhere else to scramble to. The gun shook in Sam's death grip and he wanted to shoot the man so much more now.

"Sam, don't," Dean immediately snapped, and that was pretty ridiculous, with him standing there, gun to his head. "Come on, man, don't do this. You were cool the first time we met."

"I've never met you!" Andy sounded hysteric. "Now stop lying! Who are you?"

"I'm Dean Winchester. I'm from the future."

"Dean, shut up."

"I said tell the truth!"

"I can't, Sammy, and I am, kid. I'm from the future. 'Bout ten years. Well, nine now. An angel sent me back to save the world."

Andy just stared at him, and Sam wondered if his powers would last past his death. He couldn't risk if they did, couldn't risk Dean shooting himself.

"It's the truth," he spat out instead, drawing the kid's attention back into the car. "Now get that gun away from my brother."

"You first!"

"Come on, guys," Dean practically whined, both smile and gun still in place. "We've gotten off on the wrong foot, here. Look, I'm Dean, this is my brother, Sam. We're here to help."

Andy faltered, glancing back up at the older Winchester as something he said finally seemed to get through. He glanced back at the man holding the gun on him. "Sam… Winchester?"

The brothers exchanged looks.

"Yeah."

Andy hesitated another moment, then obviously made some sort of decision. "Put the gun down, Sam."

Sam gave him a look that clearly said, 'Do I look stupid to you?' but Andy merely returned it.

"It's okay, Sammy. Put the gun away."

The younger Winchester turned the same damn look on his brother, but eventually squared his jaw and lowered the weapon, very clearly re-engaging the safety. When the gun was set pointedly on the seat between them, closer to Andy than it was to Sam, the kid hesitated for only another half second before he angled his head over his shoulder to look at Dean.

"Put yours away, too."

"Safety on," Sam growled, but Dean didn't need the additional command. He re-engaged it all on his own, tucking the gun back into his waistline.

"Now, um…" Andy swallowed nervously, looking between the brothers. When he spoke, his voice sounded ever so slightly different, missing a timber that had been there previously. "Who are you two and what is going on?"

-o-o-o-

They left Andy's van behind; the thing was totaled and it wasn't like they had time to call a tow. Andy was covered in blood and, it turned out, it wasn't all his.

"He killed her," he whispered from the back seat of the Impala, most of the story already out but this part clearly the hardest for him yet.

"Your brother?" Dean was in the front seat, driving them into town, but not to the county Andy had lived, where the suicides had been. Where a man named Ansem Weebs had changed his name, gotten a job in a coffee shop, befriended the manager, Tracy, and the local customer, Andy, and eventually used his new life to kill a doctor who delivered a set of twins twenty-three years ago, murder their biological mother, and finish it up with the girlfriend who stood in the way.

"I didn't know I had a brother," Andy mumbled, staring numbly at his hands in his lap. He huffed. "An evil twin. What do ya know? He didn't even have a goatee."

Sam glanced over at his own brother, but Dean could only offer a helpless shrug. They'd gotten there in time to save Andy's girl last time, though it still hadn't exactly been a happy ending.

"I killed him."

Both brothers looked at the kid in the backseat as the quiet confession turned to silence.

"He said a yellow-eyed man was going to reward him. Reward us. All we had to do was take out everyone else." Andy blinked tears from his eyes, wiping at them with bloody hands that didn't do much but make more mess. "He was- he was crazy. Said we could do it together. Be- be kings." He laughed, the sound hysterical and not remotely funny. "Some yellow-eyed freak came to my evil twin in a dream and convinced him to go on a murder spree."

Neither brother knew what to say to that. To that nightmare that sounded to made up even for television. And Andy was trapped in it, stuck living it.

"The man to get, he said-" The kid stopped, swallowing as he clenched his hands in his lap. He finally looked up, meeting their eyes, Sam's directly and then Dean's through the rearview mirror. "The man to get was Sam Winchester."

The Winchesters exchanged wide-eyed looks. Well shit. That's definitely not what had happened last time.

"He killed her," Andy whispered again, head back down. He was clearly in shock. "He killed her and I couldn't- I couldn't save- Oh god, she's dead. She's dead and I killed him."

Dean pulled into the first motel they came to, making sure to park in the back where there were less guests and even less working lights. Sam got them a room and they got the bloodied kid into the motel under the cover of darkness.

"I'll get him cleaned up," Dean said, putting the keys into his brother's hand. "Why don't you go check out the crime scene."

Sam nodded, hearing the unspoken words. He was going in to town to see if there was any way to salvage this for Andy, to let him keep his life as though he hadn't witnessed a homicide, committed one himself, and then ran. So the younger Winchester climbed back into the Impala and headed to the coffee shop where the kid said it had all gone down.

-o-o-o-

Andy came out of the shower with skin an irritated red from the heat, but he still felt numb. Everything tingled, but not the pleasant way. He sat on the bed in a pair of sweatpants that weren't his and were way too big for him, a band t-shirt he didn't know, and his maroon robe, still damp from his attempts to wash the blood out. He didn't know why, but getting it out, keeping one thing that was his from a life he knew was over, mattered. His hair was wet, dripping down his neck, and his forehead hurt, but Dean had assured him he didn't need stitches or a hospital. Just a few butterfly bandages, a couple Advil, and a fifth of rot-gut whiskey he downed greedily.

"What am I going to do?" He stared at the paper cup in his hands. He didn't feel the heat of the alcohol yet – had never been much of a drinker, really – and wondered if he should take more. "Tracy is- and I- I killed someone."

"Come with us."

Andy's head snapped up to the man – the hunter – leaning against the dresser-turned-tv-stand across from him. He looked serious.

"Look, you're a good kid and this is a…a shitty set of circumstances. We'll help. You're already running; we can teach you how to stay off the radar. Get you set up someplace new, if you want it." Dean uncrossed his arms and shrugged one shoulder. "Or, you can stick with us. We're planning on putting a bullet between those yellow eyes. You're more than welcome to be a part of that."

"I'm not a killer."

Only, god, yes he was.

"Nah, and you don't need to be," Dean agreed, a little smirk in the corner of his mouth that had Andy thinking, huh…maybe this guy was telling the truth. Maybe this guy really did know him, because with the ease that Dean agreed with his protest, Andy almost believed it himself. "But you are in danger, and me and my brother? We can help."

He looked down at the cup in his hands and didn't respond. Andy didn't have an answer, so he didn't bother trying to give one. Dean didn't ask, instead he just pushed off the dresser, grabbed the liquor bottle, and refilled his empty cup.

-o-o-o-

Sam was back before sunup. It was no good. The cops were already looking for Andy, and the evidence was stacked pretty strong against him. Two dead – at least one a homicide – with Andy's blood at the scene, a witness who placed him there, and both him and his easily-recognized van now missing? Even if he turned himself in immediately and claimed self-defense, the DA would use his running as a sign of guilt. It might not be an open-and-shut case, but it would be a hell of a battle, with no guarantee that Andy would walk away a free man.

Neither brother really factored in that he could talk his way out of anything, but Andy didn't much feel like talking about that. He was pretty sure if he turned himself in, the first words out of his mouth would be that he did it. He'd murdered someone – his own brother – and he'd gotten his girlfriend – not his girlfriend, not anymore, not ever again – killed.

"It's okay," he said, still a little numb, but the alcohol was starting to warm his bones, if only just a little. "I was already running."

And he had been. His life was over, and he'd known it. He'd had no clue where he was going, only that he couldn't stay. Tracy was dead and- and there wasn't anything left for him in that town anyway. Before, he hadn't thought he'd needed much. But it turned out, he'd needed Tracy. He wished he'd figured that out sooner.

"I'll go with you," he added, looking up at the brothers. He didn't know them, but they seemed like good people, and they were offering him something he couldn't figure out for himself yet. "If that's still okay."

"Sure thing," Dean supplied, and if Sam was surprised by it, he hid it well behind sympathetic brown eyes. Maybe the two had already talked about it. Andy hadn't exactly been 'present' for the past several hours.

"I don't- I don't know what I'm doing." He didn't know if he said it because it was the truth, or as some sort of warning to the two that they were taking in a stray. An honest-to-god, lost and homeless stray. Andy had always been a bit of a wanderer. Bum, was usually the word people used, but it had never bothered him. It had been mostly true, after all, and he'd been happy with it.

Sam smiled, and Andy got the feeling the man knew exactly why he'd said it. "We'll figure it out."

"Until then, you're with us. It'll be awesome having a Jedi on the team." Dean grinned, but Sam must have caught Andy's hesitation and worry.

"You don't have to hunt," he added quickly, and the kid relaxed a fraction.

"'Course not," Dean agreed, though there was something in his voice that suggested he thought otherwise, even if he didn't say anything aloud. "You can just get us out of speeding tickets and we'll call it even."

Sam was shaking his head again and Dean winked over in Andy's direction. Even though there really was nothing remotely happy about it, Andy found himself smiling weakly back. Dean grabbed his jacket and duffle, tossing them onto the thin carpet. He grunted as he laid down.

"Next time, though, we're getting two rooms."

Sam shared a look with Andy that made him feel, ironically, like a brother. As the younger Winchester settled onto the other bed, Andy thought about offering the one he was sitting on. But Dean was already rolling onto his side, complaining to Sam to turn out the lights, and telling Andy to get some shut eye.

So he did. He didn't get any sleep, not with Tracy's tear-stained, shocked face replaying through his mind on a never ending loop, but he did close his eyes and at least pretend.

-o-o-o-

"So you get death premonitions?" Andy leaned over the front seat of the Impala, elbows brushing either brother as he hunched forward from the back seat. He was looking at Sam primarily, but kept switching between the two, especially as the conversation turned more and more incredulous. "That's impossible."

Beside him, Dean snorted. "Says the Star Wars guy."

Andy shrugged, cuz, hey, fair point, and added, "Dude, that sucks."

Sam gave him a look that Dean had called (earlier that morning) the patented 'Bitchface.' Dean, apparently, had a whole list of them, labeled and everything. Andy wished he could un-dead Weber just to tell him 'this is what being brothers is about, you asshole!'

"I mean, like, when I got my mind thing? It was a gift. You know, it was like- it was like I won the lotto!" Andy, halfway through a chuckle, suddenly trailed off and the car got quiet. Yeah, it had been a gift. A gift that led right into a nightmare. He slid off the front seat and slumped in the back. "Guess what they say about winning the lotto is true."

"What's that?" Dean asked, though it was clear he couldn't decide if staying quiet would have been better.

They'd left early that morning, having Andy keep low in the back seat of the Impala as they headed out of town the opposite way they'd come in. They didn't run into any trouble, and Andy honestly didn't know what he'd been expecting. Road blocks maybe. Search dogs.

But it wasn't like he was on the FBI most wanted. Just a small town murderer. That was him, now.

He stared out the window, farther from home then he'd ever been before, and unlikely to ever go back. "You know. Be careful what you wish for, and all that."

The brothers exchanged looks, unsure how exactly to help someone grieving the loss of a loved one at the hands of their own flesh and blood. Crazy flesh and blood, maybe, but still kin. Kin that they'd then turned around and murdered. Dean gave Sam a pointed look – he was the one with all the feelings, after all – which Sam returned with a bitchface (#3 but it morphed into #9 midway).

Before the more feely of the two Winchesters could say anything, however, Andy cleared his throat and moved on. "Hey, you didn't get one of your visions about…?"

"No," Sam answered quickly, so the kid wouldn't have to finish that sentence. "We heard about the suicides on the news and came looking for a case."

"Because you hunt monsters." Andy still didn't sound like he believed them. But, then again, he could control people with his voice, he had an evil twin, and Sam saw dead people. So, really, what did Andy know?

Sam was staring at Dean, who hadn't had a comeback right away, and Andy realized the older Winchester was frowning. Sam nudged him.

"Nothing." Dean shook his head but Sam could tell he wanted to rub at his chest. Though, he was starting to think anytime Dean managed to refrain, the urge was more out of habit than necessity. "Just, last time we did this, you had visions."

"I did?"

Andy frowned, pushing himself into the front space once more, elbows over the back of the seat. "Wait, last time? Is this- hang on, you were serious? I thought you were joking!"

Dean ignored their tag-along for the moment, and wondered aloud if the coin Cas gave Sam was blocking his visions as well. Sam frowned.

"I haven't had any while I'm awake, either," he reasoned, but looked less than confident. It wasn't exactly scientific theory they were working with, here. Dean hadn't been able to confirm whether Azazel was directly responsible for every vision or not, at least not with any future knowledge, and the brothers could only speculate at best since the incident with Max Miller. "Not since I got off the demon blood."

"Whoa, demon blood?!"

"Don't worry," Dean said over Andy's growing concern (probably starting to panic about what exactly he'd signed himself up for), "you don't need them."

Sam seemed less confident – especially considering his visions were arguably integral to the timeline and they were supposed to be sticking to that – but they were interrupted by the kid, who had pushed himself so far into the front seat that he was going to cause an accident soon if they didn't start listening to him.

"Guys, can we slow down and rewind for a sec?"

"Get back and buckle up, you idiot," Dean snipped, but Andy did not such thing, just staring at him with wide eyes and no lack of disbelief.

"You were kidding back there, right? Yesterday? When I probably had a concussion and was bleeding all over the place and that's why you were able to lie? Because- because you're not really from the future. That would be- heh- that would be insane." When neither brother said anything more, Sam looking a little guilty and Dean keeping an unnecessary level of focus on the road, Andy added a little hysterically and definitely loud enough to make Dean wince, "You're from the future?!"

-o-o-o-

Andy sat, kind of like a statue, in the back seat, staring through the windshield. He'd been that way for the last five minutes, and it was honestly starting to get a little worrying.

"The apocalypse," he finally spoke, though it didn't come with much movement. "The apocalypse. Holy crap."

Dean huffed something out that wasn't pretty, but thankfully it wasn't really audible either. Sam turned to tuck his elbow over the back of the seat and tried to offer a reassuring look. It wasn't all that reassuring.

"I know it's a lot," Sam offered, going for gentle and Andy's eyes slid over to him, looking no less freaked out than a second ago. "And I'd say you don't have to be a part of it, but-"

"But you are," Dean cut in, ignoring the sharp way Sam looked at him for it. No use playing soft ball with the kid. "And it sucks, but we'll get you through it." As if realizing what he'd said – which wasn't technically untrue if you counted intent being stronger than all that destiny crap, but still – Dean locked eyes with the kid in the rear view mirror and added, "We're gonna stop it this time."

Andy chewed on the inside of his cheek. It wasn't that he didn't believe Dean (okay, he didn't exactly believe Dean…) but this was the freakin' end of the world they were talking about here! "I… I don't know if I'm- If I can…handle that, guys. I'm just- I'm just a normal guy, okay? With- with mind control powers, I'll give you that, but I didn't sign up for any of this!"

Sam's smile, while weak, was understanding, because of course it was. He was an understanding guy who sounded even deeper up shit creek than Andy was. At least he had awesome mind powers. Sam just saw people die all the time and was apparently doomed to escort Lucifer to the end of the world.

"We know, Andy, and you don't have to be up for it, alright?" He turned back around, leaning against his own seat. "You want out, tell us. It's true that you're a part of this, and you may not be able to avoid it but…" Sam glanced at Dean, a silent conversation Andy had no hope of interpreting. "It doesn't mean you have to go running head first into it, either."

The kid from Guthrie, Oklahoma just swallowed heavily in the back seat, completely lost as to how his life had spiraled so out of control so quickly. He was in a world of pain he knew nothing about. But, there were two people currently with him who at least knew the rules of that brave new world, and were promising to teach him. If he wanted it.

"Yeah," he breathed out, leaning back against the seat and tipping his head up to stare at the beige ceiling. He didn't have a better option right now, and Andy had always been more of a go-with-the-flow kind of guy. He turned his head and watched the world pass by the window. "Yeah, alright."

-o-o-o-

That night they stopped at another hotel. Dean got his two rooms, as requested, and rock-paper-scissored with his brother for the single. He lost. The older man was still grumbling when Andy asked if he got to play the winner, then. Both brothers just stared at him, before glancing at each other and sort of shrugging out a 'that's fair.'

He kicked Sam's ass, and got a room all to himself. Go him.

Despite his best attempts not to, it wasn't all that long before Andy was asleep on his single queen mattress in a rundown motel that hadn't seen renovation since it was built in the sixties. He hadn't meant to sleep, desperately wanted not to, and had been avoiding it for well beyond his limit, now. Honestly, he hadn't thought sleep would even come, not without a little help from Mary Jane. He hadn't slept without her assistance since he was a tweener. As it turned out, though, a near forty-eight hours of no sleep on top emotional trauma the likes he'd never experienced before was, apparently, where his body drew the line, with or without MJ.

The silence of the motel, mostly empty except for the occasional thump or shuffle of the brothers next door or a guy two doors down who sounded like he'd snuck a stray cat into the room with him, lacked the necessary distraction to stay awake. Soon enough, Andy was pulled into a desperately needed, albeit terribly unwanted, sleep.

And with sleep came the dreams he feared.

"Well, well, well," a man with yellow eyes was clapping as he emerged from the shadows of Tracy's kitchen. He seemed heedless of the growing puddle of blood beneath his feet. "Looks like I put my money on the wrong brother."

Chapter End Notes

A/Ns: I loved Andy. I always wanted more of him in the show (so…uh…look guys, I fixed it!)

Update on Cas: For those of you missing Cas (I'm seeing an increasing number of reviews about the lack of him/her…) hang in there. He's gonna keep popping back up. We haven't even gotten to what Uriel is up to in Heaven, which is also coming this season. I promise, as 2.1 comes to a massive head, you'll get plenty of your favorite angel (whump. I mean, cough what? I didn't say anything, you're hearing – er…reading? – things.)

Up Next: Andy relives the worst night of his life to an audience of one (yellow-eyed demon), in which evil twins are evil (facial hair or no facial hair). Meanwhile, the Winchesters learn that it's not just hunters who wake up swinging, and Andy is strongly reconsidering that that whole atheism thing when the boys get an impromptu visitor.

Chapter 64: Season 2: Chapter 31

Chapter Notes

A/Ns: Figured we could post a little early again this week (it was supposed to be earlier but I got distracted watching the first Avengers...). I've been relegated to standing around my house for the second weekend in a row with nothing to do but write standing up while I stare longingly at the couch, or any chair in general, really. Back issues are so stuuuupid.

(It's actually my piriformis, which is beneath your glute, so, literally, what a pain in the ass. Talk about being the butt of my own joke. God, tight asses, am I right? Okay, I swear, that's the last dad pun, and this was probably waaay too much information for you all XD)

Extra long chapter this time (to make up for the dad jokes) I know the last, like, ten chapters have been on the shorter side of out normal range, so an extra long one to finally balance it out :P

Chapter Warnings: Andy's getting his dream power on and oh boy is he wishing he wasn't, evil twins are evil, angels and demons are popping by for chats, and oh, yeah, Andy watches way too much trashy tv (and maybe ships it?)

See the end of the chapter for more notes

-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-

The Road So Far (This Time Around)

Season 2: Chapter 31

-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-

Tracy called him on the phone that night. Andy didn't own a cell – he always just asked one off of someone when he needed to – but it wasn't all that hard to get a hold of him. Just call the pizza joint he parked his van outside of most nights (they had the best pie in town, man, and were always willing to give him dinner on the house anytime he asked). Mike was one of the delivery guys and just so happened to also be Andy's primary supplier of the good stuff (he actually had four different guys around town he went to for pot; even the lowest-key of dealers got kinda squirmy pretty quickly if they thought you were scamming them, mind powers or not. So Andy had taken to alternating). Mike knocked on the side of the van around nine, one medium pan-crust peperoni, banana peppers, and pineapple smelling like Heaven in his hands. Andy's favorite. Mike handed over the pie, a couple grams, and the message that Tracy was looking for him.

Man, did Andy live the good life, or what?

He got to Tracy's shop a little after eleven. She didn't call him much anymore, not since he'd pretty much put the grand canyon of emotional distance between them. He hadn't meant to, not really. He just…didn't want to end up controlling her, not even by accident. And it would be accidental, of course; Andy would never use his power on Tracy any other way. But, he hadn't always had the best control, especially early on when they'd first started and he spent several months just freaking out. Even once he'd mastered them, Andy knew better than to think control was anything more than a matter of will, and he'd never exactly been good at the self-discipline category.

He didn't want to hurt her, and Andy sort of knew that, eventually, if he stuck around, he would.

"Trace?" The little door above the shop jingled as he slipped inside. It was way too late for customers; the coffee shop would have closed up hours ago. But he knew Tracy often stayed late to prep for the next day or have some peace away from an apartment sometimes noisy with her roommate's late night habits.

"I'm back here, Andy." Her voice came from the kitchen, but he frowned at the slight shake in it. She sounded like she'd been crying.

"You okay?" He hurried towards the back, rounding the counter and slipping into the kitchen only to pull up short. Tracy was sitting in one of the chairs beside the counter, in nothing but a slip, one of the straps falling off her shoulder. She'd definitely been crying, and she wasn't alone.

"Weber," Andy said cautiously, glancing between the two. Weber was sitting on the counter just beside Tracy, and he had a very large kitchen knife laying across his lap. Oh god, this was one of those new-guy-in-town-is-actually-a-serial-killer sort of things, wasn't it? Weber always had come on way too friendly.

"Hey, bro."

Tracy hiccupped, a single tear slipping free but she fought back any other noise, her face tinging red with the effort. Andy got a very, very bad feeling in his gut.

"What's going on? Tracy, you okay?"

She started to shake her head, not moving from the chair and Andy wondered why she wasn't just getting up and moving to him. Probably for the same reason he wasn't crossing the room to her. Weber's big damn knife.

"Now, now, Trace, don't be like that. Tell him how happy you are." Andy couldn't help the cant of his head as he stared at the man he barely knew with growing dread. The way he'd said that last bit- it had been different. It had been…familiar.

"I-I'm s-so happy, Andy." Tracy stumbled over the words, hiccupping again. Her hands were shaking and Andy eye's widened in realization of what was happening.

"How-" He turned back to Weber. "How are you-"

Weber smiled. He freaking smiled, like Tracy wasn't sitting there in nothing but her underwear practically sobbing while he held a knife in his hands. "Surprised that there's someone else like you?"

He hopped off the counter and Andy took a step back, eyeing that blade. But Weber didn't turn it on Tracy. He seemed, for the most part, to be ignoring her, his eyes only on Andy. "Now ask me why I'm like you."

It wasn't a command, not like he'd given Tracy and not like Andy had given a hundred people in the last year alone.

"Why…"

"Why, what, Andy? You gotta be specific, man."

That sarcastic tone, that smug little smirk, like all of this was a game, was enough to spark something in him. Andy realized he was angry. Angry enough to focus, to eye that knife with more than just worry. "Why are you like me?"

"Because we're brothers!" Weber cast his hands out, blade getting dangerously close to Trace, who flinched at the wild movement. Andy twitched forward, but Weber didn't notice. He dropped his arms, a manic grin on his face. "Aren't you going to say something, bro?"

"I don't-" Andy blinked, then closed his eyes and shook his head. "I don't have a brother."

"Don't say that." The tip of the knife was suddenly aimed in his direction, and Weber jabbed it forward with each word. "Don't."

Andy raised his hands, his pulse rapid. "Okay, just- just calm down, alright? I- what do you mean, we're brothers?"

"I mean we're brothers!" Weber practically screamed it, face red, before he calmed back down. He lowered the knife and took a deep breath. God, Andy though. He's crazy. "Our mother," the word was spat like a curse, "gave us up. And that doctor helped with the adoption. He split us up!"

He was shaking with rage, and that scared Andy, but not enough to stop the words from going through. "Doctor- wait… are you… are you talking about Dr. Jennings?"

"Yes!" Weber was getting animated again, waiving that knife around. "He split us up, bro. He ruined our lives. So I killed him."

"You-" Andy couldn't breathe. Forget the fact that he had a brother, that brother had just claimed to be a murderer. Dr. Jenning's death had hit Andy hard, hard enough to go running back to Tracy, even after he'd told himself she was better off away from him. Weber had been there, he kinda remembered, but he hadn't been paying attention to anyone but Tracy. "You killed…"

"Had him take that useless piece of shit in the sports shop with him. Our father, or so Mom thought. The whore didn't even know for sure."

This went so beyond not being able to breathe. Andy just flat out couldn't understand. But his subconscious and his mouth seemed to be doing a hell of a lot better than his brain. "What- our father… our mother?"

"I killed her too." A maniacal grin spread across his face as he leaned leisurely against the counter, crossing his legs at the ankle, like they were having a freakin' family reunion and it was just another evening in the whatever-their-last-name-would-be household. "Lit her up like a bonfire. Well, she did the hard part. All I had to do was give her a little nudge."

"Oh my god…" Andy remembered hearing about the woman who had set herself on fire at a gas station just down the road from here. But he hadn't- he didn't know anything about her. And he'd been pretty torn up about Dr. Jennings already. "You killed them. You- why?"

Weber frowned again, that agitation coming back. "Because they split us up, Andy. They ruined our lives!"

"So you killed them?!" It was Andy's turn to throw his arms up, staring wide-eyed at this clearly unstable man claiming to be his brother. Andy even believed him, but that didn't make him any less crazy. "Weber, you don't just kill people!"

His brother's hand tightened around the hilt of the knife, and Andy backed off, realizing this was not the kind of person – the kind of situation – he wanted to push.

"Look…just, let Tracy go, okay, man?" He glanced at his friend, who was shaking in her chair but hadn't moved. Hadn't even tried to get away. Weber must have told her to stay put. "She doesn't have anything to do with this. This is- this is fam-family stuff, yeah?"

Weber eyed him, like he was trying to decide if he was telling the truth. Finally, the wacko settled again, leaning back against the counter. "I didn't want it to be like this, Andy. If it had been up to me, she'd have thrown herself off the dam and you'd never even know she was gone."

Tracy sobbed, and Weber snapped at her. "What did I tell you about crying?"

"Stop!" Andy raised his hands, both furious and terrified all at one. "Don't talk to her like that. Please. Just let her go."

"It wasn't supposed to go like this," Weber said instead, almost pleadingly, like he wanted Andy to understand. Only Andy really, really didn't. "I would have gotten them all out of the way, it could have just been us, and you wouldn't have known. But he wouldn't let me! He said you needed to be strong, too."

"He?"

"The yellow-eyed man."

Andy couldn't help it. He knew he shouldn't, knew whatever this was, it was balanced on a knife's edge (literally). But this guy was crazy.

"You're- you're insane."

Weber's eyes darkened, and he pushed off the counter. Andy took a step back. "No. I'm not. He came to me in a dream. He came to me a dozen times! He said I had to prove myself. He said if we wanted to win, we had to prove ourselves. And this is how."

He grabbed the blade of the knife and flipped it around, holding the hilt out to Andy, who stared at it, dumbfounded.

"Kill her, Andy. You don't need her. All you need is me."

His eye snapped to his brother's, and it was official. He was insane. "Wh-what?"

"Come on, man. You gotta do this."

"No!"

"She's garbage!" Weber gestured to Tracy with his free hand and she flinched violently. Andy clenched his fists, hating the fear in her eyes, the red of her cheeks and the drying tracks from her tears. "They all are, man! We can push them, we can make them do whatever we want! We don't need any of them!"

And just shook his head, well and truly stunned. "You- you can't be this stupid."

Weber pulled up short, obviously not expecting that as one of the multitude of responses Andy could have gone with.

"You find out you have a brother and you- you-" Andy shook his head again. "You call them up! You go for a drink! You don't kill people!"

"I know it's all wrong, but don't be mad at me, okay?" Weber shrugged helplessly, a pleading look on his face that Andy wanted to punch right off. "I've wanted to tell you for so long, bro. But he didn't let me."

"The yellow-eyed man." His brother nodded and Andy just shook. "Weber, you sound crazy."

"I'm not crazy!" he yelled back, furious. Then something smoothed out on his face, and Andy knew he'd lost him. Weber shook the knife, a clear indication for Andy to take it. "And I'm not waiting anymore. Take it, Andy, or she'll do it for you. Won't you Trace?"

Beside him, Tracy nodded, fresh tears spilling down as she gasped for air.

With a painful swallow, Andy reached out and took the knife. He tried, one more time, to reason with a madman, stalling desperately for time. "She isn't part of this. Please, please just…just let her go, Weber. B-bro. Please."

For a moment, Weber only stared at him and Andy thought, maybe. Maybe he'd gotten through.

"No," his brother said, voice as serious as he'd ever heard the man he barely knew. But there was a smile on his face. It was almost a sympathetic one. It just made Andy sick to his stomach. "I know you better than that, man. You'll never be with me while she's in the way."

"Stop it," Andy commanded, voice deepening, pulling from that power deep inside of him that he'd always felt but honest-to-God ignored whenever it really mattered. He pointed the tip of the knife at his brother, hand shaking, but prepared to use it.

Weber's smile turned bitter, not surprised in the least. And he didn't listen. "Our powers don't work on each other, Andy."

Andy sagged, knife falling to his side. "Please, Weber, this is insane. I'm not going to kill her, she's my friend!"

His twin's smile faded into something a lot darker. "Fine. Tracy, do it."

"No!" Andy screamed as she didn't hesitate, opening the drawer closest to her and pulling out a second knife. She raised it to plunge into her own gut and Andy threw his hands out. "Tracy, stop. Stop it!"

Her arms shook, knife poised out in front of her, but she didn't move. She listened. Her whole body trembled with exertion, her cheeks grew red and puffy, and Andy strained with everything he was as he waited for the balance to tip.

"Put it down, Trace."

"Heh." Webber pushed off the counter, that sympathetic smile slapped back on his face. Tracy didn't put the knife down, but her arms shook harder. "Not bad, bro. But I'm stronger than you. I've been practicing."

He turned his head to look straight at Tracy, something evil in his eye that contorted his whole face. She couldn't help but stare at him, eyes widening. His mouth never moved, he didn't say a word, but Tracy's lip trembled, she sobbed, and her arm twitched.

"Weber, don't-!"

Tracy cried out as she thrust the knife down. Andy stumbled back, red splashed everywhere as she pulled the blade out and plunged it back in, again, and again, and again. She was screaming.

"No!" He ran forward, catching her as she slumped in the chair, the two of them falling to the ground. There was blood everywhere- oh god, there was so much blood. Tracy was still trying to raise and lower the knife in an ever-weakening and ashen hand. Andy grabbed onto her wrist, pinning it to her side. It wasn't hard; she didn't have much left in her. "Tracy, Tracy, oh god, stay with me. Please! You're gonna be okay. I'm gonna- I'm gonna get help."

Her lips were moving, but nothing came out, and Andy cupped her cheek with shaking, bloody fingers.

"I can teach you, Andy," Weber was saying, standing over them as he watched the light fade from Tacy's eyes. "I'll teach you how to be strong. We'll do it together, we'll take everyone else out. We'll start with Sam Winchester. He's the one to get, the yellow-eyed man said so. He won't stand a chance against us, bro."

Andy lowered Tracy, his friend, his love, to the ground. Her eyes were still wide with terror but lifeless now. He reached up and closed them, leaving behind streaks of red on her pale, pale skin. He sat there, on his knees, covered in her blood, and couldn't understand what just happened.

"You're insane," he whispered, and reached out to take the knife from Tracy's limp hand. He stood, turned to his brother, and said it again, anger taking over. "You're insane."

Weber eyed the knife with a flicker of worry, but smiled that sympathetic smile again. Andy was going to cut it off his face, this time. "I'm your brother, Andy. Family. You're not gonna hurt me. Besides, I told you; I'm stronger than you."

Maybe that was true, but he sure as hell wasn't stronger than a knife.

By the time Andy came back to himself, he was still screaming, over and over and over. Like Tracy had been before she went silent forever. His throat was raw and he had even more blood on him. Weber was dead, knife sticking clear out of his chest, and Andy couldn't stop shaking.

He had to run. He knew he had to run. Tracy was dead because of him and he couldn't stay here.

Andy sunk to the floor, suddenly alone in the all-consuming dark. The smell of blood was thick. It was all around him. On him, on his skin, in his mouth. He could feel it on his hands, slick and warm, and oh god, he was going to be sick.

The sound of someone clapping snapped his head up so fast, Andy got dizzy and had to breathe through the spell. But he stumbled to his feet as soon as he could, back in the coffee shop as the darkness retreated. There was still blood everywhere, but Tracy… Tracy was gone. No body. No Weber. Just puddles and puddles of red.

What was happening? Was he losing his mind?

"Well, well, well." Andy startled, fumbling back as a man stepped from the shadows of the kitchen door, a grin stretched across his face and pale, yellow eyes staring him down. Oh, god, he had gone crazy. As crazy as Weber. "Looks like I put my money on the wrong brother."

"Who- what-" He stumbled back another couple steps, keeping distance between him and the man who couldn't be here, who couldn't even be real. This couldn't be real, he thought, the part of him that was fascinated with philosophy and thought and mind trying desperately to kick into gear over the panic and fear. "This- this isn't real."

"Nope," the man said, popping that last syllable. "Well, murdering your own brother after he killed your girlfriend was. But this is just a bad memory. Gotta tell you, kid, that was something else."

"He- he wasn't my brother," Andy managed to get out, but really, that was hardly the important part. "I- it was- it was self-defense."

Why was he explaining himself to a delusion?

"Regardless." The yellow-eyed man came to a stop at the closest puddle of blood, looking down at it with an analytical eye and absolutely no emotion. "I could use that fratricidal nature, tiger."

"Use… what?" God, Andy really wanted to run, to wake up and find none of this was real. But he knew that it was, at least parts of it. Maybe not the man in front of him, but the blood on the floor. That part was real, no matter how much he wished it wasn't.

The yellow-eyed man leaned against the counter where Weber had, only moments ago. He even crossed his ankles, folded his arms over his chest. Another family reunion. Andy was shaking again. "There's a war coming, kiddo. Didn't your brother tell you? I need soldiers, and you're showing real promise."

"You're- you're not real."

"Not in here, no." The man shrugged one shoulder, and Andy wanted to shake him. To tell him that this, all of this, was terrible, and he ought to be as messed up as Andy. But that seemed like a really bad idea, and Andy just wanted to wake up.

Weber had said this man came to him in a dream. Which meant he was dreaming.

"I need to wake up," he mumbled, and slapped himself across the face as hard as he could. God, it stung. Tracy's blood was smeared across his cheek now. The yellow-eyed man laughed.

"You've got spunk, kid. Way more potential than I pegged you for." He pushed off the counter with a wide smile. Like a shark, Andy thought. "All we gotta do is toughen you up."

Andy scrambled backwards until he hit the kitchen wall. He had to wake up now.

"Andy!"

His head snapped to the side as someone called his name. It didn't sound like it was coming from the shop. Maybe outside? The voice sounded familiar, but he couldn't place it.

"Andy, man, wake up!"

He heard it again, from the other side now. A different voice, but one he placed a little faster. "Dean?"

The man – Azazel, he remembered now – was suddenly in front of him and Andy caught his breath, flattening his body against the wall. Those pale yellow eyes regarded him carefully, suspiciously, and he found himself swallowing past the lump of fear in his throat.

"Someone calling you, kiddo?" Yellow Eyes tilted his head to the side, as if he was listening, and Andy was suddenly terrified that he would hear it too.

"Nope. N-Not at all. You know, I-I, uh, I should really go now."

Cold fingers wrapped around his jaw and cheek like a snake strike, and Andy cried out instinctually, flinching away with nowhere to go. The demon was close enough for Andy to feel hot breath on his skin.

This isn't real, this isn't real, this isn't real.

"Tell me, Tiger, where are you right now?"

-o-o-o-

He woke up screaming and, apparently, swinging.

Sam took one right to the face. Dean was lucky enough that when the kid came to yelling 'Get off me!' his powers meant Dean was halfway across the room before he could stop himself. Which is probably how Sam took one right in the face. But they got him lucid pretty quickly, even if he couldn't catch his breath for several minutes and ending up emptying his stomach just as soon as he had enough air to do it. Lucky for him, bad nights were a Winchester standard. Dean had already been ready with a bucket.

The ice bucket, it turned out, because they were in a motel, far, far away from Tracy's coffee shop.

"You were having a nightmare," Sam offered when Andy's chest and stomach had stopped heaving.

"No kidding," he gasped out, wiping his mouth with the wet washcloth Dean offered. He wondered if they'd heard him, given how raw his throat felt, or just stumbled on in when they'd come to collect him since it was, apparently, morning. Funny, it didn't feel like he'd slept a wink. "Some nightmare. No wonder Weber lost it."

Sam frowned, glancing over at his brother worriedly, but they didn't push. They apparently had an unspoken rule, and Andy didn't know if he was thankful for that or not.

-o-o-o-

Andy got in the shower while the boys got the Impala packed up. He'd actually been in the shower for over fifteen minutes already and Sam and Dean were just stalling by that point, but neither had any plans to call him out on it. That nightmare had looked like a bad one, and with what the kid had just gone through? There were horror movies with happier endings.

"You sure this is a good idea?" Dean angled his head at Sam's question. His brother was leaning against the driver's side door while the older Winchester did some putzing under the hood. Just checking up on his Baby while they had the time. "I'm not against it, but he doesn't know the first thing about hunting. Or this life. You really thinking dragging him along is the right call?"

Dean wiped his hands on his jeans and closed the hood. "No," he answered honestly, "but he's a part of it now, whether he likes it or not. He wants to opt out, that's fine. We'll get him setup somewhere, teach him the basics of staying safe. But it's not gonna save him, and we both know it."

Sam stared down at the ground, moose-brow furled morosely. "Was he part of the battle royale?"

The older Winchester came around the side of the car and propped himself up a foot or so from Sam. He cleared his throat, eyes off to the side, watching the cars pass by on the main road. "I don't know. I wasn't there and after…. There was enough going on that we never really talked about it."

Because he'd been dead, Sam thought. Yeah, that would have kept him pretty occupied, he figured.

"You never told me names," Dean continued, crossing his legs at the ankle and leaning back against his beloved car, arms crossed. Trying to keep it casual, despite the somber topic. "But you said it was all of Azazel's kids, spread out over weeks. And only one got to walk away. So yeah, pretty sure old Yellow Eyes isn't gonna let Andy out of this one."

Sam kicked at a loose pebble, watching it scatter. "His best bet is with us."

Dean shrugged, but it was obviously the same conclusion he'd already come to. "Azazel nabs either of you, Cold Oak is the first place I'm heading. We'll only get there faster if we know he's missing."

Honestly, Dean hadn't yet come up with a plan to avoid that scenario entirely, though it was on his mind almost every day now. Sam's death date was most of a year away, but he didn't trust Hell to stick to the schedule anymore. They sure as hell hadn't with Dad.

So, Plan B was to head to Cold Oak if Sam went missing. Andy too, now that he was with them. If he chose to stay, of course. But Dean needed a plan A. He and Bobby were already working on one, though at the moment he sure hoped the gruff old hunter was doing better at it than him.

"Alright," Sam conceded, though it hadn't ever been an argument or even a debate. He didn't mind Andy joining them, though it would be weird to have a third person who wasn't Cas (it was still pretty weird when it was Cas). "We'll keep him safe. He doesn't have to hunt if he doesn't want to, though."

"Sure," Dean agreed, because making someone hunt, or even feel like they had to be part of the life with no other choice, was not something he ever planned to force on anyone. He'd grown up like that – seen what it did to someone like Sam, saw what it could have done to Ben, what it did do to Claire – and had promised he'd never be like his own dad. He'd never do that to anyone. "Although, it would be pretty handy, having a Jedi on the team."

Sam just pulled a mild bitchface and pushed off the car. He headed back into the room. Dean thought maybe the water had shut off by then. He couldn't hear it, but then again, he hadn't really been able to hear it running, either.

The truth was, Dean had another reason for wanting Andy along, even though it went against the timeline, and Cas would probably lecture the crap out of him once they found out (Bobby too, most likely). Last time, they hadn't exactly done right by the kid. Andy hadn't done anything wrong, hadn't asked for what happened to him or his powers, and hadn't even misused them. The Winchesters just hadn't been in a great position to take on a passenger, and they'd had no clue what they were leaving him behind to face alone. At the time, they knew he'd have to figure his life out, and the best they could do to help him there was offer a number to call if he needed them.

But now Dean did know what was coming, and he couldn't just leave Andy on his own, at the mercy of Azazel, to eventually be thrown into a fight for his life with no warning and no training. No, they could do better by him this time. What was the point of time-travel, of having to relive all of this crap all over again, if he couldn't do it better?

Plus, it really, really wouldn't hurt to have a Jedi on their side.

-o-o-o-

"So, you wanna talk about it?"

They were back in the car and Dean was driving again. Hunting was actually a lot more driving than the title suggested. They were headed to a town outside Nashville. Apparently, there'd been reports of ghost activity around the area, and some woman named Ellen tipped them off about it. One hunter had already tackled the case and gotten himself laid up with a broken leg and a nasty concussion for his trouble, so she was calling in the cavalry.

"No," Andy answered, maybe a little too quickly and a little too grumpy. Dean's voice had been light, if somewhat forced, and Andy didn't think either of them would push the issue. Even if they probably should. He cleared his throat from the back seat, wrapped his arms around himself and pressed his knees against the seat in front of him. "Maybe later?"

These guys were just trying to help. And if that dream had been real, if that man really was a demon showing up in his dreams to try and… what? Talk him into being a murdering psychopath like Weber? Well…if that was his goal, Andy should definitely tell the Winchesters about it.

Just, how did he do it without bringing up all the rest of it? He didn't want to think about it, didn't want to be dreaming about it. Didn't want to be sleeping at all.

"Ball's in your court, kid," Dean answered easily enough, and that was that.

-o-o-o-

Less than an hour down the road, Andy was playing around with how to bring it up.

'So, you know that yellow-eyed guy you mentioned? The demon?'

No, too casual.

'Azazel visited me last night.'

Okay, too far in the other direction. And sounded like a bad Jesus

Freak promo. Only, well, this was apparently the opposite of divine intervention.

'So, a yellow-eyed demon walks into a coffee shop…'

"Hello, Dean. Sam."

Andy screamed.

The younger Winchester, who was driving for once, almost crashed the car into oncoming traffic at the sudden fourth presence in the back seat. Andy kicked at the figure who had freaking appeared out of nowhere, shoving himself across the seat and into the door. She – and it was a woman, despite the deep, gravelly voice – didn't even move. Her head turned like a god damn owl to take him in with a curious blink and a head tilt.

Dean, who had a lot more experience with randomly appearing angels in the back seat of the Impala, jerked his head over his shoulder to glare at their new guest as Sam managed to correct the car and not kill them all. They pulled over, vehicles blasting past them, horns blaring. "Jesus, Cas, give us some warning or something! Do we need to get you a bell?"

The woman (and how the hell was everyone so calm?!) turned stiffly to the hunter in the passenger seat, a little frown pulling at her eyebrows. "Bobby Singer made a similar threat. What would be the purpose of wearing such an instrument?"

"Who are you?!" Andy didn't mean to use his power – or sound quite so hysterical – but he was freaking the hell out back here! Did no one else care that a woman had just popped into existence in their car?!

The lady looked his way again, tilting her head to the side. Like a bird. A bird with big blue eyes that didn't blink nearly as often as they should. "Interesting. You are one of the children infected with demon blood."

Andy sputtered, mind both terrified and blown. Jeez, how many people was he going to run into that his powers didn't work on?

"Your abilities would have to be much stronger to affect me," the woman said, as if reading his mind.

In the driver's seat, Sam's eyebrows went up and he turned to look at the angel directly, now that they were safely pulled over, engine off.

"They could affect you?"

"In theory," Cas answered, and Andy was still trying to get further away than was physically possible in the muscle car. "If you were to ingest the amount of demon blood you were drinking at the peak of Dean's notes, then yes. I believe you could contend with a lower angel."

Not that Andy understood half that (and god, the half he did understand he really wished he didn't. When had his life gotten so out of control?) but Sam blanched whiter than rice, and Andy found himself wishing he understood none of it. Or wasn't in the car at all. Or part of this insane duo. Well, hell, trio now.

Was it too late to back out?

"I'm sorry, who the hell are you?!"

-o-o-o-

"Angels. Angels." Andy was pacing at the gas station they'd pulled over at. Sam was filling up the tank and Dean had dragged Cas into the store for refreshments and microwaved burritos ('People practice, Cas. You need it.') Andy spun on Sam. "Angels are real, you guys have one on speed dial, and you didn't think to mention that?!"

Sam just shrugged apologetically. He was pretty sure Dean had mentioned it about the same time he'd mentioned being from the future. Not that Andy had been in any shape to hear – let alone process or believe – any of that.

"If it makes you feel better, I'm still getting used to it too."

"No, that doesn't make me feel better! It makes me feel worse!" Andy grabbed at his head. "Jesus, I'm an atheist!"

Sam winced, offering a sympathetic smile. "Dean was, too. Uh… actually, pretty sure he still is."

"He has an angel as a best friend, and you're telling me he doesn't believe in God?"

"Erm…" Sam just shrugged again. "Pretty sure knowing something exists and believing in it are two very different things for my brother."

"You're so not helping." Andy groaned, and the thunk of his head hitting the roof of the Impala was not nearly as soothing as he needed it to be. "You all are crazy. And now I'm crazy too."

Sam patted him awkwardly on the shoulder and put the nozzle back on the pump.

"Welcome to the club."

-o-o-o-

They got back in the car, Dean driving this time, and resumed their trek for a Tennessean ghost. Andy was in the back seat with a freaking angel, who he couldn't stop staring at.

"You look human." He didn't mean to blurt it out, but, well, he'd never been great with holding back even before he got magical powers of speech added on top.

Castiel regarded him without offense. "I am possessing a human vessel. Angels can operate on Earth without one, but few humans can view our true form or hear our voice without taking damage."

"The prophets." Andy nodded absently; that made sense. But he caught the surprised looks the Winchesters sent his way. "What? I grew up in the Bible belt, guys. Sunday school was less optional than actual school."

And also the leading factor of a twelve-year-old Andy deciding a lack of belief was more morally defensible than false belief used only to justify self-interest. The pastor at the church his father dragged him to every Sunday had looked at him long and hard when he'd announced it (loudly) the last time he'd ever gone to service. The man of God bent down, put a hand on his shoulder, told him to believe what was in his heart, and had he ever heard of a philosopher named Marcus Aurelius.

"Um…I'm twelve," an overly confident and often contemptuous child had answered back. It would be several years before he learned that arrogance and intelligence hand-in-hand usually landed him in the dumpster behind the school gym. At the time, the pastor just laughed.

"You should look into him," he'd said with a wink. "I think he's right up your alley."

Turned out, the pastor hadn't been wrong. Though, personally, Andy preferred turn-of-the-century German philosophers, more of late.

"You are correct," Cas stated, continuing their conversation as if the Winchesters had not interrupted. "The prophets were, indeed, unique individuals able to perceive an angel's true form. I would have thought Sam and Dean, with their destinies, would also be among such men. But Dean has assured me they are not."

"You almost blew out my ear drums the first time we met, Cas." It was not the only time Dean had said as much, though it was news to Andy. "We're sticking with vessels this time."

"Angela is a devout woman," Cas continued, blue eyes still locked on the man sitting beside her, who was kind of enjoying the way she didn't rise to any of Dean's goading but flat-out ignored him instead. It looked like it was ruffling his feathers, so to speak. Andy would have to remember that. "She offered her body in service against the coming apocalypse."

"Uh-huh." Andy frowned, looking at the woman, then the brothers. Dean didn't seem to care so much that their angel buddy was possessing a human, Sam at least looked regretful. Andy figured he didn't have any right to judge someone else's sacrifices, particularly as he was known for not giving people that choice to begin with. At least, not for the last year.

Tracy's pale, blood smeared face flashed across his mind and he flinched, pushing the thought back as quickly and viciously as it had come forward.

"So, you sticking around, Cas?" Dean raised his eyes to the mirror and the angel in the backseat. Subtle change of topic: check. Although Andy could admit he was grateful for it, and for Dean's tact. "We got a ghost in Nashville needs re-deadification."

"That's not a word," Sam and Andy answered at the same time.

"Oh god, now there's two of you," the older hunter groaned. "Don't make me turn this car around, cuz I will."

"That would make reaching Nashville difficult indeed."

Andy stared at the woman in the backseat with him. Huh. Angels with sarcasm, whadya know. Dean, meanwhile, was glaring at her in the mirror.

"Don't make me add you to the list of reasons Cas." He looked back at the road, seemed to think better of it, and was back to glaring at the mirror again. "And don't play dumb, I know devil lady's in there feeding you all this."

"Would 'angel lady' not be a more apt name?" Cas asked, even as Andy tried to figure out who Dean was talking about. But after a pause, Dean muttering that no, absolutely not, that would not be a 'more apt' name, Castiel added, "Angela prefers 'Dragon Lady.'"

The older Winchester rolled his eyes hard enough Andy might have warned him about them getting stuck that way, but he was too busy staring at Cas with wide eyes.

"Wait," he blurted out unintentionally for the second time in less than ten minutes, "there's a person in there?!"

-o-o-o-

Dragon Lady, indeed.

Once Cas and Angela were done lecturing him (my god, he was getting lectured by an angel), Andy sort of just sat, stunned in the backseat. Not that they'd really lectured him. Well, Cas had sort of lectured him, but it hadn't been like a mom lecture (and the parts of it that had were definitely coming from Angela). No, it had been more of the droning monologue variety, the subject matter being the subtle but numerously intricate differences of the conscious mind versus the unconscious mind, delivered by a professor who only spoke in monotone to a class of mostly asleep students at eight in the morning. Andy hadn't really done the whole college thing, but he was pretty sure Cas just summed the entire experience up for him in seven and a half minutes.

Angela interjected every so often. Andy could tell, because Castiel would use air quotes anytime she did. An angel with sarcasm and air quotes. Good God, maybe he'd been missing out on this whole religion thing, after all.

The short answer, delivered after the long answer, was no, Cas could not stay long or join them for the hunt. She was merely checking in while she had the time to do so. Dean tried to hide his disappointment, but Andy picked up on it easily enough (he wasn't exactly good at hiding it, after all), and glanced between the two of them. Cas seemed aware of it as well, though took careful steps to avoid addressing it.

Good god.

An angel and a human with- with- was that unresolved sexual tension Andy spotted?

Oh, this kept getting better and better (and less and less believable). Well, okay, one-sided sexual tension, as far as Andy could tell. Cas's face didn't really, uh, give away much. Or move. Like at all. But Dean's sure did. That might even make it better. Very teenage drama, very One Tree Hill. They even had a pair of brothers and everything.

(He had not watched that show voluntarily. It was just one of Tracy's favorites, and she'd dragged him to her house every day after school. In no way ever, on pain of death, would he own up to watching it even after he stopped going over to her house. Nope, no way, you couldn't make him, no amount of money, fine, alright, okay it was a guilty pleasure. Happy? Now shut up.)

Oh yeah, he thought, glancing back and forth between hunter and angel. He'd definitely been missing out on this whole religion thing.

"How's it going up there?" Sam turned in the passenger seat, side-tracking Andy's thoughts.

"Up where?" he wondered aloud, though he already could tell no one was going to answer him.

"Better. It is…comforting to have an ally."

Andy frowned, wondering what they were talking about.

"Yeah, you said you'd spoken to one of your brothers about… everything. That's, uh, going okay?" Sam glanced over at Dean, who was suddenly tight-lipped and ignoring the conversation like it was an Olympic sport.

Andy frowned further as the plot of their teenage drama thickened. Love triangle perhaps? Those were always big on that caliber of crap television. Sam had mentioned a brother, though. Incest was probably a bit much. Family drama, of course, was always a solid go-to. Possible bad guy, then, getting in the way? Unlikely, he supposed, since a brother to Cas meant another angel.

At least Andy knew what they were talking about now. Which probably meant 'up there' was Heaven. Yeah, he should have figured that one out sooner. Again, atheist. He wasn't used to thinking about things like Heaven as actual locations one could visit. Or worry about.

Speaking of, why, exactly, were the Winchesters worried about Heaven? Shouldn't Paradise come with, you know, no worries?

"Yes," Cas answered the brunet, a tiny smile just in the corner of her mouth. Andy thought it look a little out of place: unpracticed, maybe. "It is going well, Sam, you needn't worry."

The younger Winchester settled back in the front seat, easy as that. Even Dean seemed to relax a fraction, although Andy suspected that had more to do with the conversation moving on than Castiel's reassurances. Still, he sat in the back and watched the three of them interact, forming his own theories (which, albeit, probably had a touch too much trash TV influencing them), since no one seemed very willing to discuss the realities of his – or their – situation with him.

-o-o-o-

Cas rode with them for another hour before announcing, rather abruptly and in the middle of Sam and Dean bickering about what constituted good music ('I'm just saying, maybe, just once*, we could listen to something recorded* this century, Dean'), that she needed to return.

"Yeah, alright. Thanks for checking in," Dean said, somewhat grumpily. He really didn't seem too happy about Cas taking back off for Heaven, which was ringing all sorts of alarm bells for Andy. But, then again, that could just be the teenage love angst talking (who was he kidding, he'd watched Gilmore Girls and Veronica Mars all on his own, no female influence needed. They were addictive, okay? Plus, the girls were hot. And Sam kind of reminded him of this one character…)

"Good luck, Cas," Sam added, and again, Andy wanted to know why an angel needed luck in Heaven.

Castiel leaned forward ever so slightly, then paused, before a little chime like a clerk's desk bell went off inside the car.

"What the hell-"

The angel was gone, leaving Andy staring wide-eyed at the now empty space beside him.

"Damnit, Cas, not when you leave!" Dean shouted up at the ceiling. "When you show up!"

Andy wondered, vaguely, if an angel could hear human criticism from Heaven. Sure didn't seem to stop Dean.

Chapter End Notes

A/Ns: This is a classic example of how I can never write just one chapter of something. It's always three chapters. Oh, the Andy Episode? Three chapters. Jo episode? Three chapters. Croatoan? Okay, let's not even get into that one. This mother friggin' season's gonna end up being sixty chapters at this rate!

Andy Shipping It: I swear, there will be characters in this story that do not ship Destiel. It's not my fault Bobby and Andy are just the first ones to witness it. Jo won't ship it! Or Ellen, or Ash, or Charl- okay, no, Charlie will totally ship it. Uh... I mean...she will, if, we, er, cough get to Season 7. Yup. Totally smooth exit on that one.

Up Next: Andy gets his first taste of a real hunt. Upon further introspection, he decides he's a superhero (because he has a cape), quickly realizes that capes are a terrible idea when his tries to murder him, and ends up telling Sam about his late night visitor after Dean decides rock-paper-scissors is a game for children (I swear this all actually happens, I'm not writing drunk)

Chapter 65: Season 2: Chapter 32

Chapter Notes

A/Ns: I wrote this chapter months ago, so the Avengers reference in it seemed totally innocuous at the time, a bit of fun, you know? Now, of course, it just sounds like I'm still stuck on Endgame… Not that I'm not, or, like, going to see it again this weekend, or anything… XD

Reviews: You all continue to be fantastic and I really really really appreciate it! For the guests reviewing on ff dot net without a login, some of you have been asking fantastic questions or just leaving really wonderful reviews. Please know that I would love to reply to your comments, answer your curiosities, and thank you personally. If that is something you're interested in, please PM me or leave me some sort of contact or something. Whatever works best for you!

Chapter Warnings: Andy's taking advice from Edna Mode, Dean's getting to play with just his absolute favorite of supernatural beasties, and Sam's in a sharing mood. Bring on the capes, coins, and just a sprinkle of silliness.

See the end of the chapter for more notes

-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-

The Road So Far (This Time Around)

Season 2: Chapter 32

-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-

The mist was thick, almost fog really, and it hung low in the air, heavy enough to taste the humidity with every breath. It was somehow worse in the cemetery; the trees were slick with it, moss hanging off the branches lowest to the ground, swaying in a wind that didn't seem to exist. The tombstones and above-ground entombments of soldiers long-time passed were hazy silhouettes in the yellow lights of the nearest street and then the grey light of a half-moon once the three hunters ventured further in.

The Winchesters had told Andy to stay in the car, but yeah, no, screw that. That was how people died in horror movies, man. Didn't they know that?

"Can I have a gun?" he asked as he caught up to the two brothers, one armed with shovels and a small duffel, the other with a shotgun. Both of them exchanged looks before answering together.

"No."

Andy made a face, toyed with the idea of making Dean give him the shotgun (although he knew he'd never actually do it. Sam would kill him and then Dean would kill him again once he came out of it. It was a fun thought, though.) "Does a gun even do anything to a ghost?"

"It does when the shell is packed rock-salt."

The kid's brow went up in interest. They'd given him the basic rundown of supernatural baddies and their weaknesses, mostly in response to his stream of questions and curiosity and logistics that kept him from thinking too much about the last few days or the shambles his life was in.

"Bet those aren't standard rounds," he chuckled, quickening his step to come up between them, almost tripping on his robe as it tried to tangle between his legs. "Do you guys pack 'em yourself?"

They looked surprised, exchanging another one of those brotherly-type looks, and Andy glanced between them.

"Really? Bible belt, guys. Practically doubles as the second amendment belt?" Andy laughed again at their faces. "What kind of civilians are you used to dealing with?"

"The kind that would have stayed in the car," Dean emphasized, but his grump was mostly for show.

"Or the kind too shocked by the werewolf breaking into their house to remember where the gun safe is," Sam added and Andy had to concede that point.

He didn't have much experience with guns, himself. He'd shot a rifle a couple of times with some high school buddies, mostly cans and bottles in fields or on camping trips, but it hadn't really been his thing. He knew plenty of hunters, though. The turkey and deer kind, he thought, glancing at the two brothers who were definitely unlike anyone he'd met in his hometown.

Silence fell between the three as they kept moving deeper into the park. Their ghost was old – really old – and that meant the back of the place, apparently. He was civil war era level old, which, according to Sam and Dean, was pretty rare. Most of the time, ghosts hanging around that long were usually taken care of by hunters generations before them. Unless they were newly awoken by something, like an excavation or grave robbery.

Apparently, the only sorts of ghosts who managed to stick around to the triple digits were either in a remote location, kept a low victim count, or were of the rare power level that made them too risky to go after.

"Like the Morton House," Dean said, not that Andy knew what that meant. Sam immediately spared his brother a look.

"No."

"I'm not saying we go," the older Winchester amended with an eye roll, but Andy kinda had the feeling that's exactly what he was saying. "I'm just using it as an example."

"Do I even want to know?"

Sam shook his head in Andy's direction, hefting the shovels over his shoulder as they picked their way through graves. Andy had been armed with a flashlight and the job of finding their dead Lieutenant ('If you're tagging along, you're gonna be useful') but he wasn't really paying much attention to the passing names. Unfortunately for them, this section of the cemetery was old enough that half the names weren't even visible on the stone anymore, and the county office didn't have accurate plot records for at least a quarter of the park's skeletal residents. It certainly had the potential to be a very long night.

"It's a haunted house famous for its body count. No one even knows if it's one ghost or multiple, but the house locks down on February 29th, every four years. No hunter has ever come back from it."

"Plenty of school kids looking for a dare haven't come back, either," Dean added, pausing to wipe plant growth off of a tomb so they could properly read the faded name. Not their guy. "And it's one ghost. One pissed off, it-rub-the-lotion-on-its-skin level, psycho ghost, with a whole bunch of death echoes hanging around."

Sam raised his eyebrows at his brother, but Dean didn't elaborate further. The bitchface Sam pulled clearly said he was the one who didn't want to know, now.

"How has that gone unnoticed?" Andy's eyebrows were also up, but he was focused about the missing kids. "I mean, that many deaths, on the same day, and local authorities haven't looked into it?"

"Because the house is back to normal by the time cops come looking. And no bodies have never turned up, so they're all classified as missing, usually declared runaways." Sam bent down in front of a grave, trying to discern the worn carving on it. He dropped the shovels to the ground beside him. "I think this is it, guys!"

"Thank Christ." Dean passed Andy the shotgun with a pointed look. The kid got a little more serious, giving a nod back as he took it. The older Winchester bent down for a shovel and started clearing the top layer of ground cover that had grown naturally after so many years.

The brothers broke ground and dug for several minutes of mostly silence, offset only by the shovels shifting dirt and the Winchesters occasional grunts of effort and heavy breathing. Andy stood guard, but he wasn't even sure what he was looking for. So, he just kept scanning across the misty landscape, the silhouetted tombs and tree trunks pretty creepy in the darkness.

"Oh yeah, if I was a monster, I'd definitely kill as many people as I could on a night like this." The comment, mentioned offhand, caused both brothers to stop digging, and silence reigned. Andy looked over his shoulder to catch their looks. "What? It's all about mood. Atmosphere! Even monsters understand setting the tone."

Dean shook his head, digging the blade of metal back into the ground. "Thanks for that truly helpful perspective there, kid."

Andy just shrugged, eyes going back to the mist. "Just trying to get in the killer's mind. Profile them. Like the FBI."

"They're monsters," Dean disagreed, groaning with effort against a particularly stubborn tree root that fought back. "This one's an ancient-ass ghost. Don't need profiling to hunt that down, just a good old fashioned salt-n-burn."

They'd made it about a foot down in a roughly six by two rectangle, and Andy grinned at them from the edge. "You know, that's what people in the sixties said about profiling psychopaths. 'They're psychopaths – don't gotta understand them, just gotta catch them.' But profiling actually turned out to be an incredibly useful tool to the FBI."

Sam was giving Dean the kind of look he knew too well. The look that said, 'He's got a point, you know.' It'd be a bitchface all of its own number if that look didn't also pull Dean's ass out of the fire on the occasional hunt. The older Winchester stopped digging and leaned against his shovel, glaring up at the much shorter kid instead of his brother.

"Okay, here's my profile of you: you watch too much television."

Andy seemed to think about it, like really think about it, before he turned to Sam and said, completely sincerely, "That's true. See, working already!"

Dean just rolled his eyes and Sam, who hadn't stopped digging, wondered when he became the mule who carried all the gear and did all the work while the other two bickered.

Good god. He'd become a middle child.

"Dig, Dean," he grumbled, though it was mostly good naturedly as his brother grumbled back and kicked the blade into the dirt.

"What else would you profile about me?" Andy crouched at the foot of the grave, maroon robe piling in the loose leaves around his feet. The shotgun was laid across his legs and doing them a whole lot of good. About as much good as their look-out.

"I'll tell you what I'd profile," Dean growled, not stopping digging this time at least. "You need a life. Some grooming wouldn't hurt. Change of wardrobe-"

"Hey, these are your clothes!"

"And you definitely need to get yourself a girlfriend."

The words were out before he had time to think them through. Good natured ribbing that the hunter would lay on just about anyone. Not even targeted specifically at the kid, just pulled from the Dean Winchester library of insults. But as soon as his brain caught up with his tongue, the older man closed his eyes, shovel stilling in the ground.

Silence reigned, and not the good kind.

"…Sorry, kid."

"It's okay." Andy was still crouching, legs like a cricket, a little too pale with a brittle smile on his face. Soon enough, though, it morphed into a weak grin. "It's the robe, isn't it?" He grabbed a hold of one side, holding out the edge like he was a back ally drug dealer with a trench coat full of fake Rolexes and little baggies of the good stuff. "Gives off too much of a 'lives-in-his-mother's-basement' vibe."

Dean huffed something very close to a laugh. Even Sam, who had stilled since the close mishap, shook his head.

"Maybe just a little?" The younger Winchester offered a sympathetic grimace, hand raised with his thumb and forefinger pinched together.

Andy sighed dramatically, and the tension passed. "But it's so comfortable!"

Dean could almost agree – there were days when he longed for his Dead Guy robe (and more so the bunker that came with it) – but that would be too easy. He had a reputation to maintain. So he shook himself back to grumpy.

"Maybe in a house, behind closed doors, buddy, with a white picket fence and a little yapper to go fetch the paper. But not in public, looking like Jerry Maguire and Ferris Bueller had a love child that hasn't showered for a month. And definitely not on a hunt! It's a friggin' work hazard."

Sam was trying to muffle his growing grin, but Andy just scoffed.

"If anything, it's an advantage!" The kid stood, swishing back and forth at the hips. The tails of the robe followed, and Sam kind of wondered when this had become his life. One hunter doing the hula and the other looking close to brotherly-murder-by-shovel. "Free range of movement, flexibility, ectoplasm slime shield-"

Dean reached out, latched onto the end of the fabric, and pulled. Andy yelped as he toppled into the shallow grave, landing in a heap between them. Leaning heavily onto the shovel once more, Dean looked down at his sprawled form with a smile made up entirely of teeth.

"Work hazard."

"So…" Andy sat up. "In that way, it's like a cape."

The older hunter just groaned, throwing his head back in clear defeat, and climbed out of the grave.

Andy scrambled up, soil-spattered robe and all. "And I'm a superhero."

He caught the shovel Dean chucked at him. "Why don't you put those heroic muscles to work, then, hero."

Sam, who decided several minutes ago that he was not going to dig this grave single-handedly to the surround-sound background music of two idiots bickering, was leaning on his own shovel when Dean looked his way. Andy started on his first dirt load.

"Whose idea was it for him to tag along?"

"Yours." Sam didn't even hesitate. He probably should have, given the glare he got in return. "Definitely yours."

"Brought two shovels for a reason, Sammy!" Dean hollered, bending down for the shotgun Andy had dropped. Sam rolled his eyes but dug the tip of the blade into the ground and started digging once more.

-o-o-o-

The attack, when it came, wasn't wholly unexpected, but the source of it sure was. Lieutenant James W Barnes' ghost ('Look for a metal arm, Sammy! If there's a metal arm in that grave, I'm so keeping it! God, you don't even know, do you? Just wait; 'Winter Soldier' was awesome. Only gotta wait…uh…eight years. Maybe seven?') reported attacks had suggested a powerful spirit. They were talking level five poltergeist activity, at the least. Ectoplasm had been present at the last two crime scenes, and that slime took a lot of rage and a lot of time.

Sam had only seen the stuff once or twice before in his life. It just didn't make any sense.

They'd spent half the day at the county records office, looking for whatever Lieutenant Barnes could have been tied to, or what might have woken him up. They walked away empty-handed, a day wasted and another victim dead in the time between. The only reason they even knew the identity of the ghost was a witness who'd turned out to have a good eye. Civil War nut, he'd explained, followed quickly by the distant look and numb expression usually acquainted with a witness who knew they couldn't possibly have seen what they'd seen. But the town had a museum dedicated to their fallen soldiers and past wars, and James W Barnes just happened to have a decent photograph taken of him in the war, blown up and hanging next to one of the larger displays of military regalia.

The Winchesters still didn't know what was keeping the Lieutenant tied to Earth, or what the hell he was so pissed off about. The victims had basic community ties to one another, but nothing criminal or particularly malicious. The three of them had spent a second day split between the museum and the public library until the sun set and they'd decided to just go burn some bones, see where that got them.

So when the pretty skeletal visage of James Barnes showed up just shy of the grave, skin hanging off his frame like ripped curtains (and looking nothing like Sebastian Stan, which was a damn shame), Dean had been ready. He pulled the shovel free of the pile of bones they'd just hit and swiped the metal right through the thing's legs. It wasn't pure iron, so it wouldn't last long, but Lieutenant Barnes disappeared with a whoosh and an angry cry.

By then, Andy had the shotgun leveled where the thing had appeared, though the barrel shook ever so slightly where it was braced against his shoulder and his eyes were definitely two sizes too big. Despite that, he was ready. Dean kept the shovel raised like a baseball bat while Sam dropped to his knees and started digging out bones and scraps of fabric and metal adornments with his hands.

What made the attack something none of them were expecting, though, was Andy's clothes to suddenly turn homicidal.

The kid's robe attacked him from behind, the ends coming up and over his head while the belt wrapping around his throat like a hangman's hood and noose. Andy cried out in surprise, the shotgun going off as he struggled, the shot thankfully wide of the Winchesters. The folds of fabric completely entangled the kid and he was hauled back and away from the grave.

His strangled, "Not the cape!" could just be heard through the fabric before Dean recovered was scrambling after him, and Lieutenant Barnes was back. Sam went flying out of the grave as the ghost threw an arm to the side. Dean managed to duck, his brother's limbs tomahawking over him as he dove for the ground and conveniently landed on top of the shotgun Andy had dropped.

He rolled on his back and fired just as the ghost bared down on him. As Barnes disappeared in a wave of blasted smoke, Dean spotted movement in the trees. It was a woman, tucked partially behind a tree, staring right at them. Her lips moved in a chant he couldn't hear, one hand wrapped around the trunk of the tree, the other stretched toward them.

Witch. Great. A witch and a ghost. Or, more like a witch controlling a ghost. Lucky them. At least they'd found their mystery cause behind Lieutenant Barnes' sudden reawakening rage fest.

Dean rolled over and up to one knee, braced the butt of the gun into his shoulder and fired at the bitch. The tree splintered brilliantly with his hit, but the witch managed to duck behind it just in time. Before the hunter could take a second shot, cold fingers dug into the back of his jacket and he cursed as the Lieutenant hauled him up to his feet and sent him flying.

Amidst the chaos, Sam scrambled back towards the grave, snagging the duffel bag they'd brought with them as he slid into the hole. He could hear Andy's muffled hollering and saw the robe haul him up and into the trees, feet kicking with all the kid had in him. The younger Winchester dug the igniter fluid out of the bag with one hand, desperately clawing the bones free of dirt with the other. He upturned the container and squeezed all of its contents across the skeletal remains.

Cold plunged between his shoulder blades like a blade of ice and Sam screamed, body spasming. What felt like freezing water filled his lungs, encased his entire chest cavity. It was so cold he couldn't catch his breath. The young hunter doubled over, clawing at the now gasoline-soaked dirt as he tried to get away from the ghost towering over him, Barnes' arm buried in his back up to the elbow.

"Sam!" Dean, on his knees at the edge of the grave, swung a shovel at the Lieutenant's head. He missed Sam's hunched form by inches and the murderous ghost disappeared with a cry.

Twenty feet up in the trees, legs kicking and most of his body weight hanging from the shoulder seems of his robe to keep the weight off his neck, Andy managed to tear the fabric away from his face just in time to see a normal looking woman run from the treeline straight towards Dean. Her arm was spread out in front of her, fingers strained. The older Winchester was climbing to his feet, using the shovel as a leg up, his back to the woman he couldn't see coming.

"Duck!" Andy yelled without thinking.

Dean and the woman both hit the ground immediately. Whatever she was, she had powers of some sort, as a purple blast erupted from her hand as she hit the deck. The energy flew wide of Dean, but Sam, immune to Andy's command and just straightening up from his bout of ghost-to-the-chest-cavity, was not so lucky. He cried out in surprise and pain as the purple charge toppled him backwards into the grave.

Andy kicked his legs, trying to drop out of the robe, but the tie remained tight around his throat as he struggled with it. The woman – witch, Andy figured out a little too late – snapped her eyes up to his from where she lay on the ground. Oh boy. She was furious. Andy had time enough to think 'uh-oh', before the witch threw her hand out at him and the tie around his neck tightened agonizingly. Breathing became more than just difficult, and good god, he was going to die.

Death by bathroom apparel. Unbelievable.

Dean scrambled to his feet and tackled the woman before she could get back up. Her concentration suddenly taken up by the hunter, Andy was able to get his fingers under the fabric and gasped for breath, which he did greedily. Orange light lit the corner of his vision, and he saw Sam scramble out of the grave, lighter in hand, just in time to take a hit from the Lieutenant. Luckily, the blast knocked him clear of the grave, which was now a pit of flames. The ghost stalked after the fallen Winchester, who was clearly struggling to get back to his feet, having taken several hard hits in a row. But as the fire grew, devouring the fuel with loud crackles, the Lieutenant faltered, staggering. He fell to one knee before the downed Winchester, who stared up at him with hopeful relief. Embers lit among the ghost's legs, climbing up and up until he was consumed by the same flames eating away his bones.

He burst out of existence like a firework, and Sam collapsed back to the ground with groan.

Andy managed to rip through the last of his robe, enough to get the straggles of fabric and belt up and over his head. He was just about to tackle how to get down from the tree, assuming the article of clothing would let him – it had started tightening around his wrists and fingers instead – when a woman's scream pierced the air. Andy cried out himself when his robe suddenly stopped holding him up and he dropped out from under it. The limp fabric caught on a passing branch and Andy's arms slid right out of it as he hit the ground below.

It was jarring and it hurt, but Andy stood triumphant and alive, his robe hanging lifeless a dozen feet over his head.

Beside the still burning grave, Dean rolled off of the witch – his hunting knife buried in her chest – and collapsed on the ground, chest heaving. "God damn witches."

Andy had to agree. He stumbled over to the two brothers as they both struggled to sit up, visually checking one another over for injuries before doing the same for him. They were all alive. Bruised and a bit beaten up, maybe. Kind of shocked and rethinking fashion choices, in Andy's case. But alive.

"So…no capes?"

Sam laughed, paused to catch his breath as his ribs ached in protest, then laughed again as Andy offered him a hand. He hauled himself up and off the damp ground with the kid's help. Dean groaned, climbing to his feet as well, but there was a grin on his face regardless.

"Sorry for the whole, 'duck' thing," Andy offered as the older Winchester limped over to them.

"You kidding me?" Dean checked his brother over again with another quick up and down, then repeated the look on Andy. The inspection apparently proved up to snuff as he clapped the kid on the back almost jovially. "You probably saved me one hell of a hit, maybe even a concussion. Magic hurts, dude. And in this line of work, that's another five years, easy, of not drinking my food through a straw. If I make it that long."

Sam, who was halfway to opening his mouth to say, yeah, magic didhurt, jerk, considering he had taken that hit, stopped as Dean's words made it all the way to his brain. He gave his brother the kind of worried look that said he was probably wondering if Dean was concussed anyway. Andy just blinked, looking pleased at first before his face scrunched up in reconsideration, a clear picture of hunter retirement now painted in his mind.

"Dude. That was the most counterproductive victory speech ever."

Dean huffed again and squeezed his shoulder in what doubled as comradery and a painful warning to take the damn compliment. Andy had never had an older brother, but he was pretty sure that was an older brother should clamp right there. "You did good, kid."

"That one was much better," Andy congratulated, but he was smiling widely. "Second attempt for the win."

"Don't make me hurt you." Dean groaned as he bent over and picked up the shotgun, then made his way over to the witch's body. Andy was about to ask what they were supposed to do with her – a little worried about the fact that they'd just killed someone, even if she'd been busy trying to strangle him to death with his favorite robe – when Dean rolled her over with his foot and she toppled into the smoldering grave.

Sam bent down for a shovel, tossing Andy the other one. He sighed – not much of a victory lap – but got to work re-filling the hole they'd spent the night digging. It wasn't easy, in fact the whole night was nothing but sore muscles, a pounding heart, and utter exhaustion. But, the ghost was gone, the woman controlling him dead, and no more people in that small Nashville suburb were going to die unpleasant, unwarranted deaths.

It felt… Andy didn't know. Good wasn't quite right. Not bad, at least.

When they marched back to the Impala an hour later, Sam speculating the witch had been using Lieutenant Barnes' ghost to go after personal grudges, they left Andy's robe hanging in the tree. Its tatters blew gently in the wind that still wasn't really existent, sort of a conquering flag or possibly a symbol of fashion defeat. Solid fifty/fifty, really.

-o-o-o-

Andy was beat by the time they got to the motel. It took everything he had not to fall asleep in the car on their way back into town. Now that he was staring at the bed, so inviting despite its rock-hard springs and paper-thin comforter, Andy didn't know if he'd be able to resist. He couldn't not sleep for the rest of his life. Superhero or not, (cape or no cape), everybody needed sleep.

Sam was climbing into the other bed, having changed into a pair of pajama pants and an old t-shirt while Andy sat on the edge of his mattress, looking miserable. They'd gotten two rooms again, and this time Dean had laid claim – loud claim – to the single, declaring rock-paper-scissors an inadequate and unfair decision making paradigm. Probably because he never won at it. Sam didn't mind, though. He'd been wanting to talk to Andy ever since they'd had to shake him yesterday morning.

"You look terrible," Sam started with a sympathetic moue. "You should get some sleep, Andy."

"I can't. Not when every time I close my eyes, I see…"

Sam looked away, which was his first mistake. As his gaze drifted to the ceiling, he was hit by that brutal image of Jess, pinned and bleeding. The brunet turned his head back to Andy, physically shaking off the terrible vision.

"I get it, man."

Andy sighed and started toeing off his shoes. "I don't think you do, Sam. It's not just…Tracy. It's the yellow-eyed man, too."

"Azazel?" Sam suddenly sat up, worry etched in his frown. He'd wondered at what Andy had said that morning, but he hadn't wanted to push. He'd…kind of been hoping it was nothing. "Andy, did you see Azazel in your dream?"

"I think he knows I'm with you." The kid rubbed at his arms, bare without his robe. They would have to get him a couple sets of his own clothes, soon. He couldn't keep wearing Dean's.

Sam's frown only deepened, but his gaze drifted down to his ow pillow. Andy hardly noticed.

"He's…terrifying, man. I think he might be worse than the nightmares. It was like he was there. He was real, and I couldn't get away."

Chewing on his cheek, Sam nodded. Then, out of the blue, he swung his legs off the bed and stood. He swiped his pillow, revealing a weird looking coin lying on the mattress. Andy blinked at it, then up at Sam as the hunter snatched the thing up and made his way to the other side of Andy's bed.

"Uh…Sam?" The younger Winchester didn't say anything, just plopped down on Andy's bed, putting the coin between their two pillows. Andy watched, eyebrows raised, as Sam got under the sheet and blanket, re-arranged the pillows so they were end-to-end and covering the coin completely, then laid his head down. All without a word. "We having a sleepover, buddy?"

"It's magic," Sam said by way of explanation. "A Persian sleep coin; you put it beneath your head while you sleep and you don't dream. Azazel won't be able to find you. We can try it like this, see if we can get two for the price of one."

After all, today's standard pillow wasn't exactly common – or maybe even in existence – back when the thing had first been created. Sam highly doubted there was a clause in the coin's magic that limited it to a single pillow. He didn't know if the spell would work on two people at once, but there was no reason not to try. Andy didn't deserve the torment Azazel had in store, and if the yellow-eyed demon realized who he was with, he would use Andy to find the Winchesters.

In the morning they would make him a hex bag and, if he was willing, find a tattoo parlor to get him warded against demonic possession. But if the coin didn't work for two, they'd have to pray to Cas for a second one, if she could even find another. Sam had sort of been under the impression they shouldn't hail the angel unless it was an emergency. So there was absolutely no harm in trying this, first. Other than a crowded bed and the risk of a nightly visitor.

The kid hesitated, glancing between Sam and the hidden coin before he finally shrugged out of his last shoe and slid awkwardly under the covers.

It was a bit of a tighter fit than was strictly comfortable. Sam wasn't exactly a small man, after all, and the bed was only a double. But Andy was used to sleeping in a van, and Sam had spent his entire life bunking with his brother, so neither of them had much complaint about it. When both woke five hours later from a dreamless sleep, free of their yellow-eyed pursuer, there was no need to discuss the next night's sleeping arrangements. It was a silent agreement between them: a price they were more than willing to pay.

The next morning as they climbed into the Impala, Sam told Dean they wouldn't need two rooms after all. Predictably, the older brother spent the next several minutes shamelessly ribbing the 'happy couple', until Andy leaned over the front seat and said, "You know I can convince you that your shaving cream tastes better than any pie in the world, right?"

Dean snapped his cakehole shut, eyes all squinty in the rear view mirror. "You wouldn't."

"You could just tell him he's deathly allergic and can't ever eat pie again," Sam offered, a shit-eating grin on his face as his brother turned his most scandalous look on him.

"You know, you're right, Sam, I could."

Dean's dropped jaw snapped closed with an audible clack, broken only a moment later to grumble about bitchy passengers not able to take a joke. He put the car into gear and they pulled away from the motel. Sam shared a grin with Andy, who settled into the back seat, rather proud of himself.

Jedi on the team, indeed.

-o-o-o-

Tom sat in front of his laptop (well, it was his ever since he'd murdered the owner) and squinted suspiciously at the screen. He had an internet browser pulled up, page currently displaying a map of the continental United States and a little blinking green dot moving, ever so slowly, along one of the main interstate routes.

The same route, in fact, that it had been moving along for two weeks now. Back and forth. There and back again. And again. This would be the third time the Winchesters were making the trek from Raleigh, North Carolina, to Seattle, Washington.

Tom slammed the laptop shut with a hiss. Fucking Winchesters. They'd planted the damn tracker on a commercial vehicle. He stood, grabbed the broken cocktail glass off the table – Sam Winchester's blood still lining the jagged rim – and snatched his jacket off the back of the chair.

The demon headed out of the rather high-end townhouse he'd been squatting in ever since he'd slit the throats of the couple who owned it and stashed them in their coat closet for safe keeping.

Time for Plan B.

Chapter End Notes

James W Barnes: Was actually a real Tennessee soldier in the civil war (no clue on his rank, though). Sometimes I just make up names, sometimes I find real people, and this time I went in search of Tennessee soldiers. I went with James since it was an easy name and there were probably tons of last names to pick from. Turns out, there are tons, and at least 12 pages on dedicated to James Barnes's in the civil war alone. Since Supernatural likes to have such fun and games with names, I figured why not?

Reviews: Please share your thoughts if you have them! As always, thanks for reading :D

Chapter 66: Season 2: Chapter 33

Chapter Notes

A/Ns: I know many of you have been pondering for quite some time now what's up with Chuck's writing, and whether he's writing details of Dean being from the future. I present: the answer. I've not really written this kind of thing before, where two versions of events are happening simultaneously, so hopefully it comes across clearly.

Reviews: Thank you everyone who commented or 'pushed' that like button last chapter! We gota lot of newcomers, which is awesome (and to you all I say, Welcome!). I wanna take a min to spotlight something a couple of our binge readers mentioned, which was some form of happiness or surprise that this story had been updated recently, as many lengthy stories don't get finished. Seeing that brought up by multiple people really made me really smile because, honestly? If you'd asked me two years ago if I would still be writing this story today, I probably would have told you no. Would I have said I hope so? Absolutely. But if I'd had to guess and be honest about it, I'd have said that I was likely to lose interest, get disheartened, or just get too busy to write this mammoth all the way through. I'm happy to say the first hasn't occurred in even the slightest, and the last two may be battles I am waging, but I haven't lost yet :)

Anyway, I just wanted to say thank you to those that brought it up, and those who've been with me since the start, or the damn near start, or even just a really long time! It's been a long, but good, two years and I really appreciate that you guys appreciate this story is still going (if that makes any sense). I'm gonna keep working my little butt off (it's really not that little...) to keep it that way for the foreseeable future.

Chapter Warnings: Chuck's writing, Persephone's reading, Jo's hunting, Dean's scheming, Andy's helping, and Sam just thinks this is all a really bad idea.

See the end of the chapter for more notes

-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-

The Road So Far (This Time Around)

-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-

Chuck was nervous. His palms were positively leaking sweat around the stack of papers, and he couldn't seem to stop his whole face from alternating spastically between a smile and a frown, like some sort of crazy person. His cheeks were starting to hurt from it.

"H-Hey, Steph?" He stopped in front of her chair, and it very much had become her chair over the last three weeks. A dilapidated old thing that had more fabric hanging off of it than on it, but she'd seemed quite content with the Lazy Boy, hauling it over to his front window and curled up in it the first time he presented her with something to read. They'd started with an old draft from several books ago. Chuck had offered it to her, suggesting maybe she could read it and then version his publisher had fina'ed, so she got a hang of the kind of editing he went through. And the help maybe he needed after all.

She looked up from that chair now, halfway through the last book he'd sent to his publisher. It hadn't printed yet, and was the first thing 'new' he'd let her read. But it was far too late to make changes to it now. Chuck felt it was safer that way. He'd only managed to hand over old things that maybe he wouldn't feel too crushed over if she didn't like them or had harsh critique. As of yet, she hadn't offered much more than sparse grammatical input (apparently, his was, what was the word she'd used? Lacking.) and many questions concerning where the story might go from there.

"What's up, Chuck?"

He couldn't help the chuckle that escaped his mouth, momentarily distracting him from the fact that he'd been nervous. The slang sounded weird as ever coming from this woman. She alternated between the strangest mix of super-formal English and the kind of vernacular someone picks up from watching entirely too much 90's television shows. Chuck figured it had something to do with English not being her first language, but she hadn't told him much when he'd poked around.

Her super formal training in English, wherever it had come from, made her quite the old-fashioned grammar Nazi, though. Oxford Comma level Nazi. He'd had to remind her several times that that comma was considered optional. She'd just stared at him until he'd told her he couldn't change it, what she was reading was already published.

Okay, so perhaps she hadn't lost every inch of that intimidating persona he'd first met. Still, he supposed being a grammar Nazi wasn't a bad thing in her job, though. Maybe she just scared her clients into writing faster.

"Here." Chuck thrust the papers he was holding towards her. It was only a couple of chapters stapled together, not quite the thick stack of a finished book like she was currently reading. "I, uh…it's new. Unpublished, I mean. Uh…ripe for…critique. I-If you… wanna take a stab at it?"

Stephanie sat up, eyes wider with interest. She took the papers from him, noticing his nervousness as he clutched them a tad too tight and took a second too long to let them go. When he finally did, she settled back in the chair, but stared up at him instead of the chapters now in resting against her drawn up knees. "You're finished with it, then?"

"Uh…not…completely. It's- It's just a first draft."

Which was a lie. He'd already been through three different editing passes on it, which was about two and a half more than he usually did, but he really wanted her to like it. Or, at least, he thought he did. He wasn't used to anyone but Sera – his publisher – reading them before they were printed. It opened up a whole new round of possible rejection (disdain, disinterest, repulsion. Straight up laughing in his face. Etc, etc), and Chuck wasn't so great with that.

"Okay."

She tucked her legs back under her and dug in to the first page with no further ado. Chuck stood there for another moment, awkward, before he turned and shuffled back to his desk.

-o-o-o-

When Jo Harvelle's number popped up on his cell's display, the thing ringing away in his pocket, Dean couldn't say he was surprised. He hadn't been expecting it down to the minute or anything, but he had been expecting it for the last week or two.

"Hey there, Jo," he answered easily, sliding into the diner booth that Andy and Sam already occupied. He was still making them pay for their threats by dragging them to every single diner that boasted about 'world famous' pie.

"How far are you from Philly?"

Straight to the point then. Dean pulled the phone away to glance at it like he could actually pass on that raised brow straight through to the demanding girl on the other end of the line. "Hello to you, too."

He could practically hear the eye roll. "Dean. I'm serious."

"Four hours," he supplied, while Sam tried to ask what was going on with just his face. "You got a case?"

"Yeah, I got a case. Three weeks ago, a girl disappeared from a Philadelphia apartment, and she wasn't the first." Dean remembered the hunt. It had been the reason he'd expected Jo's call. It had been her case, though he remembered them snaking it from her on Ellen's request. Not that that had stopped her for long. She'd her to show up before they even got started. "Over the past eighty years, six women have vanished. All from the same building-"

"Your mother know you're on a hunt?" Dean couldn't help but interrupt. He didn't need the details or the sell, anyway. They were obviously going.

"What makes you think I'm on it?" He could practically see her evasive eyes dart to the side, that smirk playing at the corner of her lips to cover her unease. "I could just be calling you with the details."

Dean rolled his eyes. "Right. Only this isn't the Roadhouse landline, and I'm not an idiot."

"Fine," Jo bit back, and he practically hear the pursed lips and terse face. "I'm on it. I've rented the apartment-"

Despite Sam now trying to flag him down for details and Andy glancing back and forth between the two of them, Dean ignored them both. He closed his eyes and rubbed at his forehead. God damn it. She wasn't supposed to beat them there. "Jo-"

"There's ectoplasm here, Dean. This is one seriously pissed off ghost we're dealing with."

"Jo-"

"I've gone back through the building's history-"

"Are you insane?" Her stream of excited words died abruptly, and Dean sighed. "You're practically a walking billboard for this guy's type, and you went into that apartment alone?"

Now Sam was looking decidedly worried, which he had every reason to be, even if he didn't know the details. The other end of the call went dead quiet, and Dean knew he'd pissed her off. He just hope she didn't hang up on him without handing over an address first.

"How do you know I'm his type?"

"What?"

"The ghost," she clarified, voice clipped. "How do you know he has a type?"

Well, crap.

"Lucky guess." Dean ran a hand down his face, angry at himself and the situation. She hadn't said anything about the victims, other than they were young girls, had she? He hadn't let her get that far. Son of a bitch. It was time to switch tactics. "You calling us for backup? You better be calling for backup, or I'm calling your mother."

Jo snorted. "What's she going to do?"

Which was a fair question, but so not the point. "Jo."

"Yes." The word was practically spat, but Dean didn't really care. It was the one he needed to hear. "I…could use some backup, alright? You gonna step up, or you gonna tattle on me?"

"We'll be there in four hours. Text me the address." Dean pulled the phone away from his ear, then thought better of it. "And don't hunt this thing on your own, you got that?"

"I'm not a child, Dean."

"No, what you are is new to this, and your mother will murder me if you get dead. So sit tight – not in the building – until we get there."

He hung up before she could answer, knowing she would only argue. Even thought she was smart enough to know she was over her head, even though she'd called for backup. Jo was tenacious as hell and didn't know how to stop. Dean just hoped she actually listened this once.

Ellen wouldn't have to kill him if anything happened to her, he'd friggin' do it himself.

Their waitress came over as Dean tucked his phone away, Sam already asking what was going on while digging out his wallet. The older Winchester still didn't answer, instead smiling tightly up at their server.

"We'll take that pie to go."

-o-o-o-

"Jo Harvelle is the daughter of the bar owner, yes? The…Roadhouse?"

Chuck looked up from his laptop. It had only been ten minutes or so, but Steph was several pages in. He rubbed at his chin, trying not to be self-conscious. It was just a question. An innocent question. "Yep, that's her. Jo and Ellen Harvelle."

Steph hummed noncommittally and went back to the chapter. Chuck hesitated, opened his mouth, closed his mouth, decided she probably didn't want to be interrupted, and went back to typing.

"How does Dean know the ghost's type?"

Chuck stopped again. "Huh?"

"Dean said she fit the ghost's type. How did he know?"

"Uh…." Chuck smiled, rubbing the back of his neck awkwardly. "Just wait, you'll find out."

Steph narrowed her eyes at him, but she looked more putout than angry. So Chuck laughed nervously before going back to his writing. Eventually, she went back to the story, but he couldn't help glancing over at her with every page flip.

-o-o-o-

As they exited the diner, they were intercepted by a middle-aged man in a business suit before they could make it to the Impala.

"Excuse me, gentlemen?" The trio pulled up short at the incredibly average looking man heading towards them from the direction of their car. He was Caucasian, maybe early forties, with close-cut, pale hair, the beginnings of a receding hairline, and a stiff smile. Dean was immediately on guard, though nothing particularly screamed danger. "I'm looking for a gas station. Do you know where the nearest one is?"

Dean and Sam exchanged glances, Andy quiet behind them. Sam took one for the team, turning a friendly smile on the stranger. "We passed one on our way in. Two blocks up the road that way. On the right."

The man smiled and dipped his head. "Thanks, thank you very much."

And then he turned and walked in the direction Sam had indicated.

"That was weird." The two brothers turned to Andy, who was still staring after the guy. He glanced between them. "Was that weird? Felt weird."

"It was weird alright," Dean mumbled, glancing back over his shoulder at the retreating figure. "That was an angel."

"Wait, what?" Sam straightened, forehead smoothing out as he whipped his gaze back at the stranger in a damn near comical double take.

"For real?" Andy asked at the same time, eyebrows climbing towards his hair. "That was an angel? Like Cas?"

"Yeah." Dean was still watching the man, who made it past the next building and a row of hedges, both of which obscured him from sight. The hunter rubbed at his chest absently. He turned and headed for the Impala, the other two following, asking a million questions a minute, but Dean was busy wondering if that had happened the first time around.

He was sure it had been an angel. He'd seen enough of them, knew how they held themselves stiff in their vessels, the holier than though vibe that just wafted off of them in waves. But was this new? Was it a result of them going off radar, or had this happened the first time? Dean from 2006 wouldn't have thought anything of a weird guy in a suit who didn't leave much of an impression other than 'odd.'

Cas had said Heaven was likely watching them and would notice when they dropped off the grid. Hell had taken a crack at tracking them down. Was this Heaven's turn?

Dean angled another look over his shoulder in the direction the angel had gone, but there was nothing to see. He pulled open the driver's door and got in the car, the other two following, still bugging him for answers. They'd have to check the Impala over for trackers, again, but they couldn't do it there.

-o-o-o-

The hex bag was missing from the wheel well. They didn't see any other evidence of tracking devices, supernatural or man-made, or tampering at all. It didn't surprise Dean that Heaven was less technologically savvy than Hell. Went with that whole holier-than-though crap.

"We'll have to make another one." Sam glanced towards the trunk, trying to calculate how much they had left of their ingredients. They'd made one for Andy, and Dean had lost one on a hunt a couple weeks ago ('What do you want me to say, Sam? The thing must have fallen out. I was a little pre-occupied not becoming Vamp meat!'). Sam was certain they had enough to replace the one in the Impala, but after that, he wasn't sure. He made a mental note to talk to Cas about getting some more the next time they saw her.

"Yeah," Dean growled, though it wasn't Sam he was annoyed at. No one touched his Baby, and now Heaven and Hell had both put their stinkin' mitts on her. Sons of bitches, all of them. "We should up the warding on her too. Make it harder for them to mess with her."

He hadn't wanted to put the hex bag in the interior, because, hexbags, damnit. But maybe they would have to. Only problem was, they couldn't ward the car against angels getting in without locking Cas out too. But clearly, they were going to have to start getting a little more creative in their defense.

"We should keep moving." Dean headed back for the front of the car. Heaven probably wasn't doing anything more than tracking their movements – he hadn't spotted anyone following them and Cas had seem pretty unconcerned with the surveillance – but he didn't want to risk them dropping by for a listen. He really didn't want to go back to worrying about what he could say out loud again.

First chance they got, he was warding the car six ways from Sunday.

-o-o-o-

"Who was the man in the suit?"

Chuck stopped writing again, looking over the top of his computer to the woman still curled in her chair, but staring at him expectantly. He blinked.

"You wrote him into the scene, yet he left without any relevant purpose." Stephanie looked almost annoyed at the inconvenience of one of the basic components to any plot and, for an editor, Chuck kinda wondered how many books she'd read before this one. "You must have had a reason to include him."

"You did not ask this many questions when you read the other drafts."

She shrugged one unapologetic shoulder in his general direction. "I had already read the finished book. I knew the answers."

"Yeah, well," Chuck gave the stack of papers in her hands a pointed look, "you'll know these answers when you finish reading this book."

Those green eyes narrowed on him again.

"Isn't that what an editor does?" he prodded, before realizing with a pleasant jolt of surprise that he was teasing her. Without fear of death-by-eye-daggers-or-possibly-dismemberment, even. When her narrowed-eyed stare didn't get worse but shifted more into a put upon glare, Chuck relaxed ever so slightly and that tiny little ball of confidence deep down inside him – more of a pea than a ball, really – grew just a little bit bigger.

Stephanie ducked her head back into the story, but not before correcting, "Editorial assistant."

Chuck shook his head and tried to focus on typing.

-o-o-o-

"What are we going to tell her?" Sam asked after the silence in the car had lasted more than fifty miles, the talk of angels and demons dropping off about an hour ago. Dean twitched in the driver's seat, already uncomfortable with the new choice of topic.

"Nothing."

Sam just turned his head to his brother and stared, unimpressed. "Dean," he admonished, that kindergarten-teacher-lecturing-the-slow-kid voice in full gear. "She going to know something's up. How are we going to explain knowing so much about the case?"

Andy's head popped up between theirs, causing Dean to lean away with a tsking sound. The kid really should give them some warning. And wear his damn seatbelt!

"Wait, is this about you being from the future?" Andy asked, arms crossed over the front of the seat, head resting on them as he glanced between the two brothers like an up-close tennis match. So up close, he was pretty much the net in this metaphor.

"What else?" Dean grumbled. He lifted one hand from the steering wheel and made it halfway to his chest before he realized what he was doing and, reluctantly, put his hand back on his Baby. He was well aware of his brother's eyes on him the entire time.

Andy either didn't notice, hadn't spotted the tick in general, or decided not to comment. Instead, he frowned, tilting his head so his cheek was pressed into his wrist as he looked at Dean. "We can't just tell her?"

The older Winchester angled a pointed side-eye in the kid's direction. "You know, most people don't just believe you when you say something like that."

Their resident third wheel just shrugged. True enough. He wouldn't have believed it himself, if Dean hadn't admitted it under Andy's power. Actually, he still wasn't sure he believed it. This could all be a psychotic break, and he was locked in his head, rocking back and forth in the corner of a padded room muttering 'yellow-eyed demon' and 'ghosts' over and over again to the wall.

That scenario was really just as likely, he figured.

"So we're going to lie to her, instead?" Sam got them back on track, though his tone lot a left to be desired, support wise. Dean was back to twitchy. He wasn't exactly thrilled about lying to Jo either, thank you very much, but it was their safest option. "She's not stupid, you know. She's going to know something's up."

"We'll…stick with the psychic story if we have to tell her something."

Dean gave up trying not to and rubbed at his chest, and ended up doing it a little more harshly than was strictly necessary. It wasn't aching, not like it did around a demon, but sternum-Cas wasn't sitting well today and Dean didn't like it. Whether it was the angel they'd bumped into back at the diner or the fact he basically scheming against a friend (family), Dean didn't actually know. Probably both. He was starting to think the angel didn't like it when he lied, and if that was what was going on, well Cas was gonna have to just learn to deal. He'd been lying for nine damn months now and his little chest angel hadn't had anything to say for any of that.

(Not true, but also not supportive of his point, so that truth could shove it, as well)

"The less people that know about this, the better," he added, partially for Sam who was still sitting there with a half-formed bitchface (hard to tell which one, since it was still evolving, but Dean guessed it was lucky #1), and partially maybe also for Cas, too. Lying to their friends might suck balls, but pretending to be psychic was easier than explaining where he was actually from.

Sam didn't say anything, and Andy resettled his chin on his arms. He stared out the window, thinking idly, before asked, almost casually, "So…what was the plan again?"

Dean rolled his eyes but outlined the facts of the case again. Their perp was Herman Webster Mudgett, aka H.H. Holmes. ('Wait, like, the Murder Hotel guy? The Chicago World Fair guy? America's first serial killer*? That H.H. Holmes?* That's our ghost?!') The lot next door to the prison where he'd been hung and someone had decided, decades later, 'yeah, let's put an apartment complex here.' Jo playing bait because she was young, blonde, and female. And the subsequent race to find her in the walls-slash-basement-slash-sewer-slash-torture-chamber.

"We push Jo towards the empty lot and the basement," the hunter decided, wringing his hands along the steering wheel as he all but thought aloud about it. "We lead her to the answers we already know, let her think she figured them out herself. It's what I used to before, with Sam."

"You did?"

He didn't bother explaining, despite his brother's pinched eyebrows and affronted tone. Dean really didn't want to get any further into this mess – or the potential this had to become an absolute mess - than they already were. They just needed to lead Jo to H.H. Holmes and his underground chamber without getting her kidnapped or used as bait, or suspicious of them in the slightest.

How hard could that be?

-o-o-o-

Dean needed to stop asking himself, or Time, or destiny, or what-the-fuck-ever, that question.

Jo was waiting for them when they pulled up to the apartment complex, along with half a dozen cops and three cruisers. The three exchanged looks inside the Impala as they had to circle the block and find a place to park. Jo followed after them, rounding the corner just as they pulled curbside and shut the engine off.

"They must have found another girl," Dean muttered as they climbed out of the car. He vaguely remembered another vic getting nabbed while they'd been out looking for their ghost. He was pretty sure they'd her out alive, though. He vaguely recalled finding Jo and another girl. But then they'd had to turn around and use Jo as bait, yet again, because they'd had nothing else to draw Holmes back with.

If they could just get to that underground chamber and trap the ghost again, they'd be in and out in half a day, tops. Of course, they had to somehow manage all of that with Jo hanging around, chomping at the bit for a slice of the action, and they couldn't tell her how they knew the where and the when and the how and the why.

How did that saying go? Three people can keep a secret….

That wasn't even funny, in their line of work.

"He took another one. Teresa Ellis, apartment 2F," were the first words out of her mouth. Angry words. She pinned Dean with a look that definitely could have maimed, if not killed. "I could have stopped it!"

"No, you couldn't have." There was no use pulling punches, even when he knew they'd hurt. Jo was feeling the guilt every hunter with half a conscience felt when they lost someone on a hunt. But he knew from previous experience that even if they'd shown up a whole day earlier, they still wouldn't have keep Holmes from taking his most recent victim.

He also knew that victim was still alive and they had time to find her. They just had to figure out how to skip a day of research and searching, and get to the good part without mentioning Dean was form the future, Andy was a Jedi, and Sam saw dead people.

Oh, right. And they had a fiery Harvelle woman on their hands.

Awesome. This was going just so great already.

"I've had it up to here with your crap!" Jo crowded right into his personal space, glaring up at him with as much ferocity as he'd ever seen in her. Dean stared right back, like he had once before, ten years ago. Only now he knew so much more than he had then. "If you think

I can't do the job, then why did you even come?"

"I came because this isn't amateur hour, okay?" His words were just as biting as hers, his tone booking just as little room for argument. "You wanna be a hunter? Great. You're going to be a badass someday, Jo, I know it. But you don't start at level ten – no one does – and if you go into this thinking you know what you're doing, you're gonna get yourself killed."

Behind him, Sam held Andy back with a hand, the two of them a few feet further off and distinctly uncomfortable to be both on the sidelines of this conversation and sidelined by the conversation. The couple of feet Sam gave the two wasn't exactly privacy – there was no way this chat was getting that – but it was something. In front of him, Dean watched Jo grind her teeth together, her jaw clenched and vein pulsing, arms crossed defensively over her chest. But all Dean saw was a girl used to having to prove herself to every man who ever set foot in her home, and now she was putting on a damn good face when she didn't need to. Not around him. She just didn't know that yet.

Her eyes darted between his, and whatever she was looking for, she finally backed off a step, turning to the other two, instead. "Who's he?"

Subtle change of topic: check. Dean let her have it.

Andy's eyes widened at suddenly being addressed by this very, very angry chick, and he looked from one brother to the other before pushing past Sam to hold his hand out. "I'm Andy. I'm, um… just tagging along?"

One fine eyebrow rose even as Andy looked back at Sam to see if he'd gotten that even close to right. Especially once she didn't take his hand, and he dropped it awkwardly.

Jo looked back over her shoulder at Dean. "Not amateur hour, huh?"

The older Winchester just huffed. "It's good, Jo. He's with us."

She turned back around, not satisfied but not pushing it either, and Sam asked where she was with the case. Jo's eyes hardened and she held herself straighter, launching into the details she'd gathered and the reconnaissance she'd done so far. Dean had to give all three of them credit: she'd done her research and a lot of the legwork, and Sam and Andy kept straight faces, nothing in their questions or responses hinting that they already knew a lot of what she was telling them.

"I smelled something in the hallway last night while I was doing a search, and… I think something made a grab for me, but I didn't see it." Jo crossed her arms, looking pissed at herself for not doing better and acting defensive as hell, worried they might have similar thoughts. "I think it's in the walls."

"Sounds like solid recon," Sam responded with an encouraging smile, clearly having noticed the same thing as Dean. Jo was too hard on herself, thought she had too much to prove, and was going to get herself killed trying to do it. "Let's get inside, see what we can find together."

They grabbed their gear out of the trunk and Jo led them past the police and up to the apartment. Dean let out a whistle once they got upstairs. All of Jo's research was spread out on the kitchen table. He'd forgotten how good a file she put together.

"This is impressive," Sam agreed, pushing some newspaper clippings aside to reveal building blueprints.

"Put it together myself." Jo came up beside the taller man with a wry smile. "It's definitely a ghost, the ectoplasm confirms it, but I can't figure out what he's tied to, or who he is. This place was built in 1924 as a warehouse, it wasn't converted into apartments until a few months ago. Before that, it was an empty field."

"So, the most likely scenario would be someone died bloody in the building." Sam played along, bobbing his head. He wasn't exactly an Oscar nominee, but he'd played enough roles through their time as hunters to not sound too forced.

"I already checked." Jo crossed her arms, staring down at the spread of information. "In the past eighty-two years, zero violent deaths. Unless you count a janitor who slipped on a wet floor."

The Winchesters tried three times each to follow her research and get it where they needed to go without making big jumps. In the walls, basement, possible bloody death before the building. Each time fell flat, with Jo getting more and more obstinate about what she'd already learned and what she'd crossed off. Not to mention the growing suspicion as she stared at each of their fumbled attempts. Finally, Jo uncrossed her arms and focused a narrow gaze as fierce as her mother between the two Winchesters.

"Why are you guys acting weird?"

"You're acting weird."

Sam couldn't even suppress the sigh, that time, and Jo raised an unimpressed brow at the older Winchester.

"Nice comeback. You practice that all morning?"

"Shut up," Dean grumbled.

Jo launched back into her theory of a cursed object or something their ghost must be tied to. They'd have to sweep each apartment one by one, and should split up to do it. Which was a total waste of time and absolutely not what they needed to do. Dean was still trying to figure out how they were going to push her towards the empty lot without making things even more obvious when Andy interrupted, surprising all three of them.

"What about the surrounding buildings?" He was leaning on locked arms across the table from them, staring down at the photos and clippings. The kid glanced up, blinking in turn at the stares.

Jo regarded him with narrowed eyes, before glancing at both brothers and shooting back, "What about them?"

"Uh, I just mean… Did anyone die bloody in those?"

Dean blinked, realizing that they'd completely ignored one of their greatest assets. And it wasn't Andy's super-power (no way in hell he'd ever let the kid control Jo, or any hunter for that matter). No, it was his complete naivety to this scene. To hunting. They could blame his leaps of thought and easily missed information that any hunter should know as amateur hour. In the meantime, Dean and Sam could fill in the gaps, as if the kid's out-of-the-box thinking (cough, amateur, cough) was inspiration. Damn. He should have hired Andy as his unintentional cover nine months ago. He'd have had way less anxiety around Sam and Bobby at the time.

(Also, so not true, and totally wouldn't have worked. But, again, not supportive of his point here, so reality and fact-checking could just shove it.)

"How close does proximity matter to a dead guy?" Andy continued, shrugging a little self-consciously as Jo's stare lingered. "If he's an angry ghost wanting to kill girls, he's kinda gotta go where the girls are. Like…an apartment complex."

The younger hunter rolled her eyes, clearly more annoyed now than ever that Dean had brought a total noob along. And after giving her crap for her own slim resume. "That's not how ghosts work. They can't leave whatever they're bound to. If he died in one of the surrounding buildings, he'd be stuck haunting that building."

"Wait, he might be on to something," Sam parried before the lead Andy gave them grew too cold to use. Unfortunately for them, it only seemed to make Jo more annoyed. Right, because now the noob was upstaging her, and the Winchesters had his back. Good god, this was gonna turn into a feminism thing, Dean could just taste it. "You said this plot used to be a field. Did any of the surrounding buildings ever utilize it? Maybe that's why we can't find a violent death; it happened before this place was built."

"Uh…" Jo set aside her irritation and started pushing through the spread of papers until she found photos of the lot prior to construction. She laid it down for all of them to look at. "Here. This is the field. The surrounding buildings…Oh. Look at that."

She pulled back, both vexation and surprise flashing across her face before she grew serious again. "This building here. There are bars on the windows."

"A prison." Dean glanced at Sam and Andy. So far, so good. And all they'd had to do was bring along a hunter even less experienced then her and then given him all the answers. By her crossed arms and the none-too-happy glare she was throwing Andy's way, things were going just great there.

"I'll check the records," Sam said immediately, digging his laptop out of his backpack before the words were even out of his mouth. "Up until the nineteen hundreds, prisons were still executing people by hanging. Maybe they used the field."

Dean let out a silent breath of air as the team went to work. Yeah, Jo might be pissed off at all of them, but maybe, just maybe, they'd pull this off without her getting up close and personal with a serial killer.

-o-o-o-

Fifteen minutes later, Sam came back with H.H. Holmes' name. Jo whistled. She sure knew how to pick them. That got them to his Murder Hotel, and the likelihood of him in the walls.

"We need to get in there," Jo said immediately, already up and moving.

"What about the basement?" Dean resisted the urge to close his eyes and pinch the bridge of his nose. Damnit, he knew there wasn't a basement in this building. That's not what he'd meant. "That murder hotel had a torture chamber thing in the basement, right?"

"This building doesn't have a basement," Jo replied, once again looking at him weirdly, like she couldn't decide if he wasn't nearly as good at this as her mom had led her to believe, or if he was just having a really, really off day.

He hoped she went with the latter.

"I know, I meant- uh… what if it…did?"

A really, really, really off day.

"Like a sewer system?" Andy asked, staring at him a little too blandly. Again, Dean wondered where the kid had been the last half a year. And where his own brain was now, because the answer clearly wasn't in his skull.

"Yeah, like that. This guy was known for trap rooms and stuff. We should cover all our bases." Dean got a supportive nod from Sam, of course, and turned a look he hoped came off as confident and not cautious-as-hell in Jo's direction.

She stared at them for an eternity, a weird and unreadable look on her face, before finally saying, "Fine. We split up. Check the walls and the sewers."

"No chance in hell. We stay together," Dean countered immediately, a tight-lipped smile in place and a tone that booked no room for argument.

Jo crossed her arms and the effort not to roll her eyes was visible in the clench of her jaw. "It'll be faster if we all split up."

"How about pairs?" Sam offered, ever the peace-keeper. He glanced between the two feuding hunters, arms raised in partial placation. "Dean and I have the most experience, we'll each take one of you."

"Dibbs." The older Winchester sidled up to Jo, and if looks could kill, he'd be six feet under. Twice. Dean gestured to the other men in the room. "You two are on wall duty. Jo and I've got the sewer."

If he thought that might appease her, he was sorely mistaken. Instead, he got a cantankerous young hunter itching for a hunt she had every right to lay claim to, thinking he was confining her to a wild goose chase after a basement that didn't exist. She looked about ready to skin him alive by the time they gathered their gear and headed out.

Had he mentioned being from the future and knowing everything sucked? Cuz it absolutely did.

As they parted ways, Dean pulled Sam to the side and told him to forget the walls, grab a crap-ton of salt, rope to spring a trap, and a cement truck. He and Jo would figure out how to lure Holmes into the basement, and they'd trap him there for good, just like last time. With Jo already down there, Dean figured there was a good chance their ghost would follow.

-o-o-o-

Stephanie handed the chapters back over to Chuck, who was still writing the rest. He smiled up at her. "So?"

"I would like the rest when you are finished."

With that, and absolutely nothing more, she turned and headed back for her chair, leaving Chuck – and not Chuck – to stare after her, a touch disappointed (and a touch annoyed at the bossiness, which he was pretty sure wasn't bossiness, just directness, but on a woman intimidating as that, it sure as hell read as bossiness). The writer set the pages down beside his laptop, sighed, fidgeted, though he couldn't quite place what left him fidgeting, and hit the print command on his laptop for the rest of what he'd gotten down so far.

He could feel another headache coming on already.

Chapter End Notes

> Quality: I hope it didn't come across as being a little off, but I struggled with this one. Partly because I got halfway through it before realizing I hadn't planned it out well enough and had to sort of spot fix, partly because Jo Harvelle ended up being hard to right. I don't like angry characters, and she was kinda angry in this episode, feeling like she had to prove herself and be on the defensive. And Dean just made that even worse in our timeline. Which is so not fair. I'm the writer! I should get to decide whether or not Dean makes my job harder.

…It just, it really doesn't work out that way. Ever. (Looking at you, lady!Cas -_-) I feel so, so much more for Chuck now. Being 'God' sucks.

(Also, can we talk about how uncomfortable I just got calling myself 'god'? shudder No thank you.)

The Bitchface List: I don't always like to write out which bitchface is which in the chapter, because that format feels repetitive, or some of them are just too long and interrupt flow if they're used too often. But I do feel like I should put this list somewhere you guys have access to it… How does the Deleted Scenes sister story sound? I'll post it as its own chapter so you all have it as a reference if you want it.

I'll post the April Fool's chapter there too. I know some people mentioned not getting to read it (you're not really missing that much. Just some cockroaches, guys, I swear ;)

Btw, Bitchface #1 is 'What, that doesn't make any sense, Dean. Don't be an idiot.' I honestly don't think we've used it since, like… chapter 2. And not Season 2: Chapter 2. No, I mean…chapter 2. So it deserves an A/N just this once.

Reviews: I will try to get to some review-replies this weekend! Sorry to keep you all waiting, I'm quite terrible at this part, but I really do like to answer you guys and acknowledge (and appreciate) your comments!

Chapter 67: Season 2: Chapter 34

Chapter Notes

A/Ns: Thought I'd post a little early this weekend to make up for the lack of post, review replies, or Bitchface List update last weekend.

Speaking of: Whelp, I'm not dead (obviously), but I did end up in the ER for a while there. A couple weeks of depression mixed with this endless, stupid, friggin' back issue of mine, all came to a head in the form of a nasty drug interaction. One morning my brain woke up and thought, 'I'm gonna give Olympic Spinning a go today', and my head, jumping on the bandwagon (peer pressure, you know?) decided to put itself through the bathroom wall. Luckily, I have a tough noggin. And also, apparently, a tough bathroom wall. I'm recovering (more from the mayhem reeked on my system than the drywall head-butt) but, needless to say, this story is going to fall behind for a hot second. I need to switch to two-week posting schedule while I get back on my feet, because I haven't written in weeks and I don't really know when that'll change just yet.

Quality Warning: Following that lovely note up, this chapter is probably not up to par editing wise. It only got a once over, so apologies for any mistakes. I also don't find it the most exciting chapter, but setup and chatter is inevitable when your author can't write an episode in anything less than three chapters D:

Reviews: For a second there, this story had 66 chapters and 666 Follows. That made me grin in a definitely no good dirty rotten sort of way. The, let's say, no good dirty rotten cliffhanger sort of way ;P

Chapter Warnings: Jo's attempting (and failing) cell phone theft, Dean's attempting (and failing) to lie to anyone, Sam and Andy are attempting (and failing) to have any part in this chapter, and Chuck is the only one actually succeeding at anything this episode.

See the end of the chapter for more notes

-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-

The Road So Far (This Time Around)

Season 2: Chapter 34

-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-

A tapping on her shoulder caused Stephanie to look up from the iPod resting in her hands. The music device was something Chuck had offered once she'd run out of things to read (was it normal for an editorial assistant to just…hang around your house all day?) She'd looked at it strangely before, like everything else he'd given her so far, diving straight in with true recluse fashion. Now she pulled the earplugs from her ears by the cord and stared expectantly up at the writer.

"Uh…next chapter," he offered with a sheepish smile at the stack of papers he'd tapped her on the shoulder with. He nodded at the iPod. "Find anything good?"

She took the chapter from him, wrapping the headphones around the small device and setting it on the side table. "Yes. So far I have greatly enjoyed the singing of Robert Johnson."

Chuck grinned widely. "You're a Blues girl. I'm more a Jazz man, myself. You know, he wrote a song about a Crossroads demon?"

The editorial assistant looked up from the first page of the newest batch of chapters to stare at him. "I know. It is on your eye pod."

"Ah." Chuck rubbed the back of his head awkwardly. Of course it was. That made sense. God, he was bad at talking to girls. "Uh. Well… erm…en-enjoy the new chapters."

He turned and headed back towards his desk. By the time he settled behind his computer once more, Stephanie had her nose in the new pages, hand reaching for the iPod. Chuck hadn't really figured this woman for an introvert when she'd first popped up on his doorstep but, ah well, he never had been the best judge of character.

Then again, it was all too possible she just really didn't like him.

-o-o-o-

They didn't even make it to the elevator, the four of them, before Dean's phone rang. He dug it out of his pocket with one hand, hitting the button to go down with his other, before he glanced at the caller

ID and froze.

Jo tried to grab the phone before he could answer it, but wasn't fast enough.

"Ellen," Dean started, keeping his voice even as he raised the device to his ear. Jo was right in front of him, glaring daggers up at him and hissing all manner of death threats.

"You heard from Jo?" Ellen's voice was tinny through the speaker, but Dean knew her daughter heard it the second she tensed and those daggers got a thousand times sharper. The older hunter glared right back, keeping his expression neutral. Which wasn't terribly hard to do, since he hadn't decided what answer he planned on giving yet.

"Why do you ask?" Oh yeah. Real smooth. Not suspicious at all. Because Dean Friggin' Winchester was real prone to saying things like 'why do you ask.' Brilliant.

Ellen made an aggravated noise on the other end of the phone, no doubt behind the bar, a hand on her hip, equal parts pissed off and worried as only a mother could be. "She's been on about this case in Philly for weeks, but I wouldn't let her go. Now she's taken off for the weekend – said she was going to Vegas, but I don't buy it."

"Well, did you check for a paper trail-"

"Of course I did. I'm not new to motherhood you know." Dean almost laughed, but he knew it wasn't the time. "But with Ash as a roommate, you know good as me that means jack."

Dean met Jo's eyes, even as the blonde shook her head vehemently. Beside them, the elevator dinged loudly in the hallway, doors sliding open. No one moved, and eventually they slid shut again.

He heard Ellen sigh down the line, and his guilty conscience only grew. "You'll call me if you hear from her, won't you, Dean?"

The other Harvelle woman mouthed, "Don't you dare!" with a hand fisted in his shirt.

"Yeah, Ellen," Dean answered, and he kept Jo's gaze, no matter how much he wanted to look away. "She called us."

The younger hunter pitched her hands in the air angrily, shoving him back and stomping off away from the elevator. Sam and Andy gave her a wide berth as she passed.

"She's there?" Dean could practically hear Ellen straightening upright with hope. It quickly faltered. "With you?"

He tried not to take it personally, but the quiver in her voice, the fear of her daughter hunting with a Winchester, stung. Dean knew he didn't deserve it, knew Ellen didn't even know him enough to really mean it (and once she did know him enough, she never would have meant it), but it still hurt.

"Yeah."

Jo stalked back around (Sam and Andy shying out of her path again), finger up and jabbing at Dean as she mouthed every threat she could think of in his general direction. Though, there was hardly a point in hiding her presence anymore. Sam looked about ready to hold her back, but Dean waved him off. No reason for more than one Winchester casualty in this.

"Dean, you put her butt on the first flight outta there."

Jo opened her mouth and hissed, "Try it!"

Dean kept her gaze. "I can't do that, Ellen."

Surprise lit the younger Harvelle's face, even as the older sucked in a breath.

"Dean-"

"I can try to lock her out of this, if that's what you want," he continued, watching the surprise morph from pleasant to betrayed all over again in the span of seconds. "But I do that, next time she needs backup on a hunt, it won't be us she calls."

Jo's eyes darted between each of his, hissed protests on pause for now as she watched him with a narrowed, uncertain gaze.

"I don't want that, Ellen. I know a Winchester is the last person you want to hear this from-" and he was going to have so much fun explaining that to Jo, her brow already furrowing- "but hunting with the wrong backup is as dangerous as hunting alone. She shouldn't have to do either."

The silence on the other end was like being stabbed half a dozen times over, but Dean breathed through the emotional pain that might as well have been physical. Ellen didn't know him, not yet. He just kept telling himself that, eyes locked on those beautiful brown ones that he would see to old age this time, he swore it.

"If you know why I don't wanna hear that from you, then you know why I'm asking you to put my daughter on a plane, right now."

Dean finally turned away from Jo, away from the others. No way in hell could he stop them from hearing this, but the move was still instinctual self-preservation. "I'm not my dad, Ellen. I can't promise she'll be safe – you know I can't, and I won't lie like that to you – but I can promise I will do everything to protect her. Or sure as hell die trying."

This time, the silence in the hallway was just as deafening as the one on the phone. Dean focused on breathing through it (ignoring the hell out of it), his grip tightening on the phone. Pouring his heart out to everyone around him wasn't exactly within his comfort zone, here.

"Put my daughter on."

Dean passed the phone to Jo like it was a game of hot potato and someone had set the damn thing on fire. Jo was still staring at him, expression less readable now; muddled surprise, confusion, gratitude, and anger made it all too hard to know what she was really thinking. The young hunter took the phone and pressed it to her ear.

"Mom-"

"You listen up, Joanna Beth. You check in every hour, and I mean every hour, or I am on the first flight out there. Do you understand me?"

Jo's eyes snapped to Dean's, surprise painting her face almost as brightly as the smile that spread across her lips. "Yes! I mean, yes. Of course, absolutely, mom."

"Put Dean back on."

The younger Harvelle licked her lips, contemplating saying more, but decided against it. She handed Dean's phone back to him, and he was severely less enthused about getting back in line for the guillotine.

"Ellen."

"You let anything happen to my baby girl, and I swear, Dean…" She couldn't even complete the threat, but the hunter didn't need her to. There had always been a reason he'd been scared of her. A healthy fear, he reminded himself, given the sheer pain promised in words spoken hundreds of miles away.

"I know. You've got my word. We'll call you in an hour."

Dean hung up, knowing the conversation was over, despite them both having plenty left to say. All three of them, if Jo chewing on her lip was any indication. He pocketed his phone and turned away from them, hitting the down button once more.

No one said a word, and the elevator doors pinged open before anyone got the bright idea to try.

-o-o-o-

Dean hadn't remembered where the entrance to the sewer torture chamber was, just that there had been one, because they'd cemented it shut after they'd trapped Holmes in a ring of salt down in his own torture chamber. So they needed a metal detector. Andy, having not made it more than half the length of the lobby with his own Winchester partner, agreed to get one for them when Dean hollered at him. He was, after all, the kind of guy who could get things.

When he showed back up outside the apartment building with metal detector in hand, less than seven minutes later, Jo stared at him with the narrowest of narrowed eyes.

"Are you some kind of thief, or something?" she asked, tone skeptical, as she glanced back at the Winchesters.

"People just like me, I guess," was the kid's response as he handed over the device with a wide smile. "They give me stuff all the time."

Dean grabbed the metal detector and ushered Jo off on their task before she could ask more questions, giving Andy an annoyed glare (which the kid just waved off with an unaffected grin). He was still grumbling under his breath when they started searching for the manhole that would lead them below.

It didn't taken long to find, though it was dark and dry once they dropped down the ladder and landed in the underground system of tunnels. They broke out the flashlights and weapons – salt-loaded shotgun for Jo, iron crowbar for Dean – and started their way back towards the apartment building.

"Nuh-uh," the older hunter said almost immediately when Jo took the lead. He snagged the back of her shirt and hauled her back. "You're rear guard. I'm going first."

"You're kidding, right?" Jo glared at him, one hand on her hip, flashlight illuminating the ground, and the other on her shotgun.

Dean was, in fact, not kidding. He'd never been so serious in his life (okay, slight exaggeration there, he could admit. Still.) He gave her a pointed look to say absolutely no way in hell was she leading this expedition into the monster's layer when said monster wanted to seal her up in a wall and watch her slowly mummify herself to death while he petted her hair and pulled pieces of her scalp off.

Okay, so maybe not so slight an exaggeration, after all.

He must have managed most of that internal rant in a single look, because Jo rolled her eyes, but fell in line. Trailing slightly behind and to his left, she swept her flashlight along the dark, dirt-covered walls of the sewer system. They made it about a hundred yards in tense silence, the kind Dean could tell Jo was about to break, before she finally did in a falsely nonchalant tone.

"So what's going on with you?"

"Don't know what you mean." His own flashlight swept the walls and dark tunnel in front of them.

"Yeah, you do," Jo bit out, suddenly stopping. Dean was forced to stop as well, turning towards her and the caustic words. "You're yo-yoing between being on my side and acting like you don't want me here. You're the one who chose to show up, and now you're giving me crap for it?"

"You telling me I shouldn't have come?"

"Cut the shit, Dean, and tell me what's going on." She targeted her flashlight beam right on his face and he had to look away, squinting past the bright light. "Is there some kind of chauvinistic stick up your ass? Because back at the Roadhouse, you sounded like you had my back. And up top, on the phone with my mom. Now you're acting like I can't even walk down a tunnel right. Excuse me if I have a little whiplash from your flip-flopping."

Jo finally lowered the light, and Dean blinked several times to clear the spots. "You done?"

She put a hand on her hip, likely because she couldn't cross her arms while also holding the shotgun. The beam of light swung wildly in the dark. Her gaze was no-nonsense, learned straight from her mother. She just hadn't mastered the I-will-actually-murder-you-in-your-sleep follow-up vibe. Dean was pretty sure, with time, she'd get that one down pat, too.

"I've got your back, Jo, but I'm not picking sides between you and your mom." Dean grunted low in the back of his throat, keeping his own flashlight trained on the ground and illuminating the space around them. "I know you want to hunt; I got nothing against it. But I don't wanna see you dead. And that's got nothing to do with gender studies, by the way, so you can stow the feminism rant. Woman can do the job just fine, but you're new at this. I showed up to make sure you don't get yourself killed, because I do have your back."

She was quiet for a moment, chewing on the inside of her lip with a stiff jaw. "You think I can't do the job?"

He rolled his eyes. "You're not ready to do the job alone. There's a difference, Jo. I don't hunt alone either, not when I can help it, because it's a dumbass decision."

Jo remained tersely silent for another pause. "My dad hunted alone."

Dean sighed, finally dropping his head. Damnit, this was not a talk he was ready for. "So did mine. Look where they both are."

It was harsh, not just for her, but for him too. Even if he'd had just as long as Jo to accept that truth, to get over their fathers' deaths. Even if the brutality of his truth was just a little closer because of an angelic DeLorean.

"Your mom, she's got as much a point about this as you do," he added, veering them away from their dads. Jo snorted, and Dean was the one to flash the beam of light on her face this time before lowering it. "Having someone want more for you than a life of hunting? There is nothing bad about that. Sometimes I wish I'd had it."

His thoughts flickered to his own mom, what she would think of all this, of her sons grown into the life she'd never wanted for them. It had hurt like hell to hear that, the words coming from her own mouth back in 1973. At the time, Dean wished he could explain, could tell her it wasn't all bad. Or worse, he wished he could have saved her, had her as he grew up, to want better for him. But he had stowed it then and he'd stow it now. Wishes like that just wasted time and heartache he couldn't afford.

"You love the job," Jo countered immediately, and he could see the desperate gleam in her eye. How badly she wanted to love the job too.

"Yeah, I do." No point in denying it. "But there are days I wish to hell I didn't. They come more often than you think. You want this, you gotta be prepared for those days, too. And don't fault your mom for wanting better for you. You choose this life, good, fine, that's your choice, and there's nothing wrong with it. But don't spit on your mom's wishes just for having them, either."

Jo didn't answer, but he could tell she was at least taking him seriously, perhaps for the first time since they'd shown up. He might be overbearing here, but Jo had been rearing for a fight the moment they'd arrived. She was too damn stuck on proving herself to people who hadn't been doubting her to start with.

"We gonna find a ghost, or what?" she finally said, clearing her throat pointedly and pushing past him. So far, he hadn't let her lead, and he grumbled as he jogged to catch up. He didn't trust 'Time' worth a damn; there was no way he was letting her out of his sight this time, for any reason. Sao he fell instep alongside her, at least not curtailing her lead but not letting her walk into a trap first, either. As they resumed their trek through the tunnel, Jo glanced his way now and then. "So how are we going to ice this thing, if we can't salt and burn his bones?"

One of the first things Sam had brought up after revealing who they were dealing with, was that H.H. Holmes famously had his remains incased in cement upon his death. So no one would mess with his corpse, of course. Hypocritical dickwad.

"We'll trap him in his own torture chamber," Dean answered easily enough, thinking back to their plan the first time around. It had worked well enough then, no reason they couldn't do that again. "We'll get the girl out, wait till he shows back up looking for her, and trip a salt circle along the walls. Then we seal the entrance and Holmes spends the rest of eternity in his own little circle of cement hell. Was the guy's dying wish, after all."

He grinned over at her, but Jo wasn't returning the look. Instead she was eyeing him all funny again, a raised brow fighting a simultaneously pinched frown. She looked, once more, thoroughly unimpressed.

A weak voice from up ahead, calling for help, interrupted the conversation. Both hunters glanced at each other as the cry repeated, asking if anyone was there, in a scratchy, tired, female voice. Jo and Dean took off running.

Teresa from 2F was, indeed, still alive, just as Dean said. She was trapped in the wall via a cutout that was sealed by a heavy metal gate. Dean got to work on it immediately while Jo kept an eye out for their ghostie, flashlight scanning the room. A circular room, perfect for springing a salt trap. Jo glanced over her shoulder, suspicions starting to form, as Dean got the metal trapdoor open and helped the traumatized woman to her feet.

She was dirty, terrified, and had a chunk of hair missing, but overall appeared in decent health, all things considered. There was also no way she was staying another second in that chamber. Dean spared a look with Jo, and they agreed they'd have to come back to spring their trap, the twitchy woman making it clear she was leaving, with or without them. It's not like they'd come down prepared with salt, or any way to build the kind of trap Dean had been talking about. Just another thing Jo added to the list in her head that had been amassing ever since she'd called Dean that morning.

Their rescued damsel wasted no time once they reached the ladder back to the surface. Teresa took off like a bolting rabbit, and Dean gestured for Jo to follow. The hunter put her hand on one of the rungs, but didn't go anywhere.

"How did you know?"

Dean, having expected her to start up and ready to follow after, was caught off guard and pulled back. "Know what?"

"Any of it." Jo's eyes were sharp, her shrug calculated. "All of it. How did you know Teresa would still be alive?"

Dean's brow pulled down between his eyes, but Jo wasn't buying it for a minute. "Holmes kept his victims alive for days, didn't he? It was wishful thinking, and it turned out to be right."

It sure hadn't sounded like wishing. It had sounded like confidence.

"And the room?"

"What about it?"

"You called it circular. Twice."

Shit, he had? He didn't think he had. He shrugged awkwardly, going for defensive but knowing he was off his game. Jo did that to him. Always had. "It's a sewer. Aren't all connection points between tunnels circular or square? Fifty-fifty chance, Jo. I got lucky."

"Like you got lucky knowing I was Holmes' type?"

Dean ground his teeth and looked away. Okay, apparently he still sucked at this. What else was knew? It's not like he'd had any practice, lately. Sam had known for months now, and Andy had Jedi-mind tricked him into confessing the truth before they ever bothered trying to hide it from him. Dean hadn't had to keep quiet for months, hadn't had to pretend he was ten years in the past and didn't know what he knew. He was more than off his game; he was out of practice, and Jo was way too smart not to pick up on it.

Which meant, yet again, Sam had been right. Dean really hated those days (and how often they seemed to happen. Damn smart kid.)

"Alright, look, I- yes, something is going on, okay?" he conceded, a pointed look in her direction doing nothing to lessen that sharp gaze. If anything, it just got more expectant, like she could tell he was lining up to procrastinate this. Jo crossed her arms over her chest and Dean had to speak through clenched teeth. "Later, Jo. I'll tell you later, alright?"

"Nope. You tell me now. I'm sick of you putting me off." She was an immoveable force at the bottom of that ladder, and Dean tilted his head back, cursing Gods he knew weren't paying any attention.

"I'm psychic, alright?" He decided to rip the bandaid off so they could get the hell out of the sewer sometime this century. "Can we go now?"

She didn't move an inch, though she certainly scoffed and rolled her eyes. "Yeah, right."

Dean sighed, aggravated. He scrubbed at his hair and clenched his teeth. "It's the truth."

Jo just stared, realization slowly kicking in that he looked anything but joking. She dropped her arms. "Bullshit."

"Look, can we go?" Dean didn't exactly want to hang out any longer in a serial killer's domain, not to mention a sewer, dried up as it was.

"Oh my god, you're serious." She blinked at him, eyes growing wide before they quickly narrowed in thought. Too damn smart for her own good. "Sam?"

Dean grabbed the ladder himself and started climbing. Screw chivalry and screw waiting around for a ghost to ice their asses. "Yeah, him too, alright? But not in the same way."

"You saw all this, didn't you? What else did you see?"

The silence that followed those questions paused the hunter only a couple feet off the ground. He sighed, thunked his forehead into the rung straight in front of him, and then dropped back to the ground. Apparently, they were doing this.

"You. In one of those slots back there, after he got you in the walls." Dean was, possibly, as serious as she had ever seen him. It wasn't hard to imagine what made him such a good hunter, with a rigid, intimidating posture and a look in his eyes that promised revenge for an event that hadn't even happened. "I lost you, Jo, and Sam and I might have gotten you back, but I lost you. And then you had to sit in there and play bait for a ghost that tried to kill you, and got damn close to succeeding."

"Did it work?"

Dean reeled back. Jesus, had she heard a damn word he'd said? She could read the anger in his expression, and adopted a defensive stance of her own.

"Fear's a teacher, Dean. You said it yourself; I'm new at this. I'm not gonna learn if you don't let me."

Good god. Dean pinched the bridge of his nose, rubbed at his eyes, and let out a frustrated, protective growl. "Damn it, Jo, there's fear and then there's trauma. There's a difference, and I'd rather you have a good, healthy dose of the first and as little as possible of the second."

God knew he certainly didn't have them in that order. Sam, either.

Jo was silent for a moment, shifting her weight. "You know, your number isn't the only one I have. I could have called half a dozen hunters, but I called you because I knew you wouldn't take this away from me."

It wasn't an accusation, it wasn't consolation. It was just…what it was, he guessed. It was annoying, is what it was, and not something they had time for, damnit.

"I'm not trying to take it away from you," Dean professed, suddenly so damn tired.

"You could have told me," she argued back immediately. "You're psychic, Dean. You knew how to solve this case right from the start, didn't you? I thought it was convenient, you guys showing up, pointing out those buildings that just happened to lead to our guy. God-" Jo cut herself off, shaking her head. "You should have told me; we could have done this together."

"We are doing it together!" Jo turned away from him, her anger building, and Dean growled again. God, he hated these conversations, and he was so done having them. "Damn it, Jo, every time I try to change something, every time I've told someone so that I can, it's all gone to crap, alright?"

And now he was getting into really dangerous territory, because one little slip and then she'd know his psychic claim was as full of shit as almost everything else he'd told her so far. He was going to lose her – Ellen too – by trying to friggin' save them.

Story of his god damn life lately.

The thought had not even finished crossing his mind when an inhuman howl ripped through the tunnel, its source definitely the torture chamber they'd just come from. Holmes had come back to find his playroom empty of its prize.

Jo froze, eyes going wide, and Dean grabbed the shotgun out of her hand and shoved her towards the ladder, even as she started moving again. He hauled her up the first rung, hardly needing to as she scrambled for it all on her own.

"Go, go, go!" he yelled, shoving at her hip, thigh, then ankle, before turning to fire into the tunnel, though there was nothing to shoot. Yet. Jo was scrambling up the rungs quick as she could, with Dean right behind her, shotgun abandoned on the ground for the sake of faster climbing. They both heard the roar grow louder, and the tunnel leading back the way they'd come grew dark, a supernatural pitch that swallowed up the cement as it hurled toward them at incredible speeds.

Dean knew they weren't going to make it. He grabbed Jo's ankle and tugged. "Let go!"

She did, trusting him completely. He was only half a dozen feet off the ground, and he let go as well, catching her weight as it crashed into his. The two plummeted back to the floor, back to the shotgun that might give them a few extra precious seconds. But whatever happened, he wasn't letting her go. If Holmes wanted her this time, he was taking both of them.

But when had Dean ever gotten what he wanted in life?

Wind tore through the tunnel, darkness enveloped them, and the weight in his arms was gone by the time he hit the floor. As dim light returned, his flashlight flickering back to life on the ground beside him, Dean scrambled to his feet, gun in hand, barrel swinging wide.

It was too late. He was alone in the tunnel and Jo was nowhere in sight. He'd lost her again.

-o-o-o-

Chuck looked up from his desk to the editorial assistant suddenly standing beside it, stack of papers in hand. He pulled the pencil out of his mouth, eraser end all chewed up. A habit he had anytime he hand-wrote (which was usually when he had writer's block). The thought alone was enough to have him glancing down at his scribbles with some mixture of dismay and acid reflux.

The writer offered a weak smile to Stephanie instead, happy for the distraction.

"What did you think?"

She looked down at the chapter she'd just finished reading and offered an approving nod. "Dean is psychic?"

"Dean is…something." Chuck tapped the end of the pencil against pursed lips before sighing and tossing it atop the notebook in front of him. Not like the thing was doing him much good anyhow. "I'm not sure what, yet. But he thinks he's psychic."

Steph made a noncommittal noise, something of a hum, before handing the packet over. Chuck didn't take it right away, and if he was disappointed by her stoic reaction to his work, he didn't show it. The moment lengthened, Chuck just staring up at her, contemplation flickering across his face, before the writer – and also something much more than the writer – reached out to take the chapter. As he did, his fingertips brushed the back of her hand for the quickest of moments.

He took the papers back and set the stack on the desk beside him.

Stephanie turned away, likely to retreat back to her chair, but paused. She was rubbing the back of her hand absently, a silly little tingle spreading just beneath the skin there. Like a cool breeze. When she turned back to Chuck, there was a strange look on her face.

"She will be alright, won't she?" The writer raised his eyebrows, and Steph clarified, "Jo Harvelle?"

"Ah." A warm smile crept across Chuck – and not Chuck's – face. "You'll have to wait and see."

The woman – who was not really a woman at all – frowned at that, an emotion on her face not unlike confusion. It was replaced with the same narrow-eyed suspicion she got in those false blues anytime the writer teased her. Chuck just smiled wider and his editorial assistant huffed, dropped her hand, and headed back for her chair.

Chuck – and not Chuck – picked the pencil back up and got to work.

Chapter End Notes

A/Ns: Reminder that we'll be switching to a two-week posting schedule for a while. I'll let you know when I think that'll end as soon as I know myself (aka, as soon as my brain stops being fuzzy and my body stops trying to have nap time all the time)

Up Next: Time's doing things backwards, the boys are destroying private property, Ellen wasn't joking about that flight, Andy's an incredibly handy Jedi to have around, and Tom's finally working on that Plan B.

Chapter 68: Season 2: Chapter 35

Chapter Notes

A/Ns: Okay, I'm a liiiiitle late on that whole Sunday posting thing, but it's a nice long chapter this time. I think I'm going to keep the two-week posting chapter for a while longer, but in the meantime, all the next chapters are also pretty long (almost two chapters long, each), so that should balance it out a bit!

Chapter Warnings: Andy and Sam actually get to do things this chapter! Jo's playing hide-n-seek, where she neither gets to choose her hiding spot nor be the seeker, Dean's having some more chats he really doesn't want to have, Andy's really rocking the whole mind trick thing (enough so that this Author is gonna have to kick the poor kid out of the Scooby Gang soon if only so he's not a magical solution to everything), and Jo's a badass, but you all already knew that, didn't you. Oh, and Tom's up to terrible, no good, dirty rotten things that includes a not-really-cliffhanger-but-also-yeah-kind-of-a-cliffhanger.

See the end of the chapter for more notes

-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-

The Road So Far (This Time Around)

Season 2: Chapter 35

-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-

Dean ran. His feet hit the decades old cement hard, scattering dust and the dregs of city drainage as he pounded past. Meter after meter of tunnel flew by until he could see the cross section ahead and the chamber that lay just beyond.

"Jo!"

The hunter burst into the circular room, but it was silent. Empty. He spun, checking each of the metal-covered slots in the walls, even when he already knew he wouldn't find her. Because they'd change things – he'd changed things – and that crap never came without god damn consequences.

"Jo?"

The cry echoed in the empty space, and Dean knew he'd have to head back to the surface. He had to regroup with Sam and come up with a plan to find her.

They would find her.

-o-o-o-

Persephone left the Prophet's house at precisely six pm, as she did every day, this time to Chuck's teasing smile and a promise of Jo Harvelle's fate when she returned in the morning. Unlike all the other days, however, it would seem she would not be completing the mile and a half walk back to the new motel the demons had set her up in. Tom was leaning against a car seven blocks away from Chuck Shurley's residence, watching Persephone approach on foot.

Her demon babysitter wasted no time with his usual pretentious preamble. "Where are the Winchesters now?"

She eyed him, her distaste for her personal guard no secret. "Philadelphia."

"Specifics, Princess," Tom demanded with a raised, unimpressed brow.

"What do you want, demon?" she spat in reply, shouldering the purse he'd provided her on day one of this ruse. "The Prophet's writing is no more specific than that. The Winchesters are in Philadelphia."

He stared at her, likely to assess whether or not he believed her. Not that she cared, either way. She just so happened to be telling the truth, and whether this demon believed her or not was not her problem. Personally she hoped he didn't, just to tick him off all the more.

"You know, if you're lying to me, Azazel is going to hear about it."

Persephone hardly appeared affected by the threat, even if Tom knew she took the yellow-eyed demon a lot more seriously than she took him. She crossed her arms and stared her babysitter down. "Does your daddy fight all your battles for you, then?"

Tom's returning chuckle was dangerous, but he shook his head and opened the driver's side door even as he shoved off the side of the car.

"Get in." The demon climbed in without looking at her, starting up the engine immediately. Persephone glanced over her shoulder, the way of the Prophet's house, and Tom rolled his eyes. He jabbed one finger in a downward motion, gesturing to the passenger seat. "In, Princess."

He hardly let her close the door before he was pulling away.

-o-o-o-

Dean's phone was ringing by the time he made it to the top of the ladder. Well before Sam's hand appeared in front of his face to help haul him the last foot to the surface. Dean didn't even bother fishing the thing out of his pocket. It was surely Ellen; they'd missed their check-in. Didn't matter now, anyway; she'd be on the first flight out whether he answered it or not. Right now he didn't really have the time or emotional bandwidth to tell the woman he'd lost her daughter a second time.

"Where's Jo?" Sam asked, glancing back down the hatch when Dean was the only one to come up.

"He got her," Dean answered, already on the move. He pushed past a Andy as the kid hopped down from the cab of the cement truck they'd clearly stolen.

"What?" Sam barked, even as Andy picked up on the obvious tension and not-rightness.

"What's going on?" he asked, worry evident in his voice as Sam pushed past him as well. Dean was heading back for the apartments, not quite running but certainly not taking his sweet time. Andy glanced between the retreating brothers and the open sewer entrance. "Where's Jo?"

When it was clear he wasn't going to get an answer, he took off after them.

"Dean, talk to me." The younger Winchester caught up pretty quickly, his stride much longer. The three, Andy running a bit behind (he was considerably shorter than the two giants he now hung out with), made it back to the apartment to the distant sound of sirens. The woman they'd rescued – Teresa of 2F – must have made it to the surface before Sam and Andy showed up in their borrowed truck, and gone screaming to the nearest phone to call the cops.

They so did not have time for more crap.

"We got the girl out, but Jo was- we were...arguing. We weren't paying attention. It was stupid." Dean didn't pause as he talked, running through the foyer and hallway to the elevator, punching the call button way harder than was necessary. He should have shoved Jo up that ladder. Damnit, he'd spent the last six hours lecturing her about amateur hour and then had been no better himself. "Holmes must have realized we raided his victim collection. He came after us, in the tunnels. Ripped Jo right out of my arms."

The elevator doors opened with a ping right as Dean was considering just booking it up the stairs. Andy finally caught up to the two of them, bracing himself on the wall as he panted from the impromptu sprint. Sam grabbed his arm and hauled him into the small elevator for a devastatingly slow climb. Thank god there wasn't elevator music, at least.

"So what's the plan?" Sam fidgeted beside his brother, worry clear in his eyes, while Andy caught his breath.

"If she's not in the basement, then- then maybe she's in the walls." Dean didn't have a clue how much weight that idea actually held, but it was the only thing he could come up with. Holmes traveled through the walls, and that's where he'd grabbed her the first time. If his torture chamber was out, then the walls were all that was left.

Dean prayed that wasn't just false hope talking, because he didn't have a plan B.

"Then we need sledgehammers and crowbars." Sam announced with a nod, and Dean took comfort in his brother's own assuredness. The elevator doors pinged open and Dean rushed out, Sam behind him, still tugging Andy along, the poor kid. Lucky for them, with Dean's foreknowledge of Holmes' liking of the walls, they'd hauled all that stuff up from the Impala when they'd first arrived.

Inside the apartment, they divvied up the gear (after Dean almost took the door off its hinges bursting through it). Sam and Dean took a sledgehammer each, Andy a crowbar, and they were back in the hallway within minutes. Splitting up made the most sense, and the three barely even had to discuss it. Dean would take the top three floors, Sam and Andy the bottom. They didn't waste time on details, the younger men hitting the stairs while Dean punched the button to call the elevator once more.

They would find her, he told himself. He said it again and again as he waited for the damn slowest car on the planet. They'd find her.

They had to.

-o-o-o-

It was dark and dusty and very, very cramped. When Jo came back to, she found herself upright, unbound but pinned so tightly between four paneled structures that she could barely move. The initial panic over being trapped wasted several precious minutes and was worsened by the fact that each frantic breath expanded her lungs beyond what there was physical room for. Jo berated herself to calm the hell down until she was finally able to slow her breathing enough to work within the confines of her surroundings.

Wherever she was, it was dark. Almost too dark to make out details, but as her eyes slowly adjusted, she could see just enough of the pipes on either side of her and the ribbed wood inches in front of her to realize she was inside a wall.

'Oh god,' she thought, leaning her head back against the hard surface behind her, trying to take in a deep breath. She was shaking. 'Dean said he got me in the walls. Shit, I am so screwed.'

Jo took several more deep, calming breaths and reminded herself not to panic. Panicking would only make it worse, and she didn't have the time to waste. As her pulse slowed down, ever so much, her hunter instincts kicked back in, and she started looking around for anything she could use. Jo didn't know how the ghost even got her wedged into the small spot she was currently stuck in. There was no way she would be able to get out. The space between the two sets of pipes holding her up was barely enough for her breadth-wise, and the distance between them and the wall she was facing was only a couple of inches. No way she'd be able to squeeze past, even if she could wedge herself free.

The young hunter tried to shift her weight to free an arm. Her dad's hunting knife was in her right boot. If she could somehow shimmy down enough to get it, she might be able to dig her way through the wall directly in front of her. It felt like brick at her back, though she couldn't be sure, so it was more likely that she was facing the interior of the building and had a prayer of pushing her way through. She just needed room to work.

The first three attempts were utterly futile. There just wasn't room to bend her knees or her back, whether it was lifting her leg up or crouching down. She couldn't reach the knife. Jo bit back tears, panic and desperation warring inside.

'Pathetic,' she snipped at herself. 'Crying isn't going to get you out of this.'

It didn't stop the water from gathering in her eyes, but it did rally her for a fourth and fifth attempt. They were equally fruitless, and she let out a low-pitched scream of frustration and helplessness. She leaned forward enough to press her forehead to the dusty, cobwebbed wall. Even that she could barely do in the small space.

"Jo!"

The hunter picked her head up off the wall at the distant, muffled call. But it had definitely been there; someone was calling her name. When it sounded off again, a voice she now recognized, Jo practically jumped up and down – or she would have, had she the room.

"Sam!" She screamed it at the top of her lungs, stomping her feet and hitting the walls and pipes where she could. Anything to make a racket. "Here! I'm here!"

"Jo!" His voice was much closer now, right through the wall, and she sobbed in relief. She could hear him in the hall, and someone else too. Probably the kid, since she didn't hear Dean's voice. "Hold on, Jo, we're gonna get you out of there!"

There was more muffled chatter and then knocking on the wall. He was looking for studs. And probably her, too. So she knocked back to give Sam a clear idea of where she was. If they were going to punch through, she really didn't want it to be directly in front of her, with no more than three inches between the wall and her stomach.

His knocks moved further to her right, by about a foot, and then silenced. The quiet only lasted a second (though it stretched on for an eternity), before a crash shattered the wall. Jo turned her head to the side, eyes screwed up tight as dust flew about in the small space. Drywall and wood splintered as a sledgehammer ripped into the thin gap between the interior and exterior wall. As Sam pulled the tool away, light filled her prison, and Jo gasped at the illusion of free air, even if it was dust-filled and choking.

"We're coming, Jo!" was the hurried response to her coughing fit. The sledgehammer hit again and again, widening the hole until Sam could stick his mop of brown hair through. He turned his head immediately to the left, and looked about as relieved to spot her as she was to see him. "Hang on, I need to widen the hole."

"I'm trapped," she answered back, practically breathless but trying to keep it together. "I can't move; you're going to have to get in front of me."

Sam nodded and pulled his head back, leaving her alone in the walls once more. He kept at the hole, widening it with every swing. After a half dozen hits, she heard him talking to Andy, and the next swing was from a crowbar, latching onto the side of the gap and pulling. Wood splintered and drywall cracked. A foot long chunk of wall came clean off in her direction. Just a few more and she'd be free.

Jo kept her breathing as even as she could in the dust, her panic just barely under wraps. They were coming for her, they were right there. Still, she kept scanning the darkness beyond the hole of light, where the skinny tunnel continued down the length of the building. She couldn't see much through the dust and debris, but she didn't take her eyes off that darkness for fear of Holmes' dark, soulless eyes in the dark. Dean had been right there too, back in the sewers, and it hadn't mattered. She knew Sam was doing everything he could to get her out as fast as possible, but still Jo urged him on in her head. Their murderous ghost could be back at any minute.

Sam broke through after four minutes, pulling free the largest chunk of wall yet. It was enough, and strong arms pushed into the gap, grabbed either side of Jo, and hauled her out of the wall. She stumbled as she hit the floor of the hallway, but Sam had her, holding her upright as she found her legs.

Andy stood slightly behind them, hovering but clearly uncertain of his place in it. He held a sledgehammer loosely in one hand, and when a door opened down the hallway he turned to it and quickly and succinctly reassured the resident.

"Just fixing a leaking pipe, nothing to worry about. Go on back inside. Finish that latest episode of Oprah; it's a good one!"

The older man nodded, concern bleeding out into a blank calmness that was unnerving, before turning back into the apartment and shutting the door. Jo got the feeling the kid had been managing damage control like that for some time. It was the kind of thing, the obedient way the residents of the building just turned back to their homes – and thank god it was a weekday, with less folk at home – that Jo might have picked up on, were her mind not currently full-handed with trauma and relief. Still, amateur or not, Jo was a hunter, and her brain stored the information somewhere out of the way in the back, where she knew she'd get to it later.

"Call Dean," Sam, instructed the kid as Andy turned back towards them after making sure the tenant had followed his command agreeably. Sam handed over the crowbar, which the kid added to his wall-dismantling collection even as he dug out a cell from his jeans' pocket. "Tell him we got her."

Sam looped one arm around Jo's waist, having to bend nearly double to do it, and started her towards the elevators. They left the gaping hole behind, unworried about the damage or the freak-out bound to occur once residents got a good look. Andy could handle it if they needed him to.

"I'm fine," Jo mumbled, brain still processing her freedom and the close-call. Maybe Dean had a point. Fear was healthy and all, but she never wanted to experience that much of it in a single go ever again.

"He's on his way down," Andy announced behind them as Sam reached the elevator and hit the up button. Jo had been stashed in the north wall on the second floor. Not that far from 2F, it turned out.

"I'm alright," she repeated, pulling away from Sam a little more as they stood there, waiting for the elevator. Her legs held up beneath her, and the woman visibly shook off the last of the panic and shock. "I'm good."

Sam backed off, but not so far that he couldn't be there again immediately. The elevator arrived with a cheerful ding no one was feeling, and they piled in.

-o-o-o-

Dean had made it through a single floor, hollering Jo's name, before Andy's text came in. He'd already dealt with two tenants, one of which, a young woman, had slammed her door shut immediately upon spotting a clearly-pissed-off man running down the hall with a friggin' sledgehammer in hand. The second, and older gentleman, had been visibly shaken but still hollered at him that he was calling the cops before shutting himself up tight in his apartment.

'Yeah, you do that, buddy,' Dean thought, not even bothering to pause as he yelled for Jo again. 'Pretty sure Teresa of 2F beat you to it.'

He couldn't hear the sirens from the top floor, but he'd had no doubt that those cop cars had arrived by now. They would likely sweep the building – twice over now that reports would be coming in of a crazed man with a sledgehammer – so they were on the clock in more ways than one.

Thankfully, as he fetched his phone from where it buzzed in his pocket, Sam and Andy had better luck than he did.

Dean ditched the sledgehammer in the stairwell before hurrying down the stairs. It would do no good to be caught by cops with it. At least this way he could fake some panicked story about seeing the hammer-wielding maniac and running for his life. Luckily, he was only a couple floors up from their home base, and didn't run into any cops on his race down to the apartment Jo had temporarily rented for the case.

By the time he burst back into the place, making sure to close and lock the door behind him, Jo had her game face on and was back in the hunt. And if she shuddered in his arms when he practically tackled her in a way-too-tight-to-be-healthy hug, neither of them said a word about it.

"I'm alright," she whispered against his chest, before clearing her throat and repeating the claim with more confidence. They pulled away, both stowing the awkward silence that followed. Jo dusted herself off, an actual cloud coming off her jeans and shirt, given the state of the walls she'd been stuck in, before planting her hands on her hips. "So what's the plan?"

The brothers were caught between surprise and relieved amusement. A hunter, through and through. Sam had no doubt his brother was right; Jo would be one hell of a badass at it someday.

"You sure you don't want to take a minute?" he asked, and everyone in the room knew he was talking longer than just a minute.

Jo leveled a glare his way that could have withered men twice his size (which was saying something). "I said I'm fine. Now tell me how we're gonna get this son of a bitch."

"I like her."

The brothers, in the middle of exchanging an entire conversation in a single look, both turned to Andy, who was still holding the sledgehammer and crowbar. His sheepish chuckled died out along with the dopey smiled he was aiming at Jo, who looked both affronted and proud, and then pissed off by the latter.

"Don't even think about it, Romeo. She'd eat you alive." Dean rolled his eyes (especially once Andy balked, then blushed red, then stammered that that wasn't what he'd meant, he didn't, he wasn't-uh…shutting up now) and turned back to the actual hunters in the group. "We need to get back down to the basement. Sewer. Whatever. We'll set a trap."

"What's the bait?" Jo asked without missing a beat. It was pretty obvious by the way Dean hesitated that there was only one real possibility.

"We'll…figure something out."

"You got a problem using what we already have?" she countered immediately, and Dean clenched his fists.

"Don't you think you've had enough for one day?" he practically barked back, but she hardly flinched. Harvelle women were made of some incredibly strong stuff. Even so, Dean could see through the brave face she was putting on. She didn't need to, but he knew that would never stop her. It hadn't stopped her in the face of death, slowly bleeding out in a hardware store.

And that was one thing he did not need to be thinking about that right now.

Jo, tapping her foot impatiently on the floor, re-rooted him in the present. "It's how we did it in your vision, isn't it? And it worked."

Sam turned to his brother, a bitchface already forming. "Vision, huh?"

The older Winchester groaned loudly, the sound almost coming out a growl. He scrubbed a hand through his hair harshly, both embarrassed and annoyed as he stared down #5 on the list of Sam bitchfaces. "You really wanna play the 'I told you so' card, now?"

Sam's expectant look said yes, yes he did.

Before another word could be spoken, which most likely would have come from Dean as he tried to get them back on track, there was a heavy knock at the door. All four hunters froze, eying whatever crap kind of fake wood doors were made out of these days.

Andy raised his hands placating, warding off the others from making a move. "Don't worry, I got this."

He crossed over to the door before anyone could tell him otherwise, and opened it enough to slide his body against the frame. Whoever was on the other side wouldn't be able to see in much, but it meant the hunters couldn't see who was out there, either. "Officers! What a pleasant surprise."

All three hunters moved quickly and quietly away from line of sight of the door, backing up to the other side of the apartment where it would be harder for anyone, including the cops in the hall, to spot them. Luckily, the dining room table, currently laden with crowbars, sledgehammers, and guns, was also out of line-of-sight.

"What can I help you gentlemen with?" Andy's falsely cheerful voice was almost too much, and Dean might have smacked the kid, if he didn't know the psychic had other means of handling nosy cops.

"We got reports of a couple men in the building with sledgehammers. There's damage on the second floor, evidence of someone trying to take down a wall. You know anything about that or seen anything suspicious?"

Andy scratched at the stubble on his chin in thought, and Dean resisted the urge to throw something at the kid. Given the looks both Jo and Sam sent his way, he wasn't the only one. "Nah, can't say I have. Heard some commotion this morning, though. Something about a missing girl? This got anything to do with that?"

The cop shifted on the other side of the door, and it was a second voice that answered this time. "We're unsure at this time, though the woman has been found, safe. We're looking into it."

"Oh, well, that's great to hear! Glad she's alright. You fine gentlemen are doing an excellent job. You go finish your sweep, make sure the neighborhood's all good and safe. No need to worry about us."

"Of course, we can do that." There was a shuffling on the other side of the door that Dean could only imagine was the cops already turning away from the apartment. "Thanks for your time."

They left as quickly as they came, no more fuss, and Andy closed the door. He turned back into the apartment with a grin. Jo, hand still on her hip, immediately turned to Dean. It would have been impossible not to hear the way Andy's voice dropped a couple octaves on that last line and took on something not quite normal. Or the way the cops just moseyed on along their way without question.

"You gonna tell me he's psychic too?"

Dean looked like he didn't want to be having this conversation at all, but given that neither Sam nor Andy were backing him up, he just leveled the woman with a glare. "Yeah, he's got powers, alright? Can we get back to the murdering ghost in the walls?"

"How many of you are there?" Jo didn't even acknowledge his pissy words, looking between Sam and Andy. "You all have gifts, right? How- or why?"

She was too smart for her own good, but unlike his brother, Sam wasn't going to underestimate that. He knew what it was like to be treated with kid-gloves, and Jo didn't deserve it. "We don't really know. Azazel did something to us when we were kids."

"Azazel?" Jo scrunched her face up, brow furrowing. The name didn't ring any bells, but something about the way Sam said it…. She straightened as it clicked. "Wait, you mean the demon you've been hunting? The one that killed your mom?"

Her voice dropped on the last part, and Sam just nodded. She glanced at Dean, who shrugged a single, aggravated shoulder. Damnit, they had more pressing things to worry about right this second.

"We can hash this out later, alright?" he insisted irritably. "Right now, we need to take care of Holmes."

The words were no sooner out of his mouth when the walls and floor started shaking. The four of them scrambled for purchase, widening their stances or gripping onto counter tops or nearby chairs as the entire building trembled. It felt like an earthquake. Whatever it was, it didn't last long. Several pots and pans rattled off their shelves, some of their equipment rolled off the kitchen table and clattered on the ground, then it was over. As soon as the earth stopped moving, the four of them locked eyes and ran for the door.

There were cops congregated at the entrance when they got to the foyer of the building, taking the stairs in case the quake knocked out the power or wasn't done yet. There weren't too many officers, three or four squad cars' worth at the most. They were otherwise engaged trying to calm the residents that, like the hunters, had flooded downstairs as the earthquake subsided.

As they darted past out the front doors, they heard snippets of the conversation.

"Minor earthquake-"

"-say it was localized beneath the building-"

"Reports coming in that part of the sewer collapsed-"

Dean exchanged looks with Sam and Jo as they got out onto the street. There were more people gathered at the mouth of the back alley that led to their stolen cement truck and the entrance to Holmes' sewer of terror. A cloud of dust – the same color as the crap coating the walls and floor of the sewer tunnels – hung in the mouth of the alley, keeping people back like a natural barrier.

Clearly, their ghost was throwing a temper tantrum that his secret club house was no longer secret. They'd played their trump card too early, and now it looked like they were out of the game completely. God, Dean hated the pissed off ones.

"Great," he cussed, throwing out an arm. "That's just great."

He spun in an agitated circle. Sam waited it out, Andy glancing between him and Jo, before asking, "What do we do now?"

Jo chewed on her lip, never a good sign. "So… how hard would it be to salt n' burn bones encased in cement?"

-o-o-o-

"Okay, so we need a crane, jackhammers, and a vat of acid." Dean resisted the urge to rub his forehead. "Why does this sound like the plan of a Batman villain?"

"We're never going to be able to get that stuff unnoticed," Sam interjected, not wanting to rain on their brainstorming parade, but also trying to face facts. They were back in the apartment, and things were not looking up. "Even if we skip the phosphoric acid and trisodium phosphate-" no doubt the hardest components for them to get, at least in the quantities they would need to dissolve the concrete encasing Holmes' skeleton- "and just go for cracking the cement in two and burning what's inside. We'd still need the crane to lift it out of the ground and jackhammers aren't exactly quiet."

"So, what, we're calling it quits?" Jo's tone obviously said there was no way in Hell they were doing that. But as the brothers exchanged silent looks, they had to admit they didn't have a next step.

"Uh…" The three hunters turned to Andy as he raised his hand, like they were in friggin' kindergarten and had forgotten he was a member of the class. "I can do all that."

The three of them exchanged further looks, but Andy just smiled widely.

"Trust me, I totally got this."

-o-o-o-

The kid got the city in on it. They had cops cordoning off the Holy Cross Cemetery, just outside Philadelphia, where Holmes was buried. Excavators were called in on an emergency, must-happen-this-instant gig, and they brought with them the big guns. That included a crane and the archeological equivalent of CSIs on scene. Andy talked his socks off the entire night, wrapping anyone and everyone around his little delusional pinky. Sure, they'd all be hella confused the next morning when they realized they'd excavated H.H. Holmes' grave on the word of a kid who swore he had convincing evidence – so convincing that they all believed him – that America's first serial killer hadn't, in fact, been executed and the body they'd buried had been a fake, so they needed to check ASAP. What's more, they'd be even further confused when it occurred to each of them in turn that not a one of them had actually been present to see the body or perform a DNA test. They'd only have the word of a kid that confirmed it had, in fact, been Holmes' body and they were all good to go. But then, all of them would have the same confusing memory, so it had to be true.

Weird, but true.

It took the entire night and half of the next morning – with Dean running to the airport to pick up Ellen when he glanced at his phone finally and realize he had twenty six missed calls from the irate and worried-sick woman – but the five of them walked away from the cemetery having burned H.H. Holmes' bones with no one the wiser, reburied the two halves of cement that had survived the flames, and told everyone it was all good, they could pack it up and go home.

Hopefully, no one tried to unbury the no-longer-existent body in the future, or they would be in for one hell of a surprise (and a whole new level of conspiracy theories.)

-o-o-o-

"Handy to have around," Jo commented of Andy, around three in the morning as she and Dean stood at the edge of the operation. The crew had set up flood lights, for Christ's sake, as they prepared to exhume the cement block via crane. Dean had never been part of a bigger circus in his life, and the sheer number of people involved and literal spotlights on them made all hunters present twitchy as all get-out.

"You're telling me," Dean harrumphed beside her.

She turned to him, and the hunter realized he'd left himself wide open for a conversation he didn't want to have. Damnit. Jo was too damn good at that and he'd walked right into it. "What aren't you telling me?"

"Jo-" he started, but with the look she leveled his way, he just sighed.

"You see the future, Sam see's people's deaths, and the kid can Jedi mind trick anyone?" Jo uncrossed her arms, trying to convey that she wasn't attacking him, here. But she deserved to know. "I'm betting there's a story there."

It took the older hunter a minute, but finally, he told her what they knew. What they were supposed to know in the current timeline, at least. "It's all connected to the yellow-eyed demon."

"Azazel."

"Yeah. He did something to Sammy- uh, to all of us."

"What?" Jo's expression was caught between sympathy and horror. Dean didn't exactly blame her.

"Jo, maybe-"

"You don't have to tell me," she said quickly, looking away, back at the excavation site as they lowered the newly freed block of cement to the ground. "But maybe I can help. I want to help, Dean."

"Don't think you can," he answered honestly. "But… I'll hit you up if that changes, alright?"

She smiled at him, the kind of sad look of comradery that only emotionally stunted people really understood. The kind that spoke volumes more than either of them would ever be capable of putting into words. They were bred of the same elk, Harvelles and Winchesters.

"Yeah, alright."

They headed into the mass of people gathered around Holmes' tomb, even as Andy started telling people to go take a coffee break, not to worry, they'd see to the rest of it.

-o-o-o-

"You're something else, Andy," Jo had said as they piled into one car at seven in the morning after having lowered the cement back into the grave and left behind a crew of soon-to-be confused city workers to finish up the re-burial. It was a tight fit, especially with Ellen sitting stony and silent in the front seat. The kid, oblivious to the tension, blushed a happy red at the compliment.

"I try," was all he said, practically preening in an innocent way that meant he totally got away with it. Anyone else, Jo probably would have decked 'em.

The trip back to the Roadhouse was tense and quiet. Not unlike the first time Dean had made the world's most awkward family road trip. He kind of wished he'd been able to keep Ellen out of it this time, not only for the awkwardness that was the near-eighteen hour trip, but for everyone's sanity. They ended up stopping halfway through the night, pulling into a motel just off the highway.

It was at Dean's insistence that he couldn't drive it all in one go and no one else was driving his baby, but in reality, he was pretty sure all five of them were about to lose it. They all needed a break to stretch their legs and their personal space. Even Andy had picked up on the quiet tension and sat, a fifth wheel awkwardly pressed against the passenger side window in the back, tapping his foot until someone glared at him hard enough that he stopped. For eighteen hours.

Ellen got herself and Jo a room from the small motel office without speaking so much as a word to anyone, including her daughter. No one argued with her, and Sam followed right after, getting them a room of their own (both Jo and the middle-aged woman behind the front desk raised eyebrows at the request for just two beds, no cot needed, but Dean's unblinking deadpan stare dared either of them to say a word about it. Jo walked away with two viciously raised eyebrows and a wicked smirk). They settled in their rooms respectively, barely a word spoken.

Or, at least, they settled on the surface. Sam and Andy were arguing who got which side, which was adorable, and Dean took his cue to leave when both of them chucked their pillows at his head.

He found Jo standing outside her own room, ice bucket wrapped in both hands, leaning against the cinder block wall and looking for all the world like she was avoiding going back inside. Dean nodded his head towards the picnic table a couple rooms down, then meandered that way, hands in his pockets. Jo followed silently.

She set the ice bucket on the wooden surface, hopping up beside him. "Hey."

"Hey," he answered back with a weak grin. "Got a minute?"

"Like I'm just dying to go back to quality mother-daughter time. Didn't you know the silent treatment was my favorite?" she said dryly, chuckling with him when he shook his head. Yeah, he could imagine.

A not unpleasant silence stretched between them, and Dean finally sighed.

"Look…" The older Winchester hung his head and scrubbed at the back of his neck self-consciously. Man up, Winchester. Dean picked his head back up and turned to Jo. "Your mom is pissed, but she's gonna be more pissed at us tagging along than you hunting."

Jo frowned immediately, her first response of, "You let me handle my mom," quickly overrun by her second, "Wait, why? This was my choice."

His lack of response was probably telling, but Dean was having trouble forming the words. He knew what Jo's dad had meant to her. Knew she'd gotten years less with him than Dean had with his own dad. He wished he could switch their positions. He really, really wished he could. "Your dad and my dad, they hunted together."

"Yeah, I know. It's how my mom knew your dad."

"Yeah, well…" Dean swallowed past the lump in his throat. Jo deserved the truth, and he hoped hearing it from him this time would soften the blow. He didn't know whose sake he was hoping for more, though. "My dad was on the last hunt your dad went on…"

Jo quieted, easily picking up on what Dean wasn't saying in so many words. She looked away, struggling to swallow herself, now. Dean sat in silence, letting her work through whatever she needed to. If she needed to yell, to be pissed, to blame him, he'd take it. He'd taken it before and he could take it now.

"Was it his fault?" she finally asked.

Dean struggled to answer. "I don't know."

"But you think it could have been." Jo was too damn smart and too good at reading people – at reading him – not to come to that conclusion easily enough. Dean didn't know what to say. "My mom must think so, or she wouldn't be angry about you guys hunting with me."

The older Winchester sighed, hooking his fingers together to keep from balling his hands into fists, or worse. He couldn't quite look at his companion, instead staring out at the empty road and the darkened fields beyond. "Dad wasn't exactly known for knowing when to quit. Or drawing safe lines in the sand, Jo."

She didn't respond right away. Dean still couldn't quite look her in the eye, especially as she stared straight ahead, unseeing. But he was pretty sure there was a sheen of water over those fierce brown beauties.

"But you're not like that," Jo finally said, voice soft. Understanding, in ways Dean didn't think he deserved. "Neither of you are."

When it became obvious that he didn't agree, she turned more towards him, her body language not unlike her mother: booking no room for argument. "Are you kidding me? You both came after me, tooth and nail, Dean. And you showed up in the first place! You easily could have died." She swallowed, glancing away to blink that water out of her eyes and angrily swipe a hand beneath one. "If it's true your dad got my dad killed…then you're nothing like your dad."

Dean looked away, stomach churning unpleasantly at memories he didn't want to remember, his chest both aching and warming. He wanted to tell the angel in there to back off, damnit. He wasn't worthy of that kind of praise. That kind of devotion or forgiveness. His chest burned all the warmer.

"What if I am, Jo?" he asked, fighting down the nausea and guilt. He resisted pushing against his sternum, poking at the angel inside that wouldn't let him be miserable. Didn't Cas remember that he got this woman – both women – killed?

Jo Harvelle pulled back at the scared admission, blinking at him as her mind raced to follow what he was talking about. It didn't make sense right away, because she was right there, not dead, after a hunt where Dean and Sam had saved her life. She hesitated, realizing that what he was talking about might not have happened yet.

Psychic. That was…gonna take some time to get used to.

"Did you…" she swallowed past the nervousness that coiled in her stomach like curdled milk. "Have you- did you see…something?"

Dean paused for the wrong amount of time, but Jo couldn't really read why. "No, no, not like…that. But I can't be the reason-"

Jo's eyes narrowed as he cut himself off, clearly struggling to say what he needed to say. She grabbed his arm, forcing him to look back at her.

"No one makes choices for me, alright?" The fierceness in her voice almost made him laugh. It wasn't funny. It really wasn't. It friggin' hurt, is what it was, because he knew better than anyone that no one got to make their own choices in this life. No, apparently, Time made all the choices for you, the bitch. But Jo's eyes just narrowed further at whatever expression made it to his face. She looked pissed that he didn't believe her, wasn't listening to her. "I'm serious. I get myself killed, it's because of choices I made. I won't accept anything else. You got it?"

This time he did laugh, and it was honest-to-god laughter. Not humorless, not self-deprecating. She was straight up threatening him like he was somehow holding her back by hoarding all the blame to himself. Just like only Jo frigign' Harvelle could. Hell, that woman could out-stubborn Time itself, Dean had no doubt. God, he had missed her.

He smiled over at her, and if it was a watery smile, he ignored the crap out of it. "I got it."

She smiled right back and grabbed the ice bucket. "Now, you gonna leave me to face my mom all alone, or come partake in the scream fest?"

Dean winced immediately, the grimace the only answer she really needed. "No, you know, I think I'd rather live."

Jo snorted. "You're scared of my mom?"

"Yes. Absolutely, yes."

The younger Harvelle shook her head, but there was a smirk in her glare. She waited it out, and finally Dean sighed.

"You think I'll make it better or worse?"

Jo shrugged, hopping off the table. He was glad to see her recovering so well. Like nothing had even happened. That was his girl. She rounded back on him, ice bucket held against her torso with both hands, and smirked. "I think if she's busy yelling at you, she's not busy yelling at me."

"Oh gee, thanks." Dean rolled his eyes hard enough his head went with, but he climbed off the table all the same. It was one scream fest he was not looking forward to, but he supposed he'd weather it for the woman next to him.

Besides. He could probably drag Sam into the whole thing and hide behind his brother's gargantuan frame when the Harvelle ladies got to throwing things. Winchester stuck together, didn't they?

-o-o-o-

Chuck stared at the empty lazy boy, still sitting over by his window. He himself sat at his writing desk, decidedly not writing. Stephanie had called in sick that morning. Or, well, she'd called him and reported she wouldn't be making it to his house, but she expected to read that promised progress and more when she returned. No mention of sick, but Chuck deiced entertaining that idea was safer than thinking about the many ways he might have possibly bored her to death, whether with his mediocre writing or mundane babbling, so much so that the woman had needed a day away from him.

Of course, it was Friday, so really, if she'd just waited one more day for the weekend…

Chuck shook his head and reminded himself that he was supposed to be believing Stephanie was sick. And also coming back. Sometime. Soon. Like Monday.

He sighed, having grown weirdly used to having the mostly-silent company in his house or the sometimes hovering presence of someone encouraging him onwards in his work. Weird, really. He'd always been more of a lone wolf (okay, so wolf was hardly a fitting descriptor for him, but shut up, he was taking it). It figured he'd turn out to be a true pack animal after all. Well, maybe a penguin. Penguins lived in groups, but were ultimately independent. And they mated for life, which meant enduring loneliness or isolation in the before and after, right? Yeah, sure, that sounded like it could be right. Chuck was probably a penguin.

(Admittedly, a more fitting pick than a wolf…)

He sighed. There was nothing for it. The scary woman would expect to have chapters to read when she returned, so he really ought to get on that.

Chuck glanced at the empty chair again and frowned with eyes that sometimes looked so much older than a mere thirty-something human. Eyes that grumpily forced their focus back to the laptop, yet kept right on frowning at the blinking cursor, awaiting words to fill the digital page as if by magic. Eyes that wondered if he should be looking a little further away than a computer screen.

God shook His head and opted not to. It was fine, most likely. Yes, it would be annoying if Hell spent the weekend undoing all the progress He'd been making, but, really, it was fine. It wasn't like he was planning on intervening, no matter what Hell was up to with his editorial assistant. He could start again on Persephone, need be.

They'd get there. They still had time. You know, so long as Time decided to keep playing nice.

-o-o-o-

On the other side of the country, a clandestine meeting was taking place between two of the world's less divine beings, while a third being of decidedly unknown divine status sat in a car like a child in timeout while the adults talked.

"Nice model. Little younger than your usual tastes." Tom smiled at his brethren, despite the fact that he could hardly stand her twisted, ugly face. Not like his was much better, of course. "Didn't realize you were busy playing jailbait while the rest of us worked."

Ruby's smile was all teeth. Coming from the prom queen wannabe she was currently riding, it was particularly bitchy. "Felt like branching out. Who's the tagalong?"

Tom looked over his shoulder at Persephone, sitting in the parked car a hundred feet away, her warded necklace glinting in the sunlight as she glared at them from beneath blonde bangs like a sidelined bystander. He waved sarcastically at her before turning back to the conversation.

"An asset. But then, we were talking about you." Tom's return smile was feral. "Not even a hint, Rubes? Come on, what kind of secret mission does Lilith have you on?"

"The kind that will stay a secret." Ruby flexed her fingers, playing the nonchalant, bored teenager inspecting her perfectly pink manicure.

Tom just smirked. "You know I'll get it out of you eventually."

The other demon snorted. That was unlikely. Not even Alistair himself could get this mission out of her. Not when Lilith had entrusted her, and her alone, with its completion. But why not rub a little salt in that deliciously open wound?

"You can try," she sniggered, a sickly sweet smile on her borrowed face. "But your sister had a better chance at it."

The demon across from her hissed. Meg had always been a sore spot for him, likely because she was Azazel's favorite, and everyone knew it. Pathetic, Ruby thought, a demon craving praise. Demons should seek only their own approval, and follow others simply out of fear and survival. While Azazel certainly should be feared - he was the last of the Princes, after all – he'd spent more time searching for the key to Lucifer's prison than ruling over Hell. Which left the majority of the true power in Lilith's hands, much to Ruby's benefit.

No, she thought, eying the pathetic excuse of a demon in front of her. She had chosen the right King. Or, should she say Queen.

"I need a favor," Tom switched tactics, and Ruby just smiled lazily at the defeat. The cat who knew the canary wasn't even a challenge to begin with. "The witchy kind."

Even a smear against her pagan roots wasn't going to dampen her victory. Instead, she just picked at the underside of a nail, shrugging one shoulder, and asked, "What do you need?"

The demon produced a glass, top half shattered, jagged edge a reddish-brown with dried blood. "A tracking spell. A permanent one, not a one-time thing."

Ruby crossed the distance between them to pluck the glass out of his hand. His look soured, but he didn't try to take it back. He was the one asking for the favor, after all.

"Well, there's certainly not much here to work with," she chided, if only to see the annoyance in his face, cleverly controlled as it was. "But I think I can whip something up."

"And what will it cost me?" The question was expectantly sneered and Ruby just grinned, all teeth again.

"How about a raincheck? We're on the same side here, after all, Tom."

The demon narrowed his eyes at her guile, but didn't argue. It wasn't like he had much of a choice, if he wanted this spell quick and dirty.

"Give me thirty minutes. I'll be back with your spell." She disappeared with a wink, and he crossed his arms and waited. Exactly thirty-one minutes later, he had his spell in the form of a hex bag and what was left of the cocktail glass, most of the blood gone from the rim. "Light the bag on fire then toss it on a map. Make it a big one, because once it's cast, the spell can't be re-cast. The fire will burn wherever your man is."

"I never said it was a man."

"Please. We all know Azazel has you on the Winchester boy. Does little Sammy keep giving you the slip?"

The only outward sign of his annoyance was a twitching vein near his jaw. "This will last? Fire hardly sounds permanent."

She shrugged again. "Permanent isn't easy, and you didn't give me much to work with. It'll burn as long as his soul does. I recommend putting the map somewhere it won't get wet."

Her helpful smile was anything but. Still, he had what he'd come for. "You have fun playing with your pom poms and pimples, now."

"Always."

Neither demon departed for a moment, both still sizing the other up, waiting to see who would leave first. Tom eventually did, realizing Ruby would wait him out far longer than he had the patience for. She watched him head back to the car with his mysterious blonde and take off, headed East. Once he was gone – and Ruby took every precaution to make sure he was actually gone – she left herself, heading back to Windom, Minnesota and her mission.

Chapter End Notes

A/Ns: …how many people are going to google which Supernatural character lives in Windom, how many already know, and how many are gonna leave it as a surprise? XD

(I did not know, btw. Totally had to google the town name. I thought it was in Missouri XD Supernatural Guru I am not, but beastmaster am I when Google is at my fingertips.)

(I'm so excited guys. So many things are happening. So, so, so many.)

Fun Fact #412: Holmes' body actually was exhumed on the claim that America's first serial killer had not been executed and that it wasn't his body that had been buried. The body was dug up in 2017, examined, proved to be Holmes', and re-buried. I took a little inspiration for that here ;P I might have totally ignored that the cement never fully set, so it wasn't a block they dug him out of but more like a pit of sludge . But jackhammers are more fun.

Up Next: Timey Wimey is back to being a wibbly wobbly bitch that's taking the boys for a wild handcuffs-and-jumpsuits kind of ride in Baltimore as we deal with dirty cops, missing drug dealers, and a death omen that's not very good at her job.

Chapter 69: Season 2: Chapter 36

Chapter Notes

A/Ns: Heeeeeey guys, it's that time again. Time for the reminder (plea) that my muse lives via a straight-to-vein IV directly fed by your comments and reviews. And my muse is getting dehydrated, dear, beautiful audience. It is tough to see our viewership numbers continue to climb while reviews dwindle with every post. Worse yet, I am well aware that a two-week posting schedule equals an automatic drop in reviewership. And it is because of that that I need to whine for a minute, because that suuuuucks. When I have to delay posting it is because I am not writing up to par; I am discouraged, dealing with a bout of depression, in a rut, or, in this instance, genuinely recovering from illness and injury that makes writing difficult. None of those things do better from a drop in people willing to comment while I continue to post as reliably and often as I can. Now, I do take deeeeep breaths and remind myself don't get bitter, don't get bitter, don'tgetbitterSilence, but I'm also not good at listening to myself, like, ever.

So guys, please. I need you all to step up and remember that I do this for free, and all I ask in return is that you let me know, on occasion, that you are out there reading it. No more words needed than "like button pushed", "still here", "👍", "👄". Whatever you want to convey that you are out there.

(To the ten-to-fifteen people who let me know every chapter that you are out there, you are my mother-friggin-heroes, the reason this story is still on-going, and when I get bitter, I go read all your awesome, wonderful, beautiful words again.)

(And to all the readers who left a comment when they first joined the story, you my heroes too :)

Chapter Warnings: Andy, Dean, and Sam are playing a game of who can be the bigger brat, the boys get to be PIs on a murder investigation, memory is a bitch, and, oh, yeah, Dean's waking up in places he doesn't want to be, covered in blood.

Actual Chapter Warnings: Brief depictions of gore in this one.

See the end of the chapter for more notes

-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-

The Road So Far (This Time Around)

Season 2: Chapter 36

-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-

Personally, Dean had never bothered contemplating what thirteen dwarves with pickaxes trying to bang out AC/DC's 'Back in Black' in the cavernous amphitheater of his skull might sound like. Partly because he already knew; having racked up eleven concussions in his life, Dean had ample experience with skull-drilling head dwarves.

Apparently, he could now bump that count up to lucky number twelve.

Ever the hunter (and therefore dismally used to waking up in unknown and less than ideal situations), Dean started categorically observing his surroundings while still feigning unconsciousness. Hard surface beneath him, uncomfortable but not enough to be cement or even floor. Bad mattress, then, or maybe a cot. It was quiet, but there was an echo to the silence that suggested a small space, walls probably concrete or brick, not much around to muffle even the lack of sound. There were distant sounds of life – movement, the scrape of a chair, the murmur of a conversation – but they were far off and muffled, likely by a stretch of space and at least one closed door.

Dean figured he was in a jail cell even before he opened his eyes.

"Mr. Warren."

The hunter groaned as he rolled over on the thin cot. The room was bright and yellow and godawful. Who painted cinder block that color? Whoever they were, they needed to be murdered.

It took a minute, but Dean eventually got the room to stop spinning enough to squint at the woman leaning casually against the bars of his little cell. She was middle aged, but wore it well: trim pant suit that meant business, blonde hair down around her shoulders (so not all business, then), and eyes that were trying to be cold but probably cared too much about humanity as a whole to really manage it. Kind of a cutie, if older women were Dean's thing.

She looked vaguely familiar, but the hunter couldn't place her.

"Kris Warren?" she asked in that tone that called bullshit faster than a bull could, in fact, shit. The cop (detective, given the pant suit) was holding up a small card, feigning dramatic interest in it. "That is your name, isn't it? Says so right here, on your impressively fake driver's license."

Shit. They'd probably already ran his prints. Which… was possibly, incredibly, devastatingly, oh-shit-how-do-I-get-myself-out-of-this-one problematic, depending entirely on what year it was. Double shit… what year was it? Dean raised the heel of his hand to his throbbing head, applying pressure. Like dwarves squished easily. Ha.

"We ran your prints through AFIS. No name popped up."

Oh, thank God. Alright, so it was 2006, his concussion wasn't that bad, and he hadn't lost his marbles completely. Just half his functioning brain power. That was fine. Dean had worked with less.

"More than a dozen possible hits, though. Looks like you certainly get around, Mr. Warren. Breaking and entering, grave desecration, kidnapping. And those are just the ones we've been able to link."

He was never time-traveling again. Mental note: tell Cas, never again. The angel could have warned him that dealing with two sets of memories, ten years of time difference, and never knowing when the hell he was when he woke up from unexpected unconsciousness was going to be a veritable headache.

Literally.

Dean stilled when something foreign and encrusted flaked off his forehead beneath the pressure of his palm. Confusion knotted in his stomach, but it was kinda staring to feel more like dread. The hunter pulled away, staring with growing horror at his hand. Both hands. And his clothes. T-shirt, pull over, jacket, pants, boots. All of it.

He was covered in dried blood.

"What the hell..."

"Well, whatever your name is." The woman – detective badge now clear on her waistline – straightened upright and looked at him like the worst of the worst criminals she'd ever put behind those bars. Dean was too busy having a panic attack over who the hell he'd apparently exsanguinated to really notice. "You're being detained for the suspected murder of Karen and Anthony Giles. You have the right to remain silent. Anything you say can and will be used against you-"

Dean slammed his eyes shut so he could focus purely on breathing. Had he said thirteen dwarves? Make it thirty. Oh, yeah, and one last thing. Who the fuck were the Giles?

-o-o-o-

-12 Hours Earlier-

"Anthony Giles."

Sam looked up from his breakfast of coffee and a plain bagel, a pathetically thin layer of cream cheese atop. Dean was holding up a newspaper, finger on the article in question. The headline read 'Man's Throat Slit Without a Trace' and Sam squinted at it.

"Who's Anthony Giles?"

Both brothers looked up as Andy plunked down between them, holding a coffee in both hands with the kind of gleeful expression only caffeine addicts and hypothermia victims got with a cup of hot jo between their fingers.

"Did you pay for that?"

Andy matched Sam's suspicious squint with one of his own. "What is the point of super powers if you don't use them?"

"Pretty sure super powers are meant to be used for good, hero," Dean quipped, resisting the urge to quote Uncle Ben. Andy, while an excellent student of all sci-fi nerdage, was woefully lacking in his comic book education. Although, even in 2006 there'd been enough damn Spiderman movies for the kid to get that one. However, it wasn't like any one of the men sitting at that table had handled great power or great responsibility all that well.

"Oh, right. Should I just go back and pay for it with my fraudulent credit card, then?" Andy's smile was of the shit-eating variety, and Dean harrumphed at the absolute pissy look on Sam's face.

Andy 1, Sam 0. Dean was seriously enjoying the fresh blood in this game.

The older hunter reached over and grabbed Andy's coffee, claiming it as his own with a long, slurping sip. The kid looked scandalized. "Next time, get us all one."

Sam's bitchface reached new levels. Maybe even beyond Ultimate.

Make that Andy 1, Sam 0, Dean 1.

Their resident super hero grumbled and got up from the table to go place himself at the back of the line once more.

Andy 1, Sam 0, Dean 2. He could practically hear the ding of the scoreboard in his head. Dean grinned over the rim of the cup. Sam just shook his head and nodded at the paper lying on the table.

"Who's Anthony Giles?"

The older Winchester resisted calling him a sore loser. They did have a job to do, after all. So Dean spread the newspaper out. "Baltimore lawyer. Working late in his office, throat slit, almost to the bone. No DNA, no prints. Room was completely clean. Security cameras caught zilch."

"So, invisible killer." Sam munched on his bagel. "Or someone tampered with the tapes. Still, could be a case. Does it sound familiar?"

"I think so." Even with a picture of the vic plastered across the page, Dean wasn't sure. Visual memory was generally stronger, but in this case, it wasn't doing him a lotta good. Not that he'd really remember a dead guy he only saw a picture of in the newspaper or maybe as a body on a slab in some morgue. Dean knew they'd been in and out of Baltimore for hunts at least three times that he could remember. Not that he could necessarily pair those visits up with individual hunts. Story of his life for the last year.

So he just shrugged, folding the paper in half and tossing it back on the table. "And if it turns out it isn't, it still sounds like our sort of thing."

"How do you not remember details like a dude with his throat slit practically in half?" Andy was back in his chair, new coffee in hand. Both Dean and Sam looked from him to the line and wondered how the hell he'd overheard them from there. The kid just sipped at his drink, keeping his body tellingly turned away from Dean and protectively hunched around the cup. "That doesn't happen every day."

Both hunters snorted. When Andy blinked at them, clearly missing the joke, Dean explained, "It does in our world, kid. There's been so many cases in the last thirty years- Hell, this one doesn't even make the top one hundred of weird shit I've seen. Probably doesn't make Sam's top fifty."

But it got the Timey Sense just barely tingling, and that was good enough.

Andy was making a face again, the one he made anytime he started thinking too hard on recent life choices and where exactly they were leading him, but didn't say anything. Sam went back to his breakfast and Dean started working out the quickest route to Baltimore.

After he stole the other half of Sam's bagel, of course. And made Andy go get him more cream cheese.

Andy 1, Sam 0, Dean 4.

-o-o-o-

When they got to Baltimore in the late afternoon, their first move was to check into a motel. It was item number nine on the list of John Winchester's Rules for Hunting. He hadn't actually numbered them, or kept them in any sort of order, but having a safe place to crash or hide out after a hunt was pretty high up on that list. There wasn't always time, of course, but when there was, the boys always dropped some gear and a med kit in a warded room, ready for them to return bloody if necessary.

Then they headed out. With Anthony Giles' office locked up tight and off-limits as a still-active crime scene, they'd have to wait until nightfall to check it out. So the Winchesters decided to interview the wife of their dead guy, to see if her husband had noticed anything out of the ordinary the past couple days. Talking about it on the way to her address, which Sam got off the hacked police report, the three agreed to go in as insurance agents. Well, Sam and Dean talked it out while Andy shot out suggestions, but ultimately it was the brothers who settled on insurance folk. It was an easy way to ask a lot of awkward questions about a loved one's death without setting off too many alarm bells. It was a good brainstorming session for Andy to start learning the ins and outs of hunting, though.

Not that he had to hunt, if he didn't want to. Which was what Sam kept telling him, despite the fact the kid continued to tag along. Dean had him pegged pretty well from the start. And not because he had a lack of self-preservation, or an abundance of self-loathing or anger, or a comfort with death and isolation, or any of the dozens of other issues that usually formed a soon-to-be-hunter. Nope. Andy was just too damn curious not to get answers, and too laid back to get himself out while he could. Terrible combo, really, but at least the Winchesters would be there to make sure a cat was the only collateral of his curiosity.

Of course, they'd had to stop and get Andy a cheap, quick suit to play the part. He looked… just wrong in it. Not that the kid couldn't clean up. It just really wasn't him. Lucky for them, he looked significantly younger than Sam, despite their matched age, so he got to be the rookie agent intern, tagging along for some experience. Fitting, Dean said, since he was the rookie.

"Come on, when do I get to play a cool role?" Andy picked at the slightly wrinkled, definitely baggy suit.

"When you're cool."

Andy 1, Sam 0, Dean 5.

They knocked on Karen Gile's front door, the three of them standing on the small porch like a gaggle of monkey suited insurance agents. Fun times. Dean was all ready with the pitch when the door opened, revealing a petite brunette with square framed glasses and red-rimmed eyes.

The wave of déjà vu all but stole his breath away. It was so damn strong it came with figgin' flashbacks this time. The hunter braced a hand against the porch wall as he lilted to the side. He had knelt beside this woman's corpse. Stared into her lifeless eyes. There was blood everywhere. Her throat was slashed, almost to the bone. Dean held her hand – no, not he her hand, her wrist. She was still warm. There were dual bands of ugly bruises layered on her skin, like shadows of restraints.

"Um, are you- is he alright?"

Karen Giles was their next victim.

Dean blinked as the images and accompanying wave of nausea passed, leaving him dizzy and propped up against the Giles' house, the widowed owner of which was standing there staring at him with something between concern and wariness. He forced a thin smile.

"Fine," Dean ground out with a nod of his head, forcing his spine to straighten. Sam and Andy were staring at him with equal parts worry and what-the-hell-dude. "Just heart burn. Must have been something I ate."

Mrs. Giles looked a little unsure of the three men standing on her porch. Her eyes were red and puffy. There was a tissue clenched in her hand. Right. She had just lost her husband, after all. Sam cleared his throat and offered a condoling smile.

"Karen Giles?" he asked. When she nodded hesitantly, he continued, "My name is Sam Frehley, these are my colleagues, Dean Simmons and Andy Criss. We're with the insur-"

Dean's hand shot out to grip Sam's bicep, interrupting him as he blurted out, "We're PI's."

Sam's eyebrows went up into his hairline, his head whipping to the side like a bad car crash victim to shoot his brother a look. Of course, pro that he was, the younger hunter covered it quickly, with more of a grimace than a smile, but whatever. Karen was busy frowning at the older Winchester anyhow.

"PI's?"

"Yeah," Dean continued, releasing Sam's arm. "My partner and I were working with your husband."

Karen's frown didn't lighten, and she glanced between the two brothers before settling on Andy. "And him?"

The kid didn't miss a beat, smiling. "Intern."

"Tony doesn't use PI's," she responded after another beat, eyes going back to the Winchesters. She seemed to realize what she'd said and bit her bottom lip as it trembled. Karen sniffed, looking off to the side as she tried to staunch the tears. She wiped briefly at her nose with the tissue. "Didn't. I'm sorry."

"Don't be." Sam offered a much more believable smile, sympathetic as it was. "We know this can't be easy on you. We just… we need to speak with you, if you have a moment."

"I don't understand." Karen shook her head. "My husband worked with the police when he needed to. Why would he hire PIs?"

"We can't say any more right now," Dean explained, lowering his voice as though sharing a secret. He knew the other two would follow his lead, Karen falling hook line and sinker as realization lit her face.

"Oh god." Her skin paled and she brought a hand up to cover her mouth in horror. "Do you think- Oh god, that's why he was-"

"We can't say, ma'am," Sam picked up their new roles easily enough. "Can we talk inside?"

"Yes, yes, of course." The grieving woman stepped back, and the three men passed into the house. She led them to a spacious, comfortable living room, with two designer couches separated by a sleek coffee table. She sat primly on one, dabbing at her nose again, as the boys settled opposite her. "Um…what- what case were you working on with Tony?"

"Mrs. Giles, I wonder if I could get a glass of water before we start?" Sam's smile was apologetic.

"Oh, uh, yes, of- of course." The poor woman stood, hesitated for a moment, and then left the room, purportedly headed for the kitchen.

Sam was on his brother the minute she was out of hearing range, Andy turning similarly to Dean from his other side, so he was literally surrounded.

"She's the next victim," Dean said in answer, rather than waiting for them to voice questions he knew they would. "We need a reason to stay and keep her safe this time."

"And as PI's we can express concern for her safety; whoever went after her husband is coming for her next." Sam was ever the quick one. "So, vengeful spirit?"

"I think so." Dean rubbed at his chin and jaw, but something about that wasn't quite sitting right. If only he could figure out what. He caught Andy staring at him from his peripheral and raised an eyebrow when the kid didn't follow up with a quip about his spotty memory.

Andy just shrugged. "Intern, remember? I'm just along for the ride."

New scoreboard count: Andy 2, Sam 0, Dean 5. Sam really needed to get a move on. It was like he didn't know how to play this game.

"What do you remember?" Sam interrupted before they could get side tracked, aloud or in Dean's mind. They didn't have a lot of time here; getting a glass of water only took so long.

"Not much. Just her, with a slashed throat. It was night. I think it was in a bedroom." Dean shook his head, the flashes clear, but everything surrounding them fuzzy as hell. Whoever designed human memory was going to get a strongly worded letter from him when this was all over. "Don't know why I was back here, but I was."

"Okay, and you're sure she's next?" Sam meant was he sure she wasn't victim number three, four, five, or etc. Which no, he wasn't sure. All he knew was Karen was going to die, and they had better stop it. Sam just held up his hands when he voiced as much.

"There was something else. Marks on her wrists-"

Dean cut himself off as Mrs. Giles returned from the kitchen, three glasses of water balanced on a wooden serving tray. Sam got up to help, taking the load to place it on the coffee table in front of them. He took a sip from one mostly for show.

"Did your husband ever share any of his cases with you?" Andy was the first to break the silence, and Dean was torn between way-to-go-rookie! and what-the-hell-happened-to-just-along-for-the-ride? "He was a criminal defense lawyer, right?"

"Yes." Karen's smile was watery. "He was good at it, too. Liked helping people."

Yeah, Dean seriously doubted that. Something told him Tony Giles hadn't been a good person in life. He didn't know if that was future recall or just intuition (vengeful spirits didn't usually kill innocent people, after all), but this poor lady was either a fantastic actor a total dupe.

"Had any of his recent cases been bothering him?" Sam asked, and Karen blinked owlishly before shaking her head. "Was he acting weird, or strange?"

"Strange?"

"Yeah, strange," Dean jumped in. "Did he feel like someone was following him, did he keep seeing someone? Experience cold spots or visions? You know, Karen. Weird."

Sam cleared his throat, clearly thinking they were pushing too hard, but the widow just shook her head, confused. "Anything at all, no matter how insignificant it may seem, ma'am."

"He…had- had a nightmare the day before he died. He said he woke up in the middle of the night and there was a woman standing at the foot of the bed. He blinked and she was gone." She stared at the three men, avidly listening to her babble on about a meaningless dream, and suspicion started to overtake her grief. "It was just a nightmare."

"What did she look like?" Andy looked a little too eager, but honestly, Dean had been about to ask the same thing, so it wasn't like he could exactly fault the kid.

"What the hell difference does it make what she looked like?"

The kid's mouth clacked shut and he looked properly chastised, turning to the brothers with a 'what do I say now' look. Dean cleared his throat, preparing to cover for their intern, but realized he didn't exactly have a reason for why nightmare-lady's description should matter if she was just a dream and not a blood thirsty ghost likely coming for this woman next.

Luckily, Sam had their backs.

"Stress sometimes shows itself in unpredictable ways," the pre-law student picked up their slack with another sympathetic smile. "Our, um, our brains don't really ever shut off, Mrs. Giles. Sometimes they keep working while we sleep, and that can influence your dreams. This woman might be involved in the case that got your husband killed."

Hot damn, Dean could always count on his genius kid brother.

….Damn it, Sam probably deserved a point for that, huh? Andy 2, Sam 1, Dean 5. He was still losing, so it was fine.

Karen's mouth moved wordlessly for a moment before she had to stop and breathe through the fresh wave of tears at the reminder of her husband's demise. "R-Right. Of course. That-That makes perfect sense." She let out a sharp breath, sniffling back the emotion clogging her throat. "He said she was pale and had… uh, dark red eyes. I- I don't know how that can possibly help. Tony didn't say he knew her, or anything."

"No, that's very helpful." Sam offered another smile, and Karen smiled weakly back. He glanced over at Dean. "We, uh, we need to go check your husband's office, see if he left anything behind on the case we're working, but-"

"What case was it?" Karen interrupted, lowering her handful of tissue. "Maybe I can help."

"That's very kind of you, ma'am, but it's too dangerous." Dean leaned forward, forearms braced on his knees, hands loosely clasped. It was the standard Fed look he'd learned early. It almost always did the job. "If whoever went after your husband suspects you know anything…"

Karen's watery eyes widened, and her breath stuttered in sudden fear. "Oh god."

Sam drew a Kleenex from the box sitting on the coffee table and offered it to her. "Did Tony ever share case information with you?"

"No," she insisted, wiping at her eyes with the fresh tissue, this time out of agitation and anxiety. "Nothing recently. Nothing like this, that could have gotten him-"

She broke off again to fend off the next round of reserved tears.

The three hunters shared a look, and Dean cleared his throat. "If it's alright with you, Karen, I'd like to stay. My partner and the intern can check your husband's office."

Andy pulled a 'come on, man' face. Almost a bitchface, Dean thought. Not enough to change the score. He'd have to work harder.

Karen wasn't really all there enough to notice. "I-It's a crime scene."

Dean resisted the urge to sigh. Could this woman just cooperate and let them save her life already?

"We'll speak to the police," Sam said with a weaker smile. "We've done this before, Mrs. Giles."

"Of course. I- I have a spare key I can get you." She got up numbly before either of them could tell her that wasn't necessary. Dean wondered if she'd even heard his request to stay. As she left the room, he looked back at his brother and Andy, barely managing not to roll his eyes. She was grieving and in shock, after all.

"We'll check out Giles' office for any clues." Sam glanced at his watch, but he could tell by the diminishing light outside that they'd be good to go by the time they drove over there. "You're good here?"

"Assuming she's cool with me stickin' around to make sure she stays not-dead?" Dean's growl earned him a reprimanding look from his brother, which he didn't pay any attention to. "Yeah, I'll be fine. Let me know what you find."

"Did the description she give spark anything?" Sam asked, voice lowering.

Dean shook his head. It sounded like every description of a ghost ever. Super helpful. He got yet another one of those disappointed-soccer-mom looks when he voiced the thought aloud.

Sam and Andy stood from the couch as Karen came back in, working a little silver key off her keyring. She held it out to them, and Sam accepted it with a smile and appreciation for all her help.

"If- if you don't mind…" Karen trailed off as she released the key, arm falling limply back to her side. She sniffed again, wiping at her nose with the back of her hand, barely keeping it together. "There's a photo on Tony's desk. It's of us, in Paris." She let out a little self-deprecating laugh, and even Dean felt for this woman. "I…it's silly, but, I can't stop thinking about it..."

"We'll grab it for you." Sam's smile was entirely understanding. He placed a comforting hand on the widow's shoulder, which seemed to help.

After a watery smile, Karen broke away to lead them to the front door. Dean lagged behind the group, wondering whether or not the widow would ask him to leave. In which case, he'd have to camp out somewhere nearby where he could keep an eye on her and the house.

Lucky for him, Karen saw Andy and Sam out, and then shut and locked the door behind them, Dean still standing by her side. She let out a shaky breath.

"So what now?"

Dean smiled, but it felt more like a grimace. "Now we wait, and make sure no one comes after you."

The words were supposed to be comforting. Given the way Karen's throat moved as she tried several times to swallow, they sort of missed the mark.

-o-o-o-

"So what are we looking for?" Andy shone his flashlight around the neatly organized office. Sam slipped the key Karen had given them into his pocket, still marveling at actually getting into a place the legal way (sort of, they were still breaking the law by entering what was considered an active crime-scene). He glanced around the office quickly, eyes pausing on the puddle of dried blood to their left.

"Anything weird or out of place," he answered, still staring at the reddish-brown stain where Anthony Giles must have died.

The sound of paper crinkling came from his right, where Andy was pulling something off the top of a printer. He held the page up. "Weird like this?"

Sam got his own flashlight on and pointed it at the paper. He squinted at the eleven letters repeated, over and over again, no spaces. It filled the whole page. Sam frowned. "Dana Shulps?"

Andy turned the piece of paper back to look at it again, then nodded towards the printer. There were a dozen more pages sitting in the printout trey, and a couple more on the floor where they had fallen. "It's all over the place."

"A name?" Sam hazarded, taking the paper from Andy as he retrained his flashlight around the office, looking for other things out of place.

"Maybe someone involved in one of Tony's cases?"

Sam shrugged. "Or our pale, red-eyed, mystery girl. Maybe both."

The printer sat atop a filing cabinet that Andy now started digging through. He pulled out the first drawer and groaned at the endless rows of folders. "We're gonna have to check all of this, aren't we?"

Sam huffed something both sympathetic and disparaging, because he was definitely part of that 'we'. He headed for the desk and computer there. "Welcome to the job. We can check digital files first, they'll be faster."

They got to work, quickly discovering that the printer wasn't the only thing spitting out Dana Shulps' name. It was everywhere; written on the glass surface of the desk, on the windows, and lines and lines of it on every open program on Tony's desktop. Despite more than an hour of searching, though, neither Sam nor Andy found any mention of a

Dana Shulps.

Andy closed the last filing cabinet with an annoyed noise. "Nothing. There wasn't a Shulps of any kind in there!"

"And no Dana Shulps has ever lived or died in Baltimore in the last fifty years." Sam sighed, equally frustrated. But he switched gears, getting back to cracking the password for Anthony Giles personal files. Maybe there'd be something in his notes.

"Awesome." Andy collapsed in the chair in front of the desk, watching Sam type away. He drilled his fingertips along his knees and thighs absently until Sam finally looked up, pausing his typing, eyebrow raised. "Sorry. Kinda bored."

Sam made a noise in the back of his throat. He leaned back in the chair in order to dig into his front pocket. He pulled out the Impala's keys and tossed them to Andy. "Here. I need at least another thirty minutes to crack Giles' password, and probably a couple hours after that to go through whatever's there. Why don't you go join Dean?"

Andy caught the keys with wide eyes. "Drive the Impala? You want me to drive the Impala?" He held the keys up like they were a ticking time bomb about to go off. "You could just save time and tell Dean to murderize me."

The younger Winchester huffed something close to a laugh. Yeah, he knew that panic well enough. "It'll be fine. Just don't ding her."

Andy kept staring, keys in hand, hand still raised. "Yeah, no, you know what, I'm good. I'll just wait here."

He set the keys back on the desk. Sam rolled his eyes, leaning forward to push the jumble of metal back towards Andy. "Go. You're not going to do anything here but distract me."

"Ouch, dude. I can be useful!" When silence followed that statement, Sam staring blankly at him and Andy twiddling his thumbs with nothing else to do, the kid finally sighed and grabbed the keys. He climbed out of the chair, walking towards the door more like a man on death row than a kid just given his big brother's car. "Fantastic. I'll work on my obituary on the way over. Re-write the will while I'm at it."

"Dean'll really will murder you if he finds out you crashed his car because you were busy writing your will."

Andy said something particularly snippy in response, but it was lost in part to his grumble and also Sam's resumed clacking of keys. The kid opened the office door, but turned back to jab a finger at the Winchester. "You tell him this was your idea."

"I'll be sure to do that," Sam answered, ignoring Andy's continued mutter with a quirked lip. The kid shut the door behind him, and Sam dug out his cell to call Dean and tell him Andy was on his way. And, you know, maybe that he'd stolen the keys right out from under him.

Andy 2, Sam 2, tie game. He did too know how to play this game, thank you very much.

(Dean cheated; his score didn't count).

-o-o-o-

Dean excused himself to the Giles' backyard to take the call from Sam. He didn't want Karen overhearing anything he'd have to figure out how to explain later. Telling her he'd only be a moment (and definitely close enough to hear her call if she needed anything in response to her nervous look), he left the widow on the couch with a box of tissues. He closed the patio door behind him and answered his phone.

"Tell me you have something. I am running out of crap to talk about with this lady and I have already re-salted every surface I can get away with twice."

He could practically hear Sam's eye roll. He could absolutely picture the bitchface. Number three. Definitely number three.

"Does the name Dana Shulps mean anything to you?"

Dean frowned sharply at the words, memory sparking, but the flame didn't take. He'd certainly heard the name before. He even remembered seeing it printed, over and over and over again. It had been… it had been at Giles' office. And Karen's bedroom. He'd been at both crime scenes.

There was…there was more to it than that, though.

Damnit, it was like an itch he couldn't friggin' scratch. An itch that was going to get Karen Giles' killed if he couldn't figure it out.

"Yeah, definitely. Can't remember who she is, though. Come on!" he growled into the phone as he slammed the flat of his palm into one of the pillars that supported the upper balcony and patio roof. "There's something about this case, man. Something not right. I can't put my finger on it."

Usually his déjà vu would have kicked into memories by now. It didn't take all that much to trigger memory, really. Thinking straight on it never seemed to work, but once one or two pieces fell into place, it was often enough to bring the rest flooding back. He had a name, two victims, and a damn description of their monster. What was he missing?

"Well, I'm close to cracking this guy's password, but it'll be another half hour, at least."

Dean sighed, running his hand through his short hair in frustration. "Great." Sam huffed in response and the older Winchester did not appreciate the lack of support, here. "What am I supposed to do, just keep hanging out at this lady's house?"

"Yeah, Dean, until our ghost shows up and tries to kill her."

That was bitchface number six right there. Oh goody, they'd upgraded.

"We don't even know if that happens tonight, man." Dean leaned back to glance through the glass of the fancy French doors. Karen was still lying on the couch. The hunter turned back to the conversation and the rest of the yard.

On the other end of the line, Sam was lecturing. "This was your idea, Dean. It's not even a bad one. If your 'timey senses' say she's next then…well, she's probably next."

Dean couldn't help the pessimistic grumble. "I'm been wrong before, Sam."

The distant sound of typing in his ear stopped and he heard his brother sigh. "Even if you are, this is still our best play. We gotta try to keep her alive. Besides, there's nothing else we can do tonight. Andy's on his way back to you. He'll…keep you company."

Dean snorted. "Oh, yeah, great."

"Also your idea, Dean." And they were back to the lecturing. Balance restored to the universe. "Let him talk to Karen. Or better yet, he can tell her to get some sleep."

"Right, because the grieving widow of a murder victim is totally going to sleep well while she's got two unknown men in her house claiming to be there for her protection. Genius plan, there, Mr. Bates." Dean started pacing the paved portion of the Giles' backyard. He glanced through the window again. Karen was sitting upright on the couch now. Dean went back to his pacing.

There was a telling silence on the other end of the line, followed by the resuming of key clacking. "That's why I said have Andy do it."

What? Why? Like the kid was gonna be any more persuasive than- oh. Oh.

"…That's kinda creepy, Sam."

"Not like she'll know. Besides, it'll probably be the only good night of sleep she gets for a while." There was bitterness in Sam's voice that Dean could sort of understand and maybe, just maybe, it wormed its way into his big-brother heart.

"Yeah, alright. Maybe we'll try that." The older hunter ran a hand down his face. He could use a good night's sleep himself. Or, you know, the answer to the world's most annoying riddle currently staring him in the face. "Just…call when you get into Giles' computer. Meanwhile I get to go back to playing Suzy homemaker."

Sam's laugh was the well-rehearsed amusement of a snot-nosed little brother. "I'm sure you'll do great with your easy bake oven."

"Shaddup. I'm a great cook." And an absolutely terrible baker, but Sam didn't need to know that. Not like they'd grown up with an oven for the kid to ever see catch fire while going for cookies. Nope. They'd made it to full grown adulthood in a bunker before Sam got to see that sight.

Dean was about to lower the phone and end the call when a stray thought flitted through his brain and he suddenly frowned, suspicion in his very narrowed eyes. "Sam. How exactly is Andy getting back here?"

That silence was telling too.

-o-o-o-

Karen reached forward for another tissue, a quiet sob escaping her. She missed Tony. And there was just so much she had to deal with

now. How could it be right, that on top of the grief and misery and loneliness of losing your husband, you also had to deal with the paperwork, the finances, the people. Endless lines of people offering their well-intentioned but useless sympathy. And in front and behind them: the police, the insurers, the lawyers, the office realtors, the cleaners, the funeral planner, and now Tony's mystery PIs. God, Karen just wanted to be left alone, but she'd never been lonelier.

She hiccupped past another stifled sob and buried her face in the tissue. Ridiculous, really, to be annoyed with the people who came by to help. The PIs, the last in a long line of those visitors, were even offering protection. Because they thought whoever had killed Tony might come for her.

Which was just plain ridiculous. She'd never been involved in any of Tony's work, so really, why would anyone come after her?

Karen blew her nose and lowered the Kleenex, only to catch a glimpse of something moving across her periphery. She sat straight up, clutching the flimsy, damp material enough to tear it in two. Nothing moved.

"H-Hello?"

Practically shaking, Karen reached up and removed her glasses, pinching the bridge of her nose and muttering to herself to calm down. Dean was just outside. And no one was coming for her, hadn't she just covered that? With a sniff, she put her glasses back on and straightened, only to rear back in shock at a fragmented, nightmarish figure standing across the living room.

Karen shot off the couch, clutching at her sweater. "Dean!"

It had been a woman. A woman with red eyes, broken into multiple reflections on the glass pane doors that led to the dining room. She was gone, like she'd never been there at all, but, but she had. No, Karen thought, as she edged her way along the couch, using the edge pressing against her calves as a guide. No way she was taking her eyes off of those doors. Of course it was just…just a figment of her imagination, probably. It was just Tony's nightmare, getting to her. That was all.

A door creaked on squeaky hinges, and Karen stopped breathing. That wasn't Dean. The patio doors didn't squeak; only the garage door did. Tony had been meaning to oil it for ages, now.

Karen didn't wait to find out who the hell was coming in through the garage, because it sure wasn't Tony. She ran for it, screaming for the PI still outside as she bolted up the stairs. She'd make it to the bedroom, lock herself in and call the cops. That's what she'd do.

-o-o-o-

Dean had just hung up the phone, having made Sam listen as he listed half the ways he planned to murder Andy if his Baby had even so much as one scratch on her, when he heard Karen's scream. The hunter shoved his phone into his pocket and all but barreled through the doors back into the house, almost taking one clean off the wall. He stumbled into the living room, gun drawn, but Karen wasn't there.

"Karen!"

He heard her reply, muffled, from upstairs. She didn't sound like she was in immediate danger, but something had definitely sent her running. Dean spun, but didn't see anything. No ghost lady, no red eyes. Still, no reason to risk it.

The hunter took a second to swing by the fireplace, grabbing one of the iron rod pokers from its stand before he took off up the stairs.

"Karen?" He spun at the top landing, but only one door on the second floor was closed. The bedroom door. Dean had made his excuses earlier to sneak through the house, a container of salt on him, and he'd made sure to get the windows in that room extra good. Now he could hear Karen's panicked voice coming from behind it, speaking to the police from the snippet he caught.

The hallway lights flickered and Dean stopped, glancing up at them. Crap. He doubled timed it for the door, but it was locked. He used the butt of his gun to pound on it. The other side had gone terrifyingly quiet.

"Karen!"

When she screamed, he said screw it and kicked the damn thing open.

Their red-eyed mystery bitch was standing over Karen, who'd backed into the closet, cowering beneath the ghostly woman. The lights went out completely, the printer in the corner stopped spitting out pages mid print. Dean didn't need to look to know what was written on those papers.

"Hey, lady!" The woman turned, and even the wash of déjà vu at the sight of her, red-ringed eyes lined by bags, pale and yellow as any ghost, blood pouring from a slit throat, didn't stop Dean from swinging true. The iron rod cut her in half, and her split, wispy form disappeared with a flicker.

Karen collapsed to the floor, sobbing even as she tried to keep it together. Dean kept his guard up, knowing the ghost would be back, as he stepped closer to the distraught widow.

"Wh-What was that?"

"The thing that killed your husband."

Karen gasped for breath, her tears choking her ability to speak, but not think. "Wh-What?"

"Uh…yeah. We're…sort of like ghost hunting PIs." Dean cast her a quick, weak smile, but kept his eyes trained on the room. Throat Slasher was gonna be back. The salt at the windows hadn't stopped her, so either Dean had missed a way in (possible, it wasn't like he'd had proper time to ward the place while playing babysitter), or she'd already been inside. Or attached to Karen, somehow. Dean had seen weirder. "We gotta get out of here."

He hauled the shaken woman up by the elbow. Karen's feet held beneath her as he steadied her against the closet door. "You gonna make it?"

She locked eyes with him, and he was surprised by the ferocity in her gaze. This woman planned to live. He hadn't expected it from her, meek as she'd been downstairs. Guess grief and fear did two very different things for some people. "Get me the hell out of here."

"You got it, ma'am."

There was something still bothering Dean as he started for the hallway, hand leading her by the elbow. Something about the ghost. She hadn't been attacking Karen in those brief seconds before he'd cut her down. Just standing over her. And he'd definitely seen her before. He just couldn't remember the context….

….It had been night. They were in the woods. His life was on the line. Some sort of confrontation…

But not with the ghost.

Dean halted so abruptly that Karen bumped into his backside with a little yelp.

It hadn't been a vengeful spirit. Wasn't a vengeful spirit. It had been-

"Karen? Karen, are you here?"

-a Death Omen.

Whether from his memory or the foreign voice – the very human voice – now coming up the stairs towards them in the dark, Dean didn't actually know, but he remembered. He remembered getting arrested standing over Karen's dead body because he'd come back to ask if she'd known anything about a Dana Shulps. Only it wasn't a name; it was an anagram. An anagram that led to a building where a dirty cop killed his drug-dealing partner by slitting her throat and burying her in a wall.

Oh god.

"Pete?" Karen seemed surprised by the voice, but hope chased the confusion right off her face. She ripped herself free of Dean's grip and ran for the stairs before he could stop her. "Peter!"

"Karen, no, wait-"

Dean didn't make it in time to save Karen Giles, for the second time. Her surprised cry as a knife flashed in the dark was cut short by gargled, bubbly terror that made Dean's heart seize. Karen stumbled back, right into his arms as he ran to catch up. She was clutching her throat, blood pouring from between useless fingers, eyes wide as she stared at the cop – her friend, Tony's friend – coming up the last step.

Dean went down with the dying woman in his arms, her weight, however slight, still taking him to his knees. He scrambled to get his gun arm out from under her without dropping her to the floor, but Detective Peter Sheridan, bloodied knife in one hand, precinct-issued gun in the other, had the drop on him. He'd had the drop on him long before Karen Giles had gone running from the death omen that was there to warn her. Dean hadn't stood a chance. Neither of them had.

Karen was still alive in his arms, choking to death on her own blood, when the cop pistol-whipped him into unconsciousness.

Chapter End Notes

A/Ns: It just hit me how many people I violently murder in this story… I'm, um…guys, I think I may be kind of evil. And apparently just realizing it now.

Tons of author notes this time. You'd think I didn't write the chapter well enough or something ;P

Concussion Count: I think Dean having only received eleven concussions in eleven seasons is probably ridiculously conservative (especially as I gave him an extra one back in Season 1…). Technically speaking, the current internet count of Dean being knocked unconscious is fifty by season 11. Some of them must have resulted in concussions, obviously not all of them or that poor boy would in vegetable coma land. So I wanted to balance a conservative number with how-are-their-brains-not-mushed-potatoes-by-now? Plus, I figure if it's too conservative for you, we'll just say those are the eleven concussions Dean actually remembers XD

Dean's Memory: Keeping Dean's memory of events realistic without it just becoming "convenient" that he does or doesn't remember things has been kinda tricky. Mostly I use my own faulty memory of episodes before I re-watch them as a guide to what is and isn't plausible when it comes to memory. Hopefully it's working out alright and Dean not remembering some of these key moments isn't coming across as contrived. If it's starting to become repetitive though, please drop a line and let me know. I'll balance it out by starting to emphasize the things he does remember instead of what he doesn't.

Minutiae: I ended up re-watching this episode for a multitude of reasons (the major one being I really didn't remember much about it ^_^') But it's the first I've re-watched since 2.03 (meaning I skipped several or only watched them in pieces or read transcripts). So while I was watching this one, probably about fifteen minutes in, I suddenly sat straight up and went "When the hell did Sam BREAK HIS ARM!?" and was like, shit shit shit, I haven't been writing Sam with a broken arm!

Soooooo, Sam broke his hand in a fight with a zombie in 2.04, when that dude brings his girlfriend back from the dead and they notice because they go to visit Mary Winchester's grave after John's death? It was apparently to cover Jared breaking his hand in real life. Uh… so…. I'm gonna say that they didn't go visit their mom's grave this time around, didn't get on a case about zombies, and so no broken hand! There we go, solved! ^.^'

Now there's just an unchecked zombie murderer running around out there….

Yup, no, I'm totally comfortable with that XD

Review: "Like Button Pushed" please! (or any variation of)

Chapter 70: Season 2: Chapter 37

Chapter Notes

A/Ns: I know we're a day later than usual getting this up; apologies! I had a very busy Saturday and pretty rough Sunday, so there wasn't really time (or energy) to edit and get this chapter out. But that's apparently what Mondays are for!

Reviews/Castiel: So, last chapter had exactly one line about Cas in it, and more than half of reviewers mentioned it. It is never a good sign when you've deprived your audience of a character so much that one mention of him makes everyone comment on how much they loved that line. My favorite though, had to be SailingTheNightSea's description: "This is real Jane Austen level slow burn." Haaaaaaaaaa, XD ouch. So much ouch (the truth hurts ;P). That one's going in the tags on AO3! In the meanwhile, I am going to try and get some more Cas in here pretty soon, guys, I promise. Not Destiel, because we wouldn't want to let Jane down XD, but Cas for sure.

Lawls, I'm so sorry, but in, like, a can't-stop-chortling sort of way.

Minutiae: I'm definitely bending standard police procedure in this one. Not outside the realm of TV standards, though, and very much within Supernatural's canon, particularly for this episode. But I know I'm bending procedure, so I have to say it out loud :P Still, I think it'll fly.

See the end of the chapter for more notes

-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-

The Road So Far (This Time Around)

Season 2: Chapter 37

-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-

By the time Andy arrived at the Giles home – Baby perfectly intact, thank you very much – there were over a dozen cop cars out front, flashing lights turning the entire neighborhood into a morbid cross between the worst club scene ever and a warning ad for epilepsy. Having absolutely no idea what was going on but knowing it couldn't possibly be good (and acutely aware of his own standing with law enforcement), Andy pulled to the opposite curb almost a full block away.

Neighbors were outside their houses, in pajamas and robes, arms crossed over chests or hands raised to their mouths. Cops had cordoned off the entire area around the Giles' house and were maintaining the perimeter from locals and just-arriving news vans.

Really not good then.

Andy thought about trying Dean's cell, but decided not to risk it. Which turned out to be the right call when only minutes later two police officers and a man in civilian clothing – suit, tie, and dress shirt stained with a terrifyingly large amount of red (Detective, maybe?) – walked out of the house, escorting a fourth, stumbling man between them. It was hard to see his face from so far away, but Andy knew the short hair, the broad shoulders, the slightly bow-legged walk, staggering as it was.

That was Dean, handcuffed, clothes covered in something dark that Andy hoped to God wasn't blood, walking like he was drunk, being pushed into the back of a cop car.

Aw, crap. What the hell was he supposed to do now?

-o-o-o-

"Put these on."

Dean caught the bundle of clothes chucked his way and stared down at the grey sweatpants and shirt, black, bold letters spelling out Baltimore PD down the side and on the breast. He looked up at Detective Ballard with a skeptic brow.

"Your clothes are evidence. Forensics will collect them when we turn you over to County."

Dean dropped the sweats onto the cot beside him, not quite caring to follow orders, here. His head was pounding thanks to the non-business end of a gun meeting his friggin' skull, courtesy of Baltimore P.D.'s dirtiest cop. Whose partner was now standing on the other side of the jail cell, looking at Dean like he was the scum of the earth. Murderous scum of the earth.

"And when exactly will that be?"

Maybe Sam and Andy could spring him in the transfer. Considering the front of him was covered, thighs to neck, in Karen Giles' blood, Dean was guessing his odds of getting out of this one any better than he had the first time were significantly decreased. Forget Detective Peter Sheridan escorting his ass out into the woods for a two am private execution. He wouldn't have to lift a finger this time; Dean would just go straight to federal prison.

Do not pass Go, do not collect 200 ways to avert the Apocalypse.

"Well, we've got some questions we'd like to ask you," Ballard – she hadn't given him a first name and he didn't remember it – leaned against the cinder block wall beside the bars of his current cage, crossing her arms in the classic female powerhouse pose. Dean swore every female cop had that stance down pat. Of course, no one quite wore it like Jody Mills, but this detective sure tried. "After that, you'll be formally charged and handed over for processing."

"For the murder of Karen Giles." Dean didn't bother keeping the incredulity and sarcasm out of his voice.

Detective Ballard raised an eyebrow at him in return. "Well, you are covered in her blood."

"Right." Dean looked down at his shirt and the still damp, tacky blood clinging it to his skin. He blocked out the image of Karen, staring up at him with terrified eyes, blood spurting past her desperate hands. Instead he picked at the ruined cotton, shooting the woman a harsh look. "Cuz this looks just like arterial spray. And not like your partner rolled me in her blood after he slit her throat!"

If he thought the detective's eyes were cold before, he'd been wrong. Now they were downright frigid. She pushed off the wall, partly in what he imagined was shock, and partly in defense. But then, she'd been sleeping with that asshole last time, hadn't she?

"That's one hell of an accusation," she bit out, fire on her tongue to chase the ice in her eyes. "Especially coming from the man caught standing literally red-handed over her body."

"Under it."

Detective Ballard blinked at the low growl. "What?"

"He told you I was standing over the body, huh? I was holding her. He slit her throat and I caught her." Dean turned his body half away from her, gesturing to his thighs and the unnaturally neat line of blood-to-no-blood. "What, crime-scene photos didn't show this fine, ass-shaped hole in your blood pool? How about a gap the size of an unconscious body, then, because you're partner clocked the hell out of me while Karen was alive and bleeding out in my arms, lady."

Ballard stared at him, and her eyes might be cold, but Dean could see the logic getting through. Not enough, of course. No, he was accusing a cop of murder. Accusing her of not knowing her own lover was a cold-blooded killer. But he remembered liking her, thinking she had some brains under the uniform, at least for a cop.

The laugh she let out was short and bitter and disbelieving. "You're really something. You don't know what you're talking about."

"No?" Dean pushed his luck, approaching the bars. The detective stood her ground, but he could tell by the way her arms tensed that she was ready to back away if he proved violent. He leaned against them, bracing his forearms on the crossbar so he could bend at the waist and make it seem natural. Get himself more to her height than the looming foot he had on her. "How about a crap ton of drugs missing from your lockup. That sound familiar? What was that, a year ago now?"

The detective reared back, though her feet never moved. Dean saw the confusion, the first flicker of doubt that went beyond what little evidence he had for her while locked up in a jail cell. He gripped the bars, planning on taking that seed and getting the damn thing to sprout before he ended up dead in some back country woods or rotting in a state penitentiary.

"Your partner-"

"Get your ass away from the bars!"

A loud slap of a manila folder against the wall broke the growing tension in the room as Peter Sheridan stepped into view. Detective Ballard backed off, a deep breath shaking free any doubt Dean had gotten going. The hunter leaned back, wrists still on the crossbar but now taking full advantage of his height. He eyed his framer with derisive challenge clear in his green gaze.

"You okay, Diana?" Peter walked over to his partner, back turned to Dean, body language over bearing in its protective stance. Too obvious. A blatant show. It made Dean want to roll his eyes as the far shorter detective had to tilt her chin up. She seemed oblivious to the physical manipulation as she shared a shaky smile with him.

'Gag me,' Dean thought, looking away as the two shared a quiet word.

"You must think you're pretty tough shit, huh?" Oh, the detective was apparently talking to him now. Dean was sure to put every ounce of his 'shaking-in-my-cowboy-boots' fear into the dangerously blank and knowing glare he leveled at the man. Peter Sheridan was too stupid to be wary of it. "Put the sweats on and your clothes in the evidence bag, or we'll make you. You have five minutes before we haul your ass into interrogation, naked if we have."

"Oh," Dean leaned forward, pressing his face to the bars as Peter grabbed Diana by the elbow and the two detectives started back down the hall, ignoring their prisoner. "I'd love to see you try, pal!"

The hunter growled as the officers disappeared, soon replaced by the one obviously slapped with guard duty. He was a beast of a man – Dean hadn't even known they made uniforms in Hulk size – who stationed himself just to the side of the bars. His hand settled atop his gun holster none-too-subtly and he had the kind of look about him that suggested Dean do what he was told before the B.U.G (Big Unfriendly Giant) here actually did try to make him.

Dean sighed, crossing over to the pair of sweats and picking at his bloody, ruined clothes. He scooped up the sweatshirt, staring at the Baltimore PD shield stamped across the breast. Well, he'd sure stepped in it this time. Andy and Sam had better be thinking something up, and quickly. Time was never on their side, but in this case particularly, they'd have just about forty-eight hours to figure something out. If Peter Sheridan waited that long.

-o-o-o-

The interrogation room was cold, the chair was hard, the cuffs bit into his skin, and the stupid sweats itched. Dean glared at the two detectives across the table from him, Ballard seated and Sheridan leaning over her. He looked like he was ready to mansplain some serious bullshit. Dean couldn't wait.

Diana pulled a sheet of paper out of the manila folder Sheridan had had back in the holding area and slid it towards him. He stopped its movement with his hands best he could, chained to the table as he was. When he looked down at it, Dean found a pretty good sketch of himself and Sam staring back.

"Sacramento PD just faxed us that. Look familiar?"

Damn. Meg and the diner. There hadn't been cameras, but there'd been plenty of witnesses to remember their faces, to see them rescue Meg Masters. Only, at gun point, it sure hadn't looked like a rescue to any of the decent folk that had tried to stop them that day. And if they took his prints before throwing him in lockup, then Sacramento would have popped up as soon as they ran them, even if the cops there didn't have names to put to the evidence.

"That would make you Dean, I assume," she added, nodding at the paper and the names, first only, beneath each sketch.

"Good looking guy," Dean replied with a smirk, flicking the paper back her way. It spun almost three-sixty before she put a stop to it with a firm palm. He shrugged. "Uncanny resemblance. Can't say I recognize 'em, though."

Detective Sheridan rolled his eyes with a sneer, but Ballard let his attitude slide right over and off her.

"You got a last name, Dean?"

"Sure do."

Both detectives let the silence stretch, but Dean didn't elaborate further and the male detective shook his head.

"This is pointless," he muttered. "You can play this game all you want, but we got you on murder."

"No, what you got is me in a house where a woman was murdered. By you."

Both officers ignored him. Instead, Diana laid out the facts, her cold, stoic expression not giving away an inch of the doubt Dean knew he'd seen in her eyes earlier. She was pretty good for a cop. He remembered sending her to Sam, after the kid managed an escape. At least they wouldn't have to deal with that this time. They had nothing to grab Sam on; no last name, no location, nothing. Hell, these guys didn't even know he had a brother. At this point, all they had was a sketch of a one-time partner, who may not even still be in the picture.

At least Time had given them that much. One tiny little positive in their usual shit-storm of worse-worse-worse. That was Time for ya. The giving type.

And it was a shit-storm. They had the murder weapon, literally in his hand, for starters.

"Yeah, because you planted it there, you asshat."

Karen Giles' blood all over him.

"Clothes were spic-n-span before you clocked me with your Sig Saur."

And he'd been in the Giles' home to begin with, patio doors damn near taken off the hinges. Even if he could make Diana – or anyone, for that matter – believe him about the piece of dirt standing across from him, he couldn't deny that he had been in the house of a grieving widow who just so happened to turn up dead after he'd kicked two doors in to get to her.

"Look, I was invited, alright?" Dean rubbed at the corner of his eye. He'd scrubbed the dried blood off his face pretty vigorously back in the cell, but it still felt like it was there. "I was working with Tony when he died."

That seemed to surprise the two detectives, and they shared a glance.

"Working how?" Diana folded her hands atop the metal table.

"I'm a private investigator." Dean made sure to keep his voice even, which for him usually sounded bored. That worked too. He offered Diana a tight smile before shifting his gaze to her partner. "He hired me, to look into this bastard, right here."

Peter just scoffed, shaking his head as he pushed off the table, straightening up. "Unbelievable. Tony Giles was a friend of mine, you son of a bitch. And you murdered him and his wife. In cold blood. I'm not going to let you sit here and spin your little delusions of murder and psychopathy on me."

"You know, I've done a lot of shit in my life, but I think I'm the kettle in this scenario, pal."

The detective took a challenging step forward, looking like he was half a step away from hauling his suspect out of the chair and making his point a more physical one. Dean vaguely remembered him doing that once before. Certainly wouldn't put it past him for a repeat performance.

"If you're a PI, where's your work?" Diana's eyes were pinned on him, ignoring her temperamental partner for the moment. Dean slowly dropped his gaze back to her. "Photos? Notes? Anything to prove you are what you say you are. How about a last name, for starters."

The hunter leaned back in his chair. "I give you any of that, what's to say it doesn't disappear, same as those drugs?"

Detective Sheridan's left eye twitched, and Dean watched his hand ball into a fist, hidden from his partner by the width of his body. Guy had a pretty crappy poker face. It was a wonder he'd lasted this long without getting caught.

"If you thought I was in on it, you wouldn't have told me back in holding."

Dean's gaze snapped back to the woman. Damn, she really was good. For a cop. He smiled and sat up, putting his cuffed hands on the table almost conversationally. "Then send your partner out of here, and we can really talk."

Sheridan slammed his palm down on the table between them. Diana jumped, but Dean didn't move a muscle. He just shifted those dangerous green eyes up to the man he sure hoped would die the same pathetic death this time around. The detective's veins throbbed with how hard he was clenching his jaw.

The plus side? Dean's Yeah-That's-Right-I'm-A-Scary-Ass-Mother-Fucker-You-Sorry-S-O-B glare was definitely getting to Sheridan. And he knew he was starting to get to Ballard, too. The downside? That same glare was not doing him any favors in the not-coming-across-as-a-murderous-psychopath department. But one problem at a time, damnit.

"Enough!" Pete spat through gritted teeth. "This isn't a game, asshole, and I'm done with your wise-ass remarks. If you're really a PI, why don't you tell us why your prints were found at over a dozen unsolved crimes."

Dean raised a sarcastic brow. "Uh, I'm a PI. I look into crime scenes, buddy."

"Yeah?" Sheridan spread both hands on the table, leaning towards Dean. The hunter didn't resist the urge to lean the hell away from the fool. "Well that's some sloppy investigative work, if you ask me. Why exactly did Anthony hire you, an apparent expert in grave desecration, breaking and entering, and oh, yeah, this one really got me: kidnapping."

Okay, so the kidnapping charge wasn't going to be the easiest to explain. Technically, they had rescued Meg Masters from the actual demonic kidnapper. Not that either of these two were going to believe him, even if he used the redacted version. Probably best to stick with being an incorrigible ass.

"You missed that whole 'pot calling the kettle black' comment a minute ago, didn't you?"

This time the detective did surge forward, grabbing Dean by fistfuls of sweatshirt and hauling him, and most of his shirt, up and out of the chair. The hunter internally winced at the sharp pull of the cuffs, chained to the table and digging into his skin. But he didn't let it show, too busy giving Pete Sheridan the smuggest, tight-lipped, I-am-Dean-Winchester-and-you-will-not-out-asshole-me smirk.

"Pete!" Diana was on her feet, hands on the table and that fierce gaze locked on her partner, who stood still at her bark. "That is enough!"

Dean waggled his eyebrows at the man, but Sheridan just sneered and shoved the hunter roughly back into the chair. He grunted, hands spread as far as he could for balance, and managed not to topple onto the floor.

"Jeez, anger management much?"

"Let's go." Diana sent a withering look Dean's way, following it with one slightly less, but far more expectant, look at her partner. Dean raised his cuffed hands, the picture of innocence. Sheridan curled his lip but ultimately stalked out the door, Ballard following.

-o-o-o-

Pete slammed his palm into the hallway wall as they left interrogation behind. A passing officer gave the detective a wide berth, and Diana caught his high eyebrows as he passed. Knowing better than to grab her partner when he was like this, she took off down the hall, leaving Pete to follow. He did, with a huff, until they were around another corner, in a lower-traffic area near the vending machines.

"You cannot lose it like that in there," she admonished the moment they were alone, keeping her voice low. "You'll blow this case and he'll walk out of here on a technicality!"

"I know," Pete snarled, but reigned in his temper almost immediately. It simmered just beneath the surface of his skin, though, as he leveled a calmer but still dangerous look her way. "What about you? You weren't exactly jumping to my defense back there. Tell me you're not buying his crap, Diana."

She paused, brow furled in a thoughtful moue, and her partner darkened considerably.

"You think I murdered Karen and Tony?"

"Of course not." Diana all but rolled her eyes, tilting her head to the side and staring up at him expectantly. "I know they were your friends."

"Good friends," Pete emphasized, but backed off. He leaned against the vending machine, plastic surface warm from the bright lights of the interior.

"Look, I know you want to clean this mess up quick, but you've got to admit some things aren't lining up," Diana continued, mirroring her partner's position against the appliance. "There's something off about this guy, for sure, but he's not wrong about the blood, Pete, or the crime scene photos. And where's the motive?"

"Diana, he's a con-man! You can't tell me you believe a word he said back there."

The female detective shrugged, because, honestly, his words were niggling at her brain. Particularly the bit about their missing heroin. They never had caught the cop that did it. But how did this Dean guy even know about it? "What if there was another person at the scene? What if he's not wrong, and he's just got the wrong guy framing him. Tony knew a lot of criminal types."

"You've got to be kidding me," Peter muttered, tilting his head until he could pinch at the bridge of his nose with an arm propped up on the vending machine. "He was a defense lawyer, for God's sake.
Of course he knew criminal types."

She could see him trying to keep a lid on his anger, and felt guilty for riling him up. Diana knew he struggled with his temper, but she didn't think she was wrong for asking the questions.

"Why were you at the house, Pete?"

He picked his head up, and she saw when his surprise at the question turned tempestuous. His face retreated to that deadly calm, eyes halflidded. That was usually when he started hitting suspects. Not that he'd ever hurt her, she was sure. Well, fairly sure. Sometimes his temper really was perturbing.

"You read my report. I went to check on Karen, make sure she was doing alright." His expression never shifted, and it settled uneasily in her stomach to see him address her like he would one of the criminals in interrogation. "I heard her scream, Diana, and there was a struggle upstairs. She was already gone by the time I got up there, but that scumbag locked up in interrogation was standing over her, knife in hand."

Peter had gotten his gun on him, but the guy charged. There was a struggle – one that wrecked the scene and scrambled the hell out of their blood evidence – but Pete had gotten the best of the man and taken him down.

At least, that's what was in the report. But this Dean character wasn't making up the void in the blood pool – what hadn't been smudged and spread in the struggle – or the clear line on his pants, suggesting he'd been on the ground before the blood reached him, leaving the back of his thighs clean. It didn't make sense with Pete's story, and that was worrying her.

If he'd give them his last name, an ability to prove his story, then maybe they could get to the real killer. Or at least the real truth, if Dean was their murderer.

"Come on, Diana. Don't let this guy get to you."

She sighed, dropping her head with a little shake.

"Of course," she answered, because her partner wasn't wrong, either. There was definitely something dirty about this Dean fellow, that much she was sure of. And the rest, well…

Pete stepped into her space with a gentleness to him that hadn't been there moments ago. He tugged at the corner of her blazer, a secretive smile on his lips that she couldn't help but mirror. "Look, we'll keep leaning on him; he's bound to tumble eventually. I'm telling you, this Dean guy is our guy."

He reached up, running this thumb along the bottom of her chin and Diana smiled wider, leaning into the touch. They didn't get to steal moments like this often, not on the job. A door at the end of the hallway to their left opened, and the two stepped apart as a party of three men came into view.

Peter eyed them – two officers and a suspect being escorted to interrogation – and nodded their way. He turned his eyes back to his lover. "You know what? Let Dean stew for a bit. Maybe we'll have better luck with the other one."

Diana turned her head to look at the man being led past. He was tall, a lot taller than Dean, with longer hair and softer eyes. He matched the artist's sketch of the second kidnapper in Sacramento almost to a tee.

He must be their Sam, then. And, if Diana was a betting gal, their missing killer.

-o-o-o-

It was a good thing Diana was not a betting gal.

The timelines didn't fit. Yet another level of complexity on this already bizarre, enigma of a case. Diana sat across from the equally mysterious Sam, report in hand from the forensics teams at both the Giles' house and office. Sam and an unidentified man had been seen entering Anthony Giles' office around eight pm. Karen Giles called 911 at 9:46pm, and Detective Peter Sheridan had been found by responding officers at the residence at 10:03pm. He immediately re-dispatched those officers to Anthony Giles' office on information he'd overheard from their murder suspect, talking to a partner on his cell. They found and arrested Sam at the office 10:28pm.

Which was another thing that wasn't lining up. Between finding their suspect armed with a knife, standing over Karen Giles' body and engaging him in hand-to-hand, when exactly had Pete overheard this phone call? It wasn't particularly clear in his report, stating it had been before he'd heard Karen scream, as he approached the house on foot from the driveway.

Diana's growing theory of another perp on scene was making more and more sense to her. Problem was, what had caused Pete to mistake two men for one?

Yet another issue was why the officers had left the Giles' residence in the first place. SOP was to secure the crime scene. Another unit could have been called to investigate the Giles' office. But Pete had been insistent, they'd said. They would get there faster than any of the other units, and if they wanted to catch the partner, every second counted.

He wasn't wrong, but… they had standard procedure for a reason. One of which was to keep this kind of confusion and muddled evidence from happening. Had those officers stayed, there would have been two other witness accounts to back Pete's claims.

Which, Diana uncomfortably sidelined for further thought later, really wasn't helping her partner's story right now.

But back to the man sitting in front of her, stewing over a cup of coffee she'd brought him, staring at the table top with a morose and frustrated glare. Sam, who also refused to give a last name and insisted he was a PI, could not have killed Karen Giles. Although it was possible for him to have done the deed and returned to the office in the thirty minutes between Karen Giles' likely time of death and the responding officers arriving on scene at Tony's office, it would have been cutting it damn close. Add to it that Sam had no blood evidence on him, no car found at the scene, and no car keys, it was unlikely he was their killer. None of the six local taxi companies they'd called had dropped anyone off within a three block radius of Giles' office within their time range, either.

It was looking more and more like Sam hadn't left Anthony Giles' office since he'd first been seen going in. They still had him on breaking and entering, of course. Cops caught him red-handed at Tony's computer, an unregistered firearm on his persons, a picture of Tony and Karen in Paris taken from a bookshelf and placed beside him on the desk, and a cell phone with one recent call, the outgoing number a match to Dean's. So, Sam might not be their murderer, but he was still a criminal.

Or, as he insisted, a PI. A PI with a key to the office that Karen had given him (found on his persons at his time of arrest), a story about Karen requesting he grab the photo of her and her husband (which they could not disprove, given Karen's untimely demise), files from Tony's personal notes open on the desktop("Karen gave me the password, alright? She knew we were working with her husband, and he hadn't given us all his notes. He was playing this one close to the chest."), and a rather convincing act of perfectly balanced innocence and guilt as he told Diana that breaking into a crime scene was wrong, granted, but it wasn't like they had time to wait for the cops to clear it.

Right. Because he and Dean were on a case they refused to give the specifics of, under a deadline they wouldn't share. ("If Dean didn't tell you the details, he had a good reason for it.") He put the perfect amount of vagueness in each of his explanations and excuses. Not exactly convincing, but damn difficult to disprove.

However, the report did shed light on a third partner. Because that's what this case needed: more suspects. An unidentified man – average height, bit scraggly and a sloucher, with dark brown or black hair – was seen by an eye-witness entering the office with Sam. He had not been there upon the cops' arrival.

So, Diana was back on the possibility that Dean was telling the truth, he hadn't been the killer because there had been a third man. She wasn't sure yet if Dean had simply gotten confused; he had taken a blow to the head, after all, though Pete swore paramedics had cleared him, despite the lack of paperwork for it. She supposed it was more than possible that Dean had gone down an innocent man, only to wake up covered in blood and blame the detective, the only other person he'd seen in the house, for framing him. It was also possible, she kept in mind, that Dean was a criminal and a con-artist, in on the murder committed by this third partner, and playing the police by pointing his finger at Peter Sheridan.

She sure didn't trust him, after all. Either of them. But Diana was also determined to see the guilty party be brought to justice, and she wasn't convinced that was Dean.

"We ran Dean's fingerprints through AFIS," she began again, deciding to switch it up. Sam had seemed genuinely surprised when she'd told him they had his partner on murder. As if they hadn't both tried to kidnap a girl in Sacramento, California. As if the Dean he knew wasn't capable of murder.

Or, he was just that good of an actor.

"Okay," the kid answered, glancing up at her with that same combination of impatience and anxiety. If it was an act, it was a good one.

"Got over a dozen possible hits."

Sam sat more upright in his chair, which he'd spun around before sitting down, leaning over the back of it. "Possible hits. Which makes them worthless."

Which he would know, as a PI. He'd also know that, either way, the Baltimore PD could hold them for forty-eight hours without formal charges.

"But it makes you wonder," she offered almost off-handedly, a little tilt of her head, a little shrug of her shoulder, a sly look that should make the kid even more nervous. "What are we gonna find when we run your prints?"

Sam's smile was bitter. Humorless. He knocked his fist on the table, knuckles rapping at the metal surface sarcastically. "Yeah, well, you be sure to let me know."

Neither his anxiety nor his anger ratcheted up in even the slightest imbalance. He was perfectly both. Diana's eyes narrowed at him, more convinced than ever that this was an act, albeit a good one. She leaned back in her chair and crossed her arms lightly. Time to bring in her wild card, then.

"We have enough to charge Dean for murder. His life could be over." Sam's face twitched, and the scales tipped more heavily towards anxiety. Interesting. She wondered if there was more than partnership going on here. The two could easily pass as brothers, their looks similar enough. Maybe this was a family matter. She leaned forward, placing steepled hands on the tabletop. "Yours doesn't have to be. Breaking and entering? We can get that charge reduced if you help our investigation."

"You want me to turn against my own partner?"

The incredulous look in his eye told her he never would.

"No," Diana answered honestly. "We've got him red-handed at Karen Giles' murder scene. We just need you to fill in some missing pieces."

Sam was silent, chewing on his thoughts as much as he was chewing on his cheek. He tapped a finger against the table, once, twice, three times before he abruptly pulled his hand back and straightened again. "You said, 'could.'"

Diana blinked, feigning confusion. "I'm sorry?"

The kid stared right at her, and she found the look unnerving, though she didn't let an ounce of her discomfort show. "You said Dean's life could be over."

She shrugged. "It could be. Maryland takes a double murder seriously; the death penalty is a possibility here."

"Double murder. A minute ago it was only one murder."

"Karen and Anthony were likely killed by the same person. Same MO."

"Really. Well, then you've got the wrong guy." Sam shook his head, that bitter smile back on his lips. "Dean and I weren't even in town for Tony's death. But let's go back to that 'could.' Because that's not what cops say when they have someone red-handed."

She bit back the smile as he took the bait. Instead, she fiddled with the corner of the file containing both crime scene reports. Again, she shrugged one shoulder. "There are some holes in your partner's case. Perhaps enough for reasonable doubt."

"What kind of holes?"

Diana met his gaze, and neither of them blinked. "The possible-second-person-at-the-scene kind."

Sam's eyes widened before he quickly covered the reaction, expression narrowing as he thought furiously. Diana let him, for a moment, before she pulled out the police sketch of the two of them from Sacramento out of the folder. She slid it towards him, following it up with the witness statement from Giles' office.

"A second man was seen entering Tony's office with you. His description doesn't match Dean's." The kid's eyes tracked over the drawing, but it was the witness statement he picked up. Not surprised by the police sketch, then, and more concerned by their mystery man. Diana hoped it was a sign that turning Sam against this third wheel would be easier than turning on his partner. "You have another associate, and he wasn't there when you were arrested. Where'd he go, Sam? Back to Karen Giles' house?"

Sam's fingers tightened on the edge of the paper, almost imperceptibly, before he released the document and straightened off the chair back again, conveniently moving his hands out of sight so she couldn't pick up on any further giveaways. Oh, he was good.

"There was no third person." He raised a steady finger to flick the paper back her way, so like her partner that Diana again wondered about the possible fraternal connection. His facial expression shut down, cold and blank as a wall of ice, and she knew she'd lost him. "My partner and I work alone."

-o-o-o-

Diana sighed as she settled her hip against the edge of the desk. Pete was watching the surveillance tape of Dean's room, despite the man being visible through the one-sided mirror just to their left. He turned from the monitor to offer a sympathetic smile at her exhausted countenance.

"You get anything from the other one?"

"Sam's story matches Dean's, down to the last detail." She shook her head, sure they were being played, but unsure how the hell the two of them were pulling it off. Diana crossed her arms, then raised one to pinch at the inner corner of her eyes and drag her fingers to the bridge of her nose. She needed a good night's sleep to think on this messed up case, but they weren't going to get a break anytime soon. They had only forty-eight hours to figure this out before they'd have to submit what evidence they had and press formal charges.

They had Dean red-handed, sure, but there was still a lot of wiggle room for a good attorney to get him off before he ever saw the inside of a courtroom.

A knock on the door interrupted her morose musing, and both she and Pete looked up as a junior officer stuck his head into the surveillance room.

"His lawyer's here." The man nodded towards Dean's slouched form through the mirror. Their suspect hadn't moved since they left him, instead hunkering down in the chair. He was tapping something out on the table top, fingers occasionally tracing letters they couldn't read, and his lips moved silently. Sheridan had been trying to figure out what he was muttering for the half hour Diana had been with the other one.

Her partner picked his head up and away from the small screen as the officer's words registered. Pete frowned over at Diana. "You let him make a phone call?"

Legally, they were obligated too, but it wouldn't be the first time they'd told a suspect otherwise. But Dean hadn't asked for one while in interrogation, so he must have when Diana was alone with him in Holding.

Diana was shaking her head, though, expression as surprised as his. "He never asked."

Pete unhooked his arms from behind his head to look at his watch, and then at the officer. "You're telling me a public defender showed up, out of the blue, at six in the morning?"

The guy just shrugged. "Don't think he's pro-bono, Boss. Guy said he was here for Dean Winchester."

Both detectives sat upright, shock overtaking their features.

"Wait, Winchester?!"

-o-o-o-

Dean was halfway through his mental list of acronyms for Dana Shulps, when there was a knock on the door to his room. He paused, busy trying to keep track of the growing list in his head and unsure if he just hadn't hit the right word yet or he didn't remember it well enough for déjà vu or memory to kick in.

Cops didn't knock on their own interrogation rooms.

An officer opened the door. It was one Dean hadn't seen before, and he gave the guy a skeptical look before going back to the anagram. The feeling appeared to be mutual as the cop indolently said, "Your lawyer's here."

Dean didn't even look up, remembering some pretty useless public defenders during his last couple go-arounds with the law. At least now he could ask for a pen and paper. The officer closed the door once more as his supposed saving grace walked over to the table.

A briefcase was set down before a very familiar voice said, "Mr. Winchester."

Dean's head snapped up to find Andy Gallagher standing across the table, dressed in his ill-fitting suit, a briefcase from God-knows-where in hand and-

"Is that a fake mustache?" the hunter hissed, leaning forward against the table to gape at the fuzzy caterpillar perched on Andy's upper lip. It didn't quite look glued on, but it also wasn't even, either. And it didn't remotely match his brown mop of hair.

Andy pulled out the chair opposite Dean and slid into it with a reproachful scrunch to his face. "I'm a wanted man, remember? I can't just waltz into a police station without a disguise."

Dean stared at him. Then he stared some more. "And you thought this was better?"

The kid shot him another look, but opened up his briefcase and pulled out a legal pad and a pen. "Now, Mr. Winchester," he said, deepening his voice in an attempt (a terrible, terrible attempt) to sound serious. "Let's discuss your case."

The older hunter narrowed his eyes into one hell of a glare, but leaned back in the chair, stuck with this, apparently. At least Andy could get him out of here if things got dicey. "Don't use my name, they haven't figured out who I am yet."

"Wait, really?" The look on the kid's face alone was a dead giveaway that that cat was well out of the bag. Dean physically growled, and Andy at least had the sense to sort of shrink away. "Uh…oops."

"Are you kidding me right now?"

"How was I supposed to know!" Andy threw back at him. "I couldn't just walk up to the front desk and ask to see the dude who murdered that nice lady and her lawyer husband."

Dean growled again.

"Not that you murdered her," Andy was fast to say. He pulled out a thin file from the briefcase. "Look, they wouldn't give me anything until I said I was your lawyer, so…" He shrugged, opening the folder and pulling out the details of the case the police must have provided him. "Good news is, they ran your prints and got nothing. Well, I mean, they got a lot of stuff they can't use-"

"You've studied law, now?"

"Uh…and Order." Andy offered him a grin that made Dean really, really want to hurt him. "Twenty seasons, four hundred and fifty six episodes. Hours of educational entertainment. I'm a tv-certified professional."

Dean went back to staring. "Oh great. I'm saved."

Andy rolled his eyes, spreading his hand atop the file and finally glaring at the unappreciative guy sitting across from him. "Hey, you could be grateful, you know. I could have left you here and ran."

The hunter finally let up on his glare, though he couldn't help one last parting quip. "Not likely, kid. There's no prison on earth that could keep me from hunting you down and strangling you to death for stealing my car." He leaned forward against the table again, mouth like a shark, and was pleased as punch when Andy physically leaned away. "And you know it."

"Okay, I did know that," the kid answered way too quickly, one finger raised in his defense, "but that's not the only reason I'm here." Dean's unimpressed brow was enough for him to fidget. "And I didn't steal her. Sam gave me the keys!"

"Where is Sam? He get into the guy's files?" Dean switched gears, deciding to give the kid a break. He was here, after all, and hadn't been wrong. While unlikely that a Baltimore police precinct would be on the open lookout for a small time murderer from Oklahoma, coming here had still been a risk and, more than that, took guts. Dean was grateful. He just wasn't gonna hand it over that easy. The man had a reputation to keep, after all.

"Uh…" At Andy's hesitation, the hunter's expression darkened. Then the kid's brief, fifteen second reprieve of Dean's ire was over a lot faster than he'd hoped. Fast enough, actually, that he never even realized he'd been on the receiving end of a reprieve at all, let alone had time to hope for a longer one. "Yeah, about that…"

-o-o-o-

Sam was pacing the room they'd holed in up in when Detective Diana Ballard entered the for the second time since they'd brought him in for questioning. They'd removed his cuffs when he'd first come in, the female detective even offering him a drink while she played good cop. Apparently, breaking and entering wasn't cause for concern over Detective Ballard's safety. Not that Sam would ever hurt her, but the leniency would be her mistake when Sam decided how to get him and his brother out of this. He rubbed at his wrists bitterly, like he could still feel the cold metal there, despite the fact it had been at least an hour since they'd been removed.

"So." Detective Ballard smiled at him as she slid into the chair, setting a file down on the table between them. Sam immediately knew something was different. That sure wasn't the good-cop smile she'd used on him the first time. "Sam Winchester."

The young hunter managed to bury his reaction, though it was a close thing. He couldn't do much against the paling of his skin or the reflexive swallow, but he'd spent his entire life lying, and lying to cops more often than not.

"Surprised?" The detective's smile grew tight before she looked down at the file. "Once Dean started talking, drawing the dots wasn't so hard. We know all about you, Sam. Twenty three years old, no job, no home address. Your mother died when you were a baby, your father's whereabouts are unknown. And then there's the case of your brother, Dean."

Sam bit at the inside of his cheek to keep the defensive look off his face. He wasn't entirely successful, so he leaned against the back wall, crossing his arms defensively and keeping his mouth sealed shut. He focused, instead, on the sharp gut instinct that told him she was lying her ass off right now. No way his brother would ever talk to a cop willingly, even the one from ten years in the future.

"Feeling shy, now? No problem. I'll keep going." Detective Ballard stood from the chair, file in hand, and started a slow pace of the far side of the room. "Your family moved around a lot when you were a kid. Despite that, you were a straight-A student. Got into Stanford on a full ride."

She closed the file, staring at it for another moment before tucking it and her hands behind her as she turned to regard her prisoner. "Then about a year ago, you were in Boston with your girlfriend, Jessica Moore. There was a home invasion. Her father, Frank, was stabbed with a knife. You, and your brother, were both there. And that's where the details get a little sketchy."

Ballard tossed the folder onto the table, the thing open. It showed the police report they'd had to file at the hospital. It included pictures of the wound post-surgery. Sam turned away from it. The detective braced both hands on either side of the folder, a cynical smile on her lips. "You went off grid. Left everything, including your girlfriend, behind."

Cold brown eyes snapped up to hers, and the look he leveled her way was almost petulant. The tone certainly was. "I needed some time off. To deal. Jess and I broke up. She was going through some stuff, and what happened to her dad…" Sam looked down, and he didn't have to fake the regret that crossed his face and silenced his words. He looked back up. "So, I'm helping my brother with his PI gig."

The Detective's look was blandly skeptical. "How's that going for you?"

Sam shrugged one shoulder. "It's not exactly a break, but…it keeps my mind off things."

"I'll bet." She set her hand, fingers spread out, atop the folder and tapped it. "Grave desecration and B&Es will do that for a guy."

Sam bristled at the accusations. Not that the information was incorrect, but the intent behind them sure as hell was. But he stayed quiet, knowing that was his best, and safest, bet. This was building into a real mess. They had Dean on murder, him on breaking and entering, and Sam had no clue how they were going to get themselves out of this one.

Hopefully, Andy had kept himself from getting arrested. Maybe he could do something with his powers to get them out of there.

-o-o-o-

"You don't want me to get you out of here?" Andy's voice was incredulous, eyes wide as he stared at Dean, who was busy scribbling something out on the paper he'd stolen from Andy almost the second the kid had put it on the table. "Are you crazy?"

"We got out of this without you just fine last time," Dean countered, inserting a touch of annoyance at their resident Jedi. He and Sam were capable on their own, they didn't need fancy powers, thank you very much.

"Last time." Andy blinked. "This happened last time? And you didn't think, 'gee, maybe I should warn them I'm about to get arrested'!?'"

Dean spared him an annoyed glance, but it wasn't enough to stop the kid from leaning forward, eyes and tone disbelieving as he realized the answer to his own question.

"How do you not remember getting arrested?!" Andy shook his head, leaning back in his chair so he could throw out his arms in disbelief. "Do you, like, smoke more weed than I do, man? Because your memory sucks."

"Shut up," the older hunter hissed, leveling a more intense glare Andy's way. "You tell me what you did ten years ago down to the day and then we'll talk."

"Well I sure wasn't getting arrested! Know how I know? I'd remember that!"

Dean set the pen down before he was tempted to chuck it at the kid who was still going to get him out of here, even if it wasn't with Jedi powers. "Lay off, kid. It's not like it was the first time."

Andy facepalmed, elbow on the table, and groaned into his hand. "Tell me again why I didn't leave you here and run for my life? I could be in Jamaica right now."

"I'd find you and murder you."

"Right." Andy sighed, dropping his hand from his face, muttering as he did. "Not like I could drive your precious car to Jamaica, stupid." He cleared his throat and spoke up, ignoring the unamused look Dean sent his way. "So what do you want me to do?"

Dean ripped the piece of paper he'd been scribbling on off the pad and folded it in half. He handed it over, pressed between two fingers. "Get in to see Sam, give this to him. And then create a distraction in ten minutes."

"A distraction." Andy took the paper, tempted to look inside but deciding he'd pushed enough boundaries for the day.

The hunter shrugged. "Yell fire, flip some lady's skirt up, start a food fight. Whatever, man. Just cause a commotion and get out of here."

Andy raised an eyebrow, tucking the paper, which no doubt now had some sort of escape instructions, into his briefcase. "Oookay. And you want me to get Sam out and not both of you because…?"

"Because over a dozen cops saw me arrested. Sam too, probably. You don't know who all those guys are, and unless you can make some sort of blanket announcement that everyone will listen to, and also wipe a mile's worth of paperwork, that's too many loose ends, kid."

Andy scrunched his mouth to the side, considering that. He hadn't really worried about much more than telling the officers to let Sam and Dean go, then walk out of here with them. But Dean sort of had a point. He had no idea what would happen when the cops he didn't influence showed up, asking where their suspects were. Or how that would work with the paperwork the precinct surely filed concerning the Winchesters' arrests.

Still. Staying to possibly be charged with murder and transferred to county lock-up seemed a lot riskier than some incomplete paperwork and a couple cops with questions no one could answer.

"Trust me." Dean handed him the legal pad and pen back. "That kind of mess with a double murder suspect? They'll call in the Feds. We don't want that complication. I got out of this just fine last time. Besides, we're supposed to be sticking to the timeline, remember?"

Andy snorted, because sure, he remembered (not that he knew much about that timeline, or had even really wrapped his mind around that whole can of worms just yet), but Dean never seemed to until it was convenient to his argument. He tossed the legal pad and pen back into the briefcase, but paused as he stared at the pen, which had sort of come apart on the single bounce. Come apart, because pieces of it were clearly missing that had not been missing before he handed it to his 'client.'

"Alright, whatever you say, oh Captain, my Captain." He shook his head, figuring that Dean, of all people, could probably pick handcuffs with a damn toothpick in the middle of a jungle if he had to. From what Andy had seen of the brothers so far, they made MacGuyver look like a rookie. He shut the briefcase and stood. "One distraction coming up in ten minutes."

"Ten minutes," Dean confirmed, a light smirk in the corner of his mouth.

Andy left the room, nervously drilling his fingers on the side of the briefcase as he passed the cop stationed outside of the interrogation room. The guy just nodded to him, though, and Andy reminded himself he could control people with his voice, for Pete's sake. He didn't have anything to be worried about. Except drawing the attention of every single cop in the station because he had to be the distraction.

Well, wait a minute, now. He didn't have to be the distraction. He just had to make one. Dean's words about a food fight got Andy's gears turning, and he looked around at the slowly populating precinct. He might not have access to food, per say, but there were other ways to start a fight. Seven in the morning sure wasn't prime arrest time, but he saw a couple drunk and disorderly's sitting on a bench, miserably awaiting the next step in the judicial process.

They sure looked like food enough to Andy.

Chapter End Notes

A/Ns: Guys head, meet desk, with an added thunk for emphasis we're two (looong) chapters into this episode thunk and we're not even to the good stuff yet thunk thunk thunk Why do I do this to myself?!

I actually stopped multiple times during this and asked 'do you really need to write this episode? Is it even important?!' and the muse said 'Yes, Andy is wearing a fake mustache. It is important.' Lo and Behold, the muse has spoken. Thirty six pages and counting all so that Andy Gallagher can have his fifteen minutes of lip-caterpillar fame. Sure. Why not. -_-

Fun Fact #207: In the original episode, Sam was arrested at the motel. The cops found him because Dean had a matchbook from the motel in his pocket when he was arrested. Personal head-cannon: Dean never kept any identifying objects from places again. He didn't necessarily remember this case as being the cause of that habit, but that's why there was not one on him when he was arrested this time ;)

Of course, it didn't matter because Time's about as no good dirty rotten as your author.

REVIEW MILESTONE:HEY GUYS! We are within spitting distance of that awe-inspiring 1,000 comments on AO3! It's not a shoe-in (we're forty shy right now) but I bet we can do it. In which case, you might recall from it happening over on FF, I post double chapters when we hit new milestones. If we make it, I will post the next two chapters (which 1. conveniently return to normal length and B. wrap up this case!)

However, whether or not we make it, this will be our last two-week stretch, guys! I have enough chapters built up to resume a weekly posting schedule after the next chapter :)

…Assuming Croatoan doesn't suddenly start kicking my ass. Which...it's Croatoan...so it totally could...

Chapter 71: Season 2: Chapter 38

Chapter Notes

A/Ns: We did not quite make the 1,000 comment milestone, but we got close. Normally, that would mean I just hold off on the double post until next time. However, I am going on vacation next weekend, so getting two chapters edited and up is going to be tough. Therefore, you all get an extra special treat this time! Four awesome somebodies on AO3 need to get us over the hump, and I'll post the next chapter on Monday.

Chapter Warnings: Andy's starting a food fight without the food, Sam's thinking they may need to re-lable their Jedi Master as more of a Sith Lord, Dean's sort of finally almost getting through to Diana, and our Death Omen is showing up places she's not meant to be. Darn you, Death Omen!

See the end of the chapter for more notes

-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-

The Road So Far (This Time Around)

Season 2: Chapter 38

-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-

The precinct was never quiet, even in the latest hours of the night or earliest in the morning. There were always criminals of all walks; scumbags and drunks and trouble makers were brought in and out all hours of the day. But this was possibly the quietest it ever got, between the hours of six and nine am, with the first shift of beat cops out on the streets, the night prowlers finally in bed and the day crime not yet getting started. A little lull period, in which Diana Ballard was usually at home, asleep after a long night's work on a case. But not this morning. Not this case.

Diana blew out a breath of air, enough to shift her hair off her forehead. The mostly blank report in front of her was a pain in her tired ass, but there was no going home until she got it written up. At least some of it.

The detective scrubbed face, exhaustion starting to kick in. Well, long-past kicked in, really, but she was used to the occasional all-nighter.

Just, not usually two in a row, and her and Pete both were steadily heading for thirty six hours on the job now. They still had to confront Dean Winchester, now that they had his name. They had enough to charge him, so all that was left was one last chance to talk. Then, either way, they could wrap this up. It would be in the DA's hands by noon.

It didn't sit right with her, of course. There were too many unanswered questions. But she and Pete had to get sleep at some point.

Diana sighed and put her fingers back to the keys. A few more paragraphs, a couple more sections. She could get that much done. Before she could move her fingers, however, the blinking cursor suddenly took off all on its own. The detective blinked dumbly at her computer as it started typing for itself, the same two words, over and over again.

Dana Shulps.

Dana Shulps Dana Shulps DanaShulpsDanaShulpsDanaShulpsDanaShulps

She pulled back, fingers flying off the keys, a trill of terror suddenly mixed in with all the confusion. What was going on? Diana sucked in a breath and blinked, only to find a blank page once more staring back at her.

What?

No, seriously, what just happened?

The detective shook her head, rubbed at her eyes, and checked again. Mostly blank doc just waiting for her to fill it out. Man…she was more tired than she thought. With a moment of hesitation she wasn't proud of, Diana put her fingers back to the keys, but couldn't stop staring at the screen, waiting for something to happen.

Okay, maybe it was time for that last round of interrogation. She could finish the report afterward.

No sooner had Diana stood up then something did happen, and it had nothing to do with her computer. The precinct erupted in chaos, and it all started in the bullpen. Shouts erupted and Diana went for her gun, spotting Pete shooting out of his seat in front of her. They and a dozen other cops and detectives ran towards the yelling.

It was chaos. There were half a dozen small fights broken out, two of them involving civilians and the rest cops. Others who seemed to still be in their right minds were trying to break up the fighters. Diana and Pete dove into one themselves, but it was like the men and women couldn't even hear them. They just kept at each other, grappling and exchanging weak punches, no matter who pulled them off or what was said. A few had been detained, but even handcuffed to whatever was nearest, they were still trying to get back in the fight. One cop – Charlie, the front desk officer – was dragging one of the waiting chairs behind him, one hand still cuffed to it, as he went back in one armed to his battle with Janice Price.

It made no sense. Diana knew these people. Worked with these people. What was going on?

And then it all stopped. On a dime, all at once, every combatant dropped arms. Exactly one hundred and twenty seconds after the first fight broke out between two recovering drunks, every single one of the men and women involved in a tussle just stopped, blinking, dazed, and most definitely confused. It left a couple of the non-crazies trying to pull people off one another stumbling back at the sudden lack of resistance, often with their now dazed fighter in hand. A couple tumbled to the floor together.

"What the hell," Diana said loudly as the chaos died down into murmurs of discord and injury. She wasn't the only one. Diana helped Janice up from the ground, where she'd gone down in a post chaos tackle by a fellow cop. She had a black eye and a sharp cut on one cheekbone, but otherwise, she was alright. They all were. Despite the weird and random breakout of violence, no one was seriously harmed.

It was another seven and a half minutes of trying to figure out what the hell had happened – everyone talking over each other to get to the bottom of the unexplainable chaos – before a rookie came flying into the main entrance, panting heavily with a look of pure panic on his face.

"He's gone."

Diana stopped what she was doing – an informal interrogation of yet another friend and coworker who was utterly clueless as to why he suddenly needed to punch the living daylights out of his partner – and turned, stone cold dread pooling in her stomach.

"What?"

"The suspect." The out of breath cop panted, spitting out words between heaving gasps. "Sam Winchester. He's gone."

Diana turned wide eyes to her partner, but Pete's face was already morphing from surprise to pure rage. He took off for interrogation, and Diana had to run to keep up.

-o-o-o-

Sam looked up as the door to his own little interrogation room opened, admitting an officer and…. Andy. In a mustache. A very fake mustache. The Stanford near-grad managed to keep a straight face as Andy nodded at the cop before proceeding over to the table Sam was camped out at. He set his briefcase down as the officer closed the door, leaving them alone in the silent room.

"Mr. Winchester."

"So, I take it you're the reason they suddenly know our names?" Sam raised an eyebrow at the poor kid, who looked sheepishly at him as he opened up the case, supposedly under the pretense of actually lawyering. The hunter cast a glance at the camera in the corner of the room, but the blinking red light was currently off.

"Sorry," Andy muttered, digging out a pad of paper and a pen, and passing a folded piece of paper Sam's way. "I didn't realize they didn't know. Guess I'm, uh, kinda new at this."

Sam didn't rag on him for it. First of all, he was sure Dean already had. But more than that, Sam knew the kid was only trying to help. Knew how risky it was for Andy – a wanted murderer with a warrant out for his arrest – to walk willingly into a police station to help get them out of this mess. That took guts, and loyalty the Winchesters had never asked from him. The hunter gave a forgiving nod and reached forward, snagging the folded paper off the surface of the table. "You've been in to see Dean?"

Andy nodded, though he knew Sam got the answer first from the scrawl of his brother's handwriting. "Yeah. They've got a pretty solid case on him, far as I can tell. But he says it's the cop – the dude one, not the lady one – framing him. Dirty as a mud pie on Tatooien, apparently."

Sam quickly scanned his brother's coded note, bobbing his head at Andy's information. "Does he have a plan?" Other than helping to get Sam out, given the allusion to 'The Great Escape' in his not-so-many worded note.

"Uh…" Andy shrugged, not exactly inspiring a lot of confidence. Sam pinned him with an expectant look. "He told me to make a distraction."

"Alright." Folding the paper back up, he shoved it into his pocket as he stood, stretching his long legs. The room he was in was windowless – a proper interrogation room located in the interior of the building's layout – so they'd have to go out the door they came in. Which was currently locked from the outside and guarded by a bored kid probably new to the force. Sam had a couple of thoughts, but none of them particularly quiet or subtle. "Any ideas?"

Andy lifted his wrist, pulling back the cheap suit he was wearing to look at his way-too-big-for-his-wrist watch that Sam wondered if he'd stolen from the same place he got the briefcase and fake mustache. "Give it… twenty seconds."

Sam raised a brow, but Andy just grinned up at him. At exactly the twenty second mark – and Sam was counting silently in his head – there was a shout from outside, followed by a grunt and then what sounded like all Hell breaking loose. Andy winked at him with that same grin and walked over to the door just as it swung inward.

The officer on the other side was, oddly enough, holding the door open with one hand, the other slapped over his eyes like a kid playing hide-n-seek. Andy strolled past, one hand in his pocket, the other swinging his briefcase without a care in the world. Sam stared after him until the kid whistled for him and Sam tilted his head back to keep from rolling his eyes. With a sigh, the Winchester just shook his head and followed.

Right. Jedi.

Sam thought maybe it ought to be 'Sith Lord', given the chaos they walked into as soon as they rounded the corner into the main room. There were fights breaking out across the room, some between civilians, some between cops (Sam stared in wide-eyed horror at those), with other officers trying to break up the bouts fruitlessly. The weirdest part, though, was definitely the way that any cop they got near immediately turned their backs on the pair, a hand slapped over their eyes as they crossed paths.

Andy smiled, all innocence and sparkles, up at him. "I might have dropped a word here, and there…and maybe way over there, while they escorted me to your room."

Sam could only stand, shaking his head for a solid second, trying as hard as he could not to smile (the kid did not need any encouragement), before a stapler went flying over their heads. Both hunters ducked out of instinct. Sharing a look, the two decided they'd loitered long enough and took off quickly for the front doors, most officers too pre-occupied to notice them, a few of them ducking their gazes when they did.

-o-o-o-

Dean was a quarter of his way through a table-top out rendition of The Rolling Stones' Hot Rock album (side A, track four: '(I Can't Get No) Satisfaction', a true piece of Rock'n'Roll perfection, in his humble opinion), when he heard the fight break out. His first through was, 'What the hell?' followed by the realization that Andy might have taken his suggestions a little too much to heart. Which immediately got a smirk and an 'atta boy' out of him before Dean realized that, likely, this would call more attention to them than just letting Sam escape on his own.

Oh well. It's not like Winchesters ever caught a break when it came to winning. And he'd kill to see what was happening out in the station right now.

He rolled the thin, long strip of metal and the interior spring mechanism he'd swiped from Andy's pen between the palms of his hand, considering whether or not to pick the cuffs now or wait for that asshat detective to 'transfer' him in the middle of the woods at two in the friggin' morning. It was probably safer to wait, Dean thought. If he played his hand too early and they caught him out of his bracelets, he wouldn't get a second chance. Despite the confident front he'd pulled with the kid, last time had cut it way too close. Dean wasn't planning on letting things come down to the wire quite so tightly a second time.

Dean was just pocketing his borrowed lock-picks someplace the cops wouldn't look when the air across the room from him flickered. The hunter immediately went on guard, too used to that phenomenon not to spot it immediately for what it was. Ghost. Dean's hands slid into fists on the table top, painfully aware of the handcuffs and suddenly wishing he'd picked them after all. It happened again, the air shifted, blinked rapidly, before a woman was suddenly in the room with him. Her clothes ragged, blood dried on her chest and neck, throat slashed, and red eyes open wide, staring right at him.

Dean recognized her. The missing drug dealer. Pete's old flame and first murder.

Oh, yeah, and also their death omen.

"Oh shit," Dean muttered, eyes going wide as the ghost raised an arm, stumbling towards him, gargling through her split vocal cords. Fresh blood spilled down her chest as she tried to warn him of his impending doom at the hands of her own murderer.

Dean had time to pretty much think, 'Son of a bitch!' before the door burst open.

-o-o-o-

Peter Sheridan stormed into interrogation to a wide eyed Dean Winchester staring at the far wall like he'd just seen a ghost. But Sheridan didn't care about that. No, all he cared about was that this piece of shit, this asshole who knew a hell of a lot more than he should, had just facilitated his brother's escape. Pete didn't know how, but damn it, he knew he had. He knew it.

The detective hauled their murder suspect clear out of the chair, slamming him into the back wall. He didn't care that the interrogation table screeched across the floor, dragged by the chain securely attached to their dirtbag's cuffs. He hoped it hurt like hell.

Dean grunted against the hard wall, trying to raise his arms up to stop the cop practically choking him to death, but couldn't. The table kept his arms stretched out and down, bracelets biting into his skin and sure to leave one hell of a bruise.

He really should have picked those locks, damnit.

"You son of a bitch," the cop hissed in his face, spittle landing on Dean's skin. He turned his head away the best he could. "How'd you do it?"

"Do what?" Dean cracked one eye open to grin at the cop. Sure, yeah, there was a solid chance it was gonna get him killed, but Dean Winchester never could take a bullet lying down. Or, er, strangulation. "You lose something, Detective?"

The punch that landed wasn't wholly unexpected, but it still hurt like a bitch. Man might be a coward and a dirty cop, but he wasn't a pushover, apparently.

"Pete!" The lady cop's voice was practically a shriek in the room, and it stilled the murderous detective for a single moment. Dean could feel the hands fist and un-fist in the stupid B.P.D. sweatshirt Detective Ballard had given him at the start of this nightmare.

"He'd dirt, Diana. He killed Tony, Karen. And now he's helped his brother escape? We can't let him get away with that." Sheridan didn't look over at his partner, just kept his eyes locked on the fierce green staring right back at him. Unafraid. Pete gritted his teeth. He'd put the fear of God in those eyes before he was done with Dean Winchester.

"How, Pete?" Diana's words, frank and biting, finally caused the cop to look her way. Her chest was heaving, she'd clearly run after him, but her stance was firm. Her face…the turmoil there was evident, but so was determination. Damn her morality. "He never left this room. How'd he help Sam escape?"

"I don't know," Pete hissed, looking back at their prime suspect. The suspect he'd easily pin Karen and Tony's murders on, so long as he could keep the man quiet long enough. He pulled Dean off the wall and slammed him back again. "The lawyer. Something. But I know he did."

"You should really buy a guy dinner before you get rough with him," Dean mocked, that smug smirk still on his face. Would nothing wipe the damn thing off? Sheridan tightened his grip. He bet oxygen deprivation would. Winchester picked his head off the wall and leaned into the detective, like he could see the murderous intent clear on his face and thought to match it. "Or you gonna give me a pretty necklace before you brick me up in a wall, too, Pete?"

Sheridan clenched his teeth, fisted hands tightened in the sweatshirt, inching up towards his neck with obvious purpose.

"Peter!" Diana barked again, this time with more incredulity. She still hadn't clued into what her partner – lover, Dean's mind supplied for him again – was capable of.

"No one would know."

She stared, blinking in disbelief, at the man she shared her bed and her life with, currently pinning a suspect to the interrogation room wall with every intention to finish the job. "Are you kidding me right now?"

Pete didn't look at her, just glared up into the cold eyes of a guaranteed murderer. He was sure of it, even if he knew this guy hadn't murdered the Giles. Dean Winchester was a killer, of that Peter had no doubt.

"The precinct is in chaos, Diana! And he did it. Any one of them out there could have come in here and killed him." Peter's grip shifted, hand itching for his gun. "Hell, he could have done it to himself."

The silence that rang through the room was deafening, but no one moved. No one backed down. Over by the door, Diana's voice got quiet.

"Put him down. We have enough to charge him. Let's leave it at that and go get some air."

Sheridan's eyes shuttered at the command, calm and in control. He lowered his eyes from Dean's, eyeing his neck with a deep (and deeply disturbing) sigh. Then he was hauling Dean off the wall and shoving him back towards the table. The hunter didn't quite make it, hitting the surface and practically sprawling over it to stop from going down, knocking the meagre contents to the floor.

Pete barely looked at Diana as he left the room, a single glance her way that she couldn't read. Didn't want to read. Because that look was somehow disappointed that she hadn't let him… let him what? She shook her head. Jesus, what was happening? She really didn't want to know.

Diana bent down, picking up the notepad and pen that had scattered on the floor as their suspect managed to seat himself back in the chair, leaning over his legs to give the handcuffs some slack. He was rubbing at his wrists. They probably hurt like hell. She didn't bother saying anything to the man, about her partner's treatment of him or anything else. Diana didn't believe in killing a man in cold blood, but she did believe in the system that would take Dean Winchester down. She straightened up, notepad in hand, ready to toss it on the table and leave as well, when she glanced down at the scrawled writing. Diana froze.

Dana Shulps.

Right there, at the top of the page. Dana Shulps. And below it a bunch of nonsense. Words that didn't make any sense. But Diana couldn't shake that first name. That name that had appeared on her computer, all on its own, like some sort of…

Slowly, she turned to their prime suspect, setting the notepad on the table. Tapping it, she asked, "What is this?"

Dean looked up at her with one eye squinted, still rubbing at his wrists. Diana caught a flash of a bruise and frowned. That looked…the width of that bruise, the deep purple of it, didn't make sense. They looked deep – old and bad – but they definitely hadn't been there earlier.

Her perp straightened – sitting back with a look of annoyed defeat – and Diana shook herself out of it. This case, man. It felt like she was going crazy. Diana kept her eyes locked firmly on her prime suspect, ignoring his wrists and the damage Pete had done.

"Anagrams."

Diana's frown became pinched. "What?"

"An anagram." Dean sighed. "A word made from another word, with the letters all scrambled-"

"I know what an anagram is." The man raised his hands at her harried, aggravated tone and she bit back a sigh of her own. She tapped the notepad again. "Dana Shulps. That's the starting word? Where did you get it from?"

Dean eyed her, glancing at the paper her hand was spread over, and then back up. She could tell by his calculated pause he was about to lie to her. "Something Tony was working on. A clue, I guess. He didn't share it with me. But there's no Dana Shulps in any of his files so, I figured…"

He shrugged, and Diana finished his thought for him, "Maybe it's an anagram for something else."

Dean just shrugged again. "Why not. Tony's left me a lot worse before."

He was lying again, but that wasn't the part she really cared about at the moment. "Where did you see it, exactly?"

The man eyed her once again, like he was trying to suss out the same thing she was, only in reverse. "Printer. At the house and the office. It was everywhere. Hell, the damn thing was written on Tony's desk. Whatever it means, it shows up and dead bodies seem to follow."

Diana swallowed past the sudden spike in her throat. She drew her hand off the notepad and turned to leave. She was letting this man get to her.

"You saw it somewhere too, I take it, Detective?"

Diana paused, turning her chin into her shoulder, not quite looking at him, before she left the room. This time, she made sure the door was firmly locked and, for good measure, put an officer on the door with strict orders not to let anyone in.

-o-o-o-

The tap water was tepid, at best. What she needed was ice cold, but the precinct's pipes had always sucked. Never as hot as you wanted them in the winters, never as cold as you hoped for in the summers. Diana looked up at her reflection, water running down her face in rivulets. What she needed was a hot shower, a good cup of coffee, and a long night's sleep. With the circles under her eyes as dark as bruises and her hair having seen better days, she looked about as bad as she felt.

Water ran down her neck, disappearing below the v-shaped collar of her blouse. Diana stared at the clear trail left behind, before reaching up and tugging at the thin chain hanging around her neck. She pulled free the pendant at the end of the necklace. It was a beautiful, simple little thing Pete had given her that, in many ways, she cherished.

Handmade, one of a kind, over on Carson street, he'd said.

'You gonna give me a necklace before you brick me up in a wall, too, Pete?'

What had Dean meant by that?

Diana sighed, shook her head, and tucked the necklace back into her blouse. Dean must have seen it. But how could he have known Pete gave it to her? Had he seen them together? When? Pete wasn't the most discrete, she could admit, but…

She shook her head again. She was letting that man – a conman – get in her head and under her skin. It didn't matter. So, he was that good at being evil. Fine. She would just have to that much better at being good. Diana reached forward and turned the faucet off. She just had to shake this (whatever this was) and finish the job. Then Dean Winchester could rot in a jail cell and she could figure out everything else, with Pete and…well, just everything else, sometime after that.

The detective was reaching for a paper towel when the faucet beneath her turned back on, making her jump. She stared at the spout pouring water into the sink. Hot water. Very hot water; steam was rising from the porcelain basin. Diana eyed the faucet knobs, but they seemed to be in the off position. She reached out, trying to turn one, only for there to be no give.

What the hell?

Diana verbally gasped when two more faucets burst to life, and then another two, and another until the entire row of sinks was pouring water like damn Niagara Falls.

"What on earth-"

The steam started fogging up the mirrors. Diana stared at the cloudy surfaces, a true trill of fear running down her spine, as a squeegee, squeaking sound like someone dragging fingers down the wet mirror, was accompanied by letters starting to appear, one by one in the fog, with no one there to draw them.

D-A-N-A S-H-U-L

Diana tried to run for it, but the minute she turned, she was met by red eyes and gurgling blood.

-o-o-o-

Dean was not expecting the lady cop to make a second appearance so soon. Sure, he was pretty certain Diana was beginning to realize how fucked up her boyfriend was, but the hunter was also pretty sure he'd lost any common ground with her over the near forty-eight hours he'd been here. Of course, that wasn't entirely his fault, being assaulted by her dickhead boyfriend, having to facilitate Sam's escape, and accusing her partner (in more ways than one) of cold-blooded murder.

Given all that, he didn't think she'd come bursting into the interrogation room in a hurry. She did take the time to close the door behind her, locking out the armed guard standing just on the other side. Dean blinked at her frazzled expression, then sat up a hundred times straighter as the deer-in-headlights look registered. He knew that look.

"What happened? What did you see?"

Diana paused, taken back by his question, which was, apparently, the wrong thing to say. Dean saw the hesitation, the doubt, immediately triggered in her gaze, but she pushed through it. Instead of answering, Diana crossed the room to hover over the table. She crossed her arms, then immediately uncrossed one in order to point at his wrists, which hung between his knees, still chained.

"Those bruises. Where did you get them?"

Dean glanced down at his forearms and the ugly markings there, identical to Karen Giles'. Yup. Their death omen might be pretty damn useless, but she sure packed a punch, regardless. He looked back up at the detective, lips a thin smile. "You were here, lady. You saw your boyfriend manhandle me-"

"Handcuffs don't leave marks like that. They're thicker than that. Older too. Now where did you get them?"

Her brisk, sharp words wiped the smile right off his face. He scoffed, dropping his arms and leaning back in the chair, shoulders slumped and facade of nonchalant control back in place. "You wouldn't believe me if I told you."

Diana stared, unblinking and unnerving. Damn, she really was good, for a cop. Then, taking the hunter by surprise, she stuck her arm out, pulling up her sleeve to reveal identical bruises slapped across her own wrists. "Try me."

Dean sat up, staring at the marks he remembered seeing on the detective's skin once before. He sure as hell hadn't had a matching set at the time, but that was Time for you: a bitch.

"You saw her, didn't you?" He looked up at her, all the smirk and smugness long gone.

The detective's eyes wavered, but nothing else gave her away, and her tone, if anything, grew icier. "Saw who?"

Dean just huffed. "Red eyes, blonde hair, bleeding from the throat? That ringing any bells?"

Diana Ballard paled, and her pretty brown eyes finally darted away. She cleared her throat, lowering the sleeve of her suit to cover the marking. "That's not possible."

He spread his arms as much as he could while cuffed, as if to say, 'and yet.'

"You expect me to believe that woman was a… a what?" Diana laughed, but this was anything but funny. "A ghost?"

It sounded ridiculous just coming out of her mouth. But Dean wasn't laughing. He just stared at her, eyes as deadly serious as they had been when Pete had him up against the wall. Only less…hostile.

"You're serious- what? A ghost? Really." She crossed her arms. "Ghosts don't exist."

"And yet, you look exactly like someone who just saw one." Diana hardly looked amused by his quip. Dean tapped his heel against the leg of the chair and, with a one-shouldered shrug, amended, "It's a death omen, if you wanna talk technicalities."

If anything, she looked even less amused. Which, no, wasn't really possible. "A death omen."

"Yeah. They usually show up to warn others." Dean shrugged, but those intense green eyes never left hers. "In this case, she's following your buddy Pete around, warning all his next victims. Trying to stop the same thing that happened to her. So far, she's not been all that successful."

Clearly.

Diana turned away from him, most likely at the mounting evidence – no matter how unbelievable, it was quickly becoming less and less dismissible – that Pete was what this man said he was. This man, who was so obviously a conman. He had to be.

"This is insane," she muttered under her breath, reaching up to rub at her temple but ending up so much closer to clutching her hair.

"I know," Dean said aloud, though there was no way he could have heard her. "You think you're going crazy. But let's skip that part, yeah? Because this thing doesn't show up without a reason. So let's go to the next step, where we keep you alive."

Diana leveled a glare – a terrified glare, but still a glare – on him. "You can't honestly think Pete is going to try and kill me."

"You tell me. You're the one who just told the guy 'no' after he showed his hand on the whole, 'let's kill a suspect in cold blood' thing. How do you think good old, calm, anger-management Pete is gonna take that?"

Dean stared at her as he spoke, daring her to counter what he could already tell she knew. And she did know. That look Pete had given her on his way out… Diana shivered and turned partially away from the man, trying to hide how clearly unsettled she was.

"I thought you said you were a PI," was what she eventually threw out, and while it may not have been the most subtle change of topic, Dean let her have it.

"Yeah…I'm really more like a Ghostbuster."

Diana huffed, shaking her head from her slightly turned away position, still not quite looking at him. She stared at the floor for a good thirty seconds, Dean just biding his time while he let the sane woman contemplate the insane, before she finally turned fully towards him, a decision clearly made. Her shoulders were squared, her chin was up, and that decent (and probably actually good at her job) cop was back in the room with them.

"Why should I believe any of this, huh?" She tossed an arm out to the side before it landed on her hip, hiking up her blazer. "You're a conman. All of this? You could just be playing me."

Which wasn't exactly something he could deny. He could be. He wasn't, at least not at the moment, but that didn't mean he hadn't in the last forty-eight hours spent with her. So he just shrugged and went for broke in the good old honesty category.

"Sure, but you're a cop. Trust your gut, not me." The look she leveled his way wasn't a kind one, but he also knew when he'd won someone over, and he'd finally won Detective Ballard to his side of crazy. Which meant it was time to go for broke. "Out of curiosity, what did your gut say about Sam?"

The sigh that left her chest was the world-weary, what-have-I-just-agreed-to kind that Dean knew only too well. Diana dropped her hand from her hip and ran it through her hair. "Other than that he was your brother before we had your name?" She sent a look his way that dared him to challenge her, but he just smiled the kind of smile that teenage kids sent their parents in emoji form when they'd broken the family heirloom vase. Not that Dean would know anything about that. She rolled her eyes. "Why?"

Dean thought about it for another, maybe, half a second. If that. He weirdly liked this lady, after all, poor choice in men aside. "Go to the first motel listed in the Yellow Pages. Look for Jim Rockford."

The detective's sharp eyes snapped to his, widening as they realized what he was offering. "You're giving your brother up."

Shrugging was pretty much the only damn thing one could do while handcuffed to a table, but Dean was getting pretty tired of it. "Look, you can arrest him if you want, or you can help him solve this case and, maybe," he raised his hands here, waving identically bruised wrists in the air, "we both get out of this with no more visits from a death omen."

Diana stared at him just long enough to let out another one of those sighs.

-o-o-o-

When Peter Sheridan came out of the washroom after a prolonged stare into the mirror, a good slap to the face, and a reminder that he could handle this, he'd handled it before, it was to the sight of his partner walking out of the precinct. Only, he knew Diana. That was her hurried, urgent-but-trying-not-to-make-a-scene walk that really wanted to be a run. Pete's eyes narrowed as he turned his head back the way she'd come, from the hallway that led to interrogation.

Something ugly pooled in his stomach. On anyone else it might have been dread. On Peter Sheridan, it was just anger. He took off at his own decent pace towards Dean Winchester's room – determined to finish this once and for all – but drew up short as he rounded the corner to an armed officer standing guard outside the door.

"Damnit, Diana," he hissed between clenched teeth as he spun back around and headed the same way his partner had gone. That Dean kid had gotten to her and now he was going to have to kill her too.

By the time he made it to the parking lot, she was already pulling onto the street in her dark blue sedan. Sheridan swore, turning in a circle, fingers curling into fists with the urge to hit something. He grabbed at his hair, loosened his tie. This was falling apart, damnit!

Okay, think. Peter took a deep breath, smoothed out his tie, cracked his neck, and knew what he had to do. He didn't know how the hell Dean Winchester knew what he did – if he even knew what he did or was just a damn clever con – but if it was true, than he had to destroy the evidence.

He had to get to the old supply store on Ashland and burn it to the ground before anyone discovered Claire Becker's body.

Chapter End Notes

A/Ns: My internal thoughts while writing this chapter? "Four chapters. This friggin' episode is gonna take four chapters. Good god Gertrude, whyyyyyyyy?"

Non-Linear Story Choice: Lemme know if the bit at the start of this chapter - the fight breaking out and Sam being found gone, then jumping back to Andy walking in to talk to Sam - was at all confusing. I don't usually write that way, but I had some struggles with order this chapter. I will swap it around for future readers if it just isn't working out.

Comments: Folks on AO3! Make it happen and I'll get you that next chapter ;) Everyone else after those four reviews, plus the peeps at ff dot net: I would still really love to hear from you :D

Chapter 72: Season 2: Chapter 39

Chapter Notes

A/Ns: Have I mentioned you guys rock lately? Well, you do. I loved the overall response to last chapter's quality check: "Yes, the writing is fine, it's great, now do more of it. Now now now now NOW." XD You guys make me feel all the warm fuzzies. All of them.

Review Milestone! You folks over on AO3 knocked it out of the park! You were like, she wants comments? FINE. TAKE THEM ALL AND GIVE US OUR CHAPTER. NOW NOW NOW NOW NOW. Did I mention you all rock? I think I might have said something... it wasn't loud enough though. Not by far. YOU ALL ROCK :)

Enjoy your double chapter, and the wrap up to our Baltimore case!

Chapter Warnings: Oh my Chuck, do we have a Chapter of almost entirely Sam and Andy!? Yes we do! What the hell, this story is supposed to be all about Dean (and Cas. Oh, wait, I'm totally failing on that front…) XD Maybe I can fix it at the veeeeeery end....

See the end of the chapter for more notes

-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-

The Road So Far (This Time Around)

Season 2: Chapter 39

-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-

When Sam Winchester opened the motel room door, he didn't look all that surprised to see Diana Ballard standing in the doorway. She, however, was surprised to see the person behind him. A familiar face, sans facial hair.

"The lawyer." Diana turned a baleful glare on Sam Winchester, who responded with an appropriately castigated expression. "Really?"

"You must be the lady cop whose boyfriend's trying to kill her," Andy said with way too much enthusiasm, sticking out his hand for a shake that was absolutely not returned.

Diana had to snap her jaw shut after an unacceptable amount of time letting it hang open. "Does everyone know about that?"

Sam raised his hands in surrender after a second accusatory glare was sent his way. "Yeah…Dean's, uh…something else when it comes to just knowing things…"

Andy snorted, but Diana did not have time (or energy, or the emotional bandwidth, or, really, any fucks left to give) to probe into it. The taller of the two men dug a folded up piece of paper out of his pocket, handing it over to her. The detective eyed it suspiciously, sending another look at the giant of a man (who had the smarts to once again look sheepish), as she opened it.

A note, in the same scrawled handwriting as the legal pad filled with anagrams back in Dean's interrogation room.

Hilts-

It's a street . Ashland. Our Omen's inside a wall.

Del Toro's dirty. Benson's next.

-McQueen

Diana huffed, a bitter smirk at the corner of her mouth as she handed the paper back with a caustically raised brow. "Hilts and McQueen? You two really are something."

"Hey, I helped, you know," the lawyer (that definitely wasn't a lawyer) piped up from the background, having wandered back over to the little kitchenette table that came with every room at the Aardvark Motel. He was flipping through pictures – what looked like mug shots from what Diana could glimpse – as he took a bite from a burger half out of its wrapper. The table was covered in a depressing mix of crime photos, weapons, and what apparently passed as dinner for Ghostbusters.

"Yeah? Why don't you tell me just how you did that." Diana levied the kid a look that had him gulping down the last of that burger, mouth too full to answer and a chipmunk-cheeked smile shown her way before he quickly ducked his gaze. "That's what I thought."

She turned to Sam next, who didn't look all that much more thrilled to be the center of attention. "I take it I'm Benson, then? I suppose I'm not completely insulted. What's with Del Toro?"

"Benecio," Sam supplied the actor's first name with a slightly more real smile as he took the note and tossed it on the table with the rest of the case. Dean must have watched Way of the Gun at least a dozen times, never shutting up about it for days afterward. It was one of those movies that just always seemed to be on TV and, back in the day before their lives had turned into horror movies themselves, Dean had enjoyed a flick with an ending where the main characters didn't pull through for once.

Sam had a feeling the version of his brother from 2016 likely had a different opinion of that kind of ending, now.

When Diana just gave him a quizzical look, the younger Winchester shrugged. "Yeah, my brother knows like a thousand movies, but they all star the same five guys. Consider yourself lucky Detective Sheridan didn't inspire a Jack Nicholson quote."

It wasn't much of an explanation, but the detective seemed to drop the question as soon as Sam mentioned her partner. She looked around, clearly uncomfortable with the fact that she was in the motel room of a fugitive and…whatever they called guys who impersonated lawyers and broke their fake clients out of jail.

Criminals. They just called those people criminals.

"How exactly does your brother know all of this? How does he know Pete's dirty?" Other than, you know, roughing him up and threatening to murder him in lockup. Could Pete use some anger management? Sure. But that didn't make him a murderer or a thief.

Diana moved closer to the table to see what it was Andy was flipping through. Those were definitely booking photos. And next to them crime scene photos these men should not have access to. She picked one of them up, unable to keep the incredulity – and accusation – out of her voice. "Where did you get these? These are crime scene photos. Booking photos!"

The supposedly gentle giant scoffed lightly, though his expression suggested it was more self-deprecating than anything else, as he took the photo from her. "You have your job and…well, I have mine." His voice trailed off, and Diana looked at him to see what had caused it, but Sam was staring at her wrist. Specifically, the bruise there. "Where did you get that?"

Sam reached across the table to pull free one of the crime scene photos from Karen Giles' murder. He offered it to her, but Diana didn't need to take it to see the snapshot of a woman's wrist, with the exact same bruising. The detective pulled the sleeve of her blazer down to hide her matching mark, uncomfortable with the evidence of something she still wasn't quite ready to wrap her head around.

Diana glanced hesitantly up at the man her primary murder suspect told her she could trust. Little late to be doubting that, considering she was standing in his motel room. Still, this was all insane. "Your brother called it a… a death omen?"

"Yeah, he mentioned one in his note." The first Sam had heard of it, which meant Dean hadn't remembered before, but it was pivotal information now. If Sheridan really was dirty, and the death omen one of his victims, it would likely be the key to solving this case. "You saw it?"

Diana watched as the beanstalk of a man ducked his head her way, probably an unconscious attempt to make himself less tall – less looming – around her. She nodded, and Sam nudged Andy out of the way to take the photos he'd been going through and pass them to the detective instead.

"Here, look through these. I've been researching every girl that's ever died or gone missing from Ashland Street. Tell me if you recognize anyone."

The detective's eyes lingered – none too cheerfully – on him for another moment (and Sam may not have grown up with a mother, but damn if this woman wasn't trying to educate him in all ways of the patronizing mom glare), before Diana started flipping through the photographs. She stopped on the third page, hand stilling as she stared down at a blonde-haired woman in clear shock.

"This is her." She looked up, glancing between the two as Andy stepped away from the table to join them. "I'm sure of it."

Andy took the photo from her and reached blindly over to the table for a couple more sheets of paper. He shuffled through them before selecting one and scanning the lines of data. "Claire Becker. Twenty eight, disappeared eight or nine months ago. Was last seen on Ashland street."

"Ashland; that fits Dean's note. We got an address?" Sam asked. Andy handed him the paper even as he reached out to take it.

"Okay, but I don't know her," Ballard emphasized in the same beat, looking between the two like they weren't doing a great job of explaining something they both thought pretty clear. "I mean, why would she come after me?"

"It's probably not about you." Sam was scanning the missing persons report and talking at the same time. He paused long enough to meet the Detective's eyes, offering a sympathetic smile. "Death omens are warnings. Um…sometimes what they want is justice. If your partner killed her, Claire might be trying to lead you to the truth. Did Sheridan know her? Says here she was arrested twice for dealing heroin. Your partner ever work narcotics?"

Diana could only shrug one shoulder, crossing her arms in clear discomfort. "We both did. But I never booked her. Not that I remember."

"Doesn't mean your partner didn't." Andy smiled something of a grimace, which was probably supposed to be apologetic, but got stuck somewhere in between. Diana spared him an odd look (possibly wondering how this man had managed to convince an entire precinct that he was capable of practicing law…) before her face paled, realization hitting like a bag of bricks to the gut.

"Oh my god…"

"What is it?" Sam lowered the paper, reaching out a supportive hand, but Diana brushed him off.

"The heroin." She looked stunned, but more in the dreaded, just-realized-her-partner-was-a-scumbag sort of way. "Dean mentioned the drugs that went missing from lockup."

"Wait, what?" Sam glanced at Andy, but he shrugged. First he was hearing about it too. Dean hadn't said anything about drugs. Just that the dude cop was dirty and he'd killed his junkie girlfriend somewhere on Ashland street.

"About a year ago, some heroin went missing from an old bust. Obviously it was a cop." She dropped her arms, a look of frustration coming over her face. "We never found out who did it. But whoever did it would need someone to fence their product."

Andy's gaze dropped down to the mug shot of a drug dealer he was still holding.

"Someone like a heroin dealer," Sam supplied, a bitter grimace coming to his own face now as he stared at the picture too. "Somebody like Claire."

Diana tilted her head back with a deep, aggravated sigh. "None of this points to Pete, though." She looked back at both men, and while it was obvious she was truly starting to believe her partner was dirty, she wasn't wrong. "How do we know it's him?"

"We don't." Sam raised the missing persons report. "But Claire's our best lead for finding out. She was last seen entering 2911 Ashland Street. Let's start there."

Both men were on the move like a starting gun had gone off that only they'd heard. Ballard blinked at the flurry of movement – Andy gathering up their evidence and the last of their dinner to take on the road, Sam going over to a duffel full of (oookay, Diana was going to ignore the bag full of guns sitting on the motel bed) …stuff – and waved her arms to get their attention, feeling a little silly and a lot left out.

"What?"

"Uh, well, we gotta find her body if we're gonna prove your boyfriend's a murderer and Dean's innocent," Andy supplied oh so helpfully, like he wasn't talking to a woman who solved murders for a living. It did not help that he spoke through a handful of fries half stuffed in his mouth. Sam spared his younger partner a look that definitely said 'You're not helping' and Diana wondered if she was looking at another brother in this insane family. Andy shrugged haplessly. "What? Dean said the guy bricked his ex-junkie-girlfriend up in a wall."

Related or not, the taller of the two men turned to Diana, who was now trying to process the ex-girlfriend bit, because she hadn't heard that piece of information yet. Sam tried for a calming smile as he paused in his gathering of (and nope, Diana absolutely did not see illegal firearms in the motel room. Plausible deniability) …stuff, to explain a thing or two about ghost hunting.

"We also need to salt and burn her bones." At the wide, blank look and single blink he received in response, the sheepish, apologetic look was back on Sam's face. "It's the only way to put her to rest."

Ballard just kept right on staring. Because of course it was.

-o-o-o-

Diana kept glancing between the road and her six and a half foot passenger sitting to her right. She, the beanstalk, and his fake lawyer were now on their way to what was apparently the scene of a murder. Because a ghost had told them. Or, well, left the breadcrumbs for them to figure it out.

"How exactly does Dean know all this, again?" The detective glanced at Sam – the brother – for the fifth time in half as many minutes. "You never really covered that."

"No, I guess we didn't," Sam hedged, and Diana knew a man avoiding a question when she saw one. The taller man glanced over his shoulder almost self-consciously to the kid in the back seat. Diana's hunch on a third brother grew worse. As did a seriously misplaced sense of humor; Sam checking in with his 'lawyer' before answering her question. "Dean's…uh… got a talent for knowing things."

Diana's look directly his way called absolute bullshit on that one, because, yeah, they'd said as much already, and it hadn't been any more true or enlightening the first time. Sam shrunk down like a chastised kid caught stealing a cookie.

"Like your lawyer buddy has a talent for starting fights and hypnotizing half my coworkers?"

The beanstalk managed to shrink down even further. Make that a kid with his hand stuck in the cookie jar, the thing so wedged in there they were gonna have to break the jar to get him free.

"Dean's psychic." Andy popped up between them, elbows propped up on the backs of each of their chairs, and Diana jumped. Sam's reproachful look didn't stop the kid from smiling congenially.

"Psychic." It wasn't a question. Hell, it wasn't even a statement. Diana didn't know what the hell it was, because…well, she didn't know what the hell kind of answer that had been to start with.

"Yep."

You know what? Sure, why not. Day she'd been having, Diana figured anything was possible. She flipped on a blinker and took the next right for Ashland street.

"Don't think we're not circling back to the part where you hypnotized half my coworkers." She glanced in the rear view mirror quickly enough to see Andy's sheepish, tight-jawed smile.

"Uh-mmm…I am pleading the fifth."

"Of course you are." Diana refocused on the road as the building numbers reached the first of the 2900s and she pulled over outside of an old supply store. It looked abandoned and was up for lease, sitting collecting dust.

Sam offered her an encouraging smile – it really wasn't all that encouraging – and climbed out of the car. Andy scrambled out of the backseat with a duffle bag of gear and weapons that was practically half the kid's size. Diana stared at the closed up building, dread somewhere between her stomach and her chest, and sighed. She checked the gun at her hip and climbed out of the car to join the two hunters on their search for a death omen.

-o-o-o-

Sheridan watched the three figures exit his partner's car from his own parked across the street. His partner, a fugitive, and the lawyer he was now pretty damn sure wasn't a lawyer, all entering the store where he had killed and buried Claire Becker. Together.

He hadn't wanted to believe it. That Dean Winchester was anything more than a conman blowing smoke up everyone's ass. He'd wanted to believe even less that he could have gotten to Diana. That Diana would take the word of a criminal and a scumbag over the word of her partner. Her lover. Him.

But when her car pulled up and she got out with Sam Winchester of all people, Pete's anger overrode the last of his hope. He reached into to the glovebox of his car, removed his gun from the compartment, grabbed the full gas can sitting in the passenger seat, and climbed out of the car.

As he crossed the street at a jog, Peter flicked the safety off with his thumb and entered the building after his wayward lover and two dead-men-walking.

-o-o-o-

The partially obstructed light shining through the old lettering on the store window – Ashland Supplies – cast a gloomy picture on the opposite wall and gave them their little mystery word, complete with its extra letters. Ashland Sup. Dana Shulps.

Sam crossed the room, moving around dusty shelves and old equipment. The brick wall illuminated by the front window and their mystery word, looked different than the rest of the building. Newer. Sloppier. It didn't fit with the dust and disuse that had probably been a part of this building for at least a year now. He called to Andy, who tossed him an EMF scanner without needing the request verbalized.

"What's that?" Diana asked, joining the boys as Sam turned the thing on and started a slow wave across the brick surface.

"EMF," Andy answered, watching the more experience man at work. He'd used an EMF a time or two now, at least enough to understand the theory behind it. "Ghosts give off electromagnetic frequencies, so you can sort of track them with a meter, or at least know if it's a ghost you're dealing with."

"Some remains give off waves as well," Sam added as the beep-beep-beep of the machine started to grow more frantic, static growing with each increased beat. The two hunters shared a look and Sam turned the thing off, tucking it into his pocket.

"So, that thing's going crazy because Claire's body is in there?" Diana looked between both of them, but Andy had turned his attention to the bag they'd brought along, already rifling through it. Sam's smile, while grim, was encouraging.

"That's the theory at least."

Andy stood back up with sledgehammer in hand, passing it dutifully to Sam. Dean's note had said they'd find their body in a wall, so the two had come prepared. The taller hunter hefted the weight of the tool before he turned to the bricks. It only took a couple of good swings. The wall had been put together hastily, certainly not the work of a professional. Once he'd gotten a large enough opening, Sam stuck a flashlight and his head inside the hole. He drew back when he saw something a foot down, instead pushing his hand in and groping for what had looked like black plastic.

"Yeah," he muttered, hand grasping at what felt like a garbage bag wrapped around something hard and round. Probably a skull. "There's definitely something in there. Andy, see if you can find a crowbar."

He could probably take this thing apart with his hands if he had to, but since they were in an old hardware shop, there was no reason not to look. Sam pulled at a couple of the bricks in the meantime, just to see if they'd come loose without much trouble, while Andy shuffled about in the rest of the store. Two of the bricks came off with minor tugs, and Diana joined in widening the hole.

Sam was about to tell Andy that it wasn't worth it, they could get through the wall without a tool, when the kid cried out in surprise. Both Sam and Diana whipped around, the cop pulling her gun in half the time it took Sam to reach for his.

Peter Sheridan stepped out from behind a shelf, hauling Andy in front of him like a human shield and kicking a gas can into the aisle with his foot. The sloshing of liquid was loud in the suddenly tense room. Sheridan's gun and focus was trained entirely on his partner, fist full of Andy's shirt, rucking it up about his neck in a painfully tight hold. Andy had his hands up, eyes wide and a fresh line of blood running down the side of his face. He was going to have one hell of a shiner from the butt of Sheridan's gun.

Diana's eyes hardened at the sight of her partner, her lover, hiding behind a kid. A good kid, it turned out, even if the detective had some suspicions about these boys' pasts.

"What are you doing, Pete?" She took a step in front of Sam, who had a hand on his gun but hadn't yet pulled it from his side. Two drawn weapons were plenty already for this Mexican Standoff. Pete's eyes glinted at the move, a tick in his jaw saying her protective measure hadn't been missed.

"I'm not doing anything, Diana."

She scoffed. "It's a little late for that."

Her eyes flickered to Andy. The kid looked terrified, but he kept glancing at Sam. Diana didn't have the bandwidth to check, but she could almost feel Sam beside and just behind her, shaking his head. She didn't know what it was with these two, particularly their hypnotic little lawyer, but she could sense the play they were trying to line up. She needed to buy them time and distract her partner before he killed again.

"I know about Claire."

Pete's jaw clenched, his hand twisting in Andy's shirt. The kid fidgeted, raising his hands a little higher. "I don't know what you're talking about."

"You telling me I'm not going to find the body of a drug dealer in that wall?" She countered, tilting her head to the hole in the bricks, but her eyes never left her lover. Her gun didn't either. "You killed her. You stole those drugs." She reached up with one hand and pulled the necklace he had given her free of her blouse. "Am I going to find one of these on that body, Pete?"

His eyes shuttered, his whole face turning to stone, and Diana had her answer. Her hand went back to the gun.

"You bastard-"

Behind her, Sam suddenly shifted his foot to the left. Pete immediately retrained his weapon on the movement. Diana's finger tightened on the trigger of her own weapon, mind having all of half a second to contemplate if she was really about to shoot her partner should he shoot Sam. Andy took that half second – a distraction, Diana's brain filled in – to open his mouth.

"Put the gun-"

Andy's words disappeared in a yell and the deafening crack of a gun discharging. Pete had lowered his Sig Saur in one swift moment and shot the ground less than an inch from the kid's right foot. The bullet ricocheted off the cement and Andy jumped about a foot in the air, hands raising practically to his chin. The cop shoved his still smoking gun into Andy's jaw. The kid cried out as his flesh sizzled beneath the smoking metal.

"Not another word."

He was shaking, but Andy didn't say a thing. The look in his eyes, scared as it was, was fierce, and Diana regretted not taking the shot the moment her partner had lowered his gun. She wasn't going to get another chance like that and she'd wasted it hesitating.

"Put the gun down, Pete!" she shouted anyway, arms straightening with resolve and the preparedness of taking the next shot the moment it came.

Pete just hauled the kid even further in front of him, gun deep in his cheek. "Oh, I don't think so, Diana. You're fast. I'm pretty sure I'm faster." He turned to Sam next and gestured with his head. "Toss your gun over. Not you, Diana. You keep yours."

She could feel Sam's eyes on her, but the hunter did as he was told. He lowered his weapon to the ground in front of him cautiously, kicking it across the cement once he'd straightened. Pete kicked it further into the store and out of sight. Diana didn't lower her weapon, still trained on her partner, but she knew his demand for her to keep it was in no way good.

"Why did you kill Tony Giles?" Their one chance at this might still be their first play. Diana just had to keep Pete distracted long enough to find another opening. One that hopefully didn't get Andy killed. "What's he got to do with all this?"

"He scrubbed the money Claire brought in." Sheridan's voice remained cold, hard, and his fist in Andy's shirt seemed absolute. "He got skittish, wanted to come clean."

"And Karen?"

The cop rolled his eyes, as if it was obvious. "I'm sure he told her everything! She was a liability."

Diana's look was sour with regret, but Pete, the narcissist and psychopath that he was, saw it as something else entirely. He saw it as a flicker of hope, a flicker of understanding. Of sympathy.

"This doesn't have to be the end, Diana. I know it's a mess. I just panicked. But these guys?" He lifted Andy's fisted shirt, causing the kid to raise up on the balls of his feet with a gulp. "They're a gift. We can pin the whole thing on them." When his partner's eyes wavered in what he perceived as doubt, Peter continued, "Dean confessed; he told you where he bricked up the body. We came to investigate, only his fugitive brother attacked us. You shot him. It was self-defense."

Diana tensed as her partner wove his little tale. She could feel Sam at her back, exposed enough to be easily shot and killed, but staying impressively still. Diana regarded Pete with ice in her eyes, refusing to believe any more of his crap.

"So you can frame me, too?"

"No!" Pete's exclamation was desperate and his face morphed into that look he always gave her when he didn't get his way and didn't know how else to win an argument. She'd once found it endearing. Now it disgusted her. "We're in this together, don't you see? I'll kill this one, you take care of the brother. We'll deal with Dean when we get back to the precinct. An immediate transfer back to Sacramento. I'll drive him myself; he'll have an accident along the way."

Diana stared at him in growing horror. She startled, ever so slightly, at the pressure of a hand to the small of her back. It was nothing, so subtle and slow that Peter probably didn't see it. But Sam was signaling her.

She swallowed and looked back at her partner, gun shaking ever so slightly in her hand.

"I still love you, Diana," Pete confessed, a light smile on his face, and she could see it. She could see the manipulation so clearly, the mental instability, the thought wide open in his expression that he'd won her over. How she'd ever missed it before, she didn't know. Maybe she wasn't such a good cop after all.

Diana lowered her gun.

Pete beamed. "Thank you. Thank you."

He lifted his gun from Andy's cheek, leveling it Sam's way. The moment his eyes left hers to focus on the man just over her shoulder, Diana fired two shots in the interim, gun back up in a flash, no hesitation this time. Pete took two to the shoulder and neck. Andy dropped like he was the one shot, hitting the floor and scrambling away from the dirty cop as fast as he could.

"Then why don't you buy me another necklace, you ass?" Diana lowered her gun, the scowl on her face etched from marble. She turned towards Andy, who was only a couple feet away from them, clearly messed up. Diana opened her mouth to ask if he was okay when Sam suddenly moved in her periphery.

"Diana!" he cried out, and she instinctually spun back to her partner's body, gun back up but not in time. She could feel it. Pete had his gun on her, still on the ground, one hand clutching his bleeding throat. But he had her, and she knew it. She'd let her guard down around him again, and it was going to cost her life.

She hoped it wouldn't cost Sam and Andy's too.

The gun went off with a crack at about the same time Sam's body collided with hers, but the bullet never hit flesh. Diana blinked in shock, her and Sam still upright but a tangle of limbs and precarious balance, at the back of a woman now standing between them and her partner. She wore white, the clothes more rags now than the dress they had once been. Dirty, bloody blond hair fell in waves down her back.

Standing there, no more than a foot in front of the hunter and detective, Claire Becker looked as solid as any body Diana had ever seen. She'd apparently taken a bullet for them as well.

Claire garbled and bubbled, fresh blood flowing from her neck as she stared down at the man who had killed her. Who was bleeding out from the throat as well, so similar to her own demise. Justice. Peter Sheridan stared up at her with wide, horrified eyes. He thought he was hallucinating. That was fine. Claire did not care if her murderer believed this to be real. All that mattered was that she was the last thing he saw. The last thing he'd know in life before he was dragged down to Hell for his sins. For killing her, among others.

The death omen stalked towards her last victim. The last person she'd ever need to warn. Her slow, bloody smile left Peter Sheridan shaking, as he gargled and gurgled his own denial. Claire Becker's ghost faded away inches away from the dying detective's body as he took its last, drowning breath. The finalizing silence left behind two corpses, one in the wall, the other soaked in his own blood.

Sam let out a haggard sigh and Diana lowered her gun with a truly shaking hand now.

"It's over?" she asked hesitantly, glancing at the hunter as he backed off a couple of steps to give her space. He nodded.

They could probably skip the salt-'n-burn, too, Sam thought, as he glanced back towards where the body was still in the wall. Claire had found her own peace, and her remains would be paramount evidence in the case against the deceased dirty cop.

"Oh, thank god," Andy practically gasped, doubling over with his hands on his knees to heave a couple deep breaths. The poor kid. Sam crossed over to him as Diana holstered her gun. He put a comforting hand on the shorter man's shoulder. Andy looked up at him, something pained but knowing on his face. He nodded reassuringly, and Sam shared a sad smile with him.

These boys. The stories they must have. The horrors, too. Diana didn't envy them.

Staring at the growing bruise and burn on Andy's face, she moved over to the two and offered her own hand on the kid's shoulder. He didn't look built for this kind of crazy, and Diana could not help but feel responsible. It had been her partner, her lover, who'd blindsided the both of them. "You alright?"

"Yeah," he reassured her, though she could still feel the slight shake of trembling muscles beneath her hand. "Just, let's not do that again, okay?"

"Sounds good to me." Diana couldn't agree more, actually. She turned to look at her partner's body, at the hole in the brick wall, and the entire mess her life had become in forty-eight hours. What on earth was she supposed to do now?

"So what now, detective?" Sam asked, the prodding in his voice a mirror to her own uncertainty. But, she supposed, she could start by helping to clean up the most recent mess Pete had made. She turned back to them, a hand on her waist, and chewed on her lip for a second of thought.

"Well, Pete did confess to me. He screwed up both your cases royally." She sighed and passed a hand though her hair. "I'd say there's a good chance we could get them dismissed."

Sam straightened in surprise, his face lightening, though his furled brow remained concerned. "You'd take care of that for us?"

"I hope so." Although, she had a feeling whatever the heck the kid in front of her actually was (and she did not want to know. Andy was a good old human in her book, and he was staying that way, so help her), he could probably 'take care of that' with a whole lot less paperwork. Diana grimaced, realizing that, honestly, these boys might not have a choice. They weren't the only police department looking for them, after all. "But the Sacramento kidnapping charges? That's another story. I can't help you."

Sam shared a look with Andy, the growing disappointment on his face tempered by what she knew was an already forming plan.

"Unless… I just happened to turn my back." Two sets of eyes locked on her, blinking owlishly. "And you walked away. I could tell them the suspects escaped."

Again. After all, it wouldn't be the first time with these guys.

Andy looked completely and utterly fine with that, just about ready to collapse where he was standing, but Sam hesitated. He turned a pair of puppy dog eyes on her, full of worry and appreciation. "Are you sure? You could lose your job over something like that."

Diana drew in a deep breath, but she'd been sure of her answer well before she gave it. "Look, I just want you guys out there doing what you do best. Trust me, I'll sleep better at night." She paused for a moment, then turned towards Pete's body, already reaching for her cell phone to call it in. "Just, go get your brother and get out of here."

Andy practically grabbed Sam's arm like a child tugging a parent along at the sudden permission to leave the boring-ass-store-their-dad-had-dragged-them-to. Diana raised her hand to stop Sam from opening his mouth again, probably to protest good naturedly one last time.

"I don't want to know how you're going to do it. Just go." Diana offered a crooked smile as Sam's shoulders sagged, in both relief and regret, and he nodded. As he turned to follow Andy, she stopped him one more time. "Sam, you need to watch your back. They're gonna be looking for you now – all three of you. And get your gun on your way out. I've gotta radio this in."

Sam thanked her again, a farewell smile both sweet and bittersweet across his handsome face. Then the two headed deeper into the store for his dropped weapon and the back way out. Diana really hoped it was the last she'd ever see of those boys, a wish meant with only the best of intention and promise for them. Staring at her partner's body and the shattered remains of both her career and life, she sure as hell didn't have a great amount of either for herself.

-o-o-o-

Dean was long gone by the time Diana got back to the precinct. It was chaos. The organized chaos of trained professionals now trying to get a handle on a very fucked up situation, but still chaos. Diana had called in Pete's death, along with the murder of Claire Becker and what the disastrous truths her partner had confessed to. CSU and a whole band of officers, led by the Captain himself, were on scene within a half hour. Diana didn't touch a thing, in part to preserve the scene and give herself the best chance at a corroborated story, but more than anything, because she didn't want to see the remains of Claire Becker bricked up in that wall. Didn't want to confirm the necklace she knew hung around a skeletal neck.

She couldn't even look at Pete's body, so she sat outside on the stoop of the warehouse and waited for her coworkers.

The Captain took her statement, an air of authority, complete disbelief, and stunned disapproval wrapping up what was a half hour of exhausting misery. By the time Diana got back to the precinct, the news of Dean Winchester's disappearance was wide-spread, and the news of her and Pete – their relationship, Pete's crimes, her self-defense killing, him attempting to kill multiple suspects, you name it – was just as known. Diana kept her face like stone, ignoring any look sent her way, sympathetic or judgmental, and followed the officer escorting her to the very same interrogation room Sam had escaped from twenty-four hours ago.

All she wanted to do was sleep for a week and never think of the man named Peter Sheridan again, but Diana knew that wasn't how this would go. She had responsibilities, and they included interviews, interrogations, and paperwork for what was likely to be days. The next week, at a minimum, would be spent trying to prove her innocence in all this (based almost entirely on ignorance and being completely and utterly duped by a man she'd thought loved her) so that maybe, just maybe, she'd still have a job at the end of it.

If she even wanted it. Which, given the looks most of her coworkers were sending her way, she likely wouldn't.

Internal Affairs was called in, and Diana spent most of that first day with them and the Captain. Over and over and over again, she told and retold the series of events that had led to her shooting Peter Sheridan. No, she didn't know where the drugs were, if there were any left. No, she didn't know where the money was, but Anthony Giles had been responsible for laundering it. No, she didn't know if Karen had been in on it. One could only assume from the tone of Pete's voice that Mrs. Giles was an innocent bystander caught in the crossfire. No, neither of the Winchesters were involved in the money-making scheme, to her knowledge. No, the Winchesters did not play a part in Karen or Tony Giles' murder. No, Sam Winchester did not kill Peter Sheridan. No, she didn't know how either of them had managed to escape custody. No, she didn't know who the damn lawyer was outside of his first name. No, she didn't god damn know where they were now.

The second day was an exact repeat of the first, only with different IA agents, the Chief of Police, and the Mayor. Who, frankly, had no business being there, was pretty much useless as part of the conversation, and only drove Diana to further frustration.

The third day was worse. On the third day, the FBI showed up, called in by the Mayor who had clear plans to make an example of the precinct as part of his campaign promises to clean up corruption. Probably all a part of that rumored gubernatorial bid next year. The FBI were somehow worse than IA, something Diana had not thought possible, as she found herself going over every second of those fifty-six hours with a comb that 'fine-toothed' was too loose a description for.

On the fourth day she was called back to the precinct, yet again, for another chat with the FBI. She couldn't imagine what else they could possibly hope to gain after yesterday's six straight hours of grilling. Whatever it was, she simply didn't have it for them. She didn't have much of anything left for anyone, at that point.

Diana entered the precinct and headed to her oh-so-favorite interrogation room for the fourth day in a row. With what few hours she had not spent in interrogation, Diana had gone home, which was only filled with reminders of how truly screwed up her life now was. Pete's toothbrush next to the bathroom sink. His shaving cream, razor, and shampoo in the shower. His clothes in her closet, his scent on her sheets. Diana had slept on the couch for those first two nights, if one could call it sleeping. Clean sheets hadn't been enough, even when she'd finally found the energy to change them. She'd thrown all of the rest of his things in the trash.

After the first round of questioning by IA, Diana had been suspended without pay for two weeks, pending their investigation. Following the results, she would either be charged, or her suspension re-evaluated. Diana's lawyer was confident she would be cleared of any wrong-doing, other than falling for the wrong man and being an oblivious and frankly pathetic detective. Her words, not his, but there wasn't much he or anyone else could say to the contrary. At least, not that she'd really listen to.

Diana sat down in the now-familiar and still-uncomfortable chair across from a man she didn't recognize. He was dressed like FBI, had the stony expression befitting of a Fed, and there was a thin manila folder on the table in front of him with the FBI logo stamped on it. So, likely a Fed. Diana could hardly gather the energy to wonder why yet another agent needed to talk to her when there were now multiple written accounts and every single detail, down to the least significant, had been pulled from her like a bad tooth.

"Look, whatever you want to know, you can find it any one of the reports," she stated, voice as hard and cold as it was drained. "There's nothing left to tell, agent."

"Henriksen," the dark skinned man introduced himself with a shark-like smile that put Diana instantly on edge. Not because it was aimed at her in any real way, but because this was a man with a bone, and Diana didn't know who – or what – that bone was. "And I'm not here about Detective Sheridan or your precinct's corruption scandal, though I can say it is an impressive one."

Diana stared at him, uncertainty and unease pulling her face into a stony frown. Agent Henriksen pulled out two pictures from the folder, passing them over. They were both from the precinct interrogation security footage. One was Sam Winchester being escorted out by Andy, the officer manning the door standing there with it wide open, hand over his eyes.

Officer Miller had not been able to explain his actions. He had not been able to explain anything about those one hundred and twenty seconds, only that they had happened and afterward he'd been left standing there, blinking, and asking himself if he'd dreamed them up. Because he wouldn't have done such a ridiculous, careless, and illegal thing.

None of the seven officers and two civilians who'd started a fight in the precinct that night or blatantly turned away from the escaping suspect could explain their behavior. And Diana never had gotten an answer out of the "lawyer."

The second picture was of Dean, having just stood from the chair, rubbing at surprisingly free wrists, handcuffs and chains pooled on the interrogation room table next what was clearly a set of improvised lock-picks. But what surprised Diana was who he was smiling at. She frowned at the second person in the picture, someone she didn't know. It was a woman, mostly turned away from the camera. She had dark hair and was wearing a trench coat. Diana had heard that an unidentified person had assisted in Dean Winchester's escape, but she'd just assumed it was Andy again. This woman, she didn't know.

The detective looked up to meet Agent Henriksen's bright and fierce eyes. He was watching her, likely to gauge her reaction to the two escaped fugitives. Two criminals who, before this case blew up in the Baltimore P.D.'s face, had only been a set of fingerprints and rough eye-witness sketches, sitting in a thin folder mostly forgotten on an FBI agent's desk.

"You see, Detective Ballard, I have no interest in you or your partner." Henriksen nodded his head at the two photos as Diana set them stiffly back on the table. "I'm here for the Winchesters."

Chapter End Notes

A/Ns: And the FBI are now on scene! Okay, so fifty eight pages, twenty nine thousand words, and four friggin' chapters all so Andy could have a lip caterpillar and so we could get Henrikson on scene. Fine, Muse, you win; I guess that's kind of important.

Dean's note: If you don't remember from the episode, Hilts is Steve McQueen's character in The Great Escape. Benson is a reference to Det. Olivia Benson from Law and Order: SVU. I would have used an exorcist line for Linda Blair instead, but since she was a kid in that movie, nothing about that was going to come across as not-forced-as-hell, sadly. Benecio Del Toro was the first actor that came to mind when I tried to think of one who looked similar to the actor who played Peter Sheridan (who did not play anyone recognizable enough for Dean to quote, unfortunately).

Cas: Did I spend fourchapters with absolutely no angel only to have him be the one to get Dean out of the precinct without actually writing the scene? Yes. Yes I did. I figure if Dean grumbling in his head at Cas was enough to make you all happy, him smiling at a little jail break was gonna flat out break hearts ;) Plus, I kinda want Henrikson going after Andy and Cas too this time around. Or at least have them on his radar.

Castiel will be making a legitimate appearance in upcoming chapters. Like, a big, big, big, oh shit, oh crap, you are a mother effing dirty rotten author, Silence, you jerk, level appearance. It'll be over the span of, like, nine chapters because I am fucking verbose and it's Croatoan, but I promise it's coming ;D

And now I have to go get on a flight. Like, they're legitimately boarding and I'm sitting on the floor next to a plug typing like mad... Adios, until next time, all my lovely readers :)

Chapter 73: Season 2: Chapter 40

Chapter Notes

A/Ns: Thanks so so so so so much for the reviews last chapter! I'm really glad so many of you told me you liked the last four chapters, since I was sitting there bashing my head about just how long that one episode was getting.

I am once more sitting in an airport next to a plug desperately trying to get this chapter up while they start boarding my plane. I'm cutting it even closer this time XD

Chapter Warnings: Chuck's sharing State secrets, Persephone's reminded where her loyalties are supposed to lie, Dean's getting unhappy hunches, Sam's being stubborn but not altogether wrong, and poor Andy's just dragged along for the ride he can't bring himself to get off of.

Actual Chapter Warnings: Drug use and judgment against that particular drug of choice. Due to this, I am going to post the following disclaimer: the below opinions concerning drug usage, both positive and negative, belong to the characters and do not reflect personal opinion on my part.

See the end of the chapter for more notes

-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-

The Road So Far (This Time Around)

Season 2: Chapter 40

-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-

When Chuck opened his door Monday morning to the standard, three-rap knock of his no-nonsense Editorial Assistant, he beamed like a kid coming down the stairs Christmas morning. Stephanie just raised one eyebrow, and Chuck sheepishly admitted he hadn't been sure she'd come back.

"I told you I would," was all the woman had said, like that should have been enough from the get-go. She walked past Chuck, straight to his living room and her chair, which was still in its spot over by the window.

The writer, caught between further embarrassment and a touch of defense (it wasn't like he was used to people showing up in the first place, let alone sticking around long enough to be missed), closed his front door and followed after the blonde, who immediately demanded to see the progress he'd made while she'd been away. Chuck scrambled for the new chapters, Stephanie sat in her chair, and all was right in the world.

That was Monday. Today was Thursday, and Chuck and Steph were in the kitchen sharing a glass of lemonade while Chuck babbled on about the characters and their most recent experience with the Baltimore Police department. He'd managed to get two (two!) smiles out of her so far and even a partial chuckle (he was on a roll), when the woman suddenly hissed as if in pain, head twitching and tilting to the side like she had a bad neck cramp.

"Steph?" Chuck paused in his animated retelling of a Andy Gallagher role-playing a mustached lawyer, as his Editorial Assistant raised a hand to her throat and rubbed at the skin there until it was ringed red. "You okay?"

Whatever it was – a cramp, Chuck suspected, though how weird for it to come out of nowhere (perhaps she needed more potassium and magnesium in her diet?) – seemed to pass and Stephanie offered him a tight smile.

"Sorry, I didn't mean to interrupt." She set her glass of lemonade, barely more than a quarter drank, down on the counter beside her.

"Not at all-"

"I'm going to step outside for a minute," she continued, much to Chuck's confusion (and slight alarm, certain it was probably something he'd done, again). "I'll be right back."

Before she'd made it out of the kitchen, Chuck, who was definitely internally panicking because he liked his Editorial Assistant, yet kept getting the weirdest sensation he was going to lose her every time she walked out the door, blurted, "Do you wanna see something cool first?"

Steph paused on the threshold of the kitchen, raising that sardonic eyebrow in his direction. At least this time it was partially amused. "Right this second?"

"Sure." Chuck shrugged, laughing weakly at his own awkwardness. He crossed the kitchen, passing her in the doorway and leading the way into the living room. "It'll only take a sec. I wanted to show it to you earlier, but kinda forgot."

The woman followed after him, so Chuck decided not to be too embarrassed by the poor and panicked attempt to keep her around. He set his own glass of lemonade down on his writing desk and shuffled through the multitude of papers there. It took a bit of scrambling, but he finally found the one he was looking for. "It's kind of like a deleted scene. I thought you might enjoy it."

She took the pages from him, nothing more than a small excerpt about a demon encounter the boys had had. Steph scanned the paragraphs quickly, while Chuck rambled on about what she was reading even as she read it.

"It's a hex bag that paralyzes demons! The idea just came to me." He moved his hands around as he talked, both in a nervous fidget and animated excitement that he so rarely got about his own story. Or, well, used to rarely get. He'd never really been a fan of his own writing; he always thought he'd like to write something else, sci-fi or mystery perhaps, but it was only ever flashes of 'Supernatural' that came to him. However, it turned out what he'd needed was someone to talk about it with, someone who was both detached and also weirdly invested. Encouraging, at the very least. It was odd and out of his comfort zone, but considering this was the most human interaction Chuck had possibly ever had in his adult life and the best he'd ever felt about his chosen career, he'd take what he could get. "You can tie it to a string and wrap it around the demon and bam, instant paralysis! Cool, right?"

"Very cool," Stephanie replied in that sort of monotone way that always had Chuck questioning whether it was, in fact, cool at all. He was starting to figure out that was just Steph though. Like she knew the words to say but hadn't figured out the meaning behind them. Probably had to do with English being her second language, again. Not that Chuck had ever figured out what that first language was. "Why did you take it out of the story?"

She was reading the page again, which included a thorough description of how to make the bag, with all its ingredients and even the necessary incantation. Chuck didn't really know why he'd written it out in that much detail – he usually kept all the magic and hoodoo a lot vaguer – but it just seemed important at the time.

"Oh, it was too easy." He laughed another weak little laugh, rubbing at the back of his neck self-consciously. "Readers like it when the characters struggle, you know?"

Stephanie regarded him with that look again, definitely amused but also so, so harsh. "Didn't you give them a gun that could kill anything?"

The laugh that left Chuck's chest this time was entirely self-deprecating, as was the sheepish smile and red tinge to his cheeks. "Yeah…that had to go too. I think it's why I killed John Winchester, honestly. I guess I could have just had them chuck it or something…."

The eyebrow got worse. "Why would they throw away a weapon that valuable?"

Chuck's laugh got a little more nervous, his cheeks a little more red. "Yeah, you're right. Killing John Winchester was probably better."

Steph didn't agree one way or the other, she just handed the pages back. Even as she did, her expression pinched sharply, her head twitching in another spasm of pain, and her arm raised in an ultimately aborted move towards her neck.

Chuck's smile was strained but he pushed her hand and the pages back towards her. "Keep them. It's not like I'm gonna put it in the story."

Or even keep the excerpt. He hadn't been sure why he wrote it in the first place. His Editorial Assistant looked surprised for a scant moment before she folded the pages and walked over to her chair and the purse sitting beside it. Steph slid the papers inside and gathered the handles. She was rubbing her neck again, bag over one shoulder, when she returned.

"You have to go?" Chuck asked, and Steph nodded, reaffirming that she would only be stepping out for a moment. The writer smiled and tried to believe her. As he escorted her to the front door, he paused, hand on the knob, and glanced back at her. "You sure you're okay, Steph?"

The smile she gave was one of those rare real ones and it made the writer smile in return. The little knot in his stomach he couldn't explain but wrote off as a pathetic crush loosened ever so slightly.

"I'm fine, Chuck. I'll be right back."

With a weak nod he tried to have more faith in, he opened the door and watched his Editorial Assistant disappear down the steps and around the corner of his neighbor's hedges, like she did every evening at six pm. Only it was just after two and he didn't like the boulder sized rock in his gut. An identical set of eyes, set into the same face and similar in every way but for the age and knowledge in them, also watched the woman leave with a touch more suspicion and knowledge of real cause behind the knot in Chuck Shurley's stomach.

-o-o-o-

It was the yellow-eyed Prince of Hell waiting for her, this time, and Persephone regarded him with the distaste a demon of his caliber deserved.

"You are aware there is an Archangel attached to the Prophet, are you not?" she immediately spat as she came to a stop in front of him, glaring up as she shouldered the stupid bag that passed for fashion these days. The straps lay only an inch from the reddened, irritated skin of her neck, where an invisible, gold chain lay wrapped around her throat. A chain Azazel had enjoyed tugging on for the last seven and a half minutes. "Raphael may not be the most observant, but you are playing with fire, demon."

"I was going to say the same to you," Azazel returned with a lazy, toothy smile. He dropped the chain from his hand, or at least he did on the plane of existence he'd hidden the thing, and Persephone twisted and cracked her neck in annoyance as it was freed. The chain remained, but it was looser where it lay against her skin.

The demon crossed his arms over his chest, leaning back against the fence of some white collar family home. He'd considered spending some time with the woman and two children residing inside while he waited for his wayward asset. Just because he could (and because he hated waiting). However, Persephone had shown up before he'd quite settled on what he would do to them. Azazel regarded her now with the same smile he would have worn when he slaughtered those children in front of their mother.

"Tom says you're not being a team player, Princess. Didn't your parents teach you how to share?"

The twitch in her jaw and the aborted twist of her neck had nothing to do with the chain this time. Persephone bared her teeth like an animal. "What exactly are you expecting here? You told me to watch the boys from afar and I am doing that. Providing you or your incompetent offspring with information is not why I am playing house with the Prophet. If you expected it to be, then you are stupid." She crossed her arms over her chest, a move Azazel was beginning to recognize as a tell. "Chuck doesn't even use their last name in his writings! He does not get more specific than that, demon. There has been nothing to share."

Azazel hummed, running his tongue over his teeth behind sealed lips. Reaching out with a lazy hand, he tapped a finger against the top of her head. "Oh, I don't know. I think your daddy sculpted more than beauty into that head of yours, Princess; you're not fooling me. You might not have specifics, but that doesn't mean you don't have information worth sharing."

She shoved his hand away with a hiss, eyes ablaze with a fiery green glow, and Azazel grinned all the wider. The woman seethed, but he knew she was quickly losing the control she desperately fought for.

"See, we need the boys to visit a little town in Oregon." He stretched out to muss her hair but this time she dodged him, taking a step and a half back and out of his reach. Azazel didn't bother following; he was content with the point he'd made. "So, put that pretty head of yours to use and get them there."

When her fierce gaze did not budge – all of that loss of control so clear beneath rage – the yellow eyed demon sighed dramatically.

"How about we skip the part of the conversation where I remind you that I dug you out of that hole-"

"You dug me out of that hole to bind with Sam Winchester!" she cut him off, anger and that famous temper of hers finally boiling over. Azazel's hand twitched for the chain once more but if Persephone noticed the threat, she didn't care. "Instead, you have be babysitting a Prophet right under an Archangel's nose."

Azazel did wrap his hand around the end of that chain, giving it a hard enough tug that Persephone bent practically double and lurched into the demon's waiting grip. Azazel could feel the thin links of metal beneath his hand, wrapped tightly around her neck, and he decided a little extra pressure was needed. A creature such as she could not be choked to death, but it was still rewarding to hear her struggle for the air she was compelled to take in.

"I dug you out of that hole to do as I say, when I say." The demon lifted his arm until the tips of her toes were left struggling for purchase on the sidewalk. "You can start making yourself useful or you can go back to being chained up in the motel room twenty-four-seven until I do have use of you."

He released both her neck and the chain and she stumbled for footing, hacking through a partially crushed larynx.

"It's your choice, Princess."

Persephone hacked several harsh exhales, bent over with one hand braced on her knee, the other on her throat, before she was able to look up enough to glare at him. The first time she tried to speak, her voice broke before she'd finished the first word, and Azazel waited patiently through the second round of coughs. The woman straightened a second time and held out her hand as she took deep, even breaths.

"Give me your phone." Her voice was still rough, but she gestured with her hand when Azazel merely stared at her. "I know you have one. Give it to me."

The demon stared her down for another moment – a power play, she knew – before he reached into his shirt pocket and pulled out a slim smart phone. Persephone took it, unlocking the device and pulling up the virtual keypad.

"Bobby Singer's landline." It was a question in the form of a demand and she glanced expectantly from phone to demon. Those green beauties were pissed but also quite a lovely shade of defeated and Azazel rather enjoyed preening under that gaze. When he only raised an eyebrow in response, Persephone added, annoyed, "The one he uses as FBI."

"He has six," the demon answered, that lazy smile back in place. "We don't know which is which."

Her jaw clenched around tightly ground teeth. "The one with the DC area code."

Azazel hummed again, smile stretching smug across his face. He reached up and tapped his own head mockingly, waggling eyebrows at her. That jaw clenched even tighter. The demon rattled off the two-o-two number and she punched it into the phone.

The gruff voice of Bobby Singer answered after three rings. "This is Agent Willis."

"Hello Agent Willis, this is Detective Diana Ballard, with the Baltimore Police Department." At her words, the yellow-eyed demon raised a languid eyebrow and Persephone kept right on glaring at him. "I'm trying to reach Agents Frehley and Simmons? Um…Sam and Dean?"

She dropped her voice at the end, tinged with uncertainty and the likes of a secret. She knew the second Singer picked up on it. "Of course. Everything alright, officer?"

"Yes, everything's fine here. We haven't had anymore, uh, problems since your agents left. But a friend of mine in Oregon called me. It sounded like they were having the kind of…thing your boys might be interested in?"

There was a shuffle in the background of the line as Bobby grabbed a pad of paper and a pen. "Well, I can get a message to them. This friend of yours got a name?"

"Rachel Williams." Persephone sent a glance Azazel's way. He was watching her indolently, but in response to a sharp look, mouthed the name of the town widely. "She's with the Rivergrove Sheriff's department."

"I'll send them her way."

"Thank you, Agent Willis." Persephone lowered the phone, ending the call and tossing it back at the demon. "It will take them a while. The Winchesters are in Mississippi."

"Oh," Azazel said offhandedly, tucking the phone back into the front pocket of his flannel with the flair of a man purposefully acting nonchalant. "Their location we already know."

Persephone's glare darkened, realizing he'd been testing her in more ways than one, and she shifted her weight in the face of his purposefully obnoxious smile. "We done?"

That expression shifted even more so, now the cat who'd caught the canary, and Persephone wanted to rip it off his face. The chain around her still-irritated neck was a painful reminder that she could do no such thing. The demon tapped the phone against his palm. "We're done. But I'll be checking in on you again real soon."

Without bothering to respond, she turned her back on the demon and headed for the Prophet's house, hand wrapped tight against her purse and the pages within that Chuck had given her.

-o-o-o-

Dean hung up with a quick, "Yeah, we got it. Thanks, Bobby," and tucked the phone into his pocket, leaning back in his seat to do so. Across from him, typing away on his computer in the internet café they were camped out at, Sam raised a brow.

"Detective Ballard called him," Dean answered the unspoken question, reaching out to grab his coffee, giving it the side eye when he realized it wasn't the beer he wanted it to be. Stupid coffee shops. Bars had wifi, too. Of course, bars weren't usually open at ten in the morning. "Said she's got a friend in Oregon with a possible case."

Oregon would be quite a trek, having just wrapped up a case way down south, but if that's where the next job was, that's where they'd go. Besides, Diana had done them one hell of a favor letting them just walk like that (again). They owed her, and this time if she'd come to collect, they were sure as hell going to answer.

They'd have to wait for Andy to get back from wherever he'd gone. The hunt hadn't been an easy one for him. Back to back, really, what with getting held hostage with a gun to his head in Baltimore. Hell, the kid still had one hell of a shiner from that encounter, the thing now an ugly yellow-green across his eye and temple. But this case… Dean shook his head. Crossroad demons were a piece of work, that was for sure, and the one they'd gone and summoned in an attempt to save Evan Hudson's life had certainly worked the angle on the poor kid.

Dean, having the more experience with the bastards, had planned to go to the crossroads alone and bargain for Evan's contract once more. It was a stupid play, really. Yes, they were hunters, but Evan had made his choice ten years ago. Risking everything – the damn apocalypse – on something like summoning and chatting up a crossroads demon just to save one man…

It was Winchester level stupid. Which is probably why they did it, because Dean Winchester was not capable of looking a person in the eye, knowing firsthand the fate they were about to suffer, and turn his back on them. There wasn't a person on the planet he wouldn't try to save from a lifetime on the rack downstairs. That was just one of his crosses to bare.

So he'd gone, but he'd had an unexpected tagalong. Andy had spent the case growing quieter and quieter, to the point where both Winchesters were sharing worried glances behind the kid's back. When it came time to split up, Sam buying some time against the hellhounds and Dean off to the crossroads, Andy had been insistent he go with Dean.

The hunter should have known better.

He'd just about wrapped the deal with the devil-trapped hell-bitch – her continued non-exorcised existence for Evan's contract – when she'd turned red eyes on the kid and asked, "What about you, handsome?"

Before Dean could shut it down, he knew they were neck deep, a mile up a certain creek without so much as a floaty, let alone a paddle.

"What about me?"

"You miss your girl, don't you?" Andy went paler than any ghost Dean had ever seen, and that was no simple challenge. Damnit, he needed to put an end to this right friggin' now. "I could bring her back."

"Don't, Andy," Dean hissed, turning his back on the demon to face Andy, whose wide, horrified, and so, so desperate eyes stayed locked on the woman in the center of the devil's trap. "Believe me, kid. It's not worth it."

Andy's gaze turned his way, but it was numb and glassy and Dean's stomach sank down to the dirt floor. "I got her killed, Dean. If I could bring her back-"

"And what? Tell her you sold your soul for her? Ten years, if you're lucky, and then a lifetime of pain until you turn into one of those?" Dean tossed his head in the direction of the red eyed bitch behind him. "You think Tracy would want you to become like her? Tricking other people into trading away their souls for the thing they want most?"

Andy's eyes dropped and they took Dean's heart (the one he usually wouldn't admit to having) with them.

"I get kid. I do." He put a hand on Andy's shoulder and squeezed, hard enough to remind the kid that he was still alive. "I've been there, I did that. And I've been the reason someone else did that. I will tell you right now, you don't want to do this. Tracy won't want to be the person left behind, knowing her life cost you yours. Trust me."

"You should let the boy make his own decisions, Dean." The demon, head cocked to the side, desperately trying to listen in, smiled sweetly when she recaptured Andy's gaze. "I'm not talking you into anything, honey. I'm just putting all your options on the table."

"Yeah, sure you are." If they'd had the Colt, Dean would have shot her right between the eyes.

Andy lowered his gaze, fists clenched by his sides, but he didn't speak again. The demon sighed, but turned her attention back to the Winchester, and they sealed their deal without a part in it for Andy.

Afterward, she smacked her lips with thinly veiled distaste while Andy dug his heel through the dirt-drawn devil's trap. "You taste like righteousness, honey. It's disgusting."

"Yeah, yeah," Dean wiped his own mouth with the back of his hand. "And you taste like roses. Now beat it."

The demon scoffed but was gone with the parting words of, "Gotta love a man with manners."

Andy didn't say a word on their drive back, Dean calling Sam to make sure they'd pulled through the hellhounds attack. The kid they knew didn't resurface, even when Dean tried to pull him out of that dark, dangerous headspace he knew only too well. They'd gotten back to the motel, Andy going straight to bed without so much as a mumbled, 'night', leaving Dean to drag Sam outside and give him the recap.

The kid hadn't been much better in the morning, though at least he'd been speaking. The jargon that came out of his mouth had been another language, at least to Dean, but the context gave was sufficient to figure out the mumbling was pot-related. Andy was planning on finding a score, which was reason for enough for Dean to wave his hand and tell the kid to get lost, come back when he was done. Not like they couldn't all use a little time apart.

Although, currently, the two brothers hadn't exactly gotten more than a foot and a half between them yet. Sam wanted internet and Dean didn't have anywhere better to be, other than morosely finding the bottom of a bottle after a case involving Crossroad deals, especially one hitting so close to home for one of their own. But that seemed like a terrible idea to do alone and he'd been better in recent years. Or, at least trying.

"Did Bobby say how she was?"

Dean glanced up, blinking at his brother as he was brought back to the conversation at hand. Sam spared him a telling glance over the top of his laptop before he went back to typing. Dean didn't even know what he was up to over there. They'd wrapped the case, saved the guy who'd been stupid and desperate enough to make a deal ten years ago. Nothing more to be clack-clacking about.

"Uh…why would he?"

Sam sent him another one, not quite a bitchface, but a key building block: exasperation. "He wouldn't, it's just… you know, Diana really stuck her neck out for us. Something like that could cost a cop their career."

Like Dean needed the reminder. Perhaps Diana Ballard's willingness to look the other way hadn't ended up as live-saving for him this time around as it had for Sam and Andy, what with Cas having not been up to much and amenable to an earth-side assist when Dean sent an if-you-happen-to-be-free prayer heavenward. But he remembered what she'd done for him the first time. She and Sam saved his life, and her letting them go had been far more a save for Dean, who would have been sent back to St. Louis on murder charges. It didn't matter that that's not what had gone down this time; he owed the detective for both, regardless.

"Yeah, well, I kinda doubt she shared her life story with Bobby." Dean played with the straw of his to-go cup, iced coffee growing pretty watery by now. He shoved the thing in out and out of its top, making an obnoxious, plastic screeching that earned him a glare from his brother.

Sam couldn't really refute Dean's point. Still, he wondered how the detective was fairing. Her life had been turned upside down, although for once on a case it was largely not due to the Winchesters. There wasn't much to do about it, however. The woman probably wanted them out of her life completely, sans sending them in the direction of a hunt. Sam sure would.

Dean set his cup down another minute later, a frown on his face. Sam wasn't really paying attention, having gone back to researching Crossroads Deals. Dean had told him plenty on and off, but Sam found control in researching something for himself, and that control offered the kind of comfort his big brother just couldn't. The recent case hadn't just struck a nerve for Andy; Sam was plenty unnerved himself. The deal Dean had made and Evan Hudson's narrowly avoided fate drudged up the still-recent death of their own father. As if that wasn't enough emotional turmoil to trudge through, it was a reminder of what, according to the world Dean had already lived through, would be Dean's fate in less than a year's time.

But his brother didn't need to know that was what he was researching.

"Did you give her Bobby's number?"

Sam paused at the question, blinking at Dean's tone. And now his face, which had grown serious in the oh-shit sort of way that never spelled anything good for them. Sam shook his head. He'd thought it after he and Andy had left the supply store on Ashland, regretting not leaving Diana a way to contact them. A cop with knowledge of the supernatural and a hunter's number in her back pocket could be huge for getting on cases quickly, before multiple victims piled up. But Sam had been focused on getting Dean out of the precinct before Diana called in Sheridan's deeds and death.

Not that he'd need to, of course. No, the jerk had been back at the motel all along, Cas having gotten him out almost twenty minutes earlier.

In the end, though, it was probably for the best that they hadn't left any traceable ties to Diana Ballard, in case her department went heavy on the investigation into her involvement.

Dean's eyes were narrowed now, jaw tightening in a way that made Sam close his computer, full attention on his brother. "I didn't, either. So how the hell did she get Bobby's number?"

Huh. Okay, so maybe that was a little weird, but Sam didn't really think much of it. He shrugged. "We're in the system now. Known associates are something cops keep track of." Dean still didn't look convinced – how would Bobby have even popped up on their radar? – but Sam continued, "Diana knew all about me. The house fire, dad dragging us across the country. They probably knew about Bobby, too."

The older Winchester was shaking his head. "Something doesn't feel right. What's she doing calling us about some small town in Oregon? She just happens to have a friend out there who calls her about a mysterious case and our number on hand, which we didn't give her? Nah, something about this stinks."

Sam watched as Dean fidgeted, pulling at his t-shirt like it was too tight across his chest, despite the fact it was the same size as every shirt his brother owned. The first swirls of unease stirred in his gut as he stared at his sibling's agitated tell. "Is this a timey-sense thing?"

"I don't know. But somethings up." Dean abandoned the pretense and just flat out rubbed at his sternum. Cas was fidgeting in there as much as he was, and something ugly – like suspicion – was building in Dean's gut. His stupid chest angel only ever reacted to two things: Dean's own self-loathing and demons. While the recent case and dealing with those red-eyed bastards had stirred up some seriously unpleasant memories, Dean had a feeling that had nothing to do with the tightness behind his ribcage now.

In fact, the hunter had a growing hunch.

Dean dug his phone back out of his pocket, dialing Bobby's number. The phone rang three times before the older hunter answered. "Hey, Bobby. That woman you talked to, did she have an accent?"

Across the table, Sam's brow pinched. Diana Ballard didn't have an accent. At least, not much of one. What was Dean getting at?

Whatever Bobby's response was, it turned Dean's face stone-cold blank. He thanked the older man and hung up again.

"What'd he say?" That knotted unease was full-well on its way to dread.

"Lady had an accent. Bobby thought Jewish, maybe Arabic." Dean tapped his cell on the tabletop, his glare deadly but not meant for Sam. "Sound familiar?"

It took only a moment, but the younger Winchester's frame tensed with an unpleasant memory. "The wrong number call. The one Crowley warned us about, that Hell had traced."

Dean's tight-lipped smile was anything but friendly. "Azazel's girl."

Sam glanced down at the top of his laptop, thinking about the implication. "Oregon's a trap."

His brother swore, tossing his phone onto the wood. Its clatter made Sam twitch, but he covered it well. "We need to know everything about this Rivergrove place, and why Azazel wants us there."

But Sam's thoughts were on another trap. The motel in that college town where Crowley had found them and warned them Azazel was coming. The bar they'd gone to afterward, hoping to trap a demon trying to search their room. The utter nothing that had come out of it all. And a woman he'd met who had a strange accent.

"What's with the constipation face?" Dean was staring at him, and although his words were pure snark, the look on his face was serious.

Sam ignored the quip, shifting in his chair, jaw squared with growing realization. "Both of those are Semitic languages."

The older hunter just stared at his kid brother. "…yeah, so?"

Sam chewed on the left side of his cheek, grinding his teeth together not out of anger but indecision. "Semitic languages, that alphabet, they all came out of the same place, Dean: Phoenicia. You know what else they call the Phoenician alphabet?"

"I bet your gonna tell me."

"Proto-Canaanite."

Dean stilled at the word. It wasn't immediately familiar to him – he never was and never would be the geek genius his brother was – but he'd heard it before, from the kid's own mouth, even. He closed his eyes briefly as it hit. "The green-eyed lady in your vision."

Sam didn't look any happier about it. "Azazel was in that vision too."

"Great." Dean leaned back in his chair harder than was probably necessary, glaring at the table like it was a physical representation for the mess this was turning into. "So now Yellow Eyes has some mystery monster playing phone tag with us, leading us wherever the hell he wants. That's just great."

The younger Winchester fell quiet again, thinking about the bar and the woman he'd 'bumped' into. He went back to grinding his teeth in indecision once again. "There's something else." When Dean looked up, an unhappy expression on his face that didn't actually have a whole lot to do with Sam (yet), the younger Winchester continued. "There was a woman. I met her in the bar that night, after Crowley."

That expression shifted from 'you dog!' into 'you've got to be kidding me' so fast it was impressive Dean didn't get a headache. But Sam couldn't help but take offense to where that look ended. He wasn't stupid; he hadn't done anything with her. They'd just talked. Well… and that one other thing.

"She didn't look like the lady in the dream. She was blonde and had blue eyes." Although, thinking back on it now like he certainly hadn't been then, the two had been about the same height and build. "She had an accent. I thought it was maybe Yiddish, but it easily could have been one of the ones Bobby mentioned."

His brother was looking more and more grumpy, and Sam hadn't even gotten to the bad part. He was stalling, and he knew it.

"She bumped into me while I was getting a beer. Spilled her drink." The hunter looked down at his hand, the cut having long ago scabbed over and faded. He couldn't remember what had happened to her glass. Sam thought maybe it had ended up on the bar, but really, that only meant anyone could have taken it. The younger Winchester didn't want to meet Dean's eye. It was stupid. Careless. To let a demon – or someone working for a demon – so easily trick him with a cute smile and batted eyelashes. Damn it, he was so much smarter than that. "Her glass cut my hand."

Across from him, Dean went still. Terrifyingly still. "So…they have your blood?"

"Yeah," Sam answered, voice cold and quiet. "They could."

"Great, Sam. That's great. Are you kidding me?" Dean slammed his hand down on the table, causing his kid brother to jump, however little, and several other patrons to glance their way. They were lucky it wasn't peak coffee-shop hours, but that didn't mean the place was empty.

Dean knew it wasn't actually Sammy's fault, and the kid certainly looked like he was stewing in enough guilt and self-loathing to not need his brother's help there. The older Winchester let out an aggravated sigh, never having been much good at biting back his temper or assuaging the guilt when he inevitably failed. Damnit, he remembered the way Sammy had looked at the bar, suddenly relaxed and, dare he think it, almost happy. He'd known in a second the kid had found some cute thing that raised his spirits, and he'd been proud of him.

Whoever this lady was, she was good as dead in his book.

"There's nothing we can do about it now," he growled out instead and reached for Sam's computer, spinning it around to his side, flipping it open. "Let's find out what the hell is so important to that Yellow Eyed bastard in Rivergrove, for starters."

It wasn't much of an olive branch, and it certainly wasn't healing any wounds, but Sam took the out as Dean googled the town and waited for the crappy-ass wifi to finish loading the images. When it did, he swore a blue streak that had even Sam staring at him in surprise, let alone the rest of the patrons near them.

"What is it?" Sam grabbed the laptop and turned it around, but the only pictures on the screen were of a quaint little mountain town. Nothing worth the words coming out of his brother's mouth or the look on his face that Sam couldn't even quite place.

Dean didn't do scared, otherwise that's what Sam would call it.

"What's in Rivergrove?" he asked, kind of dreading the answer.

Not that the answer, when Dean gave it, made any sort of sense to him.

"Croats."

-o-o-o-

When Andy eventually made it back to the motel, blessedly high off some pretty good shit, it was to the middle of one hell of an argument.

"We're not going!" Dean was shouting at Sam, the volume of his voice and aggravation in it a readable measure of how long this fight had apparently been waging. "What part of walking into a trap are you not getting?"

"The part where we leave an entire town to die, Dean!"

"Whoa, whoa, whoa," Andy interrupted, standing wide-eyed, utterly stoned, and very, very lost in the doorway of the motel. "What'd I miss?"

Sam huffed something between a sigh and a scoff, but at this point in their relationship, Andy was used to being the kid, kid brother. Sam had never gotten to be the older one, so he had a tendency to be a little condescending. But Andy had never had a brother either, so he figured they were both overdue. Dean, meanwhile, just crossed his arms and refused to talk, so the duty fell to Sam to explain just what the hell was going on.

Hell being the key word there.

Andy sank onto one of the mattresses, desperately chasing a high that, while still chemically existent in his body, suddenly felt a lot less blissful.

"Zombies." He blinked slowly at the two brothers. "You're telling me we just got an SOS from a town in Oregon, but it's a trap-" and here he turned from one brother to the other- "because it's full of…angry zombies. Reavers. We're going to a town full of Reavers."

Sam dropped his arms with a heavy sigh. Which was apparently a yes.

Andy looked down at the backpack he'd left the motel room with earlier, woefully empty at the time and now happily holding enough weed to last him till the next time they had enough downtime after a hunt to hunt down a dealer. It sat on the bed beside him, staring up at him, beckoning him with oblivion that he only just realized how badly he needed.

"I'm not high enough for this."

Dean rolled his eyes, throwing up his hands from where he was leaning against the tv-stand. Whatever he might have been about to say, though, was silenced by a look from Sam. Andy had been shaky since Baltimore, to say the least, and yesterday's case had not helped. The kid was toughing his way through it, (smoking his way through it, more like), but the brothers had both noticed the change well before they'd made Mississippi. It wasn't that they disapproved so much as it wasn't either of their pick of poison when it came to forgetting the hell that could be their lives. Besides, Winchesters were so much better at worrying about each other than taking care of themselves.

"Maybe you should sit this one out," Sam suggested, offering an understanding smile, though Dean still thought it looked judgmental. Pitying, if nothing else. Not that any expression Dean had had around the kid when he was high lately had been much better. He wasn't the greatest at being non-judgmental in general. At least not with vices, hypocritical as that may be.

"We're all sitting this one out," Dean countered before Andy could take Sam up on his offer or decline it, as he had once again on the crossroads case. Much to his regret and now Dean's sense of smell. He was so not letting Andy in Baby like that. Kid stank. "Because we're not going."

"It's fine. I'm good," Andy said, voice about as vacant as his eyes, but Sam was already arguing back, neither of the Winchesters really hearing him.

"We can't just ignore this, Dean. You said we wouldn't run from everything!" Sam wasn't going to back down on this. It was a whole town of people – over three hundred from the city census – and according to his brother, they were all about to suffer pretty horrible fates. "You talk like Time is going to screw us over, but maybe we're supposed to go! What if it's been pointing us in the right direction all along?"

Dean could only stare, dumbstruck. "Are you serious? This is not a direction we wanna go, Sammy!"

"Well, we're supposed to be sticking to the timeline."

It was kind of a dirty trick, bringing Cas's words into this, but Sam was ready to pull out any of the tricks, including using Dean's sentiment for the angel against him.

"No," the older Winchester argued right back, pointer finger jabbing at Sam even from across the room, "we're supposed to be sticking to you-not-getting-yourself-killed!"

Sam held out his arms mockingly. "Did this kill me last time?"

Dean gritted his teeth, because the smug bastard already knew the answer to that question. "It tried its damnedest, Sam! Besides, there was no woman last time, therefore, timeline's already broken!"

Silence fell for half a minute, Dean temporarily in the lead but far from victor. Sam dropped his arms, staring at his brother with a heavy rise and fall of his chest.

"What woman?" Andy looked back and forth between the two of them, but neither brother answered his question.

"Then how did it happen?" Sam's question was posed innocently enough, even if it made Dean bristle with aggravation. He ran a hand through his hair, actually having to think about it.

When the answer came to him, he wasn't happy any more happy with it than he was with anything else in this discussion. "A vision."

The younger Winchester frowned, working through the differences in the timelines. "So, Azazel then. It was a trap last time too, Dean. Only this time, we blocked his ability to give me visions, so he found someone who could dial a phone."

The sarcasm wasn't helping Dean's non-existent calm. "Someone new, Sam. And new is bad!"

He hated the expression that overtook his brother's face. It was the one he got any time he'd managed to back his brother into a verbal corner. It was the lawyer look. The man from the future hated that look. Actually, just about every version of Dean hated that look.

"Not going to Rivergrove would be new."

"God damn it, Sammy." Dean threw his arms up again, shoving off the tv stand. "Stop twisting my words around. We are not going!"

-o-o-o-

Baby sat idling in the middle of the forest road, her driver white-knuckled on the steering wheel, staring at the last bridge between them and the town of Rivergrove, Oregon.

"This is a bad idea. This is the definition of a bad idea. In the history of bad ideas, this is right up there with not killing Hitler as a baby."

Sam glanced sidelong at his brother, who'd practically slammed on the breaks when they'd rounded the last bend and come across the bridge. A bridge Dean remembered crossing only once before. He'd tried for twice, but the damn thing had been barricaded with armed men, all of which had opened fire on him and one of which had tried to tag along for a ride through his window.

Dean really hadn't been okay with any of this for the entire two day drive. Sam was expecting him to eventually collapse into the grumbling older brother who didn't like it but was going along with it because he couldn't stop Sammy from doing it. And hell if his baby brother was going alone. But Dean never made it to that stage, and Sam hadn't ever seen him quite like this. Not much scared his big brother. Sure, the idea of losing Sam, the way they lost John, even losing Jo or Cas; those were the sorts of things that scared Dean. Intangible things beyond his control.

But not monsters. Not even zombies.

There was something about these 'croats' that had Dean pretty shaken up and he wouldn't really talk about it. So far, despite all the information he'd given them about the event itself, he'd only said the creatures were bad mothers: quick to spread, difficult to kill, and the version of the virus waiting for them in Rivergrove, Oregon was difficult to spot in innocents until they turned on you. Sulfur in the blood was the only way they'd figured last time, and the incubation period could take hours.

Still, there was something more going on that Sam couldn't place. Something about the familiarity with which Dean used the slang term. Like he hadn't dealt with them just once, but a lot. It was the kind of future that fit right in with a coming apocalypse, and the kind of thing Sam needed to know, but really didn't want to ask. A reality too terrible to even imagine. One he was starting to worry Dean had lived through.

"Well, we're here," Sam said, but not harshly. "So we might as well check it out."

"Not with Baby, we're not." Dean continue to idle in the middle of the road, staring at the bridge. Sam frowned, but his brother was already switching to aggravation again. "They put the town on lockdown shortly after the breakout. Roadblocks at all the bridges, armed croats stopping anyone from leaving. No way out except on foot."

Dean put the car in reverse, spinning the wheel to turn her around. "If we're doing this, we're going in on foot because it's the only way we're getting back out if it all goes to hell."

Which it would. This was them they were talking about, after all.

Sam hesitated, the first inkling of just how bad an idea this really was setting his nerves on edge. Not that Dean hadn't warned him in every single way, using every possible word combination in existence, and all of the adjectives over the last thirty six hours. Sam had heard every single one, even accepted them, but he was still adamant that they need to do this.

Three hundred and twenty seven people lived in that town. Three hundred and twenty seven lives that needed saving, and only they could save them.

Still, as they drove about a half mile away from the bridge and pulled onto the shoulder, as much into the trees and bushes as they could, Sam did wonder how ill-conceived his notion of saving this town was.

The road to Hell was paved with good intentions, after all, and they were quite literally walking into Hell's waiting hands.

But, like he'd said, they were already here, and they had a job to do.

The three hunters took several minutes to arm themselves, filling packs with guns, plenty of ammunition, holy water, rosaries – the works – before they covered Baby with some cut branches, hiding her among the growth as much as possible. Then they shouldered their bags, turned down the road, and started the hike into Rivergrove and whatever was waiting for them there.

Chapter End Notes

A/Ns: Dun-Dun-Dunnnnn! Hehe, I've been waiting to write Croatoan for months, guys. Months! And it just gets better from here on out :D Oooh, you all are gonna hate me and I can't wait. ….There may be something very wrong with me…

Cas: Hang with me, he is coming. I'm just incapable of writing anything less than three chapters for every one episode. So, I promise, he's coming, but we've got to set the stage first ;)

Reviews: Thanks so much to everyone who has been reviewing or commenting. I love hearing from you guys and it really keeps me going! So keep those thoughts, words, all out screaming, you name it, coming :)

Delay Question Mark? Okay, so I'm off to meet my infant niece for the first time ever, which is very exciting, but also one giant question mark in terms of writing. Will I have time to write? Will I have time to edit a chapter? Will I even be getting enough sleep to function properly? That last one's probably a no… which means there is a good possibility I won't get a chapter up next weekend. It'll be a two-week delay at most though, so hang tight if you don't hear from me by next Sunday! I will do my best (I'm sure hoping to get some writing time on this 'vacation' but I imagine it just might not happen…)

Chapter 74: Season 2: Chapter 41

Chapter Notes

A/N's: Okay, obviously I did not make last week's post but I'm not making you wait till Sunday, either. Thank you all for your patience, understanding, and the many versions of "shut up, lady, we're here till the end, just post when you post and stop being such a worry-wart" (all versions of this were actually so much nicer than that but my internal comedian thinks self-deprecation is hilarious)

For real, though, thank you for all the support! It really keeps me going.

Chapter Warnings: We're checking out the quaint little town of Rivergrove, Oregon, which is about to get a whole lot less quaint. The boys have a plan - okay, the boys have half a plan - but Hell and a Zombie Apocalypse aren't gonna make it easy for them.

See the end of the chapter for more notes

-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-

The Road So Far (This Time Around)

Season 2: Chapter 41

-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-

Dean remembered the 2014 that was and never should have been. He'd had nightmares about the future Zachariah sent him to for years after he'd come back. Long after the apocalypse ended and with it the potential for that future. It wasn't until the actual year of 2014 had come and passed with no Croats in sight that Dean's mind was finally able to let go of that residual fear and the dreams stopped.

Now, the man from the future was once more facing the very real possibility. Yet again in his lifetime there was a not-insignificant chance of that world coming true. If they didn't stop Hell from starting the apocalypse, the 2014 that had caused so many sleepless nights would be back on the menu of potential ends, and here they were, walking into the very start of it all.

Dean had a feeling his subconscious would be starting those dreams back up again, not that he was planning on sleeping anytime soon.

Rivergrove was quiet as the three hunters hiked into the forest town. Nothing seemed out of the ordinary (but then, nothing ever did with these things). It was the standard fare of a late afternoon in small town America: a car passed down the main street now and then, a trio of older women stood chatting outside the local theatre, and a man on the porch outside the general store was cleaning a dismantled fishing pole.

"It seems pretty quiet," Sam commented, obviously going for calm and reassuring, given how tense Dean was beside him, eyes everywhere and hand a little too tight on the shoulder strap of his duffle.

"Yeah, that's how it starts," the older Winchester growled, but, at least for the moment, he didn't look like he was about to pull his gun on the as-far-as-they-could-tell innocent civilians. His eyes lingered on the clean-shaved, dark-skinned man polishing that fishing pole and Sam recognized the particular stink eye that meant Dean seen something just like it before.

The younger Winchester spared the man an assessing look. He was eyeing them with just as much suspicion, which wasn't all that uncommon in a town whose population size meant everyone knew everyone, and nobody knew them. But Dean turned away: away from the man sitting outside the general store, away from the center of town, and started in the direction of what looked to be residences. Andy and Sam followed quietly, Andy walking backwards a couple of paces, keeping his eyes on the fisherman fellow with about as much tension as Dean, but for entirely different reasons.

Dean had said these were smart zombies. Fast zombies. If Andy had learned anything from the remake of The Dawn of the Dead, it was that you did not take your eyes off of fast zombies.

Sam caught up to his brother, shouldering his own bag a little higher. He glanced surreptitiously around, but they were quickly getting away from the main drag and into houses set back in the woods. There were even fewer people milling about. Still, Sam kept his voice down as he asked, "Do you want to call Cas?"

The look on his brother's face said yes. Yes, absolutely, he wanted to call in Cas. But what he responded with was narrowed eyes and a straight-forward gaze. "Phones are out."

Not that thathad been what Sam was remotely talking about, but the younger Winchester still startled. He stopped walking long enough to pull out his phone and stare at the zero bars up in the left hand corner. Great. Yeah, you know what, if he was going to murder an entire town, that would probably be his first step too. The younger hunter took a deep breath, physically willing away the tension that pulled at his shoulders and neck. When he got moving again, Sam had to jog several steps to catch back up with his brother, who continued on up the road like he hadn't just dropped a major bombshell.

"You can still pray to him."

The side-eye Dean sent his way might been followed any other day with a comment on why was it always Dean's responsibility to contact Cas, considering Sam could pray to him just as easily. But, given the current situation, it wasn't really the right time to rehash that discussion. Dean was still too oblivious about his connection with the angel (particularly over Sam and Bobby's infant relationship with Castiel) to listen to his brother's reasoning anyway.

"No. If Azazel planned this whole thing, than he's got eyes here. I don't want him knowing we got an angel on our side any more than he already does."

He very specifically did not want that yellow-eyed bastard to know Cas's name. A speck of grace in his chest was one thing, but a live angel would become target number one on Azazel's to do list, and you could summon something once you had its name. Over Dean's dead body, of course. But the Winchesters already had one over-Dean's-dead-body problem coming up in the rapidly approaching future. They really didn't need another one. No, Dean was going to keep Cas out of this until he absolutely couldn't. Until it came down to life-or-death. Which, given what they were walking into, was a very real possibility.

"Like you said," Dean grumbled as they started up a hill to a destination Sam didn't know, "we survived this the first time around. We can survive it again."

The younger Winchester didn't exactly like his own words being thrown back at him – words that were intended to save three hundred lives, even at the risk of their own (a reality Sam was not blind too) – but it was too late to change their minds now. Not that Sam would. Sure, he felt a certain level of guilt having talked Dean into this, especially now that he was seeing firsthand how badly affected his brother was. But Sam chose not to respond to the curt words. Partly because he really did believe they would survive this again and partly because if they could survive it, then they owed it to these people to try.

"Not to rain on this already soaked parade and all, but where are we going?"

Andy had been surprisingly quiet on their trek into town, a worrying oddity that had the Winchesters exchanging more than the occasional glance. When they had finished concealing the Impala among the foliage on the side of the road, Dean suggested the kid stay with the car. And, as it was usually Sam making that particular concession, it was a big deal. He even tried for the angle of making sure they had a getaway vehicle warmed and ready to peel out of there. But Andy hadn't taken the bait. Honestly, Dean didn't even know why, anymore. Ever since Mississippi and the crossroads, he'd had a bad feeling in his gut that said to keep an eye on the kid. Dean was starting to worry that Andy's continued participation was more of a death wish than a sense of duty or even curiosity.

He didn't blame the kid. Dean had lived – and not lived – through more than one of those times himself, but he wasn't sure how to help him, either.

"This is the first place we went last time," Dean answered Andy's question, pointing up to a house on the right as they crested the hill. "The kid from Sam's vision lives just up there. Something Tanner. Don't remember the first name, but it was dorky."

"This is the kid you shot?"

Dean offered his brother a defensive look. "Considered shooting. And I didn't do it, alright? We thought he was infected."

Andy had to jog a bit up the hill to catch them, finally having given up watching the man outside the general store now that they'd rounded a bend, well past the point where visual range would actually do any good if the guy was a zombie. The three slowed as the incline evened out and they were left staring at a perfectly normal and seemingly calm house less than a hundred feet away. Andy thought the thing looked ominous just by default.

"And he lives here?"

"He's not home. Camping trip or something." Dean dropped his duffle, reaching inside for a gun which he tucked in his waistline, a Bowie knife that he hooked to his belt, and two extra clips of amo that went in his front pocket. Beside him, Sam and Andy took the cue to do the same. Andy still wasn't much good with handguns, faring better with the wider blast of a shotgun, but he tucked one under his shirt all the same.

Dean eyed the quiet suburban home, shouldering his bag once more as the other two finished arming up. "His dad and brother are in there. They've got the mom tied up. They were cutting her up, bleeding in the wounds."

Andy stilled, arm at an awkward angle halfway through getting his backpack back on. He swallowed, then shouldered the straps, clinging to them tightly. His eyes locked on the home. "Spreading the virus. They're infected."

"First ones we knew of." Which didn't mean they were the first – or only – ones in town, but given how Azazel had apparently set this all up, Dean was having all kinds of new doubts about just how orchestrated the events last time had been. Things that hadn't made sense on that insane, terrifying night – the two of them just happening to stumble on the first infected family right before the mom had turned, the nurse who'd been one the whole time, her patience in waiting to infect Sammy and only Sammy, and the way the whole town cleared out as soon as she'd gotten the job done – were all beginning to settle into startling clarity. An ugly, terrifying clarity.

Dean glanced over his shoulder, back towards the bend in the road and the main town beyond. If things went like they had the first time, they'd be back there soon enough. By then, though, it would be a ghost town. "The Master Sargent back there - the one with the fishing pole? Same spot, same action."

Sam straightened at that, catching his brother's eye. "You think this is the same day as last time?"

"Don't remember the date. Timing's about right, I think." Dean shrugged, glancing up at the grey sky as if reading a clock. He turned back to face the house and the Croats he knew were inside. A bullet to the brain would take them down, but something told the hunter stopping this town from becoming a repeat of the Roanoke colony wouldn't be so easy as killing two infected civilians. "But unless the Sarge does that every day, hours on end like some twisted version of the Truman Show – which I doubt, cuz he was clean last time – I bet Azazel figured out how to get us here right on time."

Sam fought back the second round of doubt over forcing the three of them to come, and instead turned that energy towards resolve. They had a job to do, the whole point of coming in the first place. He threw the strap of his duffel across his chest, game face on. "So what's our plan? How do we contain an entire town before the infection spreads?"

"I doubt the Brady Bunch in there is the only contingency Azazel has." Dean gestured with his chin towards the house. "We kill those people, Hell's probably got another three, four already infected, waiting for the cue to turn."

"We could evacuate the town?" Andy offered, but frowned almost as soon as the words were out of his mouth. "Course, then we'd have no way of knowing if we were sending the infected people out too."

"Or a way to do it, anyway." Sam wore an almost identical frown. "Evacuating a town takes time. Planning. Authority. We'd have to get a town council to agree, or a mayor if they have one. Even if we could talk them into it-"

"Or force them."

"-we don't have that kind of time." Sam ignored his brother's more violent suggestion, since the entire point they were arguing was moot to begin with

"They were more organized than that, anyway," Dean countered. "They had roadblocks, contingencies for anyone leaving town. This place didn't even make the news, even after everyone disappeared."

Which was weird, thinking back on it. Both the Sarge and the kid had made it out, and the Doc said she was heading for the next town over to get the authorities. But there'd been no report, and Dean didn't remember ever hearing about Rivergrove, Oregon again. Not that any of that mattered right now.

Dean shook his head. "Hell's too prepared; we're not going to be able to just sound the alarm."

"So what do we do?" The two turned to Andy, though they didn't have any answers for him. "What about some sort of quarantine?"

"Like a disease?" Sam asked, brow pinching in thought. "That might work. If we can't get everyone out of town, we keep them locked in. If people to stay in their homes, avoid contact with each other, then the virus can't spread."

But Dean was shaking his head for new reasons now. "No one with the authority to control this town will listen to will us without credentials, and we don't exactly have time to build a back story, here."

"Andy can do it," Sam interrupted, but Dean wasn't done.

"We can't just go knocking on every door, finding peopled one-by-one for the kid to talk to."

While the idea of Andy encouraging civilians to lock themselves up had some potential – it would at least buy them time to figure out their next step – the Winchesters didn't have the time it would take to find everyone individually. It might take an hour, if not more, and if Hell had more than one infected lined up, as Dean suspected given how quickly the virus broke out last time, they would just turn and start this thing well before they could get all the civilians contained.

Still, even if they only saved half the people of the town that way, it would be more than had survived last time.

"What if we could talk to everyone at once?" Andy reasoned aloud, rubbing at his chin. "If I could make some sort of blanket announcement, we could get to everyone in time."

"How do we get them all in one place?" Sam countered. "We could get a town meeting called, but again, it would take time to get the word out, time for everyone to gather."

"And we do not want everyone gathered in one place," Andy realized with horror, shaking his head as he thought about the chaos of an outbreak while everyone was essentially locked in a gymnasium or town hall. "Zombie apocalypse rule number one. Okay…what about announcing it through the streets, like cops used to for tornado warnings and hurricane evacuations? It's not a big town."

Dean glanced at Sam and Sam shrugged, those hazel eyes deep in thought. "It would still take time."

"Yeah," the older Winchester agreed, "but it would get people locked in their homes before any infected in the area could start something, right? We might not make it to everyone in the town, but we'd make it to some."

"And if the infected people are subject to Andy's powers, we might be able to keep them from turning," Sam reasoned, the first light of a plan taking shape on his face.

"Would that work?" Andy glanced between the two. "I've never exactly had a chance to test my powers on zombies."

"Well, now you're gonna get to." While said in jest, Dean's words didn't get a laugh out of any of them, the truth hitting far too close to home. "We might as well try. We tell people to stay in their homes and we tell the infected not to turn."

They would have no idea if that plan worked until shit hit the fan, but it wasn't like they had anything else better, either.

"We should tell the infected to lock themselves up," Sam changed course with a thoughtful look. "The virus may not be something they can consciously fight. Even if Andy's powers work on them while they're calm, the turn itself might break his control. So…If you think you're infected, tie yourself up."

"Or report to the local jail." Andy was grinning. "We'll lock 'em up ourselves, we just need to get them to come to us."

"That's not bad," Dean agreed. He eyed the house just down the lane from them and suddenly nodded, decision made. "Let's do a test run. See if a Croat will even listen to you."

Sam and Andy followed his gaze, and Andy, who up until that point had gotten lost in the ease of brainstorming, swallowed difficultly. He hadn't really thought about actually walking up to a zombie and telling him to listen. But, by then, Dean was already headed for the little suburban home, and Sam and Andy had to jog after him to catch up.

The hunter didn't go for subtlety this time. He approached the front door, gun drawn. Once all three of them were on the large porch, decorated in the glory of kitschy signs about fishing and small town life. Dean turned to Andy. "I'll cover you. If this doesn't work, it's gonna go down fast."

"Do we have a plan B?" Sam asked cautiously, casting a quick glance at Dean before refocusing on the house, drawing his own weapon.

"Plan B is we figure it out as we go," the older Winchester offered, which was less than reassuring, but what more could they do? It was what they'd done last time, and it worked out in the end (sort of).

Andy nodded, releasing a quick breath before raising his fist. With a slight tremor in his fingers, he knocked on the large glass pane of the front door. It took only a moment for someone to answer. It was a kid, a year or two younger than Andy himself, with a wide and friendly smile. Very Stepford Smile, if you asked Dean. But then again, he already knew this guy was trouble.

The look immediately disappeared when the young man took in the nervous psychic knocking on his door and, more so, the two taller, much scarier looking men standing just behind him, both with guns.

"Uh, can you do me a favor and knock yourself out?" Andy's voice was deep – commanding – but his body language was that of a prepubescent girl shying away from a spider. Again, not that Dean blamed him, but in better circumstances he certainly would have been holding it over the kid for hours to come.

The Tanner boy standing in the doorway blinked at the command, mouth twitching between a smile and a frown for several long, terrifying seconds, before he turned almost robotically towards the doorframe. He wrapped his hands around either side of the thick slab of wood and then slammed his head into it as hard as he could.

Andy jumped back with a yelp at the sudden violence. Dean definitely would have made fun of him for that if he wasn't busy watching the Croat's body slump to the floor in an unconscious heap. The older Winchester looked at Sam with raised eyebrows.

"Holy crap."

Dean couldn't believe it actually worked and, by the look of it, neither could Sam.

"Jake? Who is it?"

The brothers both raised their guns once more at the older voice calling from within the house, followed shortly by approaching footsteps. The dad. Dean gave Andy another nod, and as soon as Mr. Tanner came into view, the psychic yelled at him to do the same as his son. Mr. Tanner seemed able to fight it for a second more than Jake had, turning away only to twitch and switch back towards them. Dean was ready to fire a shot right between the man's eyes, thinking their luck had been too good to be true, when Mr. Tanner let out a garbled yell and charged head first into the hallway wall like a WWE wrestler going for the money shot.

Mr. Tanner's head went straight through the drywall, burying him up to his shoulders, and the rest of his body went limp, hanging out of the hole like some depressing marionette show gone very wrong. The three hunters stood on the porch, staring at the unmoving body.

"Heh," Dean turned to Sam, a grin in the corner of his mouth. "It's the Juggernaught, bitch."

The younger Winchester rolled his eyes, but even Andy, still trembling ever so slightly, cracked a laugh. That was before the woman in the dining room, tied to a chair, gagged and bleeding, started screaming her head off, of course. Or, well, as much as she could through the kitchen towel wrapped around her head and gagging her mouth.

The three hunters untied her, but Dean was eyeing the bleeding cut to her shoulder with worry and, mostly, suspicion. "Did they bleed on you?"

She was too shaken and confused to answer, so Andy asked her again.

"Yes," she whispered, eyes wide at the trauma of her husband and son tying her up and beating her. Or maybe it was from the unwilled compulsion to answer the young man's question.

"Damnit," Dean swore. They hadn't made it in time. What else was new? He caught Sam's gaze, turning away from the traumatized woman. His voice low when he spoke. "She's infected."

"What do we do?" Sam watched Mrs. Tanner, those eyes in full puppy dog mode over the poor woman. Andy was crouched beside her, using the same towel her family had gagged her with to put pressure on the wound.

"We have her go to jail with the others." It was Andy who answered, looking up from the woman who was too dazed at the moment to try and run (which would be futile, given the Jedi kneeling next to her, but she didn't know that). "And then we warn the rest of the town. We know it'll work now."

Even as he said it, Andy's eyes slid to the body of Mr. Tanner, foot just visible from where they were. Mrs. Tanner asked them several times about her husband and son, but Andy decided it was for the best she didn't worry about it. He told her not to, so she didn't. It wouldn't last forever, but considering she was infected, it probably wouldn't matter to her ever again, either.

"Alright," Dean conceded, not liking that they didn't have the second part of this two-part plan formed. But getting the infected into a locked up location was a good first step and they were on the clock. "Do it."

"I want you to go down to the police station and have them arrest you. Stay in lockup until, uh, dawn."

"What will they arrest me for?" Her eyes were still wide, almost unseeing.

Andy floundered for a second, glancing at the other two before just sort of making it up as he went along. It seemed to be the theme of the day, after all. "Just tell them something that will get you locked up, alright?"

"I can do that." With those words, Beverly Tanner rubbed at her freed wrists, turned almost robotically for the hall, and took three steps before Sam stutteringly called out.

"Uh, use the back door!"

Andy repeated the command quickly before Mrs. Tanner walked far enough to see her husband's body stuck in the wall or her son collapsed by the door. She might be infected and the hunters might have to kill her before it was all over (they weren't really sure), but on the off chance Mrs. Tanner survived this, that wasn't a sight any wife or mother needed to see.

"I can do that," Beverly said again before she turned on a numb dime, walking past the three men as though they weren't even there. She opened the screen door just off the kitchen and the three watched through the dining room windows as her bobbing head disappear around the side of the house.

Silence reigned.

"Alright," Dean tucked his gun away and slung his duffle off his shoulder once more. "Let's get to work on the rest of the town."

"What about those two?" Sam gestured to the unconscious, infected men in the hallway. "They could wake back up."

Dean grinned, elbow deep in his bag, and pulled out a coil rope and a roll of duct tape. He tossed one to Sam, who got to work pulling the husband out of the wall.

"How are we going to get the message out?" the younger Winchester asked as he tugged at Mr. Tanner's body. Bits of drywall crumbled around the man's torso. Sam's voice was raised so that Dean and Andy, hauling the youngest Tanner man towards the chair last occupied by the kid's poor mother, could hear him. "We can steal a car, but we're going to need a megaphone or something."

"We grab a cop car."

Dean stopped pulling just shy of the chair to stare at the kid across from him. Andy grunted as he suddenly found himself hauling all the weight alone, almost toppling atop Jake's body from the unexpected shift.

Sam's head poked in from the hallway. "What?"

Andy glanced between the two of them. "You guys definitely didn't grow up in a small town. Cop cars have megaphones? It's a great prank when you're, like, sixteen and drunk."

His grin was positively mischievous, and Sam turned both a concerned and amused expression to his brother. Dean just grinned back.

"Whose idea was it for him to tag along, again?"

-o-o-o-

They didn't even have to go find one. Two fine members of the local sheriff's office pulled up in a brown-and-tan unit seven and a half minutes later. It turned out that Mrs. Tanner showing up at the station with a story of Jake and Mr. Tanner tying her up and torturing her required a police response. Her follow up story that they needed to lock her up because she'd killed them both, well, that required a hasty police response.

Andy took care of the officers, one being the Sheriff himself. He told each of them to walk home and lock themselves indoors, no contact with anyone until morning, unless they were infected with a virus. The hunters weren't stupid; they'd have been surprised if there wasn't an infected among the police ranks. Both men took off at a decent clip down the hill, the Sheriff turning onto a side street, the other officer heading back to town. It wasn't clear if that was because he lived on the other side, or if he he was infected.

As soon as they were sure the men had listened, the three hunters climbed into their borrowed car. Andy took the passenger seat upon Sam's insistence, since they would need him on the speaker, and the giant of a man folded himself into the back.

"Attention citizens-" Andy oofed into the microphone as Dean elbowed him. "Attention town-folk."

Andy looked over at Dean to see if he was going to get hit again as the older hunter drove their new ride through the winding residential streets. Their plan was less likely to be noticed and therefore interrupted if they started outwards and worked their way in towards the main drag.

"Listen up, cuz we're cops, and you trust cops-"

In the backseat, Sam's head fell back against the headrest a little more dramatically than necessary as the kid's transmission broke off when Dean elbowed him once more.

"Lock yourself in your homes, in individual rooms, until dawn. Do not go out, do not let anyone else in. Do not interact with anyone." Andy glanced at Dean again, who just gave him the what-are-you-waiting-for-keep-going look. The kid raised the mic back to his mouth. "If you think you are infected with a virus, report to the police station straight away."

Sam watched the residents as they wound their way through the streets of the forested town, repeating the message again and again. Those out on the sidewalks or that he could see through screen doors and undrawn windows were first surprised or confused by the broadcasting police car, some even coming out of their homes at the message. But one by one, each person turned and headed indoors, drawing their curtains, or closing their windows and doors. Sam saw only one man turn and head down the street, away from the residential area and back towards town.

It looked like their plan might just be working.

Even rolling along at ten miles an hour, they covered each of the residential streets and the main drag in under twenty minutes. There were no surprises. No Croats suddenly flooding the streets, no zombie apocalypse as Hell opened the floodgates of their plan for this tiny little town. Nothing. The boys got to the main drag, which was quickly emptying of all people as the townsfolk heeded Andy's words without choice.

When they reached the police station a block past Main St, they parked their stolen vehicle in the empty spot between two more just like it. The three hunters climbed out of the car, not bothering to hide their weapons. There was almost no one left outside to see them, after all. They headed into the station to a truly bizarre dichotomy of chaos and calm. Having cut their broadcast before the station, the two cops inside hadn't heard any orders to go home and were still attempting to do their jobs as eleven civilians and one officer crowded within the limited space, demanding to be locked up. There were three uniformed cops in the building – a female desk jockey and two male officers – but only two of them were still operating under their own faculties, currently trying (rather frantically) to handle the confusing situation.

As it was a small office, just one large room with a front desk, waiting chairs, a holding cell in one corner, and a few rooms along the back wall, the chaos came more from the number of people trying to assert their personal need to be detained. The poor desk jockey was handling the civilians the best she could while the lone officer tried, probably for the tenth time, to tell the third cop – the one that had shown up at the Tanner residence – that he didn't need to be locked up. It was clear these two unfortunate souls were unequipped to handle eleven of their friends and neighbors suddenly turning up to be arrested.

"Ladies and gentlemen!" Andy called out as the three hunters entered the precinct, each man geared up like they were facing a zombie apocalypse. (Which they were.) The infected townsfolk quieted, though the several who had taken it upon themselves to fulfill Andy's command without police assistance didn't stop trying to lock themselves inside the one holding cell.

The two cops looked up, harried confusion clear on their faces until they took in the three men, armed to the teeth, standing in their office. Then the female officer was dropping her paperwork for the gun they kept in the desk drawer, while her far more prepared coworker pulled his weapon immediately. But Andy was way ahead of them.

"You don't need your guns, put them down, you don't want to shoot us. What you want to do is lock up those eleven – er, twelve – people. They're very dangerous and need to stay locked up till morning." Andy smiled congenially, standing back as the two cops stiffened, then moved on autopilot to herd the rest of the infected over to the holding cell. The infected already inside were milling about, trying repeatedly to close the barred door to the cell. Without the key to lock it, the door just slowly swung back open each time, and the infected tried again and again in a calm, dulled, and freaky manner that reminded Dean of Leviathan victims.

The man from the future shuddered, but didn't say a thing.

The desk jockey withdrew the ring of keys from her belt, sliding one into the lock while the rest of the infected were herded one after the other into the small cell. It was quickly becoming cramped in there.

Once he was sure things were under control, Dean walked back over to the main doors, sliding his duffle off his shoulder. He dropped the bag of weapons and amo next to the entrance, ready to grab it on their way back out. The hunter did a quick visual sweep through the glass portion of the station doors, looking down the street for any movement or change. It was all quiet as dusk fell on the little town. Dean tucked his gun into his waistline and headed back to the others, rubbing absently at his chest and the low ache there.

"Uh, hold up." Sam, who was overseeing those going into the cell, grabbed the elbow of one woman before she could dolefully put herself in with the others. Dean hurried the last few steps, coming up between his brother and the two Robo-Cops, but he didn't immediately see anything alarming. The lady in Sam's grip was clutching a handful of tissues, her eyes and nose were red and puffy. As she sniffled, Sam grimaced with realization. "Are you, uh, sick by chance?"

"Yes," the woman replied, wiping at her dripping nose. Her eyes had the blank, glassy quality of all Andy's puppets. "I have a virus, but I'm on antibiotics."

Dean turned towards Andy with the kind of look that had the kid immediately holding up his hands, asking how this was his fault. The older Winchester took the sick lady by the bicep, pulling her away from the holding cell and back towards the doors of the station. "You go home and lock yourself in the bathroom, kay?"

She continued resisting, trying somewhat tamely to get back to holding until Andy repeated Dean's words as a command. The lady went still, then turned and headed to the doors with the customary, "I can do that."

Once she had exited the building, Dean leveled the look at Andy again.

"What? We said anyone who thought they were sick!" The kid shrugged sheepishly, fingering the edges of his hoodie like a little kid. "We're lucky it's not full-swing flu season."

The hunter just rolled his eyes as Sam closed the cell door. The desk jockey locked the infected inside with a turn of the key while her partner stood several feet away, staring at them both with blank eyes. Upon Andy's request, she handed the jingling mass of keys to Sam, and their resident Jedi addressed their two uniformed helpers.

Dean rubbed at his chest as the ache got bad enough that he finally took notice of it. He cast a glance over his shoulder at the station doors.

"Alright, guys." Andy clapped his hands together, a grin of success spreading across his face. "Great job! Now it's time to head home. Make sure to lock yourselves in your houses, don't let anyone in, don't talk to anyone or come in contact with anyone. Sound good? Break!"

The woman turned on her heel with a nod and immediately headed for the station doors. She passed Dean on her way, the hunter momentarily distracted by the movement. He stepped aside to let her pass, eyes tracking her as he rubbed at the burn just beneath his sternum. The other cop, however, didn't move. He remained standing, staring at the three of them, more of a statue than the robot he was supposed to be enacting right now.

"Hey!" Andy complained with a frown, starting towards the man who wasn't listening. Sam looked up from the keys and Dean turned back from the station doors towards the apparent problem, worry spiking. "I said-"

A gunshot broke through the relative peace of the station and Andy cried out in shock, stumbling away from the cop who stood, gun drawn and eyes black. Andy's back hit the cell bars with a pained grunt, muffled through clenched teeth. His hand was curled around his shoulder where blood spurted between clenched fingers.

"Andy!" Sam started forward but a second gunshot had him jumping back, releasing the keys as they were ripped out of his hand by contact from a bullet. The ring of metal hit the floor in a jumble.

A third shot went off, fired wildly, as Dean tackled the demon to the ground, the two hitting the linoleum with force. Sam bolted for Andy, but the gunshot had done more than just injure the psychic; it took a bunch of peaceful, calm, obedient Croats and flipped the 'zombie' switch to 'on'.

Andy screamed in terror as hands grabbed at his backpack, hoodie, and arms, pinning him to the bars, pulling at his hair and clothing. Sam grabbed his good arm, trying to haul him away from the cell and the teaming bodies within, but he was too late. He saw the flash of metal before he could do anything about it. It was Mrs. Tanner, the woman they had first sent to the police station, taking a switchblade to her own hand, leaving the steel stained red. Andy cried out as she struck, slicing up the back of his already injured arm. More blood soaked into his sweatshirt, spilling down the bars as she opened a four inch strip of flesh with the bloodied blade.

Realizing they weren't getting him away from the Croats with force alone and that most of those grasping clinging hands were on the kid's pack, Sam brutally shoved Andy's good arm through the strap of his backpack and then pulled. The two stumble free of the Croats, the poor kid's bleeding limb ripped loose from the final strap with a strangled cry, and they hit the floor several feet away. The Croats hissed and screamed and thrashed, pulling at Andy's backpack like wild animals until it finally slipped through the bars and disappeared into the teaming mass within

Andy was shaking in Sam's arms. The younger Winchester could hear his brother struggling with the demon – a strained exorcism interrupted by grunts and fists striking flesh – and Sam flinched as a fourth gunshot went off, striking something at the other end of the room. He didn't have time to look; Andy was bleeding badly. He pushed the kid onto the ground gently as possible, rolling onto his hands and knees to assess the damage. Sam clamped his fingers around the bullet wound, not having enough limbs to cover the entrance, exit, and strip of shredded flesh in the back. Andy needed stitches and he needed them now. His skin was losing color at an alarming rate, but the med kit they'd brought with them had been in Andy's backpack.

Along with several guns and knives.

"Dean!"

"Little busy!" the older Winchester growled between taking a fist to his solar plexus and the next line of the exorcism. The possessed cop was leaking smoke left and right, but he just wouldn't let go of his damn meatsuit.

The jingle of keys and metal against linoleum drew Sam's attention away from Andy, and hazel eyes grew alarmingly wide as he took in the cell full of Croatoans. The keys that had been knocked from his grip lay only a handful of feet from the bars, and multiple Croats were scrabbling for them. Arms stretched through the bars, shoulders slammed into the barrier again and again and again, as nails scraped across the floor, fingertips just hitting the ring of metal.

Sam released Andy's bleeding shoulder in a mad dart for the keys before they got them, but he didn't make it.

"Oh shit," he whispered as the ring of keys disappeared into the undulating mass behind the bars. Sam scrambled back. The Croat nearest the door suddenly stuck his arm out, key ring jingling in his fisted grip, and shoved a key into the lock. There were a dozen possibles on that ring, but it was only going to be a matter of time. The younger Winchester pulled his gun and shot the man in the head. Even as he fell dead to the floor, another took his place, reaching her arm through the bars to grab the keys sticking out of the lock.

Sam shot that one too, but his aim was off as he scrambled to his feet and grabbed Andy by the uninjured arm. The kid hissed in pain, weakly keeping pressure on his own wounds, but made it to his feet. The hunter fired a third shot and this time the infected woman toppled, dropping the keys. Hands snatched at them from the bottom of the bars and they disappeared once more into the mass of men and women. Sam hauled Andy back behind him as he fired again and again. Another Croat went down, but two more took his place at the door, keys back in hand. The hunter was going to have to kill them all to keep them from escaping.

The click of the lock opening ended that decision before he could make it.

"Dean!" Sam fired again, killing the fourth infected madman, but then the tidal wave was upon them and Sam was running, dragging Andy behind him. He fired haphazardly across his shoulder, but a hit to the chest wasn't enough to take a Croat down. As the two hunters made it to Dean, still rolling on the floor in a struggle with the demon, Sam lowered his gun and shot his last two rounds into the black-eyed bastard's head.

It wouldn't kill the demon, but it was enough to make him release the older Winchester. Dean took the opening and jumped to his feet as Croats came screaming at them.

"Go, go, go!" he yelled, like Sam didn't already know that, and shoved his younger brother towards the doors, following just behind.

Dean made a grab for the duffel full of amo he'd left by the entrance, but the ghost of fingers across his back, snatching at his jacket and just barely missing a good handhold, was cause enough to abandon the attempt. He wasn't immune and couldn't risk getting caught. Dean burst through the doors a half dozen feet behind his brother, the Croats right on his heels.

The older hunter caught back up to Sam quickly, what with Andy slowing the long-limbed Winchester down significantly. Dean ducked under the ailing kid to take the other half of his weight without much thought beside getting the hell out there a lot faster than they were currently going. Andy screamed as Dean hoisted his arm up and over his shoulder, and the older Winchester almost tripped on his own feet at the sound. His hand came away soaked in red, and Dean stared at it in growing realization even as they ran.

Behind them, the Croats spread out. Only one maintained the chase as the eight split up and tore through the rest of the town. It wasn't long before they heard gunfire and glass breaking; the infected had the weapons they'd been forced to leave behind. One handed, Dean drew his gun, Andy's blood staining the ivory grip red, and took out the only one still following them. The body hit the ground mid-run, rolling over itself in a sickening tumble of dead-weight and limbs.

"Take a left. I know where we can go." Dean spoke forcefully as he faced forward again, doing his best to hold Andy up with only one arm and keep his gun in the other.

The three men rounded the next corner back onto the main drag and headed for the medical clinic Dean remembered well.

Chapter End Notes

A/Ns: So I'm now home from vacation (my little niece is beautiful and actually a really good baby), and catching up on sleep. But in the meantime, the muse took total advantage of my exhausted state to casually mention a couple days ago, "Hey, you know that Croatoan arc you have fully written up, finished all neatly with a bow and almost ready to post? Yeah…what if we doubled it in length? You only have to re-write the end of this chapter to make it happen! And, of course, the other seventeen pages of new material. What's the big deal, am I right?"

This is what happens when I take two week breaks. My brain thinks it has a whole extra seven days to make last minute, drastic changes.

And yes, I absolutely did re-write the ending of this chapter and the next seventeen pages after it in the last four days, because damnit, my muse is friggin' good at her job (the bitch).

Reviews! Thanks so much to everyone who commented on the last chapter. I will be trying to get around to you guys today, but I am terribly bad at this part. If you don't hear from me, please know that I read your comments several times while on my vacation and anytime I didn't feel like writing. You all really do help carry this story and give me all the warm and fuzzies. Especially those of you who just flat out yell at me. Warm, fuzzy, and laughing my ass off :D

Alright, we are totally picking up steam now and are getting in the thick of it! Let me know what you thought of the action this chapter. It's only going downhill from here, guys XD

Also, poor Andy…I'm really not nice to that boy.

Chapter 75: Season 2: Chapter 42

Chapter Notes

A/N: Twenty one pages. It ended up being TWENTY ONE EXTRA PAGES, GUYS. And damn it, I can't even break it into two cuz it's just not a good chapter for that. So I present to you the Mother of All Chapters because my muse haaaaates me. Seriously. Does she even know I have a social life?!

(I'm just kidding. I don't have a social life.)

head thud head thud head thud

Chapter Warnings: Oh for the love of- it's the end of the world, what else is new?

Actual Chapter Warnings: Croats are being Croats (aka, zombies, reavers, crappy next door neighbors, you get the idea), Dean is being Dean (aka, two steps forward, one step back), Hell is being Hellish (aka, did no one explain the first two seasons to them? There's only supposed to be, like, one of them out and about at a time), and poor Sam and Andy should never have come along for this ride (aka, when your brother from the future tells you it's a trap, it's a mother friggin' trap!)

Actual Actual Chapter Warnings: Um...lots of death in this one.

See the end of the chapter for more notes

-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-

The Road So Far (This Time Around)

Season 2: Chapter 42

-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-

They rounded the corner onto Main Street, not two blocks to go to the medical clinic, when Dean drew up short, gun raised and trained on the newest threat, the barrel of a Remington Model 700 bolt-action rifle looking him dead in the face. The older, dark-skinned, defensive face behind it was a familiar one.

"Easy there, Sarge," Dean said calmly but firmly, slowly pulling away from Andy so he could step in front of the bleeding kid defensively. As soon as his arm was free, he kept a two handed grip on his weapon, trained on the Master Sargent standing in front of them, blocking their path to the clinic. The man from the future had to hope that Time – the same Time that wanted to stay the same – wasn't fucking with them right now. The sergeant had been clean last time. And Dean was about to take a mighty big risk assuming he was clean this time, too. "Put it down, big guy."

"You first," the Sarge responded, jaw squared and finger tight on the trigger. "How the hell do you know who I am, huh?"

Dean took one hand off his gun, still coated in Andy's blood, and held it up placatingly. He didn't lower his weapon but he at least he made it clear it would only be fired in self-defense. The hunter nodded at the man's arm, sleeves rolled up past the elbow. "Your tattoo. My dad was in the Corps. Now look, man, I know, you've probably seen some weird shit tonight, but we're not the enemy here."

Sergeant Master Mark Vago stared down the unknown and armed man in front of him, before his eyes darted to the two men behind the blond. The taller one was holding up the other, a flagging kid with a blood-soaked right arm. Mark hesitated, realizing that the kid, at least, was no threat. Making a tactical assessment, the Master Sargent released the trigger and raised his gun to port arms, barrel resting against his shoulder. Across from him, the blond lowered his weapon as well.

"What the hell is going on?" Mark asked, not taking his eyes off the three, still weary of the strangers who'd shown up in town just shortly before this all went down. "I can't find anyone. It's a ghost town. The damn coffee mugs were still steaming in the Diner, like people just-"

"Up and vanished," the blond in front of him finished for him, and Mark stared at him. Uncertainty warred against the illusion of comfort that came with no longer being alone in a ghost town that, hours ago, had been his friendly, happy home.

"What the hell is going on?" he repeated, hand still tight on his rifle. He used it to gesture to the ailing member of their group. The kid was bleeding from what could be a gunshot wound, but these two were the only ones left around to do any shooting. "What happened to him?"

"A cop turned on him," the taller one supplied, adjusting his grip as the kid leaned more heavily into him. He was bleeding pretty bad.

Mark knew they weren't far from the Doc Lee's office and wondered if that's where these boys had been headed. "Tried to kill us."

"No," Mark shook his head. "No way. I know every cop in this town. They're good people."

The blond suddenly tucked his gun into the back of his pants, apparently deciding the Master Sargent wasn't a threat worth dealing with, and pushed past him. "Not tonight, they aren't."

The taller one took it as his cue and followed after, helping the bleeding kid along. Mark watched them past, not ready to take action against the only living souls he'd seen in the last twenty minutes, but also not ready to trust them.

The ragtag group didn't make it five feet when hurried footsteps coming from behind them all had everyone, Mark included, spinning around. The blond redrew his weapon in a grip as tight as Mark's as the Sarge trained his rifle on the unknown threat. The street in front of them was empty, but it didn't stay that way for long. The pounding feet got louder and a man in an officer's uniform rounded the corner, coming to a halt as he spotted them.

Mark blinked, pulling his head from the sight of his gun to stare at Officer Kyle Mason, staring them from a dozen feet away with wide eyes. They were black. His eyes were completely black, there was blood on his face, and he was glaring at them with lethal intent, none of which made a lick of sense. Mark didn't mean to lower his gun, but he was clearly seeing things. There was a god damn bullet hole in Kyle's head, for Christ's sake, yet there he stood: chest heaving, murder in his impossibly black eyes.

"What the hell…"

"Where do you think you're going, Winchesters?" the thing that was not Kyle Mason seethed, a tight and wrong grin stretching across his face.

The blond with the ivory-inlaid gun – Winchester, apparently – opened his mouth and started speaking nonsense. Another language. It made Kyle twitch and shudder, and that look in his black eyes got, if possible, a thousand times darker. Then Officer Mason was charging, and Sarge fired before he could think about the consequences of killing a man he'd known his whole life.

Kyle took two to the chest and one to the neck (from Winchester's gun), but he just kept coming.

"Get out of here!" the blond yelled, seemingly at the charging officer, but it was his companions that took off down the street, right before the black-eyed man was on them. Winchester took the tackle to the ground and for one, single, long minute, Mark just stared at the two men grappling on the sidewalk.

He'd shot Kyle Mason center mass, and yet there he was. Wrestling this stranger with clear intent to kill.

Mark raised the butt of his rifle and slammed it into Kyle's back, part of him apologizing even as the man he knew well spun at him and hissed like some kind of wild animal. His eyes were jet black, no whites to wait for, and the Sargent stumbled back in pure shock.

Then Kyle was twitching again, face convulsing in micro-spasms. Those black eyes turned down the street, where Winchester's companions had stopped a few yards away. The tall one was still supporting their injured friend, but he had picked up the babbled jargon the other Winchester had dropped. Latin, Mark realized, recognizing the odd word among the ramble of sounds.

Kyle's eyes narrowed dangerously, but Mark was too busy staring in horror at the black smoke leaking out of the corners of his mouth and eyes. The Master Sargent took another step back, gripping his gun and raising it up, prepared to fire once more even as the logical part of his brain, the part trained by years in the Corps, told him if it hadn't worked the first time it sure as hell wasn't going to work the second. Waste of ammo.

But then the thing that wasn't Kyle Mason threw back his head and billows of black smoke flew out of him like a miniature tornado. When the last of the smoke had fled him, Kyle collapsed, and Mark didn't need to check his pulse to know he was dead.

"What the hell," he muttered in horror, grip on his gun white-knuckled at best. Pushing off the corpse of a man Mark had joined on the baseball pitch more than a dozen years running, the blond let his head fall back against the pavement, rubbing at his chest as he caught his breath. "What the hell is going on!"

Winchester rolled onto his stomach and climbed to his feet quickly. "More than we got time to explain." He grabbed his gun from where it had clattered on the ground in the firefight and straightened up. He nodded to his companions, who stood a half block away, alert and cautious of the now-quiet street around them. "I'm Dean, that's my brother Sam, and the kid needs medical attention, now. You can come with us or take your chances."

With that, Dean Winchester pushed past the Sargent to join his companions and the three headed the last block towards the medical clinic. Mark hesitated only a moment, looking down at the body of Kyle Mason for an excruciatingly long minute, before he followed after the boys.

-o-o-o-

The Clinic doors were in sight when movement on their peripheral had Dean and the Sarge training guns on a pair of figures across the street and a block up, walking their way. It was a leisurely pace, but nothing about their body language said evening stroll and Dean found himself backing towards the clinic. Beside him, Sam reached for the gun Andy muttered was under his shirt, pulling it and training it on the pedestrians.

"I know them," the Sarge said in recognition, straightening from the rifle sight but not lowering the gun. He'd known Kyle Mason, too, and look how that could have turned out.

"No, pal, you really don't," Dean grumbled as he reached behind him for the door handle. Just as he hooked his fingers around the metal, a figure stepped out of the doorway of the next store over.

"Mark!" the man in a green wind breaker and blue jeans greeted jovially, like it was just another cheery Saturday afternoon. His eyes were normal – circles of blue surrounded by pure white – but something else about his face in the descending darkness was all wrong. He was holding an object down by his side, and Mark realized belatedly it was a hatchet. Alarm bells started ringing. "Where you been, buddy? I've been looking for you."

Dean didn't bother asking questions. He shot first, taking the Croat down with one between the eyes. The two across the street broke into a charge, feet pounding their way. Swearing, the hunter threw open the clinic door, holding it open as his brother hobbled inside with Andy.

"Let's go, Sarge!" he screamed, and Mark, staring in wide-eyed horror at the body of his neighbor, visibly gathered himself and darted inside. The main building that housed the medical clinic consisted of a long hallway, lined with offices on either side. Dr. Lee's was the first door on the right. It was already open, and Mark could see Sam lowering the kid down in a chair just inside.

Dean bolted the glass doors behind them, Mark turning to help. Sam joined them seconds later, hauling two waiting room chairs with him. They lodged them under the handles of the locked doors just before the two Croats slammed into the glass. Mark jumped, staggering away from the doors, worried they would give. But their attackers, something not right in their eyes, just slinked away into the darkness, as if they had never been there to begin with.

They left the body of his neighbor lying on the sidewalk, feet away.

"That-" Mark ran a hand over his mouth, the other shaking with how tightly he gripped the barrel of his gun. "That was my neighbor, Mr. Rogers. With the hatchet…"

"You have a neighbor named Mr. Rogers?"

Mark turned at the unfamiliar and slurred voice. The injured kid hadn't stayed in down for long; he was leaning heavily in the doorway of the clinic, propping it open. He had one hand wrapped around his bleeding arm, the other gripping a gun – the one the taller man had been holding – in a trembling hand. Blood dripped down the barrel and hit the floor with a plop, plop, plop.

"Not anymore, he doesn't."

Dean pushed past the Master Sargent, his brother following and the two helped the kid further into the doctor's office. Mark glanced at the vulnerable glass doors, all that was between them and whatever the hell was wrong with the people of his town. He quickly followed after the only sane men left.

"Those aren't going to hold long," he announced as he shut and locked the main door of Dr. Lee's business. It, too, was comprised of far too much glass for his liking. The whole damn building was, something he'd never once worried about before this night. He hadn't thought he'd ever have to worry about those sorts of things at home.

"They won't come in here." The mysterious words, spoken with the confidence of a man who knew far more than he was letting on, didn't do much to put Mark at ease. He stared at Dean Winchester, this mystery man, as he got the kid settled. His brother started towards the patient rooms for supplies when one of the doors swung open.

Mark had his rifle up and ready to fire as Pamela Clayton, Dr. Lee's assistant, rushed into the waiting room, straight into the taller Winchester man. Sam reached out to steady the young woman before she could crash into him completely.

"Sam?" Dean hollered from the other side of the waiting room where he couldn't see what had drawn the taller Winchester up short.

"I'm fine- it's fine." Sam answered. The young nurse looked scared, and Sam immediately released her, though he kept his arms up and open, as non-threatening as possible given the way he towered over the much smaller woman.

"What's going on? Who are you?"

Sam went for a calm, encouraging smile, taking a step back to give her some space. "It's okay, we just need some help. Is the doctor here?"

The young woman blinked up at him, then glanced around his large frame to the others. Across the room, a tense Dean met her eyes and his own hardened. Pam straightened back up, hiding her frame behind Sam's unassumingly. "No, Dr. Lee…I think she went home for the night? I-I was on break, and when I got back…"

"She was just gone," Mark finished for her, nodding, because the story fit with everything else. Hell, he was just happy to see Pam was alright. He slung his rifle strap over his shoulder as the nurse glanced nervously between the gathered, armed men. His encouraging smile seemed to put Pam at better ease, and she relaxed somewhat, though she clasped and unclasped her hands in a nervous fidget.

"I can try calling her, if you'd like?"

Smiling as calmly as he could, Sam shook his head. He was about to bluff his way into getting this woman to give them the supplies they needed to patch Andy up himself when he heard his brother's hit-the-deck voice from behind.

"Sam, get out of the way!"

The younger Winchester didn't think twice about the order. Sam spun three steps to the left, in perfect synchronization with the double firing of his brother's gun. The nurse who'd stared up at him with wide, scared eyes, dropped to the ground with two to the chest. A perfect double-tap; she hadn't stood a chance.

"What the hell!" Mark yelled, rifle up and trained on the man who now seemed to be killing just about anyone in the town that didn't have a damn Marine Corps tattoo.

Sam pulled his backup from his boot, training it on the man even as Andy, God bless him, raised Sam's primary weapon. The thing shook in his hand, barrel jumping all over the place, but it was still largely trained on the man threatening Dean.

"Put it down, Sarge," Dean said for the second time that night.

"You just killed Pam, in cold blood! How many of these town folk are you gonna murder tonight?" he demanded, not lowering his weapon as he stared the killer and stranger down.

"She was infected."

"Infected?" Mark pulled his head back, a tight frown crossing his face. He didn't need line of sight to shoot this man if he had to.

"She was one of them," Dean rephrased, head gesturing towards the glass doors and the threat lurking just beyond, somewhere out there in the dark.

The Sarge wet his lips nervously, finger rubbing back and forth across the trigger. "How do you know? Her eyes weren't black."

"Neither were your neighbors." A determined green gaze – a confident gaze if the Master Sargent had ever seen one – stayed locked on him. "Trust me. I just know."

Mark wasn't quite sure why he believed him. Maybe it was because he didn't feel like he could believe anything, really, so what was the point? Either way, he slowly – very slowly – lowered his rifle. The room seemed to let out a collective breath; the poor kid still bleeding out in the chair dropped his gun so completely it clattered to the ground with a sharp metallic clatter that damn near caused everyone to jump..

"Andy," Sam muttered, crossing back over to him, weapon lowered as well. He was pale and shaking, and Sam was surprised he'd kept any sort of grip with that hand. Andy was practically limp wristed by the time Sam took his pulse. "Shit, Dean, he's losing too much blood."

The blond continued eyeing Mark for a moment more before he tucked his gun back into his jeans and took off for the back rooms. He had to step over Pam's body, and Mark stared down at the poor girl.

"How could he possibly know?"

He hadn't asked it aloud for an answer. He hadn't even asked it aloud knowingly. But the taller of the two brothers – Sam – answered him as he stripped the hoodie off the injured kid, holding pressure to what was now very obviously a gunshot wound to his upper arm. A gunshot wound given to him by Kyle Mason. Sweet, naïve, cheerful Kyle Mason who was the shortstop on the town's leisure baseball team, who stayed after every game to hand out ice cream to the kids, who had wanted to be a cop since he was six and had followed that dream just four years earlier. Mark really couldn't believe it. But he was a practical man; he believed what he could see and touch. And he'd sure as hell seen Kyle attack the older Winchester, seen him take two sure-fired shots to the chest, and he'd sure as shit felt the butt of his rifle connect with the man's back.

"You should trust him on this."

"Yeah," the kid – Andy, was it? – mumbled from his slumped position, obviously flagging due to blood loss and what looked to be shock setting in. Sam was doing his best to rally his friend's wakefulness. Given the drooping of his eyelids, the shallow rise and fall of too-fast breaths, and the heavy slur to his words, it was a losing battle. Still, he managed a weak-ass giggle as he continued, "He's psychic."

He said it like a joke, and the Sarge couldn't help but think it was a terrible time for laughs. Shock did funny things to people, though. He'd seen that and so much more from men in the field who'd taken far worse hits they'd never recovered from. Sam's already concerned expression was growing worse.

Mark ignored the comment for the blood loss talking that it clearly was as Dean came back, arms full of medical supplies. While the two brothers got to work on the kid, the Sarge directed his attention to the older of the two, who seemed a man in charge and sure as shit more knowledgeable than Mark currently felt. He resisted the urge to glance back at Pamela Clayton's body for a third time. "I need to know what's going on, and I need to know it right now."

The unimpressed and annoyed look Dean sent his way was not necessarily a surprise, but it was always a little unsettling when Mark encountered a civilian immune to the command voice of Master Sargent Vago. His unit used to tell tall tales of what that tone could get done with words alone.

"We think it's a virus," the occupied man answered tersely as he cleaned the bullet wound while Sam got to work stitching a cut up the back of his arm. The kid was busy chasing down painkillers with a bottle of water, both of which Dean had found in the back. It wasn't the good stuff, but it was what they had.

"A virus." No way a virus had turned the good townsfolk of Rivergrove – his friends and neighbors – into…into whatever he'd seen back there. No virus turned a man's eyes black.

"O negative?" the taller of the brothers asked, holding up a bag of blood and line that Dean had brought along with the other supplies. The other Winchester nodded and Sam started hooking Andy up to the fresh supply. The clinic's provisions were as small as the town, but that didn't make them nonexistent. In a few minutes, they had Andy's arm cleaned and bound, an IV inserted for a liquids, and the kid was drifting in and out of a drug-assisted, exhausted haze as he filled back up on blood.

Dean stood with a groan, rubbing at his right knee, which was stubbornly complaining about the time spent on the ground after a hard run and two separate roll-arounds on the ground. He turned to the Master Sargent. "Will you watch him for a minute? I need a word with my brother."

Mark nodded and Dean headed towards a quieter corner of the waiting room rather than one of the back rooms, Sam following. The Sarge appreciated the man's instincts not to leave his sight. Clearly, they still didn't trust one another, but Mark preferred it that way at this point. There were too many unanswered questions. Hesitantly, the marine moved towards the front windows, half an eye on the dozing kid, the other on the slit in the blinds to the outside world.

They were still out there, his neighbors, standing on street corners and just at the edges of the encroaching darkness. They weren't doing much but staring right back at him. With general unease at the situation as a whole, Mark released the blinds and moved back to the kid.

-o-o-o-

"This is where we ended up last time?" Sam asked immediately once they had stepped away from Andy and the Sarge. He crossed his arms over his chest, partially from the cold November night and an overly air-conditioned doctor's office, partially because this was a messed up situation and he still wasn't quite prepared to see the blank rage in a civilians eyes as they charged at you with a hatchet. Or the fear in Andy's as he slowly bled out.

Dean had tried to warn him, but some things just had to be experienced to carry the full weight of horror.

"Of course it is," Dean answered bitterly, because why would Time allow for anything else? With a frustrated growl, the man from the future quickly recapped the events that had taken place in the medical clinic in his timeline. Sam cast a look over his shoulder at the downed nurse, lying in a puddle of red. He wondered if she would have attacked him then and there, had Dean not interfered. It didn't sound like it from his brother's retelling of events. It sounded like this had been a longer term play on Azazel's part, not a hasty setup.

"The whole thing ended a couple hours after Nurse Benedict Arnold over there infected you." Dean nodded his head Pam's way, a dark look in his eyes. He had no second thoughts about putting her down quick. "Everyone just up and vanished and we walked out of here like the whole damn thing never happened."

Across from him, Sam frowned. "So it was a test?"

Dean shrugged. They sure as hell hadn't known that back then, but now? Now he thought Hell wanted to know their golden boy was immune. No point in sending a virus out into the world if it killed Lucifer's precious vessel.

"But…they infected Andy," Sam continued, dropping his voice as both brothers glanced over to their resident third wheel. "He hasn't turned, shouldn't that be proof enough for them?"

The older Winchester bit the inside of his cheek, and Sam's eyes immediately narrowed at it and at the lack of eye contact.

"What?"

Dean let out more of a growl than a sigh, and rubbed a hand viciously over his scalp. "Some people didn't turn immediately. Doc said the incubation period was four hours."

There was something else Dean wasn't telling him, but Sam could tell he was working up to it. So Sam waited him out until his older brother made a frustrated noise that ultimately ended in another sigh.

"We never found out what made you immune."

It took a moment for the younger Winchester to follow the train of thought, but he stiffened when he found its inevitable end point. "What- it has to be the demon blood! Doesn't it?"

The fidgety older hunter shrugged defensively, but it was clear all his anger and frustration weren't directed at Sam. "We always assumed it was, but…"

"What else could it possibly be?" Sam asked, voice aggressive, born from fear and exhaustion and the unknown. Across from him, Dean got just as hostile.

"I don't know, Sam, how about your ability to host a friggin' archangel for starters?"

Sam faltered at that. The words were angry and bitter, but Sam knew it to be the same damn thing he was feeling and nothing personal. The younger Winchester deflated as his brother's point sunk in. His gaze dropped to the floor.

If that was true, if it hadn't been the demon blood but the angelic blood, however faint in his veins, that made him immune, that made him Lucifer's true vessel…

"Andy could turn," Sam finished the thought aloud, dawning horror reaching his eyes as he looked back at the bloodied kid. Dozing lightly, Andy would moan or twitch on occasion and Sam wondered, partly in fear, what exactly he was dreaming about.

They didn't have the coin, Sam realized abruptly. They'd left the coin safely in the trunk of the Impala. Sam's eyes widened as he stared at the other psychic – at Azazel's other kid – and realized the demon could be talking to him right now.

"We need to wake him up," Sam muttered, moving to do just that when Dean caught his arm. He turned back to his brother, but while Dean looked grim, he didn't look as panicked as Sam felt.

"It's gotta be the demon blood, Sam." There was anguish in those green eyes but also a determination formed by sheer force of will. Dean Winchester was going to will that to be the truth or so help him. Sam relaxed a fraction of an inch under his grip. "It's gotta be. He's immune, and Hell hasn't ended this freak show because they gotta see that you are too."

"Okay," the younger Winchester agreed quietly, casting another furtive glance Andy's way. Like his brother, he willed himself to believe their friend would be alright. "Then what now? Should I just…head out there and get it over with? Let one of them infect me?"

Dean shuddered at the words, skin blanching as he pulled away from his brother and struggled not to react as explosively as he wanted to. No, they were absolutely not doing that, in any way shape or form. That was not an idea he was on board with.

When he expressed as much, calmly (well, sort of), Sam only shrugged, otherwise without another idea. Not like he'd been all that serious about it to start. "Well…what else we got?"

Squat. They had jack squat, which was kind of the problem. Last time it had been Nurse Betty over there that did the deed, but Dean had seen to that problem. Which left them with a whole new set of issues, just like every other time they'd altered the timeline. You'd think they'd learn.

Before Dean could spitball any ideas, good or bad, the Sarge was calling them across the room. The brothers took off, worried for the worst, and got to Andy's side in about ten strides each (okay, eight strides in the case of the long-legged-freak that was the younger Winchester).

"What is it?" Sam asked, immediately crouching down beside their friend, who had regained consciousness. He swallowed back the next question, not wanting to alert the armed Master Sarge to Andy's possible condition, and instead wrapped his hand around the kid's wrist. His pulse was better, but still weak. "How're you feeling?"

"Definitely…been better," the kid answered, eyes half-drooped and chin slumped against his chest. There were dark circles under his eyes, his skin wasn't quite the right color, and he sounded exhausted. The blood loss, pain, and painkillers could explain all that. But then again, so could the early stages of turning into an angry zombie. The kid's eyes widened somewhat as he struggled to stay awake. "You guys g-gotta…lock me up."

"You're fine, kid." Dean, standing just behind his brother, leveled Andy with the kind of glare that dared him to say otherwise. Andy huffed.

"You don't know that," was his quiet reply, not that he was trying to be quiet.

"Yeah, I do."

Andy glanced up at him, a sad little furl forming between his brows. "Then why do you look so scared, man?"

Dean had to physically bite down on his tongue to keep from answering, and he looked away petulantly, crossing his arms over his chest without realizing it only added to the pouting child look.

To their left, Mark glanced between the three of them, and then he caught on. His rifle was in both hands in an instant, partially raised but not yet focused at the injured kid. For good reason, too. His instincts had told him taking aim at the kid would have been a threat that ended in a bullet him. And that was with Mark considering himself a damn quick shot.

Sure enough, the older Winchester had his own gun drawn on the Marine in less than a second, and Sam moved between his half-raised rifle and Andy.

"Put it down, Sargent," Dean demanded, the look in his eyes giving Mark absolutely no doubt that he would follow through with shooting him. Whereas, the Sargent hadn't made up his mind about killing the kid. "Back off, Sarge, or we're gonna have a real problem."

"He's infected!" he half-protested anyway, because if it was true, if this man was about to turn like his neighbor, like his friends, then they couldn't risk waiting. To the kid's credit, Andy just stared tiredly up at him, as if he hadn't decided whose side he was on yet. As if he could side with Mark.

"He's immune." The barked words were more like a command, and the military man found his eyes leaving the target to focus on the older Winchester.

"Immune." His scoff was incredulous at best, but the rifle remained only half raised.

"We knew this was coming." As Sam spoke up, voice even and calm amid the storm of anger, all parties involved turned uncertain and surprised eyes to him. He was he half-crouched, arms raised, between Andy and the gun. Hazel eyes locked with Marks, and damn if they weren't just as serious, just as sure, as his brother's.

Mark's grip tightened on his gun. "What?"

"We knew," Sam reiterated, keeping the Master Sargent's attention on him and not Andy. Beside him, Dean was tense. "This is what we do, alright? The people we work for-"

"And just who the hell is that?" Mark interrupted, eyes continuously darting between the two brothers, ready for whichever made the next move. But Dean's eyes were on his brother. "FBI? CDC?"

"The kind of agency that doesn't have a name," the younger Winchester offered simply, and Dean had to once again admire his brother's bullshitting capabilities. Really, kid would have made one hell of a lawyer. "We got a tip about a possible biological weapon test in this town."

"Bullshit."

"Really?" Dean countered, eyeing the Sarge now that he knew Sam's play. "You think there's a better place to test a virus than a small town in the middle of nowhere? One road in, one road out, and probably only one friggin' cell tower to knock over to kill communication of the entire place."

Mark swallowed heavily and Sam lowered his arms a little further.

"We came here to check it out. Yes, Andy's infected, but-" The younger Winchester gestured cautiously at the kid, who was still staring up at the Sarge like he fully expected the man to end it- "he's immune. We all are; we were inoculated before we came."

The Sarge caught the glance both men sent the younger Winchester's way at that, and narrowed his eyes. He knew an omitted truth when he heard one. "But?"

Sam let his arms finally settle by his sides as the tension in the room, while still tense, wasn't at shoot-each-other-first-use-our-brains-and-communication-skills-second levels. "The immunization has never been tested in the field. Not fully."

He could see his spun story wasn't do all that much to settle the Marine's nerves, but Sam was also pretty sure he wasn't going to kill Andy anymore. At least not in the next few seconds.

"So here's what we'll do," he continued once it was obvious the Sarge wasn't calling him on his lie. "We're going to isolate him-" Sam raised a hand to silence his brother before Dean could get out much more than a growl or protest- "and wait out the incubation period."

Slowly, inch by inch, Mark lowered his rifle until it was pointed at the ground. "How long is that?"

Sam glanced sidelong at his brother. "About four hours."

The Master Sargent finally released his secondary grip on the barrel, rifle falling to his side. He was in no way alright with the situation, but even in the middle of what felt like the end of the world, he wasn't going to kill a kid in cold blood. Not without a damn good reason.

The younger Winchester nodded at him gratefully, then turned to help Andy to his feet.

"Sam-" Dean started, but that head of floppy brown hair just shook him into obedient silence. He stepped forward, taking the two IV bags Sam handed him, temporarily disconnecting them from the kid's elbow and hand. With his other arm wrapped under Andy's arm and around his back, Dean helped him towards one of the two patient rooms.

"We're not sure either, Dean," Sam finally explained, keeping his voice quiet not just for the Sarge watching them like a hawk, but for the exhausted and terrified psychic between them. Andy was a champ, pushing through this with everything he had, but Sam knew he was scared.

"I don't wanna turn you into Reavers," Andy mumbled, head still hanging down as they carried him into the small room and got him up on the cushioned table. He listed to the side, and both brothers realized that wasn't going to work. "Don't let me go full Reaver, guys."

"I don't even know what that is," Dean grumbled right back, trying for good natured but missing by a hair. Given the severity of the situation, he figured his frustration could be forgiven. Sam helped Andy back off the table while Dean grabbed a chair from the corner and put it in the middle of the room. Andy settled into it, hunched into himself and looking half his size. Still, he had the energy to stare up at Dean in wide-eyed horror as the older Winchester's words registered.

"You haven't seen Firefly?" Appalled, Andy shuddered and mourned for the poor, deprived man in front of him. His friend. How had he let his own friend go on living such an incomplete and meaningless life? Beside him, hooking the blood bag back up, Sam rolled his eyes affectionately. "Dude. You say my television education sucks. You're not even allowed to talk to me anymore."

"Oh, was that all it took?" Dean rolled his eyes and moved over to the only window in the small room.

Andy scoffed, but the sound ended in a pitiful whine. He reached up towards his bound arm, but Sam caught his hand before he could risk opening his stitches. Familiar with that kind of suffering, Sam squeezed Andy's hand tightly, all but encouraging him to do the same, as the kid rode out the wave of pain. At the window, Dean released the blinds after seeing nothing but the empty lot behind the building and instead started rooting around the room for a stronger painkiller.

"You guys gotta tie me up." As the pain subsided, Andy's words came out breathless. It was clear he had used what energy he had left. The poor kid really wasn't looking good, but that could be the blood loss and shock. Or it could be the virus. It was probably blood loss and shock. Dean was ready to protest, probably to tell him it was definitely-absolutely-no-way-anything-else-but blood loss and shock (like the kid might not be aware he was missing a quarter of his supply), but the look Andy pinned him with ended the change of topic before he could even get it started. "Come on, it's not worth the risk, and you know it."

Dean was silent for a moment, once again pouting angrily at the corner of the room. But it didn't take much of the silence, of the kid's shallow, labored breathing, before he gave in. Mirroring words Andy had once granted him in an interrogation room in Baltimore, Dean conceded, "I do know it."

So Sam found several lengths of rubber medical tube, probably used to tourniquet a limb when drawing blood, and started securing Andy to the chair. While he did, Dean summoned as much huffy exasperation as an older brother possibly could, and asked the kid what the hell 'Firefly' was all about. Nothing with that girly a name could be worth watching.

Well, that kept Andy plenty distracted from the current situation, so much so that Sam was done in no time at all.

The two brothers, Dean leaning out the door to check on the Sargent (who was keeping watch at the front windows), kept Andy talking for another ten minutes, mostly about this show that Sam actually had heard of before and Dean was begrudgingly starting to admit sounded pretty awesome, before their favorite Jedi fell morosely silent. Sam worried the full weight of the situation had finally settled in now that the kid was bound to a chair out of concern for turning into a rage-crazed, mindless monster. That was a lot for anyone to handle, but even Sam hadn't realized just what the full potential of that weight really was. Andy did.

"Will my powers still work?" The question was dazed at first, but then Andy swallowed and tried to straighten in the chair, panic hitting the edge of his voice. "If I turn, will I still be able to control people?"

The matching way Sam and Dean's eyes doubled in size might have been funny – might have been the sort of thing a little brother would have a good long laugh over – had the situation not been as truly terrifying as it was. Dean looked at Sam, blinking in that way of his that said One: he had no idea the answer and B: son of a bitch.

"Shit," was what he said out loud, and Sam swallowed reflexively, struggling through what should be such a simple bodily function.

"I'll stay with him." He said it softly, but the conviction in his words was strong. Dean cast an anguished look between him and Andy, realizing Sam's words meant Dean needed to leave. Leave his younger brother and a kid that had sort of earned an honorary brother spot in his heart over the last few months.

But Andy looked as scared as he ever did, and Dean knew, even as a mindless Croat, Andy would never forgive himself if he 'Reavered' them.

'Dumb name for a zombie', he'd muttered while Sam as tying the kid up.

'I think you mean awesome, you piece of goushi.'

Dean had to admit, any show that got away with swearing on live television by doing it in another language was probably worth watching. If only to learn all the naughty words.

Watching the kid they'd tied up in the middle of a doc's office, that they'd dragged into this mess to get shot at and cut up and infected, Dean couldn't do it. He didn't want to leave Andy alone with this. That's not what older brothers did. But as he looked back at Sam, who gave him a subtle nod of support, Dean realized that the kid would have an older brother with him.

With more emotion than the older Winchester was ever comfortable feeling and thoughts clear across the border of hair braiding and sleepovers, Dean pushed down his hesitation and nodded. "Alright. I'll keep watch with the Sarge. We'll…uh, we'll figure a way out once we're sure you're clear, alright?"

Andy nodded, obviously rallying every ounce of don't-show-them-you're-afraid-you-asked-for-this that he had in him. Still, Dean continued to stall, but he knew there was nothing for it. If Andy did turn, if it wasn't the demon blood that had made Sam immune but his bloodline as a vessel instead, if the kid did keep his powers as a Croat, Dean couldn't be there when it happened. He knew that. So he finally walked out of the small patient's room and, after a second's deliberation, swung the door mostly closed behind him. Worry still gnawed at his gut, for Andy, for Sam, so, at the last moment, he left it cracked. Just in case.

The kid would be fine. Because it was the demon blood that made Sam immune. It was, it was, it was. Dean released the door handle and made his way back to the lobby and their other tagalong.

-o-o-o-

The two men stood guard by the clinic's front windows, peaking through the blinds and aimlessly pacing the empty lobby in an excruciatingly tense and unpleasant hour. Between the threat outside and Sarge given him the distrusting, angry side-eye every six and a half minutes on the dot, the night wasn't exactly off to a great start.

Dean remembered liking the Sarge the last time. Respecting him, at the very least. He'd been glad the man had been among the few to survive, and had genuinely wished him well when he and the Tanner kid headed out of town the next morning. This time though…Dean wasn't sure if it was just the changes they'd enacted – the more limited Croat breakout that meant the Sarge hadn't seen his neighbors tearing each other apart, or maybe that the majority of what Mark had seen was Dean gunning down those neighbors in cold blood – but Dean was starting to worry about the possibility of more having changed than just what he and Sam had so far caused.

Okay, so maybe half of the Sarge's looks were purely in response to the distrustful side-eye Dean sent his way every six minutes on the dot.

But the man from the future was sickof being one step behind Hell and another two behind Time. Sick of it. He wasn't trusting anything anymore, and that included a man that hadn't been infected last time.

He turned on his heel at the end of the row of waiting chairs, the third up and down line he'd made in about half as many minutes, and faced the Sarge. Dean opened his mouth, probably to start something he'd either regret because the man was nothing but an ordinary human terrified out of his mind at his quaint little home town ripping itself apart, or because he was a croat or a demon. The latter of which Dean was hardly prepared to fight.

He was damn sick of that too. As soon as they survived this nightmare and got out of Rivergrove, he was finding a damn demon knife or an angel blade. Fuck it. Other versions than Ruby's had to exist somewhere on the planet.

The sudden eruption of banging terrified cries for help coming from the front door stopped both men, who immediately rounded towards the noise, guns up.

"Hey! Let me in, let me in! Please!"

Dean frowned at the flash of déjà vu and the not-completely-unfamiliar voice. He realized who it was even as he followed the Sarge out into the main hallway of the building.

"It's Duane Tanner!" Mark exclaimed, but the pleasant surprise quickly turned into suspicion. He hesitated at the sight of the Tanner's oldest kid, pounding on the glass door, terror in his eyes and desperation on his face. Mark had seen enough tonight not to fall for it so quickly.

Winchester, on the other hand, pushed right past him, grabbing one of the chairs they'd formed a blockade with and tossing it aside. He opened the left door to the clinic, ushering the kid in without so much as a demanded explanation for where he'd been or how he'd found them. Duane Tanner limped gratefully into the quiet space, sliding his camping pack off his back as he did so.

"Thank god."

"You're bleeding," Mark said, suddenly twice as wary as he had been. Dean was putting the chair back under the handle of the door, wedging it into place.

Duane's eyes dropped down to his leg, where his pants leg was ripped clean through and he had a good two, three inch cut along his shin. A little frown pulled at his brow but the kid didn't look very worried about it. "I was running. I…I saw Roger McGill being dragged out of his house by people we know! They started cutting him with knives! So I ran. I…must have tripped."

Mark shook his head, rifle raising once more but not quite trained on the kid. He still wouldn't kill without a damn good reason, but he was starting to worry he had one.

"He's not infected," Dean announced, like he was some sort of damn oracle when it came to who in this town was a madman. The Winchester man left it at that, pushing past the two to head back into Dr. Lee's office.

"Infected?" Duane echoed with a new look of terror and confusion coming across his face. "Infected by what?"

"What do you mean, 'he's not infected'?" Mark parodied back, angrily following after the man he'd just about had enough with. Dean Winchester talked like he was a damn authority on whatever the hell was happening to Mark's town, but he refused to explain anything. Mark was done buying it.

"Exactly what I said," Dean answered tersely, that condescending tone back in his voice that grated on the Marine's last nerve. "He's not infected."

The Marine Sargent wet his lips, grip tightening and loosening against the trigger and butt of his rifle. Despite doing his best to keep his calm, it was through gritted teeth that he growled, "You can't possibly know that."

"Yeah, well, I do." Dean tucked his gun back into his waist, eyes darting, however momentarily, to the partially closed door where his brother and Andy were sequestered away. He hadn't checked on them in a while, and a little niggle of worry started up when Sam didn't come out to check on the noise. Dean rolled his shoulder, rubbing at his chest.

"You 'just know'."

Closing his eyes to keep from rolling them – or worse – Dean turned back to the front of the store and Mark, who was wringing that rifle in his hands with increased agitation. Dean narrowed his eyes and met every inch of distrust pouring off the man with a growing bucket load of his own. "Yeah. I just know."

"Yeah?" Mark countered, taking a challenging step forward. "Well I'm finding that damn suspicious. That you just know."

Between them but off to the side, Duane Tanner looked back and forth at the warring men, worry quickly replacing his confusion. "Uh, guys? What's going on?"

"You know what I find suspicious?" Dean took that same step forward, bringing the two men within punching distance of each other. His fingers twitched for the gun he'd just put away, but if his growing hunch was right, if that ache spreading across his chest was dead on as it always had been, then that gun wouldn't do him any good. "That you of all people didn't listen to Andy's message. You didn't go home, Sarge. Nah, you just happened to be out on the town, in the exact right place at the right time to run into me. Again."

The Sarge's answering frown, angry as it was, also became confused. Dean didn't buy it, though. "What message? And what do you mean, 'again?' I've only run into you once on this blasted night, and once was plenty enough."

This time Dean did roll his eyes. Ignoring the second part of Mark's words, he explained curtly, "The message we broadcasted all over town, asshole, telling everyone to get inside and stay there. Funny that you didn't listen."

The Master Sarge's eyes grew dark at the accusation he didn't fully understand but heard regardless. He drew to his full height, which was a couple inches short of the Winchester man, but he didn't let that stop him from being an intimidating sight himself. "I didn't hear any damn message, and even if I had, I wouldn'ta listened to it!"

"Guys…" Duane glanced between them, clearly growing nervous of the fight just seconds from breaking out.

"Yeah, I'm starting to get that." Dean smirked, the corner of his mouth ticking up dangerously. Mark suddenly got a whole new impression of the man, and it wasn't a pretty one. Distantly, they both heard the door to the patient's room opening and Sam coming out, asking what was going on. But Dean was focused on other things, like the burning in his chest and the son of a bitch right in front of him. "In fact, I'm starting to get the feeling Azazel had a spy on the inside the entire time. We just didn't know it."

Mark's frown only doubled, bafflement almost winning over the anger. Beside them, the Tanner kid stiffened and across the room, Sam started towards them. Dean took that last step into the Sarge's personal space and opened his mouth.

"Christo."

-o-o-o-

Dean was expecting a hiss and black eyes. Which was exactly what he got, just not from the direction he was anticipating. The sharp, serpentine intake of air to his right was surprising enough to render the hunter utterly useless for a span of about six seconds. He blinked, turning to the kid standing beside them, pack still hanging off one shoulder, leg bleeding, and eyes pure black.

"Son of a-"

Dean's stunned curse was interrupted as Duane Tanner backhanded him, both physically and with a wave of supernatural power, sending him flying into a row of chairs. The hit was hardly the worst he'd taken, but the tangle of seats around him slowed the hunter from getting immediately back to his feet. As he fought metal limbs and hard plastic, tossing the chair atop him aside, he heard the Sarge's gun discharge three times. Even heard the sick, wet thud of bullets sinking into flesh, but Dean knew they'd do no good against the Tanner kid.

God damnit, had he been a demon the whole (other) time?

Dean sat upright in time to see Duane grab the barrel of Mark's rifle and bend it like a rubber hose. The Sarge's eyes were wide; he knew death when he looked it in the face. Duane snapped his neck just as easily.

The older Winchester didn't have time to mourn the man as Mark's body crumpled to the floor or acknowledge any of the guilt he'd sure be feeling later for getting him killed this time. All because he'd targeted the wrong damn change in the timeline.

"Dean, Dean, Dean." Tanner turned to him, aggressive grin spreading across his face, and Dean drew his gun. "There you go again, knowing things you're not supposed to."

They'd come into this cursed little town with holy water, of course (prepared for anything), but his canister had been in that god damn duffle bag back at the station. Knowing it was useless, Dean emptied the clip into the approaching demon anyway. Every bullet sinking into the bastard might do absolutely nothing to slow him down, but it sure as hell felt better than doing nothing.

Soon as they made it out. They were getting themselves a god damn demon knife.

Several feet away, Duane suddenly faltered in his approach. Dean's gun clicked empty, and he reached into his front pocket to reload. The Tanner kid's focus was elsewhere, however, as his limbs twitched of their own accord and a muscle in his neck spasmed. He hissed suddenly, and with it the first trickle of black smoke leaked free of his mouth.

Black eyes turned sharply to the right, to Sam, still standing across the room from them. His lips moved in a near silent exorcism, but the Latin whispers were just enough to reach the demon. Duane hissed and more smoke leaked out, more spasms followed.

Dean slammed his backup magazine into the chamber and emptied it a second time as the demon started across the room.

"Sam, run!"

But his brother did no such thing. The younger Winchester stood his ground, mouth moving furiously, no longer keeping the exorcism quiet. The Tanner kid twitched like a damn epileptic, but it didn't stop his progress across the room. Dean knew the demon was only playing with its food.

"Damnit," the older hunter hissed, shoving the weapon back into his waistline and scrambling to his feet. He charged the demon as soon as he was upright; it was a kamikaze move – a fool's move – but he had no other choice.

"Ah-ah-ah." Tanner took his tackle head on but spun and, with a little demon-love-tap, sent Dean flying into the ground and sliding several feet away.

"Dean!" Sam broke off the exorcism as his brother hit the linoleum floor hard. The young hunter had memorized the Latin words easily enough, but rattling it off unfazed, sentence after sentence, all while facing down a creature of Hell currently beating the crap out of his brother, was something that clearly required more practice.

"Now, don't you go anywhere, Sam," the demon said as he stalked the six or so feet over to the fallen Winchester. Dean rolled onto his back and kicked out with his legs. Duane Tanner's shin bone snapped in half, but the demon hardly cared. He didn't notice or care about the limp in his gait as he bent down, picking the older Winchester up by the front of his jacket and hauling him into the air. Dean grunted, one hand wrapped around the kid's insanely strong grip, the other trying fruitlessly to punch that smug smirk right off his face.

Still holding his older brother a good inch off the ground, Duane turned back to Sam and aimed his pointer finger, thumb up, at Sam and smiled. "We've got a little something we need you to try out for us. It won't hurt. Much."

Sam stiffened, the words ringing with distant familiarity. His brother had called all of this a test. The demon raised the same two fingers to his lips and whistled loudly. The immediate shattering of glass answered as the front windows caved in. An echo of the same happening in the hallway broke the tension-filled room.

"Damnit, Sam, run!" Dean growled, and this time Sam actually listened. Several Croats came flooding into the room, climbing through the broken windows, bringing down the blinds in a clatter as their bodies hit the floor, some slamming into the clinic door, breaking the glass and scrambling for the lock with torn up, bleeding arms. The demon and Dean were closest to both sources, but the infected flowed around them like a river around a rock and Sam, realizing they weren't after his brother, finally bolted.

He made it to the room Andy was still tied up in, barreling through the door and slamming it shut behind him.

"What's going on?" Andy, who'd been in a fitful sleep until gunfire woke him in a panic, was pulling at his bonds, tilting the chair dangerously back and forth in an attempt to break free. "Sam, what's happening!"

The younger Winchester didn't answer, darting across the room for the doctor's stool tucked beneath the counter. He shoved it up and under the door handle only seconds before the entire surface rattled with the impact of something big and heavy.

Andy went deathly quiet, staring at the door with wide, horrified eyes. "Sam…? Where's Dean?"

Another thud shook the door, then another and another, and the sound of Croats trying to break it down was hard to misinterpret. Andy was shaking, struggling to swallow through the giant lump in his throat that was the realization of only one Winchester being on the right side of the door. Sam turned to him, fingers trembling with adrenaline as he pulled out the IV line and started on the knots tying the medical tubing tight to the kid's arms.

"What are you doing?" Andy whispered, but even his voice shook. "It hasn't been four hours!"

The younger Winchester barely spared him the patronizing big brother look as he got the first tube off, freeing Andy's good arm. "I'll take my chances."

He immediately moved to the other arm. With the next thud to the door, the stool slid an inch forward with a terrible metallic screech. Andy stared at the trembling, warping door with horror. It wasn't going to hold forever.

Sam got the last of the knots out and ripped the tubing off of him. He hauled Andy to his feet.

"How do we get out?" the kid whispered, leaning a good portion of his weight against the taller hunter. Sam was a damn rock beside him. "Not that I'm complaining about dying standing up instead of tied to a chair, but it's still dying, and I'd rather not do that."

The Winchester nodded his head to the small window, the only other exit from the room. Andy stared at the thing for a second, realizing how much it was going to hurt climbing through that thing with his injuries, and just groaned.

-o-o-o-

Dean kicked out uselessly, feeling humiliatingly like a toddler in the much smaller kid's grip. Demon strength was a bitch. The hunter tried to break the black-eyed bastard's hold, but to no avail. All of the Croats but one had disappeared into the back of the clinic, leaving it eerily quiet and still. Dean could only hope the lack of noise meant Sam and Andy had made it out.

"Alone at last," the Tanner kid said, eyes practically twinkling as he kept the hunter aloft like every super-powered bad guy ever. Dean was not impressed. The demon completely ignored the solitary Croat he had ordered to stay. The poor soul had once been an older man, probably a stand up fellow in the community because, sure, why not. Now he stood by the clinic doors, swaying back and forth ever so slightly, but otherwise completely blank to the world.

Dean was way more wary of the Croat than the demon currently weight-lifting his body like he was going for the official title of World's Longest Upright Planking. Cuz that was totally a thing.

"Fuck you," he spat, kicking out again. Even when he managed to strike the demon, the Tanner kid barely even reacted to the glancing blows.

"Oh, you'll wish that's all we did to you, Winchester."

Dean stilled in the demon's grip, gritting his teeth as he stared down at the creature. Green eyes glanced over to the Croat, a flicker of fear running up his spine, but the zombie didn't move. Dean bared his teeth, trying to fight back the curiosity, tried not to give the bastard exactly what he wanted, but ultimately failed. "…We?"

Duane Tanner just grinned.

-o-o-o-

Sam lowered Andy into the claustrophobically narrow space slowly, careful not to tear open those wounds. They hadn't made it far, only a dozen feet from the medical clinic, but the small parking lot that lined the back of the building had several alcoves and doorways, including this one, which was primarily taken up by a very large dumpster. The smell was horrendous, of course, but it was a good hiding spot and the best they'd get in the handful of seconds between that door breaking down and the Croats climbing out the window after them.

The beanstalk of a Winchester crouched down to the ground the best he could between the filthy metal box and the dirt and skidmark-streaked wall at the back of the alcove. From where he was positioned, he could peer around the corner of the dumpster and see about a thirty foot stretch of parking lot. He ducked back with a silent hiss as a shadowy figure ran past only feet away. A second followed, pausing for a moment right in front of the dumpster and Sam latched onto Andy's hand as the kid positively shook. But he stayed quiet, and the Croat eventually turned on his heel and headed off across the lot at a dead run. The two hunters let out silent breaths.

Sam could see others dart into his constricted field of vision now and then, spreading out and away from the medical clinic. The five or so infected that had chased after them had, once again, split up in the hunt. Luckily, hide and seek didn't seem too high up on their resume of zombie skills.

"Was that all of them?" Andy finally whispered, voice so quiet Sam barely heard it from right next to him. He squeezed the kid's hand before letting go and daring to climb a little further out of the alcove.

Sam could still see a shadowy figure in the distance, searching the tree-line a hundred feet away. But given the lack of light in the lot behind this block of buildings, Sam doubted the Croat would spot them, even if they climbed out into the open right now.

"Yeah, I think that's all of them." The hunter straightened from his half-crouched position, cricket legs already cramping from the tight fit. Andy made an aborted motion to stop him, but ended up just clenching his teeth and breathing through the very obvious panic. Sam hesitated because of it, observing the poor kid for a long moment, before crouching back down. He laid a comforting hand on Andy's shoulder. "I've gotta go back for Dean."

Wide brown eyes snapped to his and Andy's jaw flapped open uselessly for a second. "He's alive?"

Sam winced, realizing that in his frantic rush to get them both out, he hadn't exactly been forthcoming with the details. "Yeah. A demon got him but…but he's alive. The…Reavers were just after me."

For some reason, Sam still couldn't bring himself to call the demon-virus infected humans by the term Dean slung around so damn causally. It was something about the bitter darkness in his brother's face anytime he used that word that continuously hung Sam up anytime he thought about using it.

"Aw, man," Andy shuddered. "You mean I coulda stayed tied up in my nice cozy medical-tube prison and been fine?"

Now he got the proper big brotherly glare.

"Sure, if getting capture by a demon is your idea of 'fine.'" The younger Winchester stood once more, this time fully rising to look out over the dumpster. The shadowy figure by the tree-line was gone and the rest of the small lot was encouragingly empty. "I've gotta go back."

"'Kay. What's the plan?" Andy hissed as he started struggling to his feet. Sam immediately turned, pushing him back to the ground as gently as he could.

"The plan is you're staying here."

"What?" The kid blinked up at him and, despite the fluids refill, Sam could tell he was still far from good. And surely in a lot of pain. "Nah, man, I'm coming with you."

"Andy, you can barely stand on your own."

And he was bleeding again, but considering they were zilch in the way of medical supplies right now, Sam really didn't see the benefit of pointing that out.

The resident Jedi let out a loud, 'pfft' before realizing it reverberated in the alcove and echoed out into the parking lot. Sam wasn't worried – there wasn't anyone near enough to hear – but the kid quickly dropped his voice back down. "Who needs to stand? You can totally pull off a rescue with a butt-scoot."

Sam dropped back down, a pitiable but affectionate (if not properly exasperated) expression on his face. He squeezed Andy's good shoulder again and the kid new he wasn't going right then and there. No one in the history of ever could win a fight against those stupidly sympathetic, understanding, puppy dog eyes.

"Youcan totally pull off a rescue. By sitting here, out of sight."

"And if you don't come back?" Andy was quieter now but staring up at him intently.

Sam was quiet too, knowing the possibility of that was very, very real. He gave the kid the most confident look he could muster and then tried to feel it himself. "I'm coming back."

With that, the younger Winchester climbed to his feet and edged his way around the dumpster and out of the alcove. He took several tentative steps into the open, staring at the darkness hedging in from all three sides. Confident he was alone, Sam turned back to the dumpster, double checking Andy was completely out of sight.

"Well, well, well."

Sam's head snapped up and he stumbled several feet back from the wall of the building, where three people stood on the edge of the roof at least twenty feet above him.

Not good.

"Sam Winchester."

The woman who had spoken dropped from the building, hitting the ground with a sharp impact, but standing from the twenty-something drop like she hadn't felt a thing. When she rose to her full height, her eyes slid black.

So. Not. Good.

"We've been looking for you."

Her two buddies joined her, landing on either side of the woman. The larger of the two looked over his shoulder at the dumpster, and Sam's stomach sunk somewhere down near his toes. They knew. He clenched his fists by his side as the hulking mass of a demon shoved the dumpster to the side and started pushing his way into the small space. There was no way Sam could get an exorcism out before one of the three demons took him down.

The woman pulled a walkie-talkie from her hip. It crackled with static as she turned it on, and Sam realized it had to be shortwave. Dean had said the radios would be out as well; another reason not to bring Baby with them. She raised it to her perfectly painted red lips.

"Kill the jammer and call the boss. Tell him we got 'em."

Andy cried out as the demon hauled him up and out of the alcove. Sam yelled at them to stop; there was no reason to hurt him further or risk tearing the stitches keeping an already limited supply of blood inside the boy where it belonged. But neither of the psychics' words, super-powered or not, had any effect on the demons. The kid stumbled into the open space behind the demon, dragged out by the hair. Both of Andy's arms were up, clawing at the meaty hands and Sam eyed his shoulder worryingly. It didn't look like it was bleeding much more than before, at least for now.

Andy met his gaze from feet away. Sam didn't have any answers to the questions or the fear there. He put up a fight as the third demon grabbed onto his arm, eventually having to get a much better grip after Sam took out a kneecap and busted the guy's nose. But there wasn't much more than a good fight to be had against three demons who could break their bones like toothpicks. They were well and truly screwed this time.

A minute later, the familiar crackle of Azazel's voice replying through the radio sealed that deal.

Chapter End Notes

A/Ns: head thud twenty one head thud god damn head thud pages.

…But it was worth it, no? Dear Chuck, tell me it was worth it. Lie to me if you have to.

Next Update: may be late, as I'm going camping next weekend. Great for writing time, reeeeally crappy for uploading-to-that-thing-called-the-internet-which-doesn't-really-exist-in-the-middle-of-the-woods-(yet). But it'll be up by Monday at the latest.

Reviews: Firstly, you guys have been AWESOME to me the last couple chapters and there really aren't words to express just how much I appreciate it or how much it means to the success of this story. If you still have it in you, please keep it coming for this chapter. It's not that this little re-write took a lot out of me, but it definitely delayed that whole writing-new-material-instead-of-adding-a-super-long-chapter-to-an-already-finished-arc-that-just-didn't-have-the-Sarge-in-it-but-was-still-perfectly-fine-damnit. At least until the Muse reminded me that no, no it really wasn't.

Secondly, we gained a ton of new readers which is always awesome to see, so WELCOME NEW PEEPS!

Review Replies: To the Guest reviewer on ff who complimented my management of Andy not becoming a magical solve-all solution to every problem: [insert nervous laughter here that quickly turns into sobbing] You have no idea, can I please just kill him off, he makes it so I have to work SO MUCH HARDER AT THIS CREATIVE WRITING STORY TELLING THING.

Fun Fact #420: I will not kill Andy Gallagher off just because he makes me work so much harder at this creative writing story telling thing.

Fun Fact #421: I will (probably) kill him off because Time is a mother effer and I'm a no good dirty rotten author ^.^

Anyhoo! Hope you guys enjoyed this one, see you next time!

Chapter 76: Season 2: Chapter 43

Chapter Notes

A/Ns: I came home early from my camping trip to finish editing this chapter just for you all XD

Ookay, so we didn't cut the trip short only for this story; my friend also started feeling ill and the weather was pretty chuck-awful. But no lie, I sat in the woods that I love all day yesterday and grumbled about how I just wanted to be home where I could edit without worrying about battery conservation and glare on my screen. XP This story is becoming my life and I'm really not sure that's a good thing.

Minutiae: The logical part of my brain that insists on accuracy and realism tells me a town the size of Rivergrove would not have its own school. They'd likely bus their kids to a bigger town. But, the imaginative part of my brain says a town close enough to ship their kids off in a bus every day is no place for a zombie apocalypse. So I'm making Rivergrove rural enough that those bitches, all three hundred and seventy one of them, have their own school.

Just imagine how proud they'd be, having chipped in their tax dollars and a little extra to build a brand new gymnasium complete with basketball court. They'd have had one of those large signs with a thermometer drawn on it, red marker filling up the tube to show how much money they'd raised and how much more they had to go. They'd have thrown a party in that gymnasium once it was newly built. It'd be the pride and joy of the community, guys.

(Am I romanticizing small town life in my head? You bet I am. But you go watch that episode. Aside from being creepy as fuck, that town was cute)

(Now let's go murder a bunch of people in it.)

Quality Warning: The beginning of this chapter was so much better written when it immediately followed Ch. 41. But now I've cannibalized it so the damn Muse could have her twenty one extra pages, and it's still a little rough in my opinion.

Chapter Warnings: Dean's taking a beating, Azazel is being his usual unnerving self, Sam's faced with some difficult choices, Andy's hurting, Cas is coming to the rescue, and if you thought the last chapter was a cliffhanger…well, it was nice knowing you, cuz you're not gonna like me for very much longer.

Actual Chapter Warnings: For real, there is a pretty rough beating and minor torture and gore in this chapter. Azazel is a super creep, Andy is, uh, really not doing well, and there's a terrible, no good, dirty rotten sort-of double cliffhanger.

See the end of the chapter for more notes

-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-

The Road So Far (This Time Around)

Season 2: Chapter 43

-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-

Dean kicked and fought and punched for every yard he was dragged out of the doctor's office and down the main street. The Tanner kid hadn't gotten him very far in the six and a half minutes since Sam locked himself and Andy inside one of the patient rooms and never came back out. Their lack of progress was probably due to Dean putting all one hundred and eighty pounds of fit, trim muscle (and, okay, a little bit of cheeseburgers and pie, but only, like, a little), into throwing a level eleven temper tantrum that would have any two year old looking on in aspiration.

The old man Croat, weirdly enough, followed along behind the two of them like a chaperone to the world's most unorthodox and unwanted date.

"Enough!" Duane, or whatever the demon's actual name was (probably long forgotten after centuries down in the pit) shouted as he came to a halt outside a tiny little pharmacy only two doors down from the clinic. The demon spun, slamming Dean's back into the wall hard enough to shake dust free from the brick façade.

The hunter groaned, sure to have bruises all up and down his back tomorrow (if he lived that long). He picked his head off the wall to glare at the black-eyed bastard. "Or what? You'll kill me?"

How unoriginal that would turn out to be.

Tanner sneered, lip curling up and over his teeth. He gestured with his head to the old man standing just to their left, back to swaying mindlessly. "No, Winchester. I'll let that one take you apart piece by piece. Not enough to kill you, just enough to infect you and leave you to die a slow, miserable death. Until you get back up, mindless and obedient, and hunt down your own brother just to taste his blood."

For the life of him, Dean couldn't help the way he blanched, but damnit, did he try. The hunter swallowed past the lump in his throat and forced himself to maintain eye contact. But for one of the few times in his life, he opted to stay silent and it annoyed him how satisfied the demon looked. He didn't have a choice, though. There was no telling what Hell and Time would make of this mess, and he couldn't take any chances. They were far enough off from the events he knew that just about anything could happen now. Including one (or more) of them not making it out this time.

However, that didn't mean he had any intention of making it easy for the bastard holding him in an iron grip.

"Dean!"

The hunter's head snapped up and to the side, a mix of surprise, fear, hope, then ultimately devastation passing through him like so much whiplash. Sam stood at the next corner a hundred feet away, flanked by a man and woman. A third hulking beast of a dude joined them, practically hauling Andy in front of him. Dean's chest constricted at the sight. They hadn't gotten away after all.

The three captors were far too calm to be activated Croats, and Dean realized he was seeing the first wave of that 'we' Tanner mentioned. Demons. Just how many were in this God-forsaken town? Hell was only supposed to have a handful operating on Earth at the moment. Had they upped their numbers, or were they all just conveniently summoned for a little Winchester Welcoming Party? Dean grit his teeth as the Tanner kid grinned, peeling him off the wall and dragging him towards the others. He didn't fight nearly as hard since that was exactly where he wanted to go anyway.

"Sam," he breathed out as he got close enough to see his kid brother was alright. He didn't look hurt, though he was definitely a bit scuffed up and dirtier than he had been fifteen minutes ago. Andy wasn't doing nearly as well, half of his weight held up by the demon's hands, but he still looked better than he had right after they'd left the sheriff's station. The blood and fluids had clearly helped. Dean leaned away from Duane's grip as much as he could to eye the kid's shoulder. There was some blood smattering the bandages and the poor kid was shivering in the November air in nothing more than his t-shirt, but he was alive and it looked like he might stay that way for now.

He looked in his right mind too, as much as a blood loss victim could be, which was a good sign. They were two hours into the incubation period. Dean would have expected a turn by now, if it was going to happen.

The female demon took immediate control of the situation, ordering the beast of a meatsuit holding Andy to also keep an eye on Dean, as well, given the new bruises Tanner was sporting on his face and arms. The older Winchester ended up sandwiched between the two of them as they resumed their journey to who-knows where.

The demons dragged the three humans down the deserted drag, the late hours of night upon them in the ghost town that Rivergrove was quickly becoming. They could still hear the occasional glass breaking in the distance, gunfire, and one time answering screams, but the noises were few and far between. And there was nothing the Winchester could do about any of it. Most of the town had surely been lost in that first hour after the Croats broke free. Their plan hadn't saved anyone. The whole town would be infected, dead, or missing by morning, if they weren't already.

As they got to the end of the main drag, the road split in a T-intersection, and across the street was what looked like a school, though it was hard to tell in the darkness. Well, that was a terrible idea. No horror movie ever took place in an empty, abandoned school in the dead of night in a town full of zombies. Not at all.

Dean landed a particularly good kick to Demon Hulk, to let his dislike of their current trajectory be clear. The hellspawn actually let out a grunt, grip on Andy faltering to the point where the kid stumbled and hit the ground with a weak cry. Dean felt a flash of guilt there, silently urging him to get up and run, but the kid was just too out of it. The woman who seemed to be in charge of Larry, Moe, and Hulk Curly here, spun on her heel, jaw squared tight and fire in her eyes.

"Hey!" she hissed, stalking up to him while Dean just pulled on his most charming Winchester smile. The one that never failed to piss off monsters. "You better get in line right now, Winchester, or-"

The demon stopped right in front of his face, her lips so close to his he could feel her breath on his cheek, and Dean didn't hesitate. He reared back and slammed his head into hers.

He was pretty sure the snort he heard came from Andy, but given the way his vision whited out for a second, Dean didn't actually know. The Tanner kid delivered a punch right to his kidneys for that little move, and the hunter found himself bent involuntarily in half, harboring his side.

"Son of a- That's it!" the woman shrieked as she straightened back up, hands covering her bleeding, broken nose. The demon pointed viciously at the one croat the demons had kept with them: the old man.

"You! Get over here."

The guy obeyed without a sound, stepping towards her and Dean, who was playing nice while he put his internal organs back together. Tanner and the other normal sized meatsuit (Moe), seemed impatient to get moving, but as the woman was in charge, they stood by in disquieted agitation, hands tight on their prisoners.

"Gimme 'em," the demon demanded of the Croat. Dean tried not to let his trepidation show, but only ended up frowning almost comically when the infected man pulled three sets of cuffs from his pockets. He must have been one of the original Croats they'd locked up and raided the sheriff's station once the hunters fled. Dean eyed the cuffs, then turned that skeptical look on the demon.

"Wasn't my hands that broke your nose, sweetheart."

The woman took a deep breath, but let it out with a sickly sweet smile, made all the worse by the river of blood still dripping down her mouth and chin. "Oh, believe me. I'd take that head right off your shoulders if it was in the cards, bucko."

Dean forced a grin on his face to cover the way his stomach rolled. If the demons had orders to keep them alive – which was obvious given they'd been taken prisoner – then that could really only mean one thing.

Azazel was here, waiting for them at the end of this little nature walk of theirs.

Dean met Sam's eyes in realization, only to see his brother already knew. Well fuck.

They were all handcuffed, arms bound in front of them. As if to prove his brother's point, the bracelets didn't stopped Sam from giving his captor (Moe) a black eye, which earned him a particularly vicious hit across the face in return. Even bleeding from the temple, Sam didn't hesitate from striking out at the very next opportunity. As the demons turned to handcuffing Andy, the kid muffling a yell as his injured arm was manhandled in front of him, Sam broke free of Moe to bulldoze right into Demon Hulk (Curly, naturally).

"Enough!" The ringleader hollered, coming up behind Andy to grab the back of his neck with one hand and curl the other over his injured shoulder. She dug one of her perfectly manicured fake nail into the bullet wound as a warning, and Andy screamed.

Both hunters froze in their outright revolt, Dean releasing his captor (Larry, aka Duane Tanner) from a chokehold he absolutely had not been winning (though the cuffed hands had lent some assistance there) and Sam laid panting on the ground where Hulk Curly stumbled to his feet. The monstrosity of a meatsuit huffed in annoyance then pulled the hunter back up by the scruff of his shirt. Sam went willingly, eyes locked on the demon holding Andy.

She sneered at them, not withdrawing her finger from Andy's bleeding body but not going any further, either. The kid was struggling for air, eyes wide and glassy with pain, as a fresh flow of blood started down his arm.

"Leave him alone," Dean growled, uselessly raising bound wrists like the double-armed human club could ever be an actual threat to a demon (although, given he was a Winchester and they were known for pulling win's out of their asses, there was a chance, actually). Tanner grabbed onto his bicep with a low growl and Dean ripped away from him, his promise to turn that club on him next coming in loud and clear.

"Or what? Hunters; you always think you're the ones in charge," the demon scoffed, hand squeezing threateningly on Andy's shoulder. The kid whimpered, just barely keeping his feet under him as pain rolled from his arm like waves of liquid fire. No, worse than fire. Acid, burning him from the inside out. "Well, let me tell you, I've got no qualms having one less of you around. Hell, I'm more than happy to leave this kid right here and let him bleed to death if you two don't stow the hero complex and fall in line, now."

Her entire hand clenched, sending Andy back towards the ground as his legs gave out and his entire upper body spasmed in retaliation. His scream tore at the Winchesters, and Sam raised his hands as well, less of the threat his brother promised and more in surrender.

"Stop, stop!" he yelled until the demon let up, leaving their friend a gasping, gaping, bleeding mess in her hands, the only thing holding him up. "Just stop. You don't need to hurt him, alright? It's me you all want." Sam slowly lowered his hands as the woman regarded him with cold, calculating eyes. Her hand finally loosened from its death grip on Andy. Beside him, Sam could feel Dean tense, teeth gritted against his little brother offering himself up on a silver platter. But it's what Dean would have done if it was Sam standing there hurt and bleeding. The younger Winchester gestured to himself with shrugged shoulders and bound wrists, "Well, you got me. I'm right here."

The thin-lipped smile – half a sneer, really – was all teeth, and it immediately set Sam's hunting instincts on edge. "That's nice of you to, Sam. Volunteering like that."

She tossed her head at something just over his shoulder, but the brunet didn't have time to turn before something was stabbed into his neck. Sam cried out, trying to pull away, but a tight grip wrapped around his arm held him kept him from escaping as fire erupted where his neck and shoulder met.

"Sammy!" Dean saw the attack coming at the last possible second, but there was nothing he could do to stop Moe from plunging a syringe full of the old man's blood – gathered while the two had been distracted by the threat to Andy's life – and emptying it into Sam's neck. Duane, still hovering beside him, was quick to restrain the older Winchester and Dean could do nothing but watch as Sam stumbled to one knee, hand clamped over the injection site.

The blood burned through his veins like liquid ice, and Sam shuddered at the slight buzz that accompanied it. Not unlike demon blood, he realized, and his eyes shot open at that. Sam jerked his head around, wincing as it pulled at the fresh bruising to his neck. He stared at Moe and the red-ringed syringe in his hand with wide eyes.

"What was that?" the younger hunter asked, a hollow fear in his voice that had Dean immediately on his toes.

It was the demon in charge, popping her lips in success, who answered coolly, "Just a little cocktail. Something we're trying out."

Sam met his brother's eyes, the fear there clearly painting a picture of what else could have been in that syringe. Dean hadn't been paying attention – had Moe filled that syringe with some of his own good stuff before passing it onto the Croat? Damnit, they couldn't afford demon blood on top of everything else this night was turning out to be!

His part now played out, the female demon shoved Andy away from her. The kid stumbled a step and a half before his legs gave out. Luckily, Hulk Curly came to the antithetical rescue, grabbing Andy by his shirt before he could completely crumple to the ground. He set the kid back on his feet, holding up most of his weight when Andy couldn't quite manage it himself. Blood was once more falling to the black asphalt in a steady drip, drip, drip. The woman dusted her hands off on her skin-tight jeans and turned back towards the darkened school.

"Let's go," she tossed over her shoulder. The hunters' babysitters grabbed them one by one and started hauling them across the road.

-o-o-o-

The Rivergrove Robert Gray K-12 School was not a big building. It had one hallway lined with lockers that fed into four classrooms, a tiny teacher's lounge, and an administrative area that doubled as the principal's office. The building had an unattached gym, just big enough for a full-sized basketball court, which sat kitty-corner from the school. Hemmed in by the two buildings was a small rec field and playground. For a small town, it was the pride and joy of the community. They held local plays in that gym. The field doubled as a park on weekends, where the town held outdoor movie nights and the local Bluegrass band played every Friday. It was the central meeting location for just about anything town-related.

For the three hunters currently being dragged down its dark, deserted corridor, it was looking increasingly like a grave. Or, at the very least, an uncomfortably close call and the fuel for a series of nightmares they'd all rather not experience.

Andy was still shaking, eyes on the slow but steady stream of blood trailing down his arm, when the group came to a stop at the end of the school's only hallway. There were another four demons waiting for them there, eyes black and expressions grim.

Jesus Christ, how many damn demons were in this town? This was now beyond the number Dean had been comfortable thinking were topside at this point in the timeline. This was bad.

A door to their left, marked with a glowing red exit sign, led out to the field and gymnasium beyond. Still holding Dean, the Tanner kid all but tossed him into the waiting arms of two of those demons, who grabbed him and started hauling him towards the exit. Duane followed along behind, a little limp still in his step (much to Dean's satisfaction), and the whole little party was joined by another demon and Hulk Curly.

"Dean!" Sam tried to follow, not liking the uneven split of manpower and what it hinted at. But the last of the new demons latched onto him, and he and Andy were hauled into the classroom at the end of the hall, no matter how much Sam fought against it. Dean disappeared through the exit surrounded by demons, and Sam had the gut-wrenching thought that this new timeline, created by decisions he'd insisted on, was about to get his brother killed.

The two were hurled through the door, Andy catching himself on one of ten school desks that filled the room. Sam toppled backwards into another, awkwardly catching himself half on the surface and half in the attached plastic chair that was absolutely not designed for a frame as large as his. The door slammed shut behind them, leaving the two boys alone in the dark, silent classroom.

At least until a light clicked on in the front corner over by the wall of windows. Andy, already facing that direction, looked up from his near death grip on the desk (sure they were about to be torn to shreds by a hoard of zombies just waiting for them in the dark, because what else could this nightmare possibly be missing?) and suddenly couldn't breathe for all new reasons. Sam rolled off the desk so he could face the threat head on, but even he couldn't fight the urge to back away.

Azazel sat at the teacher's desk in the far corner, chair balancing back on two legs, feet up on the surface. He was tossing a shiny, cliché-as-fuck, red apple up and down in one hand, a lazy grin stretched across his borrowed face. Yellow eyes glowed beneath the light of the desk lamp, the silver pull chain still swinging back and forth underneath the shade.

"Hello, kiddos. Welcome to the party."

Andy started shaking again and beside him, while he might have been able to hide it better, Sam wasn't doing much better.

-o-o-o-

The four demons brought Dean, kicking and hollering, into the gymnasium. He threw a two-armed punch (damn cuffs) and got punched back by the Demon Hulk, almost toppling to the side as they shoved him through the double doors. His boots made god awful squeaks on the shiny wood of the basketball court as he stumbled inside.

There were two more demons waiting for them, and Dean's stumble that time had nothing to do with his current captors shoving him towards them. This wasn't right. And not just the time bullshit, because, honestly, time not following the damn timeline was old news. But this – this, six demons plus the three more with Sammy was unheard of numbers pre-Hell Gate. This was…this wasn't good.

The hunter lurched forward as the hardest push yet sent him sprawling into the two waiting demons. They caught him and immediately tossed him back, keeping Dean off balance. Like some elementary school bullying, the six demons formed up a circle around him, shoving at him as he stumbled back and forth, until the hunter finally managed to catch his footing enough in the center that he wasn't within arm's reach of any of them.

Dean wiped at the blood gathered in the corner of his mouth and spat the remaining glob onto the court. The handcuffs jingled as he lowered his arms. "Let me guess. The first rule of Demon Fight Club is, we don't talk about Demon Fight Club?"

Hands grabbed from behind and spun him. The first punch was utterly unsurprising, but the force of it took the hunter to the floor. Dean groaned against the stupidly reflective surface. His breath left a cloud of condensation across the polish. He stared along the length of it, frowning when his double vision focused on another figure, not participating in ring-around-the-demonic-rosy. Another demon, no doubt; he was leaning against the far wall beside the bleachers, observing the proceedings with about as much interest as a fat kid would have in a Whole Foods. Dean didn't recognize the guy he was possessing – his short-cropped blond hair, too-tight black t-shirt, and leather jacket didn't particularly stand out – or know why he was so important he got to opt out of the Minions Anonymous meeting (beat-a-Winchester-to-a-bloody-pulp edition).

Dean allowed himself a moment, staring at the son of a bitch staring right back at him, before he got his chained hands under him and slowly hauled himself back up. He was surprised said minions hadn't bothered kicking him when he was down.

They even almost let him get to his feet before the next punch landed.

Dean knew how to take a beating; he'd had plenty in his life to learn by. In his experience, demons were some of the least creative when it came to a smack down. That always seemed to be the case with the monsters with super strength. So busy flouting their ability to throw you across the room like a hacky-sack they didn't even notice they weren't doing all that much damage. Now, the ones down in Hell – the ones that worked the racks and turned others – they were definitely creative, if you wanted to call it that. His time on the rack was, hands down, the worst beating Dean had ever taken, and not only because it lasted forty friggin' years. But your average demon, like the ones surrounding him now, they were overpaid nightclub bouncers at best.

Another punch landed right between his shoulder blades and Dean cried out as he found himself stomach down on the court once more. Of course, bouncers or not, it didn't mean it didn't hurt. He knew he could take it, though.

The only problem was, Dean didn't know how long it was going to go on, and if Azazel really was on scene, that meant Sam was alone with him. Sam and Andy. And as far as Hell was concerned, the kid was expendable. They needed Sam and they had the leverage to get what they wanted. Dean didn't have time to make like Tyler Durden with these guys.

He felt a tooth loosen with the next punch, then lost it completely when the Tanner kid's foot connected with his face while he was still on all fours on the ground. Dean spat it out with a little clatter across the bloodied court. His face was an array of pain, the newest addition a throbbing shock along his jaw, causing neck muscles to cramp and his head to throb in tandem with his now agitated pulse.

Unfortunately, Dean wasn't exactly seeing a way out. Six to one (seven, if you counted the Travolta-wannabe over by the bleachers) were ugly odds, even for a badass such as himself. And he was a badass. Dean launched himself off of the floor to tackle the Tanner kid to the ground, reigning punches on him for as long as he had, spouting an exorcism through a swollen jaw all the meanwhile.

Demon Hulk hauled him off, and this time the punch to his face dislocated the bone completely. No more exorcism for Dean, or talking of any kind.

"Wiping the floor with your face is fun, Winchester." Dean groaned from the floor, and the demon – a new woman in a tall, athletic meatsuit with gorgeous dark skin (exactly Dean's type any other day) – picked him up by his jacket, hauling him to his feet. He managed to turn his head enough to deflect her blow from striking the same jaw, but it boxed his ear instead and his whole head rung like a bell. "But I bet it's not as much fun as little Sammy's having right now."

The demons around him laughed and Dean struck out blindly. His cuffed hands clipped the lady, but it might as well have been a mosquito buzzing in her ear for all the damage it did. She dropped him to the floor like a sack of potatoes, a kick from a high-heeled boot sent him rolling several feet back into the circle.

"Do you think Azazel's got him on the good stuff, yet?" The Tanner kid grinned toothily as Demon Hulk hauled the exhausted, bleeding hunter off the floor for the gazillionth time. He was set back on his feet with another punch to the head.

Much more and he wouldn't be conscious to save anyone, least of all himself. And though it all, that guy in black just stood there, leaning against the back wall, watching the beat down.

"I bet he's sucking down blood like a baby from its mama's teat right about now."

Fear struck through him like a bad cord at the thought. Dean blinked through the blood and the ringing that seemed to exist between his ears and his eyes. But he didn't need to see to pinpoint the one who'd said it. It was the same woman, the only female voice in a chorus of asshatery. Dean was getting real tired of her.

She locked eyes on him, a vicious smirk lighting one side of her face. "I bet it tastes good to him. Mother's milk, straight from the source-"

Dean tackled the bitch with a muffled roar. He even managed to take down the demon laughing beside her, the three tumbling to the floor in a heap. The hunter was hauled up and off of them in no time at all, but tucked his knees into his chest the second the demon whore climbed back to her feet. Making use of the strength of the guys wrestling him from behind, Dean struck out, encircling her throat with his legs and snapping her neck like a twig. The demon behind him toppled over backwards trying to shake the hunter free and they both went down together. Benny had taught him how to do that during some seriously weird Purgatory lessons.

But the demon just stumbled back to her feet, grabbing at her bent head and untwisting the mangled vertebrae with a sickening series of cracks. Her eyes flicked black as she stalked towards Dean with murder in those soulless depths.

Without an exorcism or a miracle, he just wasn't getting out of this one.

But Dean had promised. He'd promised Sammy that this would never happen to him again. Dean wouldn't let it. He'd said it – and meant it – the day they started fixing up the Impala. Sam would never be forced to drink demon blood again. Big brother Dean wouldn't let it happen.

Well, big brother Dean was currently mopping the Rivergrove basketball court with his face and blood. Lot of good he or his promises were.

Of course, there was still option left. It was a little of column A, a lot of column B, fully capable of getting him out of this mess, and the only move Dean had left that didn't require the application of a dislocated jaw. But he didn't want to do it. Hadn't wanted to do it, before Hell's Fight Club started talking shop. In a shit ton of ways, Dean still didn't want to do it. Using their get-out-of-jail-free card, the ace up their sleeve, meant showing their hand way ahead of schedule. Way, way ahead of schedule. It could easily be the thing that broke the timeline for good, that jump started a biblical war two damn years early.

But if he couldn't get to Sam, then someone else had to. Timeline be damned.

The hunter turned his head away from the next round of hits, away from the tightness spreading across his chest and the twisting knots making Swiss cheese of his stomach. Dean shut it all out, closed his eyes, and prayed to Castiel.

-o-o-o-

"You boys won't be needing those," Azazel spoke through a mouth of full of apple, juice dripping down his chin. He waved the hand holding the half-eaten fruit, and suddenly two sets of handcuffs clicked open, falling off of Sam and Andy to clatter to the floor. The demon swallowed the apple down then grinned widely. He sat up quite suddenly, pulling his feet from the desk in a shift from cool and in control to manic and still very much in control. With sweeping movement, Azazel stood and rounded the desk, taking another loud bite.

Andy and Sam both stumbled away from the approaching demon, but not in the same direction. The kid, clutching at his head with blood running down his arm like he'd forgotten he was injured, stumbled backwards down the aisle of desks until he had the length of the room between him and the yellow-eyed man. Sam only made it a handful of feet before his back met the wall beside the door. They had no weapons, nothing to defend themselves with. Not that much would work against a demon. Especially this demon.

Sam opened his mouth and got six words of an exorcism out before Azazel slammed into him, one hand slapping across his mouth, the other curling into his shirt. The apple bounced off the floor, splattering juice as it rolled away in a curve.

"Nuh-uh-uh, Sammy-boy." Those pale eyes were way too close for comfort, and Sam turned his head to the side just for the scant distance it put between them. "You play nice, now, or I'll give you the paddle, boy."

The purposeful drawl on his last word had Sam clenching his teeth against the connotation far more than the threat. Not that the threat of punishment – regardless of the obviously condescending choice – wasn't still very, very real. Sam remembered every bone Azazel had broken in his brother's body, every cut and laceration. Every scream Dean had made in that Michigan cabin. The younger Winchester was under no illusions of being safe simply because he was the demon's 'favorite.'

"What do you want?" he spat out as soon as Azazel's hand slid from his mouth. It shifted down his jaw to wrap around his neck and Sam gritted his teeth against the way his body trembled, from fear as much as anger and disgust. The touch was far too close to a caress, and Sam knew it was intentional. This demon had always been nothing if not taunting in his possessiveness over the younger Winchester. Dean would have called him creepy as fuck, Sam just wanted him away.

"You, tiger! Always you." The smile was almost cheerful, the tone full of excitement, and Sam tried to push himself further into the wall, to no avail.

"Leave him alone."

It was just a whisper in the mostly silent room, but it drew the attention of both demon and hunter. Andy was barely on his feet, the far wall all that was keeping him upright. His hands were still buried in his short hair, trembling fingers clutching at his scalp, body curled in on itself. He looked on the brink of losing it entirely. But lucid eyes were focused on them, on Azazel.

The demon chuckled, though he did draw back enough for Sam to breathe again. "And so the mouse speaks! Let us know when you've worked up to a roar."

Azazel turned back to his main prize, but Sam's eyes stayed on his friend. Andy looked terrible, pale and sweating. The hunter dropped his gaze to the kid's blood-soaked shoulder, the bullet hole still bleeding sluggishly through its bandages. The infection wound wasn't visible, hidden away on the other side of his arm. Sam could only hope those stitches had held. The kid really couldn't afford to lose any more blood.

Sam's eyes darted back up to Andy's, now glassed over, and the Winchester hesitated as the old worry of infection popped back into his brain. But Dean had said it was the demon blood. Or, tried to, at least. It had been almost three hours and Andy hadn't turned yet, so Sam took it on faith that he wouldn't turn now. Even though he looked close to the brink of insanity, curled in on himself along the back wall, clutching at his head like he was losing it. Staring at him now, this kid who'd become like a little brother to the Winchesters, Sam prayed to a God he still believed in that the demon blood in his veins kept him safe from the infection, and somehow, Sam would keep him safe through the rest. Long enough to get them out of here.

"Now, kiddo." Sam tuned back in to the demon still holding him to the wall as Azazel patted down his jacket and pants with his free hand. Sam used the opportunity to wrap his cuffed hands around the wrist pinning him to the wall, but even putting his full weight into it, Azazel's arm didn't budge. Instead, Sam stayed trapped and the demon found the hex bag he'd been looking for, pulling it out and tossing it up and down in his palm. "This here's some naughty contraband. No witchcraft on school property, boys. You know the rules."

One pale yellow eye winked at him before the small pouch burst into flames, causing Sam to jerk away from the source of heat not a foot from his body. Azazel turned his hand over and the little fireball fell to the classroom floor where it continued sizzling away.

"Clever, though. Did you kill the witch that taught you that, Sammy?" Azazel wiped the front of his hand on Sam's shirt, then flipped it over to wipe the back. "It would fit, after all. Hunters are such hypocrites."

Sam was pulled off the wall when Azazel's hand fisted in his shirt and hauled him forward. The six and a half foot man stumbled for footing as he was tossed across the room, catching himself between two desks and only sort of sliding to the ground rather than falling on his ass completely. Yellow Eyes, meanwhile, strolled to the desk across from the downed hunter and hopped up on it. Sam glared up at him as Azazel crossed one leg over the other, hands clasped around his knee.

The younger Winchester had always enjoyed school. Always liked every one of his teachers. He'd never had the kind of problems with authority figures that his brother did. But staring up at the demon, every inch of him a lesson in condescension, his stretched grin practically spelling out I-Will-Abuse-My-Authority-Over-You…well, Sam suddenly found new sympathy and understanding for Dean, who had wanted to punch every male teacher he'd ever had right in the smiling teeth.

"How you managed to block your mind, though…" Azazel tsk'ed through his teeth. It set Sam's nerves on edge like nails down a chalkboard. "That's the one I'm really curious about. I'm guessing… Spelled artifact? That's some pretty nasty magic, Sammy. Real dangerous, dabbling in stuff that can seal off your mind." The demon leaned forward, and though he was a good four, five feet away, Sam still found himself leaning further into the metal legs of the desk and chair. "You never know what might get trapped in there with it."

The trill of fear that ran down his spine was, Sam was quite certain, the whole point of Azazel's words. So he did his best to ignore them. Tried not to let this demon get under his skin or into his mind. Cas had warned them that consecutive use of the coin could turn dangerous, but Andy and Sam had both only been using it for a couple of months. They should be fine. Cas would have told them otherwise.

And besides, even if they weren't, what exactly was Sam going to do about it now? They had way bigger problems.

"How you doing over there, little mouse?" Azazel turned his gaze and half his upper body towards Andy. The kid, still propped up by the back wall, whimpered.

"Leave him alone," Sam demanded between clenched teeth. He tried to leverage himself off the floor using the desk and chair he was still clinging too, but Azazel shook a finger at him, warning look in his eye. Begrudgingly, the Winchester stilled.

"Not so fast, Sammy. You stay right there."

The young hunter bared his teeth with true huffiness that Dean would be proud of (and endlessly annoyed by, most likely). "I told you. Only my brother gets to call me that."

Azazel just smirked and re-clasped his hands around his kneecap. "I'm afraid I can't leave Mr. Gallagher alone, tiger. I need him."

At Sam's pinched expression, turning towards the poor kid barely keeping it together in the back, Azazel clapped his hands. Sam's eyes snapped back on him.

"Let me tell you how I think tonight is going to go." The demon's arm disappeared behind his back as if he was reaching for something on the desk that had definitely been clear a minute ago. "I'll pull out something like this."

The jar of blood hit the table beside his thigh with a loud clang that caused both of his boys to jump. Still fresh, a dribble of red slid down the curvature of the glass, pooling along the bottom. It would leave a half-circled stain on the worn wooden surface that would never fully come out.

Its inevitable presence in the conversation was far from unexpected, but even just the sight of it, that dark liquid settling from being sloshed about, still stole Sam's breath from his lungs and turned his veins to ice.

"And you'll get a choice." Azazel's patient tone was just about the only sound in that classroom aside from Andy's labored breathing. Sam's fingers were shaking against the metal and wood, but he blamed it on the rage scouring through him like a festering wound.

If eyes could speak, Sam's glare would be screaming N-O, capital letters, at the top of his lungs. Azazel clucked his tongue, one finger snapping into a finger gun, which he aimed at the hunter on the floor. One of those pale eyes winked at him again.

"You will choose the ill-advised, futile path of a hero," the demon continued his account of the evening's upcoming events as if his audience was nothing more than that. Then he aimed his hand, pointer and thumb still out, towards the ceiling and the tremor in Sam's muscles became more pronounced. He locked his jaw and prepared for pain. "And I will be forced to do something like this."

Sam slammed his eyes shut as Azazel waved his hand. But, of course, it wasn't Sam Winchester who suffered the demon's punishment. It never would be, until he agreed to play the game.

Hazel eyes ripped back open at Andy's scream and Sam tried to surge to his feet. But this time, Azazel did wave his way, and the hunter slammed back into the chairs. Pinned to the metal legs of the classroom furniture, Sam desperately turned his head, trying to see Andy through the sea of desks.

The kid sunk to the floor, limbs shaking and eyes wide. He was pressing a spasming hand to his chest, where three fresh tears in his shirt revealed shredded skin and fresh blood bubbling out of him. A lot of blood. Too much blood, when the kid had already lost so much.

"No!" Sam cried out, too little too late, and fought against the power keeping him down. He turned furious, desperate eyes to the demon sitting above him. "You can't!"

"I told you I needed him," Azazel shrugged one shoulder.

"Stop," the hunter pleaded, still pulling with all of his strength, legs scrabbling across the slick vinyl tiling, but the only thing he was managing to do was heave his torso off the floor. His arms stayed pinned to the desks. Sam had anger to spare on his best days, but all the fury in the world wasn't going to break him free of Azazel's powers.

Not…not without that jar of demon blood sitting next to him.

Sam slammed his eyes shut and tried to focus on the buzzing he'd felt the moment that demon injected him with the Croatoan virus. He'd felt it, he had. Something so similar to the demon blood that maybe… just maybe…

Nothing happened, and Sam was forced to open his eyes to face the smiling demon again. He looked desperately over at Andy, then snarled at Azazel. He had to do something but he had nothing. "He's one of your kids!"

"So was Max Miller."

The struggling man stilled at the name – at the reminder of what had happened to the kid it belonged to – and stared in horror at the yellow eyed man. He was going to kill Andy. He was going to sit there and listen to the kid die without a care in the world, because Sam wouldn't do what he wanted. The reality of the situation hit the younger Winchester like an eighteen-wheeler, and he turned desperate eyes to the surrogate little brother bleeding out a dozen feet from him.

Azazel resumed his earlier pose, hands clasping around his knee once more, like this was a parent teacher conference and all they were discussing was a kid's ailing grades. "You missed my Aesop reference, champ. I'm looking for a lion. That-" he pointed to Andy, not even looking at his kid bleeding out on the classroom floor- "is a mouse."

Sam stared at his friend, still clutching at his chest. Their Jedi. A kid whose powers and abilities far outweighed Sam's own. But he didn't have the right blood in his veins, so he meant nothing to the demon. Just another pawn in the game.

Andy's breaths were ragged, terrible gasps, each a heaving, panicked inhale. Sam turned back to the demon, eyes sliding down to the jar of blood that would save Andy's life, whether it be by bargain or a Hail Mary play to get them out of this. Either way, he was running out of time to make a choice he knew he shouldn't make.

"I have tons of special kiddos, Sam-boy. But I only need one winner." Azazel smiled down at the hunter glaring up at him. When the the heavy, ugly silence stretched far longer than the demon expected it to, those yellow eyes narrowed curiously. He knew his favorite well, and Sammy wasn't sticking to the script, here. "Aren't you going to ask me why?"

The human's hands curled into fists and the demon clucked his tongue.

"Maybe, you already know. That little bird on Dean's shoulder, perhaps?"

The hunter stilled in his effort not to suck in a breath. Shit, he stayed quiet so he wouldn't accidentally give anything away. He hadn't meant to hint at even more with his silence.

"I'll tell you what, Sammy. Let's make a new deal." Azazel leaned forward, crossing his arms over his legs almost lazily, hand dangling off a thigh. "You tell me all about Dean's little friend, and you don't have to drink this."

His head tilted towards the jar of demon blood, and Sam couldn't help but follow that gesture. The hunter's stomach coiled into tight, sharp knots just looking at it.

"I'll even heal the mouse, free of charge!"

Sam closed his eyes briefly as a tidal wave of desperation threatened to choke him. He couldn't. It was an out, an out that meant he wouldn't break his promise to Dean, wouldn't break his promise to himself, wouldn't end the world. It was an out he desperately, desperately wanted to take. And he couldn't do it. He couldn't drink that blood, he couldn't let Andy die, he couldn't give Cas up. He couldn't do anything, and the world was going to move on, taking Andy with it, before Sam could come up with a solution that didn't end with him or his family losing in every way possible.

"Hmm," the demon above him hummed when he didn't answer. "You seemed so much more willing to talk to my daughter about him."

Sam's eyes snapped open at that. Azazel was tapping his hand idly against his leg, still hunched over and watching the hunter like this was nothing more than a schoolyard warning.

"Was it because you thought the little birdie was a demon at the time? 'Cass', wasn't it?" It took every ounce of effort in Sam's already straining body to keep his pulse down, to keep his breathing as normal as it could be, fighting as he still was. "That's the name you gave Meg, no? Not exactly the name of an angel, I'll give you that. But humans do love their pet names, I suppose. Did you know there's only a handful of those winged gnats out there with 'Cass' as part of their name?"

Azazel raised his hands pointer finger hitting pointer finger as he started counting them off. Sam slammed his eyes shut; he knew the second he heard the angel's name, pupil dilation alone would give it away if his racing heart didn't do it first. Sam started reciting the periodic table in his head, loudly, along with every other meditation trick he'd ever heard of to block the demon.

"Cassiel," was the first name the demon spoke, and Sam's heart skipped a beat, but he kept his eyes locked shut, his face scrunched up and his thoughts on anything but their angel.

"No, not that one? How about Casrathaol? Kashiel? Damn, none of those either, kiddo? Ah, well." Azazel made another clucking sound with the side of his cheek. He'd started with the bigger name angels, but maybe he'd gone about it wrong. Maybe it was some minor league pair of wings making a mess of things. There were a lot more of those, unfortunately. Azazel sighed dramatically as Sam moved into the radiated elements. "I'm offering you an out here, kiddo! That's some fast loyalty you've got for something that's not even human. Whichever cloud jumper it is, he's not actually on your side, Sam, I can promise you that."

Hazel eyes opened to mere slits, glaring up at the demon, fisted hands straining against the bonds that held him down. Azazel sighed again and let his gaze wander over to the other end of the classroom.

"How about you, mouse?" he called to Andy, who was all but unresponsive in the back. The kid was slumped on the ground, blood starting to pool around him. He breathed shallow, raspy gulps, and glassy eyes struggled to focus on them. "Don't suppose you know anything? It'll save your life!"

Twitching, eyes half-lidded and yet still somehow wide with the growing realization that he wasn't getting out of this, Andy's gaze flickered to Sam. The rest of him barely moved. He was only half with them, but half was plenty to know he wasn't surviving this without a miracle. Or, in this case, the opposite. Hazel eyes met his and Andy saw the look there. The regret, the equal fear and horror. The guilt. Sam nodded and the resident Jedi recognized the permission there. Permission to betray them. To save himself. To give up Cas and live.

Sam couldn't do it, but Andy could.

But…should he? He knew the numbness slowly spreading through his body, bit by bit, working at the edges of the burning, screaming wound, wasn't actually a good sign. Neither was the cold, encasing him like a sprawling darkness. He'd lost too much blood and if someone didn't do something soon – if he didn't do something soon – he was going to die.

Then it would be over. He'd get to see Tracy again, if the stuff Castiel had said about Heaven was true. This weight on his shoulders that he'd been carrying for months now would be gone. Everything would just be…done. That didn't sound so bad. Maybe he was okay with that.

Andy didn't think he was suicidal. A pretty weird thought to have while bleeding out, knocking at Death's door while slumped on his front step. But it still rang true. Andy didn't really want to die. His racing heart and the pure anxiety choking his lungs in some sick form of hope from the demon's twisted offer alone told him as much. But if dying meant not betraying Sam and Dean, not giving Hell a one up against the brothers who treated him like family for the last three months, who included Cas in that family...

The kid let out the easiest breath he'd taken since that first Croat sliced him up. He locked resilient eyes on those terrifying yellow irises.

"Go to hell."

Azazel rolled his eyes, the annoyance there about as much as a man swatting at a particularly whiney mosquito. He raised his hand to squish the nuisance once and for all, but Sam cried out, surging against his power hard enough to screech one of the desks an inch across the floor. Azazel raised an eyebrow at him, arm still outstretched.

"We had a deal." Sam's eyes dropped pointedly to the jar of blood and yellow eyes followed. "Heal him and I drink it."

Slowly, Azazel withdrew his hand, crossing his arms over his legs once again. A bemused smirk formed in the corner of his mouth and he watched his favorite kiddo with intense curiosity.

"Interesting," the demon commented almost offhandedly. He picked up the jar, setting it on his knee. The blood-ringed the bottom stained his jeans with a crimson crescent. "I offer you an out, and you don't take it. But one little mouse lies dying…. Hmm."

Sam's chest heaved with the steady flow of anger coursing through him. Andy was dying and Sam had picked his poison. They didn't have time for the demon to wax interesting poetics about angels and fables, God damn it. But the hunter bit his tongue hard to keep silent. All that mattered now was saving Andy. Getting out of this without that jar was already out the window as far as Sam was concerned. Not if they were all getting out of it alive.

"Is it that soft, squishy heart of yours, I wonder?" Azazel tapped the top of the jar before he wrapped long fingers around the edges and spun the lid. The grinding noise of metal twisting across glass, so quiet if not for the oppressive silence of the room, was deafening. Sam swore he could smell the metal in the air as the lid came off. "If it is, it'll be your downfall, tiger."

The Winchester just huffed. "It's getting you what you want, isn't it? Me hooked on that crap? Thought that's what you needed for me to win."

"Oh, it's a long game we're playing, kid. Let's just say you'll win some, lose some over the course of it," was the demon's unconcerned response. Sam gasped in surprise and relief as one of his arms was freed from the power, collapsing to the ground like a dead weight. "But you know what I think?"

No, he really, really didn't give a shit.

Azazel bent forward, holding the jar out. "I don't think it's your soft heart at all, Sam. I think you just want it."

Already reaching forward, the hunter froze as the words rung in the silence. His fingers trembled in midair, so close to that thing that really, truly scared him. That thing that was so very terrifying because Azazel wasn't completely wrong. Sam didn't want it. But he also really, really did.

The younger hunter shoved the demon out of his head, burying his words as hard and as fast as he could. He couldn't let Azazel get to him. He was doing this for Andy. Not for himself, not for that buzzing just beneath his skin, not for the power it promised.

"Haven't you noticed?" Those yellow eyes were locked on his, hovering just beyond that glass jar, and Sam didn't even know which of the two he couldn't seem to look away from. "You're even weaker now than you were before this all started. Hell, kiddo. You've barely got any powers at all. The mouse is stronger than you. We can't have that."

Azazel wasn't even trying to make him take it. He just sat there, arm outstretched, like he already knew Sam would. Not to save the life of a friend. Sam's gaze flickered to Andy. The kid's eyes were still open, but only barely. The hunter could still hear his lungs laboring for breath, but the sound was growing softer and softer. Andy's skin was grey, sickly so, and his shirt was completely soaked through. He was out of time.

"Heal him." The hunter turned back to the demon, a challenge in his eyes.

Azazel tipped the jar towards him, blood flowing to one side, but it was too far away for Sam to actually reach and the demon wasn't getting any closer. "After you drink."

"He's going to die!"

"Then you should stop wasting his time." Yellow eyes, hard and expectant, didn't blink. The demon didn't budge, calling the bluff that Sam himself hadn't fully known was one.

The hunter clenched his teeth, entire body shaking against the power that still held him back, but he knew he'd already lost. That half-raised hand curled into a fist. With a pained, angry noise, Sam finally sagged against the weight holding him down, chin dropping to a heaving chest. The side of his fist hit the ground in a punch that split skin. The least of his worries now.

"Alright."

Azazel slid off the desk like slime with a smile to match and crouched in front of the defeated hunter. He held the jar within easy reach now, and Sam stared at its sloshing red contents. Dean was going to be so damn pissed at him. So disappointed. Sam glanced at Andy again and his heart picked up when he realized he couldn't hear his breathing anymore. Panic gripped his throat like a vice and resolve formed, thick and cloying. Sam turned back to that jar.

The hunter's fingers wrapped it just as a shockwave hit the building, accompanied by a blinding, brilliant white light flooding the room. Sam released the jar with a jolt, his single free hand raising instinctually to block the flare coming through the windows, which rattled first from the explosion, then continued to vibrate from a sustained, high pitch noise hitting the classroom a second later.

Azazel straightened, still crouched in front of the boy, but upright enough to look out the shuddering glass. The gymnasium beyond was practically pulsing, every single window blown out by that brilliant, sustained light, shooting out into the night. The field and playground were lit up like a stadium. The white light was painfully bright on the demon's face, and Sam lowered his hand enough to see the grin stretch across his features like a plague.

Something ugly filled the hunter's stomach at that smile.

"Well, well, well." The demon stood, the whole upper half of his body now illuminated from the floodlight pouring through the windows. They were still rattling and Sam glanced up at them, worried they might shatter at any moment from the high frequency that was causing his ears to ring painfully.

"Looks like your little birdie just flew right into our trap." Those yellow eyes turned to stare at Sam, bright and sickening in the floodlight. The grin stretched wider. "Dean must have used his phone a friend option."

Sam's eyes widened in horror, realization sinking in.

Castiel.

"No," he whispered, eyes turning to the windows he was too low to see out of. He pulled and tugged at the power holding him down, but he couldn't gain enough leverage to see anything but that blinding light.

A light he'd seen before. A ringing he'd heard before, in the Baku's dream. In the explosion that had almost killed his brother in a cabin in Michigan. The same explosion that had left Dean terrified the angel was dead.

Sam bolted off the floor, but Azazel's power was still wrapped around his left side, keeping him pinned to the desk, which jerked and screeched with his desperation. "No!"

Yellow Eyes crouched back down, and Sam tried to surge forward again. To head-butt him, crack his nose, tell him to leave Castiel the fuck alone, anything. But the demon's power was plenty to keep the man trapped.

Azazel set the jar of blood down next to Sam's thigh.

"I'll just leave this here." He patted Sam's cheek, and the hunter threw a punch that was easily blocked. "Be right back, tiger."

The demon practically hopped to his feet, skipping out of the room. However, when he reached the aisle Andy was collapsed in, he paused thoughtfully. Yellow Eyes stared at the unmoving body for a minute, glancing back to Sam. The hunter glared at him, teeth clenched so hard his jaw hurt all the way up to his temple. Hazel eyes darted between the blinding light and his fallen friend.

Azazel smiled.

"You know what? Let's put the mouse someplace for safekeeping. Just in case you get any ideas, Sammy." He swept down the aisle toward the downed kid. Sam fought against the power holding him, but it was futile as it had always been. Azazel reached Andy, bending down to start digging through his pockets. Sam's view was obstructed, but he saw the hex bag hit the ground and roll several feet from where Azazel tossed it. "Alrighty then, off you go!"

The demon's hand slapped down on the kid's back and Andy was gone.

"No!" Sam struggled, trying to use his free hand to pull himself off the desks, to shove them back or move them forward. Anything! But the binds wrapped around him were invisible and intangible. There was nothing Sam could do. He let out a scream filled with frustration and hatred.

Yellow Eyes cast one more look his way before he swept out of the room.

Sam collapsed, breathing so heavily his heart felt like it might burst from his chest. Damn it. Damn it! The hunter hit the ground with his fist, then did it again. He pulled at the desks, but could only ever get an inch, inch and a half out of them before his muscles cramped and his body warned it was nearing its limits.

"Damn it!" Sam kicked out at the desk again and again and again, but he couldn't break free. That steady white light still filled the room, casting eerie, long, flickering shadows across everything. The high pitch noise still shook the windows, and Sam was terrified it was Cas's true voice. That's what Dean had called it once.

Whatever was happening, Cas had come to Dean's aid and now she was screaming.

Sam's eyes fell to the jar of blood, so purposefully left within reach. The liquid inside was rippling under the stress of high frequency noise. The younger Winchester stared at it, knowing his freedom could lie within, but so did imprisonment of the far more eternal kind. His lungs quivered with every fast-paced, panicked breath. He glanced at the windows, light still pouring through, the building vibrations of Cas's screams threatening to shatter them.

Dean needed him. Cas needed him. Andy needed him. And he wasn't helping anyone tied to a damn desk.

Chest still heaving, Sam turned back and reached for the blood.

Chapter End Notes

A/N: [insert weak, slightly sadistic, mostly masochistic smile here] Sorry, not sorry? I love you all! And will now promptly run for my life.

Chapter 77: Season 2: Chapter 44

Chapter Notes

A/Ns: I couldn't wait until tonight/tomorrow to post. I'm just too excited about this! So. Excited.

More A/Ns: So you knooooow, how I might have mentioned at the end of the Baltimore arc that we were getting Cas soon, but in like, the dirtiest, rottenest, no good cliffhanger way purely possible?

:D

#SorryNotSorry #AtAll #NotEvenALittleBit
#CuzNoGoodDirtyRotten
#andTheEmotionalShitstormIsTotallyWorthIt

Chapter Warnings: Cas has his ears on, Dean should really learn to give a guy more heads up, Tom is a sneaky asshole, Azazel's got plans, (but unfortunately for him) Castiel is a badass Warrior of God with a Righteous Man on his side, and (despite all of that) everything is still going to shit because Dean never asked a question he really, really should have, Cas is suddenly in a sharing mood, and it's a really terrible time for all of this.

[deeeeeeeeeeeeeeeeeeeeep breath after that run-on sentence]

And here we go!

Actual Chapter Warnings: More gore and minor torture below, also increased swearing.

See the end of the chapter for more notes

-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-

The Road So Far (This Time Around)

Season 2: Chapter 44

-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-

"Cas?"

The angel was deep in the Archival Halls, performing the relatively mundane and tedious duty of filing away old battle strategies that had been retrieved by a Seraphim earlier that morning. His duties had never before been tedious, not before he met Dean Winchester. Now much of what he was expected to do day-to-day in his homeland seemed to be nothing more than busy-work, where before it had seemed important. Contributing. Castiel did not like the implication, nor how drastic the realization and change within him was. Especially not when he knew one angel somewhere in Heaven was more than capable of brainwashing them into believing just that.

And one human on earth was, apparently, able to undo it all.

"Castiel?"

Castiel paused in his filing, tilting his head to the side as he listened to the whisper of Dean Winchester's prayer once more. He had not heard Dean's call in some time, not since he had begun making trips down to earth as often as he could spare in order to 'check in'. This time, though, the hunter sounded…hesitant. All the other times Dean had prayed to him, he'd been brash. Brazen. Insolent. Sarcastic, at the very least. The change immediately worried the angel and he stopped all work, waiting for the next prayer, as his name alone was hardly enough detail to go off of.

"So, uh…if you've got your ears on-' A truly baffling statement, considering Castiel neither had ears, nor would they be removable if he did- 'we're about to do something spectacularly stupid down here."

The angel stiffened as something Angela would likely identify as terror gripped the center of his mass. He did not realize it, but his wings spread out behind him, prepared to take flight with just one word more. The parchment, nearly as old as Heaven itself and written in the hand of the Scribe, dented and crumpled beneath his iron grip. Castiel did not notice, too concerned with the way the heart he did not currently possess seemed to pound in those very ears he also did not have.

Perhaps this was why Heaven had forbade the taking of vessels for any length of time. Their flaws lingered in the mind well after their bodies were left behind on Earth.

"We're headed into Rivergrove, Oregon and I'm not gonna mince it, Cas…. It's a trap and we're going anyway."

The sound of tearing parchment broke Castiel's intense focus, and he turned down to the now ripped battle strategy. He released his fisted hands, flexing fingers that took the startling shape of a five-fingered human hand, rather than the ethereal wavelengths of light more often reminiscent of wisps and tendrils. The angel quickly filed the page, ignoring the fresh tear along the bottom, and stepped away from the archives.

"You don't need to worry yet."

Castiel felt a flare of irrational exasperation at that, and he had the oddest sensation of Angela's voice in his head. He was quite certain that if she had been with him and not back at Bobby Singer's house, she would have been hollering at Dean to 'lead with that' next time.

"We got out of this alright last go around, and we know Azazel's plan this time. But if you can be on standby…well, things could go downhill fast and we might need a quick exit."

Castiel had never before found the communication of prayer to be so wholly inadequate. Another thing that had not been a concern before Dean Winchester. If a human had needed his assistance, Castiel either appeared unto him or he did not, dismissing the conversation as there was nothing more he could do for it. If a brother needed his assistance, Castiel simply replied back via their interconnected voices or flew to his location.

Never before had Castiel needed to answer a human indirectly. To ask what they were thinking, walking into a trap, particularly one devised by a Prince of Hell. To insist his presence was clearly necessary for their well-being in this situation. To assure Dean that he did 'have his ears on' and would be on standby until otherwise notified. To- and Castiel hesitated at the realization- to acquire reassurance of his own that his human charges were, in fact, as alright as Dean's tentative prayer asserted they were.

Which was ridiculous. Other than the hesitance in Dean's voice, the human sounded perfectly fine. Castiel could detect no other duress in his charge's prayer that might suggest otherwise. He should appreciate that Dean was giving him advanced notice of possible trouble. Instead, Castiel found himself frustrated and distracted, unable to refocus on his duties now that he knew his immediate assistance was not required, leaving him with nothing but to wait.

"If things do go south and you have to get us out, Baby's parked about a mile out of town. Uh…guess that's it."

Dean's voice fell silent and Castiel was left with a distinctly unsatisfied

feeling. The human should have included far more information. Where would they be in the town of Rivergrove, so that Castiel could fly to them immediately, should things, indeed, go 'south.' Why did they suspect this was a trap, and what kind of trap? And, again, why were they marching straight into it willingly and without him as anything more than a reserve?

All things that Castiel found frighteningly infuriating and could do nothing about.

-o-o-o-

Time moved in Heaven quite differently than it did on Earth. A true mirror reflection to the Hellscape below, the Heavenly plane passed faster than that of Earth. The difference was negligible in the outer levels, enough so that most angels did not notice the passing of the plane below as any slower, and the souls in Heaven's care did not seem aware one way or another that the sun rose and set a fair bit quicker in their memories. But the upper most levels, where the Gardens, the Greater Hall, and many of the Archival buildings lay (most days, at least. Heaven was particular to shifting itself about quite often, but the inner rings did seem less susceptible to the change), hours of Earth-time could pass in mere minutes.

The Archangel Gabriel had once explained the phenomenon as the only way angels could keep their sanity. 'Wouldn't you lose your mind if you had to watch over the earth for an actual millennia?' Most of his brethren had nodded along because an Archangel was never wrong, but the answer never sat quite right in Castiel's mind. Not that he'd given it much thought.

Now he wondered if that was because he didn't find it important, or because Naomi didn't think he should.

The entire line of thinking – now taking a morose turn for the worse – all started because Castiel had not even made it to the main Archival Hall – a scant five minute walk from the lower levels up to the grand lobby – when Dean's voice broke through his thoughts in a panicked, desperate plea.

"Cas!"

The angel very nearly stumbled from the cry. It was not the calm, cautious voice he had heard only minutes before. Castiel's wings were spread before he made the doors leading outside. He was crossing Heaven's barrier using the last of Balthazar's secret exits before Dean's next words came through.

-o-o-o-

"Cas, we- we need that rescue," Dean all but begged as a kick to the gut sent him curling into a fetal position. Fuck these demons. He'd had way worse and could take a hell of a lot more. Sort of. He just had to get his body on board with that thought. The hunter groaned as another kick sent him rolling onto his back, sprawled and vulnerable. "They took Sam. They knew we were- this isn't like last time. They knew. We didn't- they have Sam and Andy. And Azazel- Azazel's here. Fuck-"

It was the demon bitch that hauled him off the floor by his hair. He could barely even see anymore, but her manicured nails dug into his scalp and Dean hissed, scrabbling at her grip. How she even managed that with his short cut, he had no clue. But he was buzzing it next time, because fuck this.

"You gotta stop it, Cas. Please. Azazel's gonna make him- make him drink more blood." Dean knew from his years on the rack that there was no shame in fear. No shame in begging. And he could summon none now for the way his words broke with internal anguish. "Please, Cas, you gotta save them. I promised-"

A punch to his stomach doubled him over again, but the woman held fast and all Dean could do was hunch inward with a deep groan. Demon Hulk, who'd already played the bongos on his kidneys, now took over. He gripped his dislocated jaw, and Dean grunted to keep from crying out as the demon raised his head.

"You gonna cry, Winchester?" The man punched him right in the temple and Dean saw stars. Whatever concentration he'd been maintaining broke and the prayer ended. The bastard just righted his head again with meaty fingers, the joint in his jaw grinding against his skull as it was manhandled. "It'd be a lot more fun if you cried."

Dean didn't know if one could spit with a broken jaw, but if he learned anything that night, it was that hell yes, one could if they wanted to bad enough. The gob of blood and saliva hit the demon square between the eyes with a satisfying and disgusting plop that the hunter was quite proud of.

The next hit cracked something in his head – he friggin' heard it – and took him to the floor. Dean knew he wasn't getting back up without help.

"Well, if you ain't gonna cry, I wanna hear you scream." Through blurry, water- and blood-streaked double vision, Dean was pretty sure the meatsuit was about to stomp the shit out of his back. That was going to suck. Really suck.

But the hit never came. A crash like thunder inside the room made the floor shake, and Mr. Muscles suddenly wasn't standing over him anymore. In fact, not that Dean could see it all that well, but he was pretty sure Demon Hulk and half the bleachers had just taken out the north wall of the gym. That, or he'd cracked his head wide open and was now hallucinating from blood loss and mashed potato brains.

The remaining demons ended up as unconscious or moaning piles of limbs scattered around him in the time it took Dean to realize Cas had heard his prayer.

"Dean."

The angel kneeled beside him, as if she hadn't just bulldozed her way through six demons like they were toothpicks.

Wait.

Six?

A hand settled on his shoulder blade, another reaching for his forehead, and Dean couldn't talk. He couldn't get his jaw to work, to even move. There was one more. He needed to tell Cas there was another demon. Mr. Too-Tight-Shirt. The Travolta-Wannabe. Last Dean had seen him, he had still been over by the wall, watching the Winchester beat-down with all the interest of someone who had better places to be.

The words came out as nothing more than a garbled moan on a swollen tongue.

"Hold on, Dean."

The hunter tried to lift himself off the ground, tried to push at Cas's fingers as they pressed to his forehead, but his body wouldn't cooperate. He was done and his brain just hadn't caught up yet.

Healing warmth flooded him at the same time as a brilliant, blinding, white light filled just about everything else. And then Cas was screaming.

-o-o-o-

Tom pulled his hand off of the now smoldering sigil he'd been leaning against, hidden from Dean Winchester by his meatsuit's broad frame. Embers sparked across the dried, blackened blood painted onto the gymnasium wall. Its sister symbol, drawn on the basketball court hours before in unholy water that had long-since dried, was now alive with crimson light. The angel that answered Dean Winchester's prayer was now trapped within its binding power. A sphere of energy, at least a dozen feet in diameter, encased the Halo like a glowing orb. Within, forks of red lightning lashed out at random intervals, striking the bent figure.

It was like a giant plasma ball, only so much more entertaining and complete with the sound effects of an angel's true voice pitched in agony. Tom could almost make out the shape of flared wings through the brightness, a strike of red flaring down the length of one, singing feathers and the flesh of grace beneath.

The activation of the sigil and consequential explosion of light had blown anything caught within its radius clear out. Tom stepped over one of his kin, heedless of the crumpled and broken body – eyes burned right out of its skull – that lay empty on the ground. No demon could survive the blast of grace pouring out of the angel in a desperate fight against the power of the sigil trying to contain her. Dean Winchester was blown clear as well, but Tom was unconcerned. The human had been near death before he'd activated the trap. He was most certainly dead now.

Azazel could bring him back once they'd secured the angel.

Whichever of the Halos she was, her true voice vibrated the walls around them, unable to remain contained within the fragile human body under the onslaught of their trap. Every single window in the building had shattered with its activation, along with, Tom imagined, the rest of the block. Glass now sprinkled the court and bleachers. What was left of them, anyway. Even the demon found the racket painful enough that he avoided getting any closer than he already. Tom's father would be along shortly and he would surely shut the thing up.

At least until they made her sing for their own purposes, of course.

Movement caught the peripheral of Tom's vision and he frowned, turning away from the encaged angel. Shock lit his features when he found Dean Winchester, wrists still bound, body mostly healed, crawling up from the ground just beneath the sigil. The demon stared, unable to comprehend his biggest mistake: thinking that the hunter was out for the count.

The damn angel had healed him before the trap went off.

"No!" Tom yelled, starting forward, but he already knew he was too late. Blood was running down the hunters wrists, presumably from where the handcuffs had cut into him on his roll across the basketball court. Whether from the angel shoving him out of the way or her explosion of grace, it didn't really matter, now did it? That blood would break the trap were it to come in contact with the sigil.

Dean Winchester met his eyes, leaning heavily against the wall beside the smoldering drawing. He raised his cuffed hands, blood smeared across both palms. The demon was still more than a dozen steps away. Tom threw out his hand to power slam the hunter away from the sigil, but Dean was faster.

"Go to hell."

The human slammed his hand against the wall, dragging a bloodied palm through the sigil, interrupting the glowing line. Made entirely of dark blood magic, the spell trapping the angel was not intended to integrate new blood, especially that of a Righteous Man, and the end result was not pretty. Not only did the trap shatter – the angel's grace ripping through the gymnasium as it was finally freed in a tidal wave of energy – but the sigil on the wall exploded as well. Tom screamed as he was hit by one shockwave and then the other, human body twisted damn near in two by the opposing forces.

Dean, meanwhile, got lucky. The force of Tom's power throw had him sailing a good dozen feet away from the explosion, which probably would have done a hell of a lot more damage than another barrel roll across the basketball court did. Not like he honestly needed another one of those, after the trap going off had flung him into the bleachers hard enough to bruise freshly-healed skin.

But if he was feeling pain then he wasn't dead. That's what he had told himself as he army crawled, handcuffed, across the floor and back wall to get to that damn sigil, listening to Cas scream all the while.

Speaking of.

Dean groaned as muscles twitched and spasmed all up and down his back, but the hunter forced himself upright all the same. Cas was still kneeling in the center of the room, friggin' smoke coming off her bent figure in floating wisps. Dean limped towards her, hands stuck together in front of him. He really needed his friggin' lock picks right about now.

On the floor, a dozen feet away, the only remaining demon lifted his head, which was at the completely wrong angle and oh, god, gross. Mr. Too Tight T-shirt glanced between the freed angel and the hunter (and Dean could hear the bones grinding in his twisted neck) before he opened his mouth and smoked out of there like the coward that he was.

"Good riddance," the hunter muttered, though he knew it wouldn't be the last they'd see of him. Even with a healed jaw, Dean never would have gotten an exorcism out in time. Damnit, they needed a faster way to kill demons, and they needed it yesterday. He turned his attention instead to Castiel, who hadn't yet moved. There were holes in the clothing they'd bought her, straight through her tan coat, slacks, and blouse, probably from those forks of lightning. Dean grimaced at the sight of blackened flesh beneath each patch of torn fabric.

"Cas?"

The hunter took another step forward, ignoring the way his knee threatened to give out on him with every step. He made it to her side as blue eyes finally opened – glowing fiercely enough to give Dean pause, unsure if the angel would recognize where she was after what had just happened – but it wasn't what made the hunter stop from reaching out to her completely.

No, that would be the double doors of the gymnasium thrown open by none other than Azazel, himself. The yellow eyed bastard strolled in like he owned the place, three more demons flanking either side of him.

All four stopped rather suddenly as they realized their trapped prize was kind of less than trapped.

"No," Azazel whispered, eyes locked on Castiel. The angel, still on one knee and looking like her hand braced against the floor beneath a locked elbow was all that was keeping her up, returned the fierce gaze through strands of singed, static-charged hair. Dean curled one hand protectively over her shoulder, the other following uselessly along due to the cuffs. He knew just how far up Shit Creek they were. He was more than prepared to pull her behind him if necessary, however futile it might prove.

He never got the chance. Without so much as looking at him, Castiel threw her hand out, slapping a palm flush to Dean's chest. The hunter gasped, first from the surprise from it, thinking he was about to be shoved out of the way, but then the sound morphed into the hollow sucking noise of someone trying to reach air and finding themselves completely unable to. Cas's eyes lit like a battery draining the last of its juice. Dean was pretty sure he was the juice, given the painful, squeezing, sieving sensation drawing at his chest, just beneath Cas's fingers.

Then her whole body started to match that glow and Dean got a really bad feeling.

"No!" Yellow Eyes shot forward, hand flying up to stop them, when Cas all but exploded.

Dean tried to throw himself to the ground – damn sick of being tossed about like a ragdoll in a tornado between these mother-effing powerhouses – but found he couldn't move. Like the last time Cas had tried to remove the grace from his chest, Dean was stuck to her hand like glue. Aside from being attached to the angel like she was world's biggest damn magnet, it turned out he didn't need to worry. Cas's temper tantrum was aimed entirely in one direction; the four demons took the full brunt of it. Their screams were drowned out by Castiel's own, full of righteous fury and absolutely terrifying to the sole witness beside her.

The hunter had seen his friend well and truly pissed on several occasions, but none quite so visceral or…Warrior of God-like. He'd never seen pre-Apocalypse Cas lose his shit. And now, staring at the devastation as the light of her grace finally faded, he was really, really glad about that.

Pre-Apocalypse Dean would have crapped his pants.

Half the gym was…well, it wasn't gone, but Dean's tornado analogy hadn't been that far off. All that was missing was the part where that tornado had been made of friggin' fire, apparently. The entire south and west walls of the gym were…blackened. What was left of them, at least. They looked like they'd taken the full force of a small bomb. Bleachers were blown over and into walls, splintered into pieces. Where windows had been were now just ragged holes. And everything had the air of being torched by a pyro loaded up with a flame thrower and about six days' worth of fuel.

In the middle of it all there were four bodies, burnt to a crisp, practically crumbling to ash where they lay.

"Cas?" Dean finally drew in a shocked breath of air, the name leaving his mouth with a wheeze. The angel's hand slid from his chest, and with it what felt like all of the energy in his body. Dean practically slumped under the lack of anything resembling strength or adrenaline. He felt like he'd been up nine days straight, and eight of them spent running a marathon. The hunter glanced to his left – brain willing his body to pull itself together so he could yell at the friggin' angel (because what the hell was that?!) – just in time to see her crumple. "Cas!"

The hunter tried to catch her before she hit the floor, but he more so just keeled over sideways and sort of managed to get underneath her head before it hit the court. (Dean told himself, of course, that he caught her with all the grace of a herculean hero.) Cas's eyes were still glowing a faint blue, the light flickering like a dying bulb, but the rest of her was ashen. Ignoring his own aches and pains, the hunter managed to get his beleaguered body on the same page as his terror-fueled brain and hauled her off the floor enough to cradle the angel against him. It was awkward as hell with his bound hands, but he managed.

"Jesus, Cas…" Dean took stock of her body. The burn marks from the lightning trap didn't look good, but they didn't look fatal either. Didn't explain the pallor of her skin or the way she sunk into him, boneless. "What did they do to you?"

"D-Damaged…my grace…" The glowing blue of her eyes finally faded, leaving Cas distressingly dim. Her voice was rough, even deeper than usual and clearly strained. Dean could imagine why. He'd heard her screams. Screams that probably should have blown out his ear drums, but his intact hearing and eyesight was a puzzle for another time. Any other damn time.

"No shit," he muttered instead. "I'm sure re-enacting Hiroshima over there didn't help."

The reminder of her attack on the demons caused Castiel to struggle in his arms. The damn idiot was trying to sit up. Dean pushed her back down with his shoulder, given that's all he had available, and leveled an admonishing look her way. As damn scolding as he could get while staring down at her wrecked expression. Cas settled for just lifting her head, which, given the way her entire core shook with the effort, was probably about as much as the weakened angel ever would have managed anyway.

"Azazel?" Castiel couldn't see much from the floor, but she searched for a returning threat nonetheless. Dean would be in danger if she had not successfully taken care of all four demons, but, most importantly, the Prince. Facing Azazel would have been a challenge for an angel of Castiel's class on a good day, and with whatever that sigil had been, it was not turning out to be a good day.

Dean looked over at the charred remains of one of his worst nightmares (one of many) with an overwhelming sense of relief and vindictiveness. "Trust me, he's not getting back up from that." He turned back to the angel in his arms. "Did you kill him?"

Cas shook her head, finally reclining against his arms. "Exorcism."

Shit. That hadn't been like any exorcism Dean had ever seen. And he'd seen this angel exorcise a demon before. Sure, the glowing white light had always been a part of it, but this right here was the difference between chucking a Mentos into a bottle of coke and throwing a grenade at someone.

The hunter raised an eyebrow. "Overkill much?"

Not that he was complaining, really.

Cas shook her head again. "Not…for a P-Prince of Hell…it wasn't."

Dean's head whipped around to stare at what was left of Azazel once more. A Prince of Hell? Jesus, that didn't sound good. He'd always known Yellow Eyes was powerful – definitely something to be feared – but with a title like that… The hunter shook his head. One problem at a time and, right now, Azazel was not their main problem.

For fucking once.

"You gonna be okay?" He gathered Cas under his arms the best he could, intent on getting her to her feet.

She was shaking, but managed a decently strong grip around his arm and looked up at him with wide, pure blue eyes. "Sam?"

Dean shook his head, hauling her up into a sitting position as he got his own knees back under him. His left nearly gave out, but he gritted his teeth and soldiered on. "We gotta find him. Can you stand?"

Cas's answer of, "I can try," wasn't exactly the ringing bell of encouragement he'd hoped for, but it was all they had. Working together, they did get her to her feet, mostly. The cuffs did absolutely no one any good and caused Dean to almost drop her once before the angel reached out and snapped the chain in two with just one hand. It was a terrifying reminder of how strong even a seriously injured Castiel was. It also left twin bracelets with little dangling chains securely wrapped around Dean's wrists, but he couldn't care less. Now with two free arms, Dean got one of Cas's wrapped around his waist (this version of her was too short to go over his shoulder as easily) and the other underneath her arms, supporting more than half her weight. Ignoring his own tired, lagging body, Dean had just started dragging her towards the gym doors (what was left of them) when they burst open again.

The angel's little explosion had taken one door half off its hinges and the other was partially blocked by a destroyed set of bleachers. So when the one burst inward, it more so fell off its last hinge entirely, crashing to the floor so that whoever was trying to get in from the other side had to scramble over the damn thing. Unarmed and weighed down with the angel, Dean tried to push Cas behind him. Cas, who never had known how to back down, tried to do the same thing to the hunter. The two canceling moves against already weakened forms just ended up with Cas almost falling to the ground in a heap and Dean scrambling to keep them both on their feet.

So they were completely unprepared to defend themselves at all against the non-threat that was Sam Winchester, all but tripping over the door he'd taken clean off the wall in his haste to get into the damaged gymnasium.

"Dean!" Sam cried, blinking in surprise and then overwhelming joy.

The first immediate thing Dean felt was relief. So much so that he nearly dropped Cas, catching her with an arm across her chest, but gravity was already against them. The two slid to the ground in a less-than elegant tangle of bodies. Sam, eyes still wide at the two of them slumped on the floor in the center of absolute carnage, let out a staggering breath of relief (and shock, plenty of shock) before he took off towards them. The younger hunter hit his knees as Dean managed to lower Cas the rest of the way to the ground.

It was a good thing Sam had found them, because there was no way he'd have been able to carry her around to look for the younger Winchester in his state. Or her state. Either of their states. Walking definitely wasn't in the cards for the angel at the moment, either.

"Dean! Cas!" Sam laid a hand on his brother's shoulder, another on Cas's, the reassurance of finding them alive clear on his face. Unsurprising, Dean thought, given that it looked like they'd survived ground zero of a friggin' air strike.

That relief Dean was feeling in equal measure turned to a sickening dead weight in his stomach when he realized his brother was covered in blood. And not the oh-I-got-an-injury sort of blood, which would have been worrying enough on its own. Oh, no, this was a distinct, triangular shaped soakage down the front of his shirt, originating at his neck, which was also drenched in red without any wound to supply it.

Sort of like he'd spilled something as he'd been drinking it.

Dean had seen his brother like that once before. Cas in danger, just like now, demons laying a trap for him and the brothers. And Sam, standing up from a kill, blood running down his mouth and throat.

His brother who, in that moment, Dean hadn't recognized.

"Sam?"

The younger Winchester looked up, worried at his big brother's shaken, wispy tone, but faltered when he realized Dean's gaze was locked on his chest. Sam dropped his eyes to the red-soaked t-shirt and tried to ignore the way his hand trembled on his brother's shoulder.

"It's not what it looks like." Sam's voice was quiet. Below them, Cas seemed to pick up on the tone, out of it and shaking as she was, and followed between their two gazes. Sam felt her stiffen beneath his grip when she followed where Dean's lay. He didn't know what the angel was thinking and didn't want to. "I didn't drink it."

Dean raised his eyes, staring right into his soul, and Sam saw doubt there.

"I didn't."

What he didn't say – couldn't say – was how close he'd come to doing just that. The jar had been in his hand, the rim against his lips (he was ready to do it, he just had to make his hand stop shaking, had to stop wasting precious time, steel his nerves, and drink) when every piece of glass in the classroom shattered, jar included. Shards rained down around him and cold, viscous liquid splattered his throat and chest, pooling in his lap like ooze. That brilliant light filling the entire room died out in an instant, and Sam had feared the worst.

But he was free. Azazel's power was gone. Sam was left clutching the remains of the broken jar, completely stunned, but free.

He'd sat in a state of shock, unsure what the hell had just happened, what he'd almost done, before realizing he was covered in demon blood. Very accessible demon blood. It was on his face. On his lips. Sam ripped off his long-sleeved shirt, using it to claw at his skin, to scrub the blood off of him as much as possible.

Then he'd ran. Out of the classroom, into an empty hall and an empty field, towards a terrifyingly dark and silent gymnasium, still fearing the worst.

"Okay," Dean said, but in that quiet sort of way that Sam knew was still full of doubt. His brother didn't truly believe him, but it was a problem for later. The hunter gathered Cas in his arms again and Sam helped haul her to her feet. "We gotta get out of here. Where's Andy?"

The younger Winchester met his eyes and the desperate guilt there was answer enough. Sam shook his head, looking away from the equal devastation running across Dean's face. "Azazel took him. I don't know where. Cas, he doesn't have his hex bag; can you sense him?"

Sam could only pray Andy was still alive to be sensed.

The question looked like it pained the angel, who was clearly running on fumes. Still, she closed her eyes, brow furrowing. After a moment, Cas shook her head. "He- He is not nearby. I do not have the reserves to search f-further."

"It's okay, Cas." Dean adjusted his grip on the angel, his intention to get moving clear in the tense lines of his body. "We'll find him."

"And Azazel?" Sam's eyes darted around in a frantic manner, looking for the yellow-eyed demon he'd chased afte. But there were only bodies.

Dean's eyes fell to one corpse in particular. "He's gone, Sam. At least for now."

The younger Winchester stared at the remains, heart skipping a hopeful, painful beat. Dean's words certainly weren't optimistic enough for Sam to think the demon was dead. But, at least for now, he wasn't a concern anymore.

Which made Sam wonder, instead, what it was they were running from then. Of course, he had a whole list to pick from. More demons, soon to arrive as backup to their boss? A whole town full of demonic-virus induced zombies? And all three of them injured, the strongest of whom was also the worst off.

"H-Heaven," Cas's hoarse voice rasped out from between them as they moved across the destroyed gymnasium. Dean's face, already grim like he knew what was coming, turned truly dark. Sam glanced apprehensively between his brother and the woman strung between them. "Angels will co-come to inv-vestigate. I have to leave."

"Take a damn minute, Cas. You can't even stand on your own." Dean didn't look at the angel, but given that she was barely supporting any of her own weight between the two Winchesters, it wasn't like he needed to.

"Dean, I h-have to get back."

"Cas," Sam spoke softer than his brother as he climbed over the downed door of the gym and partial bleachers. Dean handed the angel off to him before scrambling over the debris himself. "You're hurt pretty bad. I don't think you'll be able to hide that."

The angel nearly collapsed between them again as they carried her outside, trying to get her feet back under her and utterly failing. "My brother will help me conceal my i-injuries. I have to go b-before they find me missing."

Sam's sigh was almost silent. "I think that ship may have already sailed, Cas."

"More like sunk," Dean grumbled unhelpfully. The younger Winchester spared him a look that he was too busy helping Cas to see.

They barely cleared the gym into the field when Cas would go no further. She dropped to the ground, mysteriously more weight now than the hundred and thirty pound woman she possessed should be. Sam let out an 'oof' and Dean swore viciously as the two were partially pulled to the ground with her. Castiel raised two fingers to Sam's forehead, the hunter stiffening under the trembling touch. With her other hand, she splayed her fingers out, palm hovering centimeters off Dean's chest. The hunter realized what Cas was about to do, what it was going to take to get them all safely out of there.

"I am sorry, but I must." Blue eyes locked on green. Still, that hand didn't close the gap between them and Dean hesitated to give the consent the angel was waiting for.

The hunter cursed himself, but the words wouldn't form. His chest hurt, his whole body ached, dragging further and further behind with every step he took. He was so tired. Dean didn't know how much more he could give. But it was more than that. Because it wasn't just pain or exhaustion. It was a growing hollowness, an emptiness behind his ribcage that felt all too familiar. What would it become if Cas took back more of that grace? That's what she had done, right? Was asking to do again? For Dean's chest to feel so cold, for that little black hole, infinitesimal as it was right now, to be back?

It didn't matter. It didn't matter that he was terrified of what would happen if Cas took more, that that hole might get bigger. It didn't matter if it was uncomfortable, if it hurt, if it made him think of those forty years in hell and the worst scars his soul had ever borne. Of the hollow, empty pit that followed him around long after he'd escaped the Pit it had formed in. It didn't matter if he'd grown to need that warmth, that wholeness. That angel in his chest.

This was life or death. His life, Sammy's life. Cas, and Andy, wherever he was. And that's all that actually mattered.

"It's fine, Cas," he tried to say, but his voice cracked, coming out as only a whisper. Dean cleared his throat. "Just do it."

Cas's hand pressed to his sternum and then the three of them were riding Angel Air away from Rivergrove, and Dean's chest ached in a way that made him want to cry.

-o-o-o-

Bobby came racing down his stairs two at a time in response to a mighty thud on the first level of his house. He had a loaded shotgun in hand, ready to use it, only to find his fears abated and (reluctant) hopes affirmed at the sight of his boys and their angel sprawled on his living room floor. They all looked like hell, not that Bobby was much surprised. He'd woken in the middle of night to a flash of white light, a heavy crash down the hall, a missing angelic vessel, and a medical room looking like a tornado had come through. After something like that in the dead of night, the old hunter had more than expected follow-up company, though he had hoped they'd be in better shape.

"I have to go," Cas mumbled, barely able to form the words. Her skin was grey – the scary kind of grey that humans were never supposed to be – and she was on all fours between the two Winchesters.

"Just wait a damn minute-" Dean was saying as he, too, tried to scramble to his feet but barely made it to his knees. There were horrible spots in his vision, and if he'd thought he was tired before, he must be damn near close to blacking out now. His chest ached fiercely with the kind of hollow emptiness that left him shaking, stuck in memories of another time, another place. Dean single-mindedly rubbed circles into his sternum, trying anything to reignite some of the warmth that he'd so blissfully had for the last year.

"Dean." The deep, commanding voice, regretful as it was, brought the older Winchester's attention back into sharp focus. Dean blinked through his blotchy vision to meet Cas's stare, a desperate kind of look in her gorgeous blue eyes. "Uriel will heal me; I will be fine. But I must go now."

The floor that the hunter had just managed to get under his feet promptly dropped back out from under him, stealing the air from his lungs right along with it. He could practically see Cas spreading her wings. Panic flared within him, digging vicious claws into that gaping hole behind his sternum.

"Uriel?" The name came out stunned. Quiet. Numb. Not the ferocious fury it should have been. Not the warning it needed to be.

"The brother I confided in," Castiel confirmed, breathless. She looked like she was seconds from passing out too. "I have to go."

"No, Cas, wait, you can't-" Dean still couldn't breathe right. All he could see was that muscled up meatsuit threatening to destroy an entire town. That dickwad that had forced him to torture Alistair. The bastard who'd set that demon free and stood by while he beat the living shit out of the older Winchester. The traitor who'd sided with Lucifer. The first brother Castiel had ever had to kill.

"I may not hear your prayers while I heal," Cas talked over him, looking to Sam if only because the younger Winchester was actually hearing him. "But I will return as soon as I am able."

"Damnit, Cas, listen to me!" Dean made to grab the angel, but all he got was a handful of a suddenly unconscious and limp woman. With a brief glow of light beneath her skin, Angela Garrett fell into his arms: ashen, human, and not breathing.

"Cas!"

Dean's furious scream and the accompanying punch right into the floor – hard enough to bust open knuckles – caused Sam to jump, staring at his brother with wide-eyed confusion. Dean turned his head up to the ceiling, the unconscious vessel still lying half atop him. "Damnit, get your ass back here, you hear me? You can't trust Uriel! You idiot, he's gonna kill you!"

The younger Winchester didn't have a clue what was going on – worry, dread, and panic all fighting for control of his gut at the shit-storm this night had so rapidly turned into – but as he stared at the woman in Dean's arms, chest deadly still and face quickly gaining a blue hue to that ashen grey, he realized they had a more urgent problem.

"We've got to get her upstairs!" Sam dug his arms under Angela's torso, pulling her from Dean's lap while getting his feet under him. But Bobby's grip, hard on his bicep, stopped him. Sam stared at the older hunter, whose eyes were equally wide with yet another terrifying realization.

"They're not setup," he said, sort of stunned with a little headshake. His eyes darted down to the unconscious vessel. "Your girl must have landed hard and taken off harder. Knocked half the room over."

Sam, instantly comprehending that they weren't going to simply hook the dying woman up to the machines she desperately needed, inhaled two sharp breaths. Then, with the kind of calm Sam Winchester excelled at, immediately lowered Angela back to the floor, laying her out as flat as possible. The hunter started compressions on her chest as Bobby bolted for the stairs. They'd have to keep her heart beating and blood oxygenated long enough to get her up the stairs once the room was ready. Long enough to stave off the reaper surely coming for her soul.

How they were going to get her upstairs while maintaining CPR, Sam didn't know. They might have no choice but to stop and make the climb with Angela's heart and lungs utterly still. His mind, composed on the outside and panicking internally, battled between how long they'd have without her breathing before a Reaper came calling, and whether or not Cas would be able to heal brain damage when she returned.

If Angela's soul would even be there to grant permission.

Sam jerked his head back up to his older brother. Dean was still screaming at the ceiling for an angel who clearly couldn't hear him. They didn't have time for this, whatever this was (no matter how bad it sounded, and, given the freaked out fury in his brother's voice, it was bad).

"Dean!" Sam cast the older Winchester a harsh look, mostly formed by desperation and fear, as he kept up the unforgiving compressions on Angela's chest. "I need your help or she is going to die!"

Green eyes snapped to his and Sam was momentarily taken back by the distress in them. Not for Angela, though of course Dean wouldn't want the woman to die. No, the level of terror in his eyes seemed the type specifically reserved for Winchesters, Singers, and one particular angel.

But they didn't have time to deal with it. Like Andy, who was God-knows-where, maybe already dead from injuries or infection. Like the town of Rivergrove, all of its people murdered or missing or worse. They could only do one thing at a time, and right now, Angela's life was literally in their hands.

"Rescue breaths," Sam ordered, keeping his tone level but firm. "Two of them. Now, Dean."

Dean's hands were clenched in fists and he turned his head upwards again, glowering at the ceiling. For a moment, Sam thought he might keep on ignoring him and the dying woman. Then Dean shut his eyes tightly, forced his hands to loosen, and bent over Angela to pinch her nose and tilt her head back. Sam had no doubt that he was praying furiously to Castiel as he delivered the rescue breaths, then backed off for Sam to resume compressions. Hell, Sam was sending up several of his own, though he had no idea the kind of danger Cas was in, only that she was in a lot of it.

They could both only hope the angel heard them and that she would still have a vessel to come back to when she did.

Chapter End Notes

A/Ns: Deeeep breath in, let it out, and as you do, just whisper it under your breath: No good, dirty rotten author.

Chapter 78: Season 2: Chapter 45

Chapter Notes

A/Ns: I am SO SORRY I fell off the face of the Earth. Oh boy, did I have a rough month though, guys. It started with a awesome reviewer (who will get a mention in a couple chapters) offering up a new idea for How-Not-To-Kill-Andy(yet) that I sorta-kind-absolutely-okay-I-want-to-see-that latched onto. But, it meant halting ALL writing because I had to have an emergency re-think and planning/strategy/outlining meeting with the muse since I was in the middle of writing the chapter that would need to change if we went that route. So I didn't write for two weeks while I tackled the change in script. Then, a Surprise!Depression bout popped up out of the blue (my depression comes and goes in a fairly regular/trackable cycle) and it was a doozy. The worst I've had in a year at least. It also lasted three times the normal length of one of my normal bouts. And then, right when I thought, 'hey, I think I'm coming out of it!' I fell down my entire flight of stairs trying to leave for work one morning. I banged myself up pretty good and hyperextended two fingers on my dominant hand. I don't know if many of you recall, but my work is entirely computer based. And the program I use requires two hands to operate. -_- So work suuucked for a week, not to mention, typing generally requires two hands. So…uh…needless to say, I haven't written in over a month and a half.

And my parents are in town this weekend, so now that the depression has cleared up and I have two hands again, I have absolutely no time. I'm definitely speed-editing this chapter when I should have been in bed about two hours ago. I have to pick my parents up from their hotel in, like, six hours D:

And that is why this chapter is so horrendously late. I also didn't want to post a note telling you all what was going on, because as a reader I always hated the disappointment that came from getting a chapter update and only having a note. However, if I'm alone in this and you guys would prefer I leave a note update, let me know and I'll leave one in the future if something like this ever happens again.

Quality Warning: This chapter has had just one read-through. Barely even an edit. Half an edit. So I guarantee there are some typos and errors in it, for which I apologize but I really didn't want to hold it up for another week!

Angel Heirarchy and Titles: Alrighty, in an attempt to stay canonically correct, I went about looking for what Sphere of angel Zachariah is. Show-wise, Zachariah described himself as having six wings. According to the internet, that would make him a Seraphim. But he also has four faces, which would make him a Cherub (canonically a naked, diaper-wearing match-maker in the Supernatural World). However, if we go based on duties instead of descriptions, then Zach would most likely be in a Dominion – they rule over lower angels.

So, long story short (too late), my conclusion is as follows: gaaaaaaaaaah!

We're clearly making this up as we go, then. So here's what I'm gonna say is canon for this story: we're going with duties. Zachariah is a Dominion, beneath the archangels but with room for a promotion to Principalities. (side note: outside the world of Supernatural, I would guess Angels were born/created into their specific power level and don't move up or down, but the show does seem to move angels around or emphasize promotions and the like. So we'll go with canon, then, and say angels can climb the ladder.) Castiel and his unit will be Powers, since they're described as angels that fight against the forces of evil. Sounds like our Bad-ass Warrior of God, no? :D Power it is!

Enough Author's Notes! Now that we've got that sorted out, let's get to an actual story. Sheesh!

See the end of the chapter for more notes

-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-

The Road So Far (This Time Around)

Season 2: Chapter 45

-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-

Sam stepped back from the stolen hospital bed, wiping his hands on one of the pillow cases he'd had to strip from the bed once he realized he'd gotten it covered in blood just setting Angela down on it. Azazel's blood was still all over him. It reeked, in ways that required every ounce of Sam's strength to ignore. The metallic scent was practically palpable, a fact the young Winchester was ignoring with every fiber of his being. But he knew his limit was quickly approaching, and he would need to be out of those clothes and as far from that blood as possible before that point hit.

Angela was stable. Or, well, she was breathing and her heart was beating. The steady blip of the monitors and hum of the ventilator assured as much. She'd been braindead when Cas found her and she was braindead now. The only problem was, Sam didn't actually know if they'd done damage in the two minutes and fourteen seconds it had taken them to get her up the stairs and plugged in. Had a Reaper already come for her soul?

Staring at her unmoving, ashen body, Sam was having a tough time rallying any optimism at all. Or, maybe that was just everything else that had happened tonight. Andy was gone, dead or missing, with no clue where he might be and no yellow-eyed demon to summon him back. They'd lost the entire town of Rivergrove despite knowing everything that was supposed to happen. They hadn't stood a chance, it turned out. And Dean…

Sam glanced at his brother, sitting in a chair beside Angela's lifeless form, just staring at her. His lips were moving still – had been ever since Cas left them – so the younger Winchester knew he was uttering those desperate, pleading, increasingly-angry prayers for the angel to return. The broken handcuffs, a parting gift from the Rivergrove Sheriff's department, were still locked securely around his damaged, raw wrists. The wounds had stopped bleeding, but they would need to get those bracelets off to clean and wrap the skin.

The younger Winchester thought about saying something. Reassure Dean that Angela Garrett would be fine. Only, he didn't know that. He didn't know if the body lying on that bed was anything more than the empty husk of what had once been a beautiful young woman, kind and earnest enough to offer her body to an angel in need. And they wouldn't know until Cas returned, which was the person Dean really needed to hear would be fine. Would be coming back. But Sam didn't know that either.

The smell of demon blood was getting stronger, and his resolution was getting weaker.

"She'll be alright," he said aloud, because he felt like he needed to say something. They would need to clean and patch the burn wounds scattered across her body from what Sam could only assume was the trap Azazel mentioned. Those would be very susceptible to infection – burns always were – so they'd have to make sure they kept them clean until Cas returned and could heal her. The angel hadn't done so before she'd left, which seemed out of character for the organized, consistent, and conscientious Castiel. Of course, given the state she'd been in after battling Azazel, she probably didn't have it in her. Sam tried not to think about it, or about the fear that was still in Dean's eyes, buried deeper and deeper beneath mounting anger.

Glancing at his brother again, Sam decided silence was doing Dean no favors. "We'll have to clean her wounds. At least until Cas can come back and heal them."

"If he comes back," Dean muttered darkly, eyes still locked on the still form of Angela Garrett.

Sam closed his eyes and held back a sigh. Held back his own urge to be angry, to be hopeless and pessimistic. He really needed to change clothes. To shower off the blood, the failure, the entire night. To be free of the smell in all its pervasive, taunting memories and need. He wanted a coffee so he could see straight long enough to patch Angela up. Then they needed to be out there, finding Andy, who was alone and probably scared out of his mind, if he was even alive to begin with. And, though all of that, what Sam really needed was his brother, present, on board, with him.

But it was pretty clear that Dean needed him more right now. Sam could see it; his brother was afraid. The younger Winchester could count on one hand the things that made Dean scared, and so far, half that list had to do with his angel being beyond reach.

"Tell me about Uriel." Sam stowed his own tiredness, his aching body, and growing desperation to get clean. He wouldn't last much longer, but he could last long enough for his brother. He would just breathe through his mouth and ignore the sticky wetness clinging to his chest like it wasn't there.

Dean didn't answer immediately, still brooding. Maybe still praying. But eventually he shifted, not out of physical discomfort, and re-settled in the chair. His eyes never left Angela's face. "He was an angel. Is an angel. Real dick. Worked with Cas on some shit assignments…. He was no good, Sammy."

Green eyes finally glanced over and Sam found himself reevaluating just how much trouble Castiel might be in. His brother wasn't just scared, he was wrecked. It was hardly the time to think about it, but the younger Winchester found himself thinking about the relationship between his brother and the angel once more. Even after Dad's death, he'd never seen Dean quite like this. There was so much he didn't know about this brother from 2016. Mainly personal things, given the man never talked about himself so much as he did events to come. But the level of raw fear the older Winchester was exhibiting behind tired, ringed eyes, was reserved for family only. And, maybe, something more. Sam didn't know, he'd never seen that in his brother before, so he wouldn't know what it looked like, but he did wonder. He was pretty sure Bobby wondered too.

"He sided with Lucifer. Helped the seals fall, tried to convert other angels to his side. When he couldn't, he killed 'em." The older hunter reached up, rubbing that now familiar circular pattern across a sternum that felt so damn cold in comparison to the supernova it had been for the past year. "He framed demons for the murders. Almost got me killed."

Dean could still feel the pain of the beating he'd taken at that bastard's indirect hands. The soul-wrenching terror of facing Alistair again and losing. It was vivid enough, still after all this time, that Dean wasn't sure where the pain of Cas draining his chest ended and the approaching panic attack of Alistair began.

Sam was watching him closely – he could feel those puppy dog eyes locked on his face – but Dean was back to staring at the empty vessel. A vessel Cas should be in, damnit. Not upstairs, with friggin' Uriel. Trusting Uriel. Up where they could do nothing to help him when it all went to hell. And it was going to. Because Time wanted to stay the same, and the same meant Uriel trying to kill his best friend and almost friggin' succeeding. God damn it, Dean never should have let him go back up in the first place. He should be down here, where he belonged. Cas was a Winchester, he should be with them.

"When Cas confronted him…" Dean tried to keep talking, to keep his mind off what was happening to his best friend right now. What could be happening. And they couldn't even find out if it was happening. So, surprise, surprise, talking about last time, about what could be going down right now, was not helping. At all. Dean shifted awkwardly in the chair. "He was the first brother Cas had to kill."

He should have said something sooner. He should have sent Cas back up there months ago with a god damn list of who he could and couldn't trust. Why hadn't Dean said anything?

Because Uriel hadn't even been on that list, let alone his mind.

Dean honestly hadn't remembered the angel as an upcoming threat. They'd faced so many opponents, had so many enemies, that Uriel didn't even make the top twenty. It didn't help that Dean had been out of commission for the actual confrontation; he hadn't learned until later that Uriel was the one responsible for the worst beating of his life. And not because of the physical damage but the emotional wounds Alistair had ripped back open with glee. He'd always been so good at that.

Dean should have asked the last time Cas was here. Why hadn't he asked? Hey, which brother did you tell, exactly? Because there were so many bad answers. Too many to count. But he hadn't. He hadn't wanted to know, because he hadn't wanted Cas up there in the first place. Hadn't even wanted to think about Cas up there, alone and largely unprepared for a real fight. Because Cas was too busy thinking of it as his home. But it wasn't. It shouldn't be. His home was with his family, right. Friggin. Here. Dean was never gonna understand why every version of Cas fought so hard for those bastards that didn't want him and definitely didn't deserve him.

He'd also stupidly assumed the brother Castiel mentioned was Hannah, because it had always been Hannah for the last four years. Or Rachel, loathe as Dean was to involve her either, at least she'd always had Cas's best interests at heart. And Cas was always reminding Dean that angels didn't have genders, so it wasn't like Dean had eliminated those options just 'cuz he'd known them in female vessels (he'd even been proud of himself for that totally not-sexist or human-species-based call at the time).

And hell, even if he had knocked Hannah and Rachel off the list, thinking of them strictly as Cas's sisters, then Balthazar was the obvious next choice.

Why, why, would Cas trust Uriel of all people?

Because they had been best buds before the dickwad tried to kill him.

Dean's hand was shaking against his chest. He dropped it, fingers curling into a fist over his thigh. Cas was walking right into a trap. He had no warning and they had no way to reach him. Dean bit down on his tongue hard enough to bruise and glanced sidelong to his brother, still standing at the foot of Angela's bed.

"He'll kill him, Sam." Dean had to force the words out. They got stuck in his throat and didn't want to form. Didn't want to be true. "He'll kill Cas."

Sam was slower to answer, not wanting to immediately discount the knowledge his brother from the future had. Dean would know the events to come better than him, of course, but he was also blinded by his emotion. The older Winchester couldn't see past the possibility of what might happen because it had happened in his world.

"Maybe not," he began slowly, weighing his word choice very carefully. "Cas might be safe. She said the brother she confided in was a friend, someone she trusted." Sam raised a hand to stop his own brother from telling him that was exactly what was about to get her killed. "Uriel most likely wants her alive, Dean. As a friend and brother, but also as a potential ally."

Dean snorted. "Until she doesn't agree to help him raise the damn devil."

But Sam was already shaking his head. "That's years away, isn't it? And we already know Time wants to try and stay the same. Well… Heaven's gates aren't even opened yet, right? You said he framed demons for his kills, but he can't right now. And I'm willing to bet killing an angel in Heaven is a lot riskier than doing it down here."

The man from the future paused, his rebound protest already half formed, mouth hanging open. Slowly, he closed it. That… okay, maybe there was something there. Beneath his sternum, Dean's heart began to beat in earnest for the first time in what felt like hours.

"Cas is safe for now," Sam reasoned, putting as much confidence as he could into the statement. Probably more than he actually felt, but his brother didn't need to know that. Right now, Dean needed someone to tell him it was going to be alright, and Sam could do that for him with logic and well-acted confidence. He just hoped it didn't turn out to all be a lie. "Uriel will heal her, too. He needs her alive if he's going to recruit her. She'll be alright until she can get back down here, Dean. Then we'll warn her about him."

And lock her in the panic room if she even so much as considered going back up to Heaven, Dean decided internally. But his heart felt far steadier and though the ache in his chest was still icy and terrifying, it didn't feel so damn hollow. He was still tense – and likely would be for some time – but Dean realized Sam's logic was, as usual, right. Cas was probably okay. Well, as okay as a wounded, weakened angel stuck in heaven without his ears on and in a traitor's hands possibly could be. But Uriel had seemed like he respected Cas way back when. Dean had seen how hard the betrayal hit his friend afterward.

Which was one of only about six thousand reasons Dean still wasn't okay with this. But, he supposed, looking down at Angela's still form again, there really wasn't much they could do about it, was there? Dean bit down on his tongue again and his hand went back to rubbing at his chest.

"I'm going to get changed," Sam mentioned quietly, tossing the bloodied pillow case onto the pile of equally ruined sheets. They'd had to change them all once they'd gotten Angela hooked up. Sam was covered in blood, no-where near dry, and he'd made a mess of just about everything in their mad dash up the stairs to deposit her on the bed and resume CPR. Sam and Bobby had tackled the red-stained sheets while Dean made sure Angela stayed hooked as they changed the bed around her.

After that harrowing and exhausting experience, Sam had all new levels of respect for nurses and hospital staff.

Those soft words paired with Sam's utterly worn countenance sent warning bells ringing like crazy in Dean's head. Enough, even, to make it through the anger and brooding. He looked over at his brother, noticing the blood still soaking the poor kid's entire front. Demon blood. There were traces of it on his skin, lines of it down his neck, and a Pollack painting splattered across his hands and forearms.

Dean's throat dried up for the second time that night as the next round of realization and reality slammed home. Sam fidgeted under the attention, picking at the sticky wet cotton self-consciously. Dean knew better than to ask, but he couldn't help it. He had to know.

"You really didn't drink it?"

The defensive hurt that flashed across his brother's face, haunted and angry, was a reminder of why Dean shouldn't have asked in the first place. "No. I didn't drink it."

The older Winchester nodded, trying to accept the answer for the truth it was and not worry – not doubt – his kid brother. If Sam said he didn't drink it, then he didn't drink it. Dean would just have to trust that this wasn't the brother who'd spent a year and a half lying to him about exactly that.

"We'll patch her up after," Sam mentioned offhandedly, either trying to shift the topic or the tension. He gestured to Angela's still form and the electric burns dotting her body from that horrific lightning trap. "Then we'll…we'll look for Andy."

Dean's expression turned stricken at the reminder of another missing family member, but Sam didn't regret bringing it up. Cas wasn't their only friend in danger right now, after all. The older Winchester nodded, that curled hand tightening on his thigh.

"I'll- I'll try his cell." Dean fumbled for his pants pocket to pull out his phone.

"Bobby already tried," Sam said, words still discomfortingly quiet. The old hunter had tried Andy's number three times while Sam finished up with Angela, Dean sitting by her side, catatonic except for his silent praying. The line had gone to voicemail every time and the chip wasn't returning a GPS signal. Andy's cell was either dead or out of range. Sam really hoped it was the latter.

Dean slumped back into the chair, the helplessness of the situation – his own uselessness in particular – hitting hard. Sam took pity on him. He never could help it when it came to his brother.

"They'll both be alright." This time the confidence in his words was definitely more than he felt and it showed. But he doubled down, because they were going to be alright. Somehow, they would get through this. All four of them. Because despite the demon's words, Sam had to believe that Azazel needed Andy alive. He must have healed him before he transported him; there was no point in a demon hiding a corpse. "We'll find them and bring them home."

Turning to his brother with watery green eyes he'd never admit to, Dean nodded, before dropping his head to stare at his hands. Then he staggered up from the chair and grabbed the first aid kit Bobby had left on the nightstand. Not for Cas, but Angela this time. She was a part of their little fucked up family too, and it was time he took care of all of them, not just their one wayward angel.

The younger Winchester watched for a heartbroken moment before he turned and left the room.

-o-o-o-

Zachariah charged for the Upper Archival Halls like an angel on a mission. He was an angel on a mission. A mission to root out the traitor among his men. The ugly wrench thrown into an otherwise perfectly planned machine. An explosion of grace had been detected on earth and early reports were coming in about a large spike in demonic activity at the exact same time and place.

An unauthorized angel on earth and more demonic activity than should ever exist all in one spot? Oh, Zachariah knew who the wrench was, yes he did.

Today was the day he would finally pin something on that little upstart Castiel and get their Apocalypse Plan back on track. He could feel it.

There was no way the angel would make it back to his post in time, not if he had been the one in the middle of that grace bomb in Oregon as Zachariah suspected. No, not suspected: knew. And now, he finally had him. He'd be getting that promotion in no time at all.

One of Heaven's top head Honchos, the best of the Dominions and most deserving of an upcoming promotion in status (in his always-correct opinion), headed directly towards Archives with four other angels hot on his heels. In case Castiel resisted his arrest, of course. Oh, Zachariah hoped Castiel resisted.

The contingent passed several angels coming and going – it was a fairly busy district in Heaven's inner ring – but Zachariah drew his men up short at the sight of Uriel not far from them, heading away from the general direction of the Archival Halls. The larger angel was a close contact of Castiel's. One might even call them friends (if one was inclined to use such a human sentiment).

"Uriel!" Zachariah barked, causing the other angel to come to a formal stop in recognition of his superior. "Where is Castiel?"

Uriel arched an eyebrow – one of several – at his commanding officer and his facial colors shifted into something close to confusion, but not quite there. "Castiel? He has Archival duty right now, doesn't he?"

Indeed he did, and had for the last six centuries. Heaven wasn't really big into change, after all. The problem was, Zachariah already knew that. Why else would he be headed there? The first thing he'd done upon hearing the report of a massive explosion of grace on Earth, followed by secondary reports of demonic activity by Ishim's team on site, was ask his assistant where Castiel was right at that moment. The little puissant could only offer the Power's current duty roster, which would be no help if Castiel wasn't on duty, being planet-side instead.

But Zachariah could at least prove the little angel disobedient if nothing else.

"He should be wrapping up shortly," Uriel continued, glancing skyward at the slowly moving sun inching its way across the sky.

The burning ball of gas was a simulated representation that only ever took two forms: the most beautiful sunrise the planet below had ever seen, or a never ending sunset that would take your breath away each time you looked upon it, had you any air to breathe to start. Heaven, as it always had been and always would be, really didn't change much. Sunrise, Sunset, Repeat. Except for the buildings. Those liked to move around quite a lot. No one really knew why, but, then again, no one had yet to ask.

Three of Zachariah's four faces flushed an ugly color at Uriel's helpful and conveniently counter-productive reply. The far too readily offered alibi for his friend rubbed the Dominion the wrong way. He pushed past the larger angel, waving his men onward. "Well, we'll just see about that, won't we?"

Uriel stepped out of their way, turning to watch them head into the towering building he'd just come from. He kept the waves of his grace carefully neutral as they disappeared into the Archival Halls.

-o-o-o-

"Castiel!"

The angel in question's head shot up from his work, pouring over ancient battlefield reports. His eyes widened at the approach of his direct superior and a contingent of men who frankly had no business coming here. It was a somewhat uncommon sight, particularly in a place that's usual weekly allotment of action was a book falling from the higher shelves to make quite the racket in the near-silent halls.

Castiel drew himself to attention and nodded sharply to his superior. "Zachariah. What has happened?"

The Dominion drew up short, all four of his faces caught in a comical coloring of disbelief. His two human mouths hung open in a little 'o' shape, one stuttering closed as eight metaphysical eyes blinked at the smaller angel like he might be an illusion.

"Castiel…" the Dominion spoke slowly, as if he hadn't expected an answer from the angel he'd been hollering for among the endless halls of the Archival building. His third head, resembling that of an Earth lion, glanced around, but didn't seem to find what he was looking for in the handful of other angels milling about in their duties, several of them casting the group curious or speculator looks. All four faces focused back on the Power, grace shifting into a higher saturation of suspicion. "How long have you been here?"

Castiel's colors shifted as well, growing dim with mild confusion and concern. "I arrived during the morning shift. I have another twelves minutes of duty. But if you require my assistance elsewhere-"

"Can anyone verify that?" Zachariah snapped, crossing his arms over his broad chest. Castiel blinked at the demanding tone.

"I updated the roster upon arrival…" The angel gestured somewhat uncertainly back the way the unit of men had come. All angels noted their arrival and departure anytime they were on duty anywhere in Heaven. A positively absurd amount of information that was kept in a ridiculous number of large tomes in nowhere else than the Archival Halls. The room for storing those books alone was larger than both the Lesser and Greater Halls combined. It had to be; over a millennium of duty scheduling for thousands of angels took up quite a lot of space. "You can check the records, but…have I done something wrong?"

"And I don't suppose you left anytime between then and now?" Zachariah ignored the angel's question, his tone and color growing more accusatory by the second.

Castiel hesitated. Behind Zachariah's men, the closest other angel in the Archives Hall slid a thick book he'd been inspecting back into the shelf with a single finger. Dark, glittering eyes focused on the escalating situation.

"Is there a problem here?"

All six angels turned at the new voice, and Zachariah dropped his arms in surprise, not only at the newcomer for interfering, but for being seen in the Archival Halls at all.

"Malachi?" He blinked at the angel best known for his anarchist views and utter distaste of authority. Zachariah glanced between him and Castiel, brain completely short circuiting at the notion of this angel coming to the defense of any member of the host, but particularly Castiel.

For all that Zachariah called him an upstart, Castiel was far too goody- two-shoes for an angel like Malachi to ever associate with. But Castiel just stood there, a single blink and a slight tilt of his head suggesting he didn't know the angel or expect his assistance any more than Zachariah did.

"What are you doing here?" the Dominion asked instead, not bothering to curb his incredulity (or condescension).

"I don't see how that's any of your business as I don't report to you, Zachariah," Malachi answered coolly, crossing from the shelves to join the small gathering. Unlike most angels, the anarchist's colors rarely shifted, staying in an unappealing range of neutrals. It made him awfully hard to trust. Zachariah could feel the angels behind him fidget. "Now, did you require something of Castiel, or have you simply come to interrupt everyone working in the Archives today?"

Zachariah's hands fisted by his side at the blatant disregard of his authority, and in front of his men, no less. He drew up to his full height, puffing out his chest in indignation. "I suppose you'd like to vouch for him, then?"

The comment was made offhand. A scoff at most. A preposterous idea. Malachi didn't stand up for anyone. The anarchist didn't care enough.

But the angel just tilted his head in regard of Castiel. Then, looking Zachariah once more, he shrugged with such indifference that the nonchalance leaked off him in waves of translucent gray. "I can only speak for the hour that I have been here."

The Dominion's feather's ruffled, both incredulous and insulted by the blatant runaround. "And Castiel has been here with you for that hour?"

Malachi stared. "Did he not say that he was?"

Zachariah's teeth ground together so hard all four of his heads hurt from it. Grace growing an ugly, humiliated red, he turned, furious, to Castiel, but the smaller angel just blinked his many eyes in that innocent way of his that fooled all the others. But not Zachariah. Although…Castiel certainly didn't look like an angel that had just come from Earth after expelling so much grace that most of his reserves would have to be depleted. He looked perfectly, distastefully, frustratingly, normal.

"Finish your duty and then return to the barracks. The both of you!" Zachariah snapped out, snatching control of the situation back by the lungful regardless of whether Malachi would listen to it or not. He spun to his men, all of who backed away from his very obvious ire. "What are you staring at? Get back to work. All of you!"

The angels scrambled to clear out of the library, Zachariah following behind in a huff.

Not three seconds after the last of the apoplectic Dominion and his men finally vanished from sight, Castiel's legs buckled beneath him and he caught himself heavily on the table. Malachi was by his side in four concise strides, easing Castiel off of the cluttered surface, scrolls and parchment now a bit haphazard, and into a nearby chair. The Power was shaking, the last of the strength Uriel had lent him long gone, along with all the saturation to his grace.

"That was a halfway decent performance," Malachi praised as he got Castiel off his feet. The angel sagged into the chair, his celestial wavelength more closely resembling liquid than air. The anarchist stood back, but not so far as to withdraw from Castiel completely. "You're not as entirely terrible at this as I thought you'd be."

Castiel stared up at him, all of his eyes blinking but not completely in synch. Uriel had only been able to provide him with a surface healing; a mask to cover his injuries more than a bandage to treat them. It was a very, very thin mask now. Maintaining it in front of Zachariah had taken the last of Castiel's already depleted reserves.

"You are Malachi," the Power spoke, still staring up at the angel that had helped him. The angel Uriel had left him with to better disguise their partnership and throw Zachariah off the trail. Castiel had never before spoken to the angel most identified as an Anarchist. He had never had need nor care to.

"And you are Castiel." Malachi hardly looked impressed, but then Castiel supposed the angel not known for making friends or even being pleasant to start with had just complimented him.

Well, sort of.

Castiel was fairly sure Dean would call it a backhanded compliment. The phrase was quite evocative and the angel found that he rather liked it as a descriptor. But that was neither here nor there at the moment, and Castiel worried to find his thoughts drifting so flagrantly.

The Anarchist held out his manifested hand, an extension of his grace, palm down over Castiel's straining chest. Malachi's head tilted ever so slightly to the side. "You'll permit me?"

Castiel swallowed reflexively at the offer. He needed the healing, but he was hesitant to trust an angel he did not know. Worse than did not know: had heard unkind words about. However, Uriel told him he would assist their cause, and Malachi had yet to prove himself otherwise.

"Thank you, brother," he granted with a nod, and Malachi crouched beside him, fingers of grace wrapping around his center of mass. Castiel's many eyes half-shuttered at the healing touch of another so close to his damaged core. His brother's soothing grace was a therapeutic balm to the turbulent flow of his own.

"This is quite the beating you took," the Anarchist mentioned offhand, eyes scanning the length of Castiel's grace.

The damage was primarily to his cracked and singed core. That trap had been powerful and, while flawed, intended for him almost specifically. Castiel suspected the demons had attempted to carve his name into the sigils of the trap. He was very, very lucky that whatever they guessed, they had not gotten it entirely correct. If they had, he likely would not have been capable of flying himself, let alone Dean, Sam, and Baby, out of that town. And certainly not back to Heaven in time.

"It will take multiple sessions to mend completely. Even the most untrained Healer would recommend a trance at this point."

The injured angel nodded tiredly, already well aware of that fact. The second he'd taken off from Bobby Singer's living room, he had figuratively powered down all non-essential systems feeding off his limited energy supply. Uriel had been the one to inform him Zachariah was on the move, Castiel having silenced his brothers' voices (what Dean coined as 'angel radio') as well as the far more muted prayers of the thousands of devout humans on Earth. Castiel was running on base functions only and would be until a healing trance could be initiated by another angel.

"I have not seen this type of damage before," Malachi commented again, still rather detachedly as he observed the wounds with nothing more than clinical interest. Castiel did not know why, but it made him feel cold.

"A demonic trap," he supplied, not interested in expanding upon it any further.

"Yes, Uriel mentioned you've been making trips to Earth." Another offhanded comment, as though Malachi could hardly be bothered with the information Castiel regarded as highly sensitive and quite dangerous to simply toss around.

Castiel found his discomfort with his brother's apathy, as well as what information Uriel had chosen to disclose, growing rapidly. Malachi was not the type Castiel would have been comfortable discussing his impermissible planet-side visits with. Nor was he one of the angels Castiel would have trusted with such information. But Cas did trust Uriel. And, he supposed, an Anarchist was the sort one might garner support from when looking for angels willing to oppose Heaven. Just…not the sort Castiel would have gone to first, perhaps.

"I should return to the barracks." If Malachi noticed the less than subtle dismissal, he did not speak of it. But as Castiel attempted to stand, the angel did step in, pushing the injured Castiel back down.

"You need to enter a healing trance," Malachi corrected, reproach coloring his grace a darker brown for needing to say it twice.

What Cas needed was someplace private – someplace safe – where Zachariah could not return unexpectedly. That was not the Archival Halls with an angel he barely knew. "Uriel will assist me-"

"Uriel is busy covering for you," the Anarchist interrupted, and Castiel's grace, what little color it had left, flushed with guilt. "I will assist."

Once more, Castiel found himself hesitant to accept the largely-unknown angel's aid. There was little reason for it; Castiel did not know most of Heaven's Healers by anything more than name alone, and he had and would again trust them with such a task. Perhaps it was that Malachi was not a Healer, or known for any talents in that field.

Then again, neither was Uriel.

Either way, talking himself in circles was getting Castiel nowhere other than more exhausted. Uriel had entrusted him to Malachi's care, and his friend and brother was currently risking Zachariah's wrath by lying for Castiel and his cause. A cause Uriel had believed largely on Castiel's word alone. It would be shameful not to extend his brother the same faith in trusting Malachi now to do what Uriel could not be present for.

"Very well," Castiel conceded, relaxing back into the chair. Malachi was not wrong; he would be risking permanent damage to his being if he did not enter a trance soon, and there was no telling when Uriel would return, or if Castiel could even make it to the barracks unnoticed.

The Anarchist looked utterly unimpressed by his blessing and instead wrapped his hand across Castiel's forehead, forcing his eyes to close.

"Rest," he ordered, though not unkindly. "Uriel will finish the healing when he returns."

It was the last thing Castiel heard before his brother's calming presence guided him into the soothing silence of oblivion.

-o-o-o-

Uriel returned some twenty minutes later, once he was certain that Zachariah and his people had left the Archives and surrounding district with no intention to return. The overpowering angel had stood guard by the entrance to the Halls, though not within direct line of sight should the puffed-up Dominion choose to double back. When Uriel made it down to the lower levels where he had left Castiel, barely able to stand some hour and change ago, Malachi was crouched over the smaller angel, grace pouring into his battered form in waves of pastel healing.

The Anarchist withdrew as Uriel came near, the larger angel taking his place by Castiel's side to immediately wrap his hand across the injured angel's forehead.

"He is in a healing trance now," Malachi stated, though that much was more than obvious, given the dulled, glacial waves of Castiel's slowed grace.

Uriel's own flickered in annoyance that he had not been the one to assist his friend in such a manner. He could feel Malachi's echoed annoyance without even looking at him. Withdrawing his hand from Castiel, Uriel faced the anarchist head on.

Malachi regarded him with a cool disdain. "We should eliminate him. He put the entire operation at risk returning with those injuries."

Uriel's meaty hands curled into fists, furious that the angel in front of him should even suggest as much. Malachi did not even know Castiel. No, his brother's fate was Uriel's call to make and Malachi would have to go through him if he wanted to lay hands on the injured angel. Of course, he could have done as much at any moment over the last hour that Uriel was away guarding against Zachariah. Or simply inform the blustering Dominion of Castiel's absence from duty and let Zachariah lead Castiel away in chains. The fact that he had not soothed some of Uriel's blistering possessiveness.

Besides, his breed of angel did not respond to brawn. So Uriel dug a little deeper for the logic he knew his brother was a slave to, rusty as he was using it. "Castiel is our only connection to the Michael sword. If we are to succeed in our plans, we must have access to the Righteous Man."

Malachi did not immediately agree, and Uriel could tell he was still wary of Castiel's involvement. Or, more so, Uriel's insistence of his involvement. Malachi had not been subtle in calling out the larger angel's attachment to his friend and partner, but Uriel had been able to make the necessity of Castiel's involvement perfectly clear to the others they had recruited. They would need the information he could provide on the Righteous Man but, more than that, they would need the human's obedience, something the smaller angel was slowly garnering with every visit to Earth.

So Castiel was off limits, no matter what Malachi had to say about it.

"We will bring Castiel to our side yet, brother," Uriel tried once more to reassure Malachi's doubts with something he had no such qualms about himself. Castiel would come to see the light; Uriel was certain of it.

The Anarchist remained cold and detached in his assessment of both Powers. "If you're wrong, you'll be the one to deal with it."

With that, Malachi withdrew from the Archival Halls, leaving behind a seething Uriel. He did not like to be ordered around, but he particularly did not like to be ordered around by an equal, if Malachi even qualified as such. Still, Uriel told himself as he turned back to the unconscious Castiel, there was no sense in fighting amongst themselves. If they were to succeed in overthrowing Heaven's rule and raising their brother from the pit, they would have to work together, dislikes aside.

Uriel hoisted Castiel into his arms to find the smaller angel someplace safe and out of the way to recover from his ghastly injuries.

"Don't worry, Castiel," he said as he took him deeper into the Archives to utilize a little-used back entrance. He let his grace flow off of him in soothing pastels, washing over and ultimately absorbed by his smaller friend. "I will show you the light, little brother. That of the Morning Star, which burns brighter than any of us."

Predictably, Castiel did not answer him, but that was alright. He would soon enough.

-o-o-o-

Sam hated blood. He'd always hated blood. He'd thrown up after his first kill, in part because he had just ripped the life from something he had no right to judge worthy of living or dying, but mostly because of the blood. Over the years, his distaste had not improved, only numbed until Sam was able to do his job – the family job – without throwing up. And he'd learned quickly as a child how hard it was to wash dried blood off.

It wasn't that it didn't come off with water, because it did. Blood was pretty damn dissolvable. It was that it got everywhere. Like sand. Little crusty red particles wedged beneath his nails, along the curve of every cuticle, in the lining of every dry patch of skin, every imperfection of flesh and soul. That's what blood did. It showed all your flaws like open wounds. Sam used to pretend, as he washed his hands in motels, gas station restrooms, rivers and lakes. He used to pretend he was an astronaut – the first man on Mars – scrubbing the red dirt from his hands as the water flowed over his skin. A crew member of the U.S.S. Enterprise (not a red shirt, no, Sam would definitely be in the Science Department. It was blue for him all the way) exploring a new planet, red and dry like Vulcan. Red and dry like Mars. Red and dry like Doctor McCoy, washing the blood from his hands after saving a life, not taking it. Never taking it.

Sam hated blood like he hated his bloody childhood.

Washing the crusty red specks from his hands now, Sam stared at them, at the pink water swirling around the drain. It was no different this time; it still wasn't coming off, even as it bled into the sink like every other water-soluble substance on the planet. But it was still on his hands. Crusted in his cuticles, lodged under his finger nails, clogging his nose. He could taste it on the air. He could feel it on his skin.

And, worse, beneath it.

Sam turned his hands over, water pooling across both palms, the right shaking ever so slightly as the churning liquid pulled and pushed at the multiple lacerations cut both shallow and deep across his skin. Skin still stained red with the blood of a demon.

The younger Winchester closed his eyes and felt it. The buzzing snaking through torn flesh and muscle, where the jar had sliced him open and spilled blood so dark red it was nearly black all over the open wounds. The softer, subtler vibrations buried in the junction of his neck and shoulder, where he'd been injected with the virus and what he could now confirm had been more than just human blood. A little contingency plan, no doubt, for if he turned down Azazel's deal.

Back in Rivergrove, he'd hoped that buzzing in the back of his skull was just fear. Terror. Adrenaline. But Sam was utterly drained now and still that buzz remained.

He slowly curled his bleeding, tainted hand into a fist beneath the water, the other wrapping around the edge of the sink as he soaked in the buzzing. He was drained, but he felt strong. The utterly wrong kind of strong that was like a drug he couldn't quit. Didn't want to, even if he knew, he knew, he had to. Sam opened his eyes, staring at the man in the mirror. A man he still recognized, for now.

His hands shook.

The younger Winchester looked down at the sink, the water finally running clear. No more blood, no little red particles left, no Mars dirt to wash off, but he knew it was still there. It was just beneath the surface now, like it always had been.

Sam looked back up at his reflection, at the face he'd almost been afraid to see. But it was just a tired, pale wreck of a man staring back at him. A man who was starting to look a lot older than his actual age. The young hunter sighed. He hadn't known what he'd been expecting to see, but he couldn't wrestle with the dropped weight in his gut. It should have been relief, to still look like him, still be him, but…

Sam shook his head, shoved that buzzing back by pure force of will, and went to open the mirror cabinet. As he grabbed a suture kit (Bobby was a wise man, keeping a fully stocked kit in just about every room in the house), Sam didn't notice the hairline fractures running across the edge of the sink where his hand had curled around the porcelain in a white-knuckled grip. He threaded the needle and opened his lacerated palm. His hands were steady as stone as he started the first stitch, and he didn't feel a thing.

-o-o-o-

"Still nothing," Bobby offered as both boys came downstairs an hour later: Sam in fresh clothing, hair wet and hand wrapped, and Dean looking just as wretched as he had before, but now with an air of hardened determination. "Ain't heard a peep 'bout your town; news channels are all quiet."

Sam nodded tiredly, not having expected much else. The sun was just rising; it had only been a couple of hours since it had all gone down. If the town had gone the way of the Roanoke Colony, it would be hours yet until someone noticed all the residents were missing.

With reluctance born from even more bad news, Bobby offered over the younger Winchester's phone. He'd been at the mobile device ever since Sam told him Andy was missing, eyes all sorts of devastated as he delivered the news. "Sorry, boys, but the kid's phone is either out of range or outa battery."

Neither brother commented on Bobby's avoidance of the third option, but they were grateful he hadn't mentioned it. Hadn't even used the word 'dead' when referring to the cell phone.

"Then we head to Cold Oak." Dean turned to his brother, the words falling from his mouth with the kind of confidence that came when you've only got one option. At least it made choices easy.

Sam nodded again, rubbing at the back of his neck and the sore injection site there. He wished they had more to go on, but Dean's future knowledge probably was their best lead. Azazel shouldn't know they were aware of his little Battle Royale Arena off in the South Dakota woods, which meant it was still the most likely path the demon would take, as long as they hadn't altered the timeline that badly.

They could only hope their most recent misadventure wasn't a sign that they had.

"Yeah, alright," the younger Winchester conceded, and that was that.

The two packed quickly, Bobby telling them he'd take care of their upstairs guest. Dean's face was so damn relieved, but grateful, but guilty, that Bobby just offered a hand on his shoulder and the cherished silence that emotionally challenged hunters like them did best. Dean had mostly patched Angela up on the surface, Sam helping once he'd finished cleaning himself up, but they had no idea what real shape she was in. And leaving her was hard, knowing it was the spot Cas was most likely to return to, when she did return (not if). But there wasn't any place more secure than Bobby Singer's Salvage Yard, and no hands better to be left in than Bobby's.

It took another half hour to restock their supplies, having lost a huge chunk of their weapons and amo supply to the failed job in Rivergrove. Another thing they owed Bobby when this was all over. Then they were heading out to the Impala, which had shown up on the edge of Bobby's property, about a hundred yards away from the house. Bobby had discovered her about an hour ago when he'd gone to check and re-check all the wards once Cas had gone skyward and Angela was hooked back up.

As they climbed into the car, Dean cast his brother one more sidelong glance, sliding the key into the ignition. "You sure you okay?"

Sam, settling into the front seat, paused with his hand – his wrapped hand – still on the passenger door. He stared at the gauze tightly encasing an ugly truth. Slowly, he closed the door.

"Yeah, I'm good to go."

Dean hesitated for only a second worth of silence more before he threw the car in reverse and they were heading for Cold Oak as fast as Baby would carry them.

Chapter End Notes

A/N: For anyone on FF.net as well as this site, you may have noticed this story posted almost 24 hours ago over there. That would be because AO3 just stopped working on my laptop at 2am and I still very much needed to go to bed. So I went to bed thinking I'd be able to post it in the morning. Nope! Still down on the laptop. But on my way to my parents, I realized it was working on my phone. Cue the desperate scramble to edit and post on this stupid two-thumbed device. But I got it done! I was so proud of myself. And then I hit "post" just as we pulled into a parking garage and lost all service. The story never posted and that was my last chance until mother friggin' now to get it up today.

[You can insert that gif of Anger from Inside Out blowing his top here, because that's been my entire day]

So Apologies again for the lengthy, uninformed delay. I think, in this case, it's safe to say: Shit happens. Hopefully the chapter was worth the wait!

Secrets: Balancing what is canon in the show (eleven years of the same damn secrets and lies over and over and over again) and actually getting our boys to grow as characters while still keeping them in-character is a challenge, and one I wish I could skip. I'd rather Sam just started coming clean and Dean didn't have anger issues :P But those aren't our boys. So if you're rolling your eyes in annoyance at this, no worries, I'm aware of it and working on it! Just keeping our boys in character while I also grow them up in a quarter of the time the show did ;P

Next Up: Okay, I will not lie, I have no idea when the next chapter will be up. I haven't written in a month and a half, and while I have high hopes that will change this week, I can't make promises. We're definitely moving to a two-week posting schedule at a minimum, but I'll keep you updated from there the best I can.

In the meantime, thanks for sticking with me guys. I am sorry to make you wait longer.

Chapter 79: Season 2: Chapter 46

Chapter Notes

A/Ns: Thank you for the continued support you guys are giving this story. Real Life is taking a chunk out of my soul right now, and writing this story and hearing how you all receive it is helping me get through it.

Future Update Status: Alright, I think I've found a way to let you all know when there's a delay without posting a note chapter. I've updated my profile on both sites with a 'current works' and 'current update stats' section. So if you haven't heard from me in two weeks, go check there. Unless I'm utterly incapacitated, I will update that section with an explanation and ETA of the next chapter.

Chapter Warnings: It has been far too long since we had a proper bout of brotherly angst! And nothing balances out Winchester Angst like a little bit of Andy Gallagher, back on his feet and not bleeding out as a crumpled pile on the ground. Good for him!

Actual Chapter Warnings: I'm kind of a meanie-head, if you hadn't already picked up on that, so there is a small cliffhanger at the end. Itty bitty one. But it's a nice long chapter to make up for it!

See the end of the chapter for more notes

-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-

The Road So Far (This Time Around)

Season 2: Chapter 46

-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-

Andy sat bolt upright in a cold sweat. He had no idea where he was or what was going on, but his heart was pounding like he'd just been running a marathon in the middle of a zombie apocalypse.

Zombies.

The psychic gasped, clutching at his chest as he doubled over his outstretched legs, the memory of torn flesh and agony taking his breath away. Oh god. He grappled desperately with his own t-shirt, patting down his chest and ribs, searching for the pain that should be there, but wasn't.

He was…he was….fine. Remarkably fine. Andy grabbed at his shoulder, at the back of his arm, but he loosened bloody bandages to find clean, unmarred skin. Add to that a lack of wanting to eat brains or Reaver-fy the people around him (not that there were any…), the shirt he was wearing wasn't even sporting a bullet hole or jagged tear marks across his chest, and he was ridiculously, completely, absolutely fine.

Also, apparently, he was in a…saloon?

Okay, was he drunk and really high and had just…imagined the thing with the zombies, or something?

Andy blinked at the room around him. Round wooden tables, tipped over, broken chairs, an old-timey bar, a curved staircase disappearing up to a second floor and missing half its steps. It looked like the set of every western ever, except all dusty and completely, utterly abandoned. This…this was not where Andy had been a minute ago.

He climbed to his feet in more of a scramble than anything resembling calm observation, spinning in a circle. What… what the hell?!

He had been in- in- in the Zombie town with Sam and Dean. He'd been infected, and shot, and sliced, and frigging carved up, and pretty certain he was dying. No, very certain he was dying. What the hell happened to all that? Not that he was complaining or asking for any of it back. Nope, no, he was good in, uh… Frontier Land… he just would like some answers as to why the change.

This didn't exactly feel like a Winchester last-minute-save that he'd heard so much tell of and even witnessed a time or two himself. This…was weird. Really weird. And he'd spent the last three months hanging out with a man from the future, an angel, and a guy who saw dead people (or, okay, fine, they all saw dead people, Sam just saw 'em die first), so that was really saying something.

Andy stumbled out of the saloon through a pair of swinging shutter doors that squeaked awfully and oh-my-god he really was in Frontier Land. The philosopher-junkie didn't quite know what he'd been expecting – maybe to accidentally step off a movie set or find out that he'd been 'Punk'd' or something – but stepping into bright sunlight pouring down on an honest-to-god ghost town straight out of the Frontier was…well, it was… it was, uh…

Weird.

"Hello?" Andy called out as he spun in another circle, stumbling off the old, creaky wooden walkway and onto dry, cracked dirt littered with pine needles and dead leaves. The town didn't look that big, but it definitely looked empty. Andy was standing in what he'd guess was the center of it, an intersection of two roads that stretched about two blocks in each direction. Then there was just…nothing. Woods, from what he could see.

What the hell? Where was he? He was no botanist or geologist, but this didn't look like Oregon. At least, not that part he'd just been in. And hadn't it been night? Andy was pretty sure he'd passed out there, back in that classroom with a homicidal maniac with yellow eyes and Sam-

Andy's brain faltered, realizing for a second time but in a whole new way that he was very much alone.

"Sam?" Andy cupped his hands around his mouth and tried again, louder this time. As loud as he could go. "Sam!"

If Sam wasn't here…was he still with Azazel? Andy's hands started shaking and he shoved them in his jean pockets. It was cold here; way colder than Oregon had been. Andy pulled his hands back out almost immediately to rub at his arms as he noticed the frosty air for the first time. He was definitely further north. No clue where along that latitude they were talking, but definitely north. He wished he still had his jacket, blood-soaked as it had been. But they'd left it behind at the doc's office when he and Sam had run.

Andy shuddered, memories of those Croats pounding on the door, scrambling to get in, memories of their hands on him, holding him against those bars- The psychic pushed those thoughts back before they could turn into a full-blooded flashback, extra emphasis on the blood. He needed to focus. Survival first, panic and PTSD later. That sounded like a good plan.

Okay, so… He was alone in Frontier Land and…

"Stupid!" Andy suddenly cursed, frantically digging at his pants for his cell phone the second the realization hit him. He pulled out the small device, flipping it open and praying to absolutely no one but karma and cosmic fate. The universe pretty much owed him one by now, he figured.

The screen lit up; it had a charge. Great first step, go Universe! Andy held the thing up, squinting in the sunlight, and his expression fell. No service. Yeah, well, screw you too, Cosmos.

With a devastated sigh (although, really, he hadn't been expecting much to start with), Andy flipped the phone shut and stuck it back in his pocket. Okay, well, at least that helped him formulate a plan. He needed to find someplace with service, which was definitely not going to be Frontier Land. The psychic spun in a calculative circle this time, eyeing his four directional options, then the sun still climbing towards noon.

"Well, I'm already freezing my butt off, so North is out." Andy turned on his heel, spinning one-eighty to face the opposite direction. "South it is! Mexico, here I come. Get your beaches and margaritas ready."

"You're going to walk to Mexico?"

Andy damn near tripped over his own feet and let out a staggered yelp as he scrambled to stay upright and then back the hell away from the new, petulant, female voice. It was a girl (duh, as if the part where it had been a female voice didn't tip him off), maybe Latina heritage, roughly his age, about the same height too, with light brown skin and dark hair standing on the wooden boardwalk of the intersection's southwest corner.

His first, immediately relieved thought was that she wasn't a ghost. Well, probably not, anyway. She had on a pair of black yoga pants and a loose, knitted tank top with two little tassle-y things dangling from the v-cut neckline. There was a light sweater tied around her waist, but Andy was busy staring at those dangling strings, bouncing with every small movement the girl made. He wondered if she had a cat. She looked like the type who'd have a cat. Why else would someone actually hand over money for a shirt that had bonafied cat toys hanging off of it unless they had a cat?

But he digressed.

The girl stood with hands on her hips, nothing but attitude in the downturn of her pouty lips, and an utter lack of interest in Andy as a human being who had a soul, feelings, and, oh yeah, was freaking the hell out right now, thank you very much.

"You're nowhere near Mexico. And I hate cats," she said in that same tone, her lips thinning in an obviously unimpressed manner. Andy just couldn't catch a break with women lately, could he? Either they were too busy being defensive about their first time hunting and almost dying, they were trying to kill him with his own clothing and magic powers, or they were slicing him up for zombie chow.

Or giving him crap for liking cats and wanting a warm beach and a Piña Colada with a little umbrella on top.

The train of thought ended where all his thoughts inevitably did: he missed his girl. He missed Tracy. A woman who actually liked him and enjoyed his company and quirky humor. Until she'd been murdered by his evil twin brother, that is.

Like all the thoughts before it, Andy shoved that one and the empty, hollow pain that came with it, far, far away. Unless there was a crossroads around here with a demon willing to deal and Andy was feeling morose and suicidal enough to make that deal (eh, it came and went), those thoughts did nothing but tank his soul so deep down in an ocean of depression that he might as well be down in Hell already.

"Uh…" Andy realized he was just staring at Ms. Nowhere-Near-Mexico and had been for several long, embarrassing moments. That sass was turning into suspicion and something a lot worse. Andy cleared his throat and opened his arms wide. "Look, a tour guide! That's great. You wouldn't happen to know where we are, would you?"

She eyed him up and down like a particularly unappealing bug in a specimen jar. "Not Mexico."

Andy sagged, dropping his arms and using the last of his energy to resist telling the only living thing he'd seen so far to piss off. Instead he looked around again, detrimentally hopeful that maybe a third living thing might exist that wasn't an obnoxious college sorority girl. Maybe he could hire them as a tour guide.

He'd take a raccoon at this point, seriously.

"Yeah, thanks, I'd figured that much out for myself," he answered instead, keeping the sarcasm to not-completely rude levels (just mostly-rude). "It's not Berkley either, though that's just an educated guess. I've never actually been."

The girl dropped her arms from her hips in alarm, all that attitude disappearing in a wave of mild fear. "How do you know where I'm from?"

Andy nodded his head at the jacket tied around her waist, one arm reading Cal Softball along its length. "Your jacket. University of California Berkely, right? I looked into that place a little, back when I actually thought about going to college. I hear it's a nice campus."

In the end school hadn't been for him, but sometimes he did wonder where his life would have ended up instead.

She looked down at her waist and the jacket nodded just below her stomach. "Oh. Uh…it is."

And apparently that was all it took to kick Ms. Mexico off her throne of Bitch Supreme. She crossed her arms, body reading a lot more insecure than the strong stance she'd taken a minute ago. Andy was no expert of female body language (as Tracy had told him on several occasions aaaand oh, look, there went that thought, too, as far away from him as physically possible, bye, bye, now), but he was pretty sure she was embarrassed.

"Where are you from?" She hopped off the walkway and trudged a couple cautious feet forward in the dirt.

"Guthrie, Oklahoma," Andy answered casually. "But last night I was in Oregon."

"Oh, another West Coaster," the girl said, perking up a bit with a smile. Andy stared at her, not remotely understanding why that made her feel better.

"Not really," he shrugged, unsure what her deal was. He really didn't understand girls. Or most people, in general, really. He missed his van, man. "More of a nomad these days. Don't think it matters though; I doubt we're anywhere near the West Coast anymore."

Not if Andy had any sort of read on the trees around them. Again, he was no geographer, but this forest, the mostly flat land and lack of any mountainous features in the distance reminded him way more of home than it did of the West, at least what he'd seen of it so far. Not that that gave him any real clue as to where he was. There was a lot of the United States covered under 'not California, Oregon, or Washington.' Like…the entire rest of it. Well, okay, given how cold it was, he could probably knock out all the southern states too. Whoopie, only, like, thirty other possibilities left!

"Well, I've got a cell phone but no service," Andy continued when his companion fell silent. He wondered if their situation was settling in. She didn't ask how it could be possible, the both of them transported overnight to a ghost town in the middle of…uh…somewhere. "Maybe we can hike out of here, try to find a signal."

The girl shrugged, but didn't seem against the idea. She nodded her head down the road that went East, untying her Cal jacket and tugging it on. "There's more buildings that way. I woke up over there. Maybe we can find a road leading out?"

Andy spun on the heel of his shoe to stare down the innocuous street lined with more of the same old-timey buildings, all slowly succumbing to time and gravity. A road would be a lot nicer walking than struggling through the woods that seemed to surround their other three sides. Plus, if they made their way through town first, maybe Andy could find some supplies. Salt, at the very least, something with some iron in it if they were really lucky.

"Sure, worth a shot. I'm Andy by the way."

"Amanda."

Andy nodded. Not a bad start for waking up in the middle of nowhere with some girl who came on way too strong. Beside him, Amanda jogged a couple steps to catch up as he started down the wide dirt road in the direction she had indicated.

"Sorry," she muttered after a moment, and he blinked, turning clueless eyes her way. She offered a weak smile. "I come on kinda strong. Or, uh…so I've heard."

Andy just shrugged, appreciating that. "Everyone deals differently with waking up thousands of miles away completely alone in a ghost town probably filled with actual ghosts. So…yeah, you did okay in my book."

Her smile turned a little more genuine and the two walked in companionable silence on their search for a road away from that place.

"Wait…" Andy said in sudden realization, turning to her. Amanda withdrew, hunching in on herself like she was expecting something ugly from him. "Did you say you hate cats? No one hates cats; I mean, plenty of people don't like cats, but no one hates them. Are you allergic or something?"

-o-o-o-

Cold Oak was a deserted town deep in Black Hills National Forest on the western edge of South Dakota. It was about as far from Sioux Falls as it physically could be while still being in the same state. Despite the fact they wouldn't be crossing any state lines, it would still take them almost seven hours to get there. Something that weighed heavily on both Winchesters.

"It's not even on Google Maps," Sam muttered, staring at the small screen of his blackberry as he used two fingers to inch his way through the National Forest pixel by pixel, looking for any sort of roads or markings that could indicate the haunted town.

He'd heard of it, long before his brother came ten years back in time talking about a battle royale. It was one of the most haunted mining towns in all of North America. Rumor had it that the town was so infested by the things that went bump in the night it had been unlivable; the inhabitants all fled. Given it was in the middle of nowhere with no current population and a very low known death toll, no hunter had ever bothered to take it on. So it sat untouched, a literal ghost town in the South Dakota woods.

Until now. Yay for the Winchesters, yet again.

"Here," Dean said out of nowhere, letting go of the wheel with one hand to dig around in the back seat. Sam looked up from his map-scrolling in time for his brother to dump a small box in his lap. The contents inside rattled. Sam blinked down at the case of .45 caliber bullets as Dean put his hand back on the wheel. "Carve devil traps into those. I'm done being the underdog. We're not going into this shit unprepared again."

Sam stared at the box for a scant second before setting down his phone and digging through the bag at his feet for a switchblade sturdy enough to do the job. There were way better tools that would take less time and provide better results, but Sam didn't have any on hand, or a plug for the electric dremel he'd prefer to be using. And pulling over and finding one to get the job done was not an option.

Sam got to work carving the bullets, Dean warning him anytime the road was about to get uneven. They weren't perfect, but as Sam blew away the miniscule metal shavings to observe the first of many to come, he was fairly confident the trap would function. They'd carved seven of them originally, when confronting Crowley and Azazel the first time. That was the magazine load of their standard ivory-gripped 1911A1 Colts that John Winchester had given each of the boys on their eighteenth birthday. Once they'd concluded their business with Crowley that night, no firing needed, they'd kept those bullets in a special clip in the Impala's trunk ever since.

Dean honestly hadn't thought to bring them to Rivergrove. There wasn't supposed to be demonic activity there, and especially not the whole of Hell's population on Earth. It had been a trap, pure and simple, and not at all the one Azazel had lined up the first time around. No, Hell had made a play to see where the Winchesters stood on the board. To see if they had an angel in their back pocket or just in Dean's chest. To gauge just how deep Dean's insider knowledge went. To get Sam back onto the demon blood he'd flushed from his system and since been able to avoid.

And they'd succeeded, on all fronts but one.

Dean glanced at his brother again from his peripheral vision. Sam had been morosely quiet, and it was beginning to gnaw at the older Winchester. With every bullet the kid completed he'd stop, knife in hand, and rub at his injured palm in a way Dean was uncomfortably familiar with. It was just like what he used to do when Death's wall had come down. When the kid had lost all grip of reality, Hell scars literally driving him insane. He'd rub and press and worry at a not-so-different injury anytime he saw Lucifer, using the pain to remind himself it wasn't real.

The man from the future knew Sam was worried about Andy. The kid had apparently been in really bad shape when Azazel disappeared him, bleeding out and on Death's door, and Sam couldn't say one way or another if he'd even be alive when they found him. But this quiet was something more than just that worry. Something…unnatural, with an air of something dark. Something sinister, just beneath the surface. Dean was uncomfortably familiar with that, too.

"I need to ask you something," the older Winchester announced suddenly, but from the way the silence immediately turned into tension thick enough to poke with a stick, Sam had been expecting it. Dean wrung his hands on Baby's wheel, listening to the comforting creak of well-loved leather and steeling himself for an ugly conversation. "And I need the truth. No judgement, no anger, like we talked about, alright?"

Green eyes glanced at his younger brother. Sam watched him in tense silence for far too long, before the kid finally lowered his gaze and nodded.

"Did you drink it?"

It stung, being asked that yet again, though Sam knew there was good reason. Knew it had been coming. But a bitter part of him that still railed against being treated always like the kid brother, was angry that Dean wouldn't just believe him. Even if it was an omitted truth, what he'd said was still the truth. He hadn't drunk it.

"No," Sam answered, voice clipped, but his shoulders sagged with a weight of a burden he had no interest in carrying alone. He just hadn't wanted the burden of sharing it, either. "But in the end it didn't matter."

Dean's eyes shuttered closed for a brief moment, as long as he dared while actively driving. "The syringe?"

"I think so," Sam answered, though there was little doubt at this point. The needle mark was still sore and tender, red around the edges, but the surrounding muscles were taught with a strength Sam hadn't had before. Azazel had been right; he'd been weak, weaker than ever before. And now he wasn't.

Sam held his palm out, fingers stretched flat, switchblade balanced atop the bandage wrapped around damaged flesh. "My hand, too. When the jar broke."

"Damnit, Sammy." Dean hit Baby's wheel with a closed fist hard enough to make the entire steering column shake. "You can't- You can't keep this stuff from me!"

Despite his promise of no anger or judgement, he was angry. Furious. But not at Sam. Not really. Dean hit the steering wheel again, silently apologizing to Baby but needing the outlet. They couldn't afford to pull over so he could take his anger out on something more substantial and less loved. Andy needed them; they didn't have the time. Dean let out a frustrated noise and Sammy just kept quite beside him. That unnatural, tense silence.

"God damnit!" Dean yelled again, wringing his hands around Baby's leather hard enough to make the skin on the undersides of his fingers hurt. "I'm- Sorry, I know I said- Fuck! I'm not- I'm not angry with you, damnit, I'm just…"

"Angry," Sam supplied, like it was the easiest answer in the world. Two plus two. Dean realized that it was an easy answer for Sam, because he was angry too. He'd just always been so much better at turning it into something useful. "I get it, Dean."

"I promised you." The older Winchester's words dropped in timber, to the point where Sam almost didn't hear them. His eyes were locked straight ahead, like he couldn't even look at Sam, and the younger Winchester sighed as Guilty Dean reared his ugly head in the worst of ways. "I promised this wouldn't happen again."

"It was never a promise you could keep." Though it sounded harsh, it was forgiveness in the only way Sam could really offer. "Azazel was never going to let you."

Still wouldn't. Sam had only gotten a partial dose, and he knew the demon wouldn't stop until he took the rest. It scared him, knowing there was absolutely nothing he could do to stop it, in such a way that he was left numb to that fear, that inevitable truth.

"I need you to tell me next time. Sooner." It wasn't as demanding as his older brother usually got, nor as self-righteous and hypocritical. Sam appreciated the effort, despite the white-knuckled grip Dean had on the steering wheel that belied just how much anger he was holding back.

"What's the point?"

Sam knew he shouldn't say it, at least not like that, but he was tired. Tired, and just as angry.

"What? What?!" Dean's head whipped around hard enough to crack his neck, but he had other things taking priority at the moment. "The point is I need to know these things, Sammy!"

"What difference does it make, Dean?" Sam dropped the bullet he was working on – hadn't really been working on since Dean started this – and turned to his brother. "You can't change it."

Dean eyed him like he'd grown a second, then third head. "I need to know so I know if you're gonna-"

But the man from the future abruptly cut himself off, biting down on his own cheek to keep from saying too much.

"Say it," Sam said, at first soft, then firmer. "Say it, Dean. You need to know if I'm gonna go dark side, so you can stop me!"

Dean's hands tightened on the leather far beyond what Baby was ever built to take. "Not what I was gonna say, Sammy."

"Yeah?" Sam let out a huff of laughter, but it was bitter and angry and dark. "Well, it might as well have been, because that's what you're going to have to do."

His brother was as tense as he'd ever seen him, but Sam knew it was because he was right.

"You're not gonna go dark side."

"Not now." The surly, petulant tone was hardly reassuring. Then again, Sam didn't mean it to be. "It's not enough. Not yet. But eventually it will be."

Because eventually, Azazel would corner him with another jar of blood and more, and the Winchesters would be all out of miracles and last minute saves.

"No, it won't, because you're not gonna drink anymore," Dean argued, the tension in his voice causing the words to practically vibrate. It was usually a warning that it was time to change topics, lest the older Winchester finally boil over. It was the last sign before impending ugliness.

Sam didn't care.

"Don't you get it, Dean? Yes, I will! Even if I don't drink it, I'm still going to end up with it inside me!" Sam held up his hand like weaponized truth, palm flat and cuts bandaged. Dean flinched, remembering a time when Sam's hand alone was a weapon. "We can't stop this. They're never going to stop, they're gonna get me hooked and there is nothing you or I can do to stop it! Whether it's Layla or Andy, or someone we haven't even met yet, Azazel can threaten anyone and I won't have a choice."

Sam's voice dropped as heavily as his hand, and he stared at it, laying atop the box of bullets in his lap. "I'll never have a choice. I need you to get your head around that."

Dean was silent and the quiet this time was an angry one, as only Dean Winchester could ever truly make it. His eyes stayed locked on the road, but his shoulders were slumped in a defeated way that Sam always hated to see in his stalwart big brother. "What do you want from me, Sam? You want me to give up, throw in the towel?" He glanced over for a split second before refocusing on the windshield. "Cuz I can't do that."

Sam knew that. He knew it, and he didn't want that anyway.

"I want you to start thinking about containment instead of prevention, Dean." He sighed, raising his uninjured hand to pinch at his forehead and try to rub the developing headache away before it could get any worse. "We're always going to be two steps behind if we don't start thinking three steps ahead."

Beside him, Dean swallowed, having absolutely no idea how to do that. Damnit, he was from the friggin' future. He should be three steps ahead by the very nature of this nightmare. But he wasn't, and he didn't know why, or how to be again. And the only containment they'd ever tried had been locking Sam in the panic room. Lot'a good that did them. They'd almost killed him before Cas set him free to destroy the world.

Dean couldn't think about that right now. Any of it. He just…he couldn't. Not right now.

"Let's just…focus on finding Andy, alright?" They could worry about the rest of it after. One thing at a time.

In the passenger seat, Sam let out a world-weary sigh, eyes tracking out the side window at the passing landscape. With those words, Dean had once more set his mind to the step they were currently on, only illustrating just how much he'd missed or chosen to ignore Sam's point. The younger Winchester really didn't know how else to get his warning across before it was way too late. Part of him, a part that had grown bitter in the stubborn shadow of the Winchester name, didn't even know why he bothered.

-o-o-o-

"So what's Oklahoma like?"

Amanda trudged along behind Andy, swinging the iron skillet they'd found back and forth as she walked alongside him. It had been in the third building they'd ducked inside on their supply search. She'd picked it up, hefting it up and down to test its weight, and asked if that would work as one of those weapons he'd mentioned. You know, in case that 'wild animal' attacked them.

Honestly, she'd just stared at him when he'd said it. Long and hard and kind of like he was crazy. But there she was, finding a potential weapon, and beggars can't be choosers.

Andy took it, feeling the weight and balance of it. It was old, covered in a layer of dusty rust, and not particularly large, but it was heavy and probably solid iron, even if it wasn't pure. Yeah, this would definitely do, at least against any ghosts they might run into. He lifted it up, a batter's two handed grip wrapped around the short handle, and mimicked a swing.

Amanda backed off a step, the kind of uncertain concern in her eye that Andy had seen on many a girl on the bus, or walking home from school, or just standing outside the 7-Eleven having to deal with some asshole catcalling her. He knew that look, though he couldn't say he'd ever been the cause of it before.

The Jedi lowered the weapon with an apologetic grin and held it out to her instead, much to Amanda's surprise.

"You'll probably be better with it, being on an actual softball team and all," he said, feigning obliviousness at her relief. He didn't blame her; it was a lot easier being the one with something to swing rather than worrying about the other person you barely knew swinging at you.

She'd taken the skillet gingerly, but soon enough hefted it on her shoulder with a more enthusiastic expression, and they'd gotten back on their way, searching through the abandoned down.

Now, almost reaching the end of the current road they were on, Andy shrugged at her question. "Guthrie's a pretty small town, but not the smallest. I don't know, it was nice?"

He didn't like to think about it, about the life he'd had that he'd been forced to leave behind. About Tracy, which inevitably led him to think of what had forced him to flee, to join the Winchesters in wandering the country fighting monsters of all things.

"I'd rather not talk about it," Andy concluded, not noticing that Amanda had staggered to a stop several feet behind him and not resumed walking. Andy made it another half dozen feet before he glanced over his shoulder at her silence. He frowned at the girl, standing stalk still in the middle of the dirt road, eyeing him with that same 'oh god, please don't be crazy' look back on her face. "You coming?"

"Um…I…" Yup, that worried look was definitely back, a hundred times over. That was the best word he could put to the wide eyes and stiff posture. Andy frowned even more, realizing she looked scared. A quick flash of panic hit him, thinking perhaps she'd seen something behind him. A ghost or maybe a-

"Hello! Is anybody here?"

A panicked voice shattered the otherwise calm around just the two of them and both kids jumped at the sudden disruption. Andy spun around in time to see a kid, lanky and tall, dressed in an old brown bomber jacket, and looking a step from the grave with unwashed, messy brown hair and circles under his eyes so dark in contrast to his pasty white skin it was a wonder if he'd slept in the last century. He was kind of stumbling on the wooden boardwalk that wrapped the corner building, and he had a wild look in his eye like a man who'd just woken up in the middle of a Frontier time ghost town, completely alone, thousands of miles from where he'd fallen asleep.

Andy could relate.

"Hey!" he called out, waving an arm over his head. Tall-dark-and-exhausted spotted them right away, going completely still as he realized he finally wasn't alone. Andy hoped the energetic wave would be enough to convey 'non-threat' status as he started towards the guy who definitely looked like he might be a threat. At least in that cliché, obviously-evil-villain-in-a-spy-movie sort of way. As he jogged towards the fellow who he most definitely hoped was not evil, Andy called over his shoulder to Amanda, "Hey, looks like we're not completely alone after all."

Mr. Disney-Channel-Movie-Villain faltered on the first few steps, clearly relieved to not be alone in this town but also realizing he was now alone with two other people he knew nothing about. But eventually he climbed off the wooden boardwalk and met Andy halfway. Amanda followed with a little more caution, whatever had scared her before not entirely forgotten but also not the focus of her attention any longer.

"Hey, man," Andy greeted with as friendly a smile as he could muster. "I'm Andy. You just wake up here?"

"Y-Yeah," the guy answered, obviously still shaken by the entire event and not too trusting of its most recent changes. "Uh, Scott. Scott Carey."

"Nice to meet you, Scott. This is Amanda," Andy introduced, gesturing behind him as the Berkley student hesitantly caught up to them. "We just ran into each other, like, ten minutes ago? We've been looking for any sorta supplies or tools we can use. We're gonna hike outa here."

"You…uh…how did you…we…get here?" Scott looked shakily between the two them, face a picture of near panic, even when Amanda gave him a little wave with her free hand. Personally, Scott was finding Andy's calm demeanor about the entire thing both comforting and the absolute opposite of comforting. Dr. Waxler would probably tell him that was a dissociative defense mechanism in response to his recurring distrust of people coming into his life.

He still wasn't sure about the new therapist.

"Not sure," Andy answered easily enough, his cheerful demeanor taking no hits in the light of…well, whatever this was. "But I think we should get outa here as soon as possible. Don't you?"

Further movement over Scott's shoulder caught Andy's attention, and the Jedi blinked at a fourth kid, mostly hidden behind the corner of the building Scott had just come from. The guy was watching them.

"Hey!" he called out again, making Scott jump, and he went for the same arm-over-his-head friendly wave, since it seemed to work so well the first time.

The fourth guy, a bulky kid with a broad-shouldered frame, dirty blonde hair, and suspicious, narrowed eyes, slowly stepped out from behind the building. He crossed his arms, staring at the three of them for a moment before finally coming to whatever decision he was contemplating and stalking towards them. Andy didn't hold it against the kid; he'd be pretty cautious of all this too if he hadn't spent the last three months traipsing the country with the Winchesters.

"Hey," Andy repeated yet again once the guy was close enough not to require shouting. "I'm Andy. This is Scott and Amanda. I take it you're new here too?"

"Hilarious," the other kid spoke with a scowl. Andy let it flow right off of him. Again, he'd be pretty grumpy if all of this was happening to him unprepared. Hell, he was just happy not to be bleeding to death anymore. "You know where we are, or are you just the Walmart greeter?"

Andy shrugged. "Nope. Just trying to get out of wherever this is. I've got a cell, but no service. Figure we could try a little further down the road."

"There is no road," kid number four spat, arms still crossed, and a little more of Andy's forced calm and cheer chipped. "I've checked."

Andy didn't know why, but he didn't believe him. Still, calling out Mr. Grumpy Pants on the first day of class when they were all the new kid seemed in poor taste. Andy was pretty sure they'd do better making friends in this place than enemies.

"Alright, then…we'll hike through the woods." Andy turned to the other two, Scott who was slowly shying in on himself with every disparaging word Sir Grump-a-lots had to say, and Amanda who looked about ready to strike it out on her own and leave the behind the useless, bickering boys. Andy's frown slowly returned. If this town really was haunted (and, come on, look around. It was most definitely haunted), they'd have better luck sticking together. He spared the scowly guy another look. "What's your name?"

"Jonathon."

"Alright, well, Jonny," Andy said, giving him a light slap on the back in a second attempt at comradery, "we were thinking-"

"I said it's Jonathon," the guy snapped, immediately stepping away from Andy with something between defensiveness and aggression filling every line of his closed-off posture. "Are you deaf?"

Andy frowned but tried to shrug it off yet again. Some people didn't like being touched; water over the bridge and under the bridge and all that, right? "Sorry, Jonathon. We were looking for-"

"Supplies. Yeah, I heard you."

Andy let the awkward silence stretch, blinking at Jonathon who seemed utterly determined to be an ass.

"Alright then," Andy muttered again, finally letting some of his own annoyance bleed through. He turned away from the obnoxious guy, much preferring the company of Amanda and Scott, despite the fact that Scott was about half a second from a full freak out.

To be honest, inner Andy wasn't doing all that well himself, he just had more practice at burying the oh-my-god-this-can't-be-happening-this-isn't-real-this-sort-of-thing-doesn't-actually-happen gut reaction and panic.

About three months more experience.

And, he knew more about what was happening than any of his current compatriots. Andy might not know where they were or the name of this god-forsaken town, but it was certainly ringing all the wrong alarm bells. The young hunter was slowly but surely getting the feeling that waking up here of all places, magically not bleeding to death, when Azazel's ugly mug had been the last he thought he'd ever see, was a lot less of the miracle than it first felt like.

-o-o-o-

- Two Months Ago -

They'd been sitting in the Impala, Dean in the driver's seat, Andy in the front seat (for once!) while Sam ran into the diner to grab a late night snack (and pie. Dean always insisted on pie. He had a minor obsession, Andy was starting to realize after just a few weeks around the man). Andy hadn't been with the brothers for much more than a month now, but the red-eye drives through the night to the next hunt were becoming unsettlingly familiar. Sometimes, Andy wondered why he hadn't moved on yet. Find a nice corner of nowhere, stock up on weed and Hot Pockets, and smoke and feast till the end of the world. But then they'd face their next werewolf or ghost or wendigo, for Pete's sake, and Andy remembered that he absolutely did not want to be alone in this monster-infested worldat allorever again, please and thank you.

"Here."

Andy, lost in thoughts about the terrors of a world he'd never even known existed, glanced over at Dean's sharp voice. That was his trying-to-be-the-adult-in-the-car tone, something that never failed to amuse the likes of Andy Gallagher. Usually because Dean only summoned it in the middle of some of the most childish arguments Andy had ever heard. He'd never had brothers, but listening to Sam and Dean bicker about music choices, movies that weren't even from this century, and which of the bachelorettes was the hottest was, by and far, making up for twenty-three years of single child syndrome.

Dean was holding a gun out in the flat of his palm. Andy blinked at it.

"Uh…?"

The older Winchester leveled him with a look that clearly said don't-make-me-rethink-this and Andy took the weapon quickly. It was heavy in his hand, heavier than he'd expected. Which seemed both profound and profoundly ridiculous. It was hardly the first gun he'd held this week alone.

"What's this for?" Andy asked, a little nervous. In no way ever did a good situation require one of the Winchester's to hand him a gun. The kid managed not to glance around the mostly empty diner parking lot in search of the newest threat, lurking in the dark.

"You wanted a gun," Dean answered like it was obvious. Andy's head whipped back around to stare at him.

He…had asked for a gun, on that first hunt in the graveyard, with the crazy witch controlling an even crazier civil war dude's ghost. Andy lost his robe that day and learned an important and vital lesson about capes. But he hadn't gotten a gun. And it took a good couple of hunts after that before Dean finally trusted him not to friendly-fire their asses into an early grave.

"Yeah…" Andy glanced down at the weapon. It was a standard fair handgun, nothing particularly special or unique about it. But still. He looked back up at the hunter. "Thought you and Sam said I didn't need one."

Dean shrugged. "That was when we didn't know you'd be sticking with us. But if you're gonna be a hunter, you need a gun."

Andy slid the magazine out, checking the bullets. They weren't silver, but he knew they had that amo, and he got the feeling Dean was offering him a lot more than just one gun and one magazine, here. He slid the magazine back into place with a click.

"Uh…thanks." It didn't sound like enough, but Andy wasn't sure what else to say.

"Look, there's something else too…" Dean's voice trailed off in full-on hesitation now, and he sighed. Andy sat up a little straighter as something small and tight and definitely one hundred percent worry knotted in his gut. Dean Winchester didn't sigh. Not un-ironically, at least. "Sam told you about the yellow-eyed demon, right?"

"Azazel? Yeah, he's, uh…he's mentioned him." Andy swallowed a little roughly, throat tightening up like hypovolemic shock was setting in. The kid looked down at the gun heavy in his hand, hand resting in his lap. The offer of a weapon was starting to take a distinctly unpleasant turn. It left him with a bad taste in his mouth.

"Did he tell you about the Battle Royale?"

Andy's head turned back to Dean, a slow blink giving the answer before his mouth ever formed it. Dean sighed again, staring blankly out the front window like he wished he'd never asked. Then he launched into it. Told Andy all about what Azazel had planned for his 'special kids'. And that sinking weight in Andy's gut got so, so much worse.

"So you keep that on you at all times," Dean said, nodding his head towards the gun in Andy's hands. "And if…if you wake up somewhere you don't know surrounded by other kids like you, you do whatever it takes to get out of there, you hear me? You defend yourself, no matter what that means, and then you run. Sam and I'll come for you."

Andy swallowing the Sahara desert that was now his mouth was damn audible in the car. He stared down at the weapon with dread, wishing that tossing it out the car window meant taking its promise of a bloody future with it.

"You…want me to kill those kids?"

"I want you to survive. Hell, shoot 'em in the kneecaps." Dean's cavalier words almost, almost, had Andy choking on his own saliva. If he'd had any saliva left, he probably would have. "Just know, not all of those kids have powers like you. Some of them have a lot worse."

"My powers don't even work on other 'special kids'," Andy grumbled, still staring down at that gun like it might bite him as surely as it would also save his life.

"Doesn't mean theirs won't work on you." Dean's voice was tight, a warning not to underestimate the situation if he found himself in it. Andy curled his fingers around the edge of the metal to disguise the way they trembled ever so slightly. "Sam ran into plenty of those kids that could take him out. And none of his powers ever worked on them."

Andy stared at his lap and the quiet that filled the car was dark and weighted. "It doesn't seem fair."

"No, it sure as hell doesn't, kid." Dean glanced over at him, then back to the diner where they could see Sam's beanstalk frame sitting at the counter, fidgeting awkwardly while he waited for their order. The younger Winchester glanced over his shoulder at them and Dean nodded, though he doubted the kid could really see him through the reflections off the diner window. "Which is why you do whatever it takes. You hear me?"

Andy stared at the reflective curve of the gun's grip. He wrapped his hand around it, feeling the metal start to warm. "Yeah. I hear you."

The resident Jedi leaned forward to tuck the weapon into his waistband, as he'd seen the Winchesters – and every TV character ever – do a million times before. They'd later get him a hip holster, considering the gun slipped free the first time he climbed out of the car, fell down the length of his pants and out of his ankle while he did a 'shit, that's cold!' wiggle dance to get it free.

Thank Christ he'd given it to the kid with the safety on, the older Winchester had later muttered under his breath as he watched the jiggle dance and resisted burying his face in his palm.

-o-o-o-

- Now -

Memory fresh in his mind, Andy stared at the three other kids he had so far found in this creepy ghost town. He regarded each in turn, wondering what powers they might possess. Amanda's was fairly obvious in retrospect, but Scott and Johnathon were still mysteries. Not that the Extra-From-Dawn-Of-The-Dead or Mr. Excuse-Me-It's-Jon*athon* hadn't already had Andy at least on edge, but now he was eyeing them each a little more nervously.

He wished he'd asked Dean to go into a little more detail about those kids that Sam had run into. He also wish he still had that gun.

But he didn't and there was no use dwelling on it.

So, time for plan B. Okay. Yes. Sure. Yes. This was- this was fine. They were fine. All fine. Making friends, even. There was no need for them to start killing each other.

"What?" Amanda practically screeched, breaking the otherwise low thrum of conversation the three had awkwardly struck up as Andy's mind went other places.

"What what?" Andy spun to face Amanda in panic, still expecting a ghost attack at any moment, but he just ended up blinking at the girl as absolutely nothing else happened. Then he realized what he'd just been thinking.

Gah!

Andy raised his hands, fingers spread in little frantic waves. "It's not what it sounds like-"

"What are you talking about?" Scott hedged a little nervously, body already turned partially away from them like he could shield himself from all this if he just turned around, stuck his fingers in his ears, and sang loud enough until he couldn't hear them anymore. That, or run for it. Andy would put his money on the running.

"What what sounds like?" Jonathon snapped, his posture getting, if anything, even stiffer. The dude was the literal representation of a live wire.

Oh, god, Andy hoped that wasn't his power.

"What are you talking about?" Amanda shrieked and Andy winced.

"No one's talking about anything!" Scott half yelled, getting a tad hysterical himself. He threw his hands in Andy's general direction. "He didn't say anything!"

Andy waved at Amanda with one hand, the other still raised placatingly. "She can read minds, okay, and my thoughts were, uh, not really pleasant a second ago."

"You said we were all going to start killing each other!" Amanda yelled, the freak-out currently over-ruling her surprise at Andy not only aware of her ability, but also seemingly okay with it. Like it was normal. But, really, there were more pressing things to be panicking about, so the relief of not being found a freak was taking a back seat at the moment.

Jonathon's tension-rigid body physically moved him with a jolt, fists curling where they rested against his arms, but Andy didn't notice. He was busy waving his hands like a drowning man at the almost-panicking college girl.

"No, no," he insisted, well, insistently. "I said there was no reason for us to do that."

"Why would we do that to start with?"

Okay, touché, college girl.

"What are you two talking about, no one said anything!" Poor Scott really did sound on the brink of a mental breakdown. He kept edging further and further from them, one little shuffled heel back at a time. He was hugging himself like the comfort might actually help and Andy spared him a sympathetic, apologetic glance.

"What do you mean, she reads minds?" Jonathon spoke, voice icy in a way that made Amanda flinch. Andy didn't like it.

"We all have powers," he offered as some sort of cool down. Lord knew they needed a bit of calm right now. He turned to each of them, hands still up but less frantic now as he went from instigator to mediator. Andy wished he'd started with the mediator. "I can make people do anything I want just by telling them to. I'm pretty sure Amanda reads minds, considering she told me she hates cats, and I definitely didn't say that shirt looks like a glorified cat toy. Well, at least, not out loud."

Scott just stared at them, shoulders hunched up around his ears. "You're insane. You're all insane!"

Amanda crossed her arms defensively over her chest, shoulders pulled back and attitude slapped back in place like a shield. It was definitely a defense mechanism to hide how scared she was, Andy realized.

"You don't have powers?" His question back at Scott silenced him immediately. The poor kid shriveled up like a raisin, mouth pinched so tight it practically puckered. Andy almost felt bad about it. He was clearly pretty troubled, and Andy wondered what his powers were that he was so damn nervous to even admit he had them.

Of course, maybe he was just nervous to be around a mind reader and a Jedi. That was plenty of cause.

"They didn't start about a year ago?" Andy continued, taking a more gentle tone as he tried to get back into the mediator feel. He'd never been great at playing referee. "When you turned twenty-three, right? And your mom, she probably died in a house fire when you were super young?"

Scott dropped his arms, eyes wide, and Andy took it as a victory that his shoulders didn't stay up around his ears. "How did you know that?"

At the same time, friggin' Jonathon just scoffed loudly. "My mother never died in any fire."

"My mom lives in Phoenix," Amanda said in the silence that followed, voice hesitant with new concern as she glanced between the four of them. "Is she- she's alright, right? I just talked to her yesterday-"

"She's fine," Andy interrupted, trying hard not to get frustrated with how difficult this was proving to be. Like herding cats. All he wanted to do was get them to listen to him, agree they shouldn't start killing each other, and get the hell out of here. Was that really so much to ask? "Some of us with powers, our moms died in a house fire when we were six months old. Mine was my adopted mom. Never, uh…never met my biological mother."

Andy's offered smile, pitying as it was, completely faltered at the memory of his own home and family. A mother he'd never met, murdered by a brother he'd known for all of ten minutes before he'd had to kill him.

He practically felt more than saw Amanda go still again, and shook his head to physically shake his mind from thoughts she didn't deserve to be burdened with. So instead he turned to Jonathon, trying to give the utter jerk a little leeway. Everyone reacted to waking up in the middle of a ghost town differently, right?

"It sounds like it didn't happen that way for everyone. But we're all still connected."

And he'd put money on Scott Carey having powers too, even if the poor kid didn't want to own up to them.

Jonathon crossed his arms once more. "By what."

"The yellow-eyed man."

This dick of a kid had never, for a second, been relaxed since joining their little group, but any sort of tension they'd eased out of him over the last three and a half minutes snapped back into his spine like one of those bracelets from the nineties. Andy could practically hear the snap, and he certainly saw the jerk.

Hell, the kid twitched so hard at the exact same time Andy blinked, it almost looked like his whole body flickered, kinda like ghosts did. But Andy had made physical contact with the kid when he slapped him on the back, so he knew he wasn't a ghost. Just an optical illusion and weird timing.

"No way," Scott whispered on a low, trembling exhale. Distracted,

Andy turned to him, not entirely surprised but also not having expected their fourth and most skittish member out of all of them to have been visited by Azazel.

"You've seen him?" The Jedi asked, trying to keep the words, thick in his throat, gentle and encouraging and not at all the shaking mess of trembling terror they really were. Because Andy really, really never wanted to see that messed-up, creep of a dude ever again. His chest ached just at the thought, and he found himself absently patting his t-shirt down, once more expecting blood and torn flesh. When he found nothing, he tried to shake off the fear and focus on Scott, and getting his new friends out of Cold Oak. "Let me guess. Bad dreams?"

Scott looked truly shaken, but he never took his eyes off Andy. He folded his arms around himself again, fingers fidgeting with the cuffs of his jacket self-consciously. "He…he tells me to hurt things. Hurt people. But I don't want to!"

He'd killed his neighbor's cat. He'd electrocuted Mr. Tinkles just by touching him. Fried his insides like a hamburger.

Scott started to shake.

He'd buried him. Dug a hole in Mrs. Davidson's garden, in the back where she wouldn't notice, and buried her cat there. He'd never meant to hurt anyone or anything. He'd just…the yellow eyed man had told him he had to test it. Told him he'd never know if he didn't try.

Scott had thrown up all over Mrs. Davidson's geraniums.

"That's great!" Andy exclaimed, completely ignorant to the poor, shaking kid's internal trauma. His smile brightened, gaze sliding over to Amanda. "See, I told you, we don't have to start killing each other."

"Again, why would we?" she barked back, voice still several pitches too high and hand wrapped very possessively around the handle of her skillet.

"What do you mean by that?" Jonathon talked over her, eyes locked on Andy in a way that made the Jedi feel kind of like a frog pinned to an autopsy tray. His eyes snapped from Andy to Amanda, causing the girl's breath to hitch in a little gasp. She clearly didn't think much of Jonathon either. "Can you read all our minds?"

Rude, Andy thought, not particularly liking the way he'd said it like an accusation. It wasn't like it was Amanda's fault. These powers weren't any of their faults. None of them had asked for this.

"N-No," she replied, body language bouncing between faked confidence and cowering away. "I…um…. You guys are all…muffled." Her gaze dropped, and she unconsciously picked at a fleck of rust on the iron pan. "Usually, it's so loud. I can't block it out. I-I don't even go out anymore. I can't even go to class. Everyone, all the thoughts, it's just so loud." Amanda's breath hitched again, but with a deep breath she physically gathered herself back together. "With you guys, I don't know, it's just…muffled. I can only hear your thoughts if I focus really hard on you. Like…I was doing with Andy."

She spared him a sheepish smile, but he just shrugged. Not like he could take offense to her scanning his thoughts to make sure he wasn't a murdering psychopath who'd dragged her here himself. Dude, if his powers actually worked on them, he'd have done the same thing and demanded she tell him who she was and how she – and he – had gotten there. If he hadn't already known why they were there, that is.

Across from them, Jonathon seemed to relax a little more.

"So what's your power?" Andy asked Scott, going for another bright smile as he tried to pull Scott out of his nervous shell and maybe lower the tension between everyone to more a reasonable level.

"Did the yellow-eyed man tell you anything, then?" Jonathon interrupted his attempts once again, and it took everything Andy had in him not to glare at the asshole. He turned to him, sucking on the inside of his cheek in a ten count that he repeated in German just because he could. It didn't do much to help.

He really wanted to punch this kid. If his powers just worked on other special kids, he'd have already told the jerk to give himself the most painful wedgie physically possible. Andy had used that one before; there was a lot of grey area in 'physically possible' it turned out.

"Not much," he answered slowly instead, lifting his shoulder in a nonchalant shrug. He was seriously starting to think they'd be better letting Jonathon go on his way. The three of them could find a way out without him, Andy was more than sure of that. "I found a way to block him out. But I know he's a demon and he's got plans for us."

"A demon?" Scott echoed, that hint of 'you're all insane' back in his voice as he glanced between Amanda and Jonathon for backup.

"He wants us to fight to the death, and we're not the only ones. There's a bunch of us." Andy met each of their worried, hesitant, and suspicious gazes in turn. He knew what he was saying probably sounded crazy, but it was the truth. And he really needed them to see that before shit started hitting the fan. "But we don't have to do it. We don't have to play his game. If we work together, we can all get out of here. Alive."

With speech imparted on his fellow man (and woman), Andy turned to look down the last thoroughfare they'd yet to check. There could still be a road out of this place, since he didn't feel much like taking Jonathon at his word. They should start with that. Maybe a little travel would help improve the mood and build a little group trust. Or, at a minimum, comradery. And, if not, they could at least put some distance between them and this town while they argued.

It occurred to Andy far too late that he shouldn't have turned his back on them.

There was a presence behind him that he felt more than saw. It was way too close, way too quickly, but Andy didn't think enough about it, not in time. He never saw the hit coming. The side of his head exploded in pain, and his vision whited out at the same time his body hit the dirt.

Chapter End Notes

A/N: Special thanks to superlc529 for mentioning devil-trapped bullets in a review and therefore reminding me those are a thing! Despite having already used them once in this story, I totally let their existence fall through the cracks. With a beast this size, it definitely happens at times, so please keep flagging things you see that are either missing, wrong, or possibilities you can't tell if I've just forgotten or actually have a good reason for not using XD

Special Kids: If you are busy trying to figure out who's who and which episode they're from, Jonathon and Amanda are cobbled together OCs for the sake of originality (since we only met a handful of special kids on the show), but Scott Carey, his therapist, and Mr. Tinkles the cat are actually from the show :D

Reviews: I know the longer wait between chapters is rough, but I would really appreciate all the encouragement and good feels you guys can send my way. I am utterly struggling in real life right now – I think I'm fast approaching the time for a major change and that scares the crap outta me – so any of the good feels you can send my way would be amazing right now.

Up Next: What can I say about the next chapter…hmm, I'll keep it succinct: Andy does not have a good time in Cold Oak. Yes. Yes, that about sums it up.

I am not sure if the next chapter will be up in one week or two, but I have been successfully stockpiling chapters once more, which bodes well for future updates. I'll try to keep you guys in the loop on that as we go. For now, I really appreciate your patience and for sticking with me through all the delays and tough times.

Chapter 80: Season 2: Chapter 47

Chapter Notes

A/Ns: Short chapter this time, I'm afraid. Also, we are back on cliffhanger row for a bit, and while we remain in that most unpleasant of places I will resume weekly posts so as not to torture you all unduly.

Chapter Warnings: Andy does not have a good time in Cold Oak. I have no idea where this persistent need to hurt the poor boy came from, but it's apparently a thing. Um, sorry, kid.

Actual Chapter Warnings: We get a bit violent in this one, folks. There's a decent stretch of gore and quite a bit of blood, so please proceed with caution if you are squeamish. There is also brief mention (but absolutely no description) of animal cruelty. I probably should have warned about that last chapter, too, huh? Though, to be fair, that one was a direct quote from the show…

Anyway, in short, I'm a cruel, cruel author, so go forth prepared!

See the end of the chapter for more notes

-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-

The Road So Far (This Time Around)

Season 2: Chapter 47

-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-

Jonathon Bailey was twenty-three years old, had discovered he had powers almost a year ago, and had been dreaming of a yellow-eyed man for six of those eleven and half months. He'd killed his first animal two months into the yellow-eyed man's lessons, his first domestic pet not long after that, and any more he could get his hands on in the weeks since.

But this would be his first human kill.

"Heya there, kiddo."

Jonathon sat up with a gasp, chest heaving for air he didn't need. That's how these dreams always started. Like his body knew he shouldn't be there. Jonathon ignored his fight or flight instinct, viciously forcing it down and focusing instead on calming his raging heart and desperate lungs. Yes, the yellow-eyed man was certainly a threat worthy of his body's automatic response. Jonathon wasn't an idiot; the man definitely wanted something from him and until he found out what that was, he would remain on his guard. But for now, the yellow-eyed man was a mentor of sorts, and he'd promised to get Jonathon out of a worthless home existence that was wasting his potential and holding him back.

The yellow-eyed man crouched down beside him. Jonathon was sitting upright in the middle of a dirt road, which ran through what looked like a very old town. Nowhere he'd dreamt of before. Jonathon could see the older man from his side vision, but didn't turn towards him. Not yet. Not until he was back in control. Jonathon was all about control.

"Welcome to Cold Oak," the yellow-eyed man said with a toothy grin. Jonathon imagined that smile unsettled most people, but Jonathon wasn't most people.

"Why are we here?" the human asked once he'd gotten his breathing back to an acceptable rate and his voice came out close to a normal timber. He chanced a glance around at the old Frontier style town in the middle of a late-fall, early-winter forest. Certainly not southeastern Florida where Jonathon begrudgingly lived with his ailing grandmother and deadbeat dad who, he had hoped, would be his first human kill.

"When you wake up, you're gonna be here for real, kid."

That didn't answer his question, but the yellow-eyed man had a habit of that. He kept control of the conversation entirely in his court. It infuriated Jonathon to no end, but he did not let it show.

"And?" Jonathon ignored the questions he wanted to ask: how, why, and fucking where? They were irrelevant when talking with this figment in his mind. Or, whatever a person who showed up in your dreams but was likely real elsewhere was properly called. Jonathon didn't know or particularly care about vernacular.

"You won't be alone."

The human male straightened, finally turning to look at this mental mentor of his. So, this was it. This is what the yellow-eyed man had been training him up for. He'd said there would be challenges ahead, something he'd have to take down that was a lot bigger than his ex-girlfriend's family wiener dog.

"Will Sam Winchester be there?" he asked reflexively. It was the only name this man had given him, weeks ago, now. A battle was coming, and Sam Winchester was the one to get.

"Not yet, but don't worry, he will be soon enough."

Jonathon rolled onto his side and got his feet beneath him. He dusted the dirt from his khakis – not what he'd gone to bed wearing last night – and looked around the old ghost town. "Are there weapons here?"

"Wouldn't be much of a challenge if there was, tiger," Yellow Eyes answered with a wicked grin, and Jonathon let the implication roll off of him in waves. He was confident in his ability. He'd been working up to this. He could do it. He would do it.

"Anything else you want to tell me?"

The yellow-eyed man appraised his cold confidence for a long moment – a life time – before he started smiling again. "Only one of you gets out. But like I promised, you'll be rewarded. Anything you want, kiddo. If you're the one to survive, of course."

And then he was gone, and Jonathon was sitting up for real, lungs heaving for air they actually did need, in the middle of a road running through an abandoned mining town.

-o-o-o-

'Which one do I kill first?'

Jonathon weighed his choices carefully, observing each of this three potential victims in turn. The dark-haired male – Scott? – was clearly no threat. He looked ready to piss his own pants at the next stiff breeze. Jonathon could take care of him easy. The girl was more of a problem. Her jacket suggested an athlete's musculature and reflexes. Speed, if nothing else. Plus, she'd managed a meager form of protection in that iron skillet, clutched in a white-knuckled grip at her side as she shrieked and wailed away at the last kid. That one – Andy, was it? – didn't seem to be much of a threat either. Average size for a twenty-three year old man, with barely a muscle on him. Jonathon could take him one handed. He wouldn't be much to handle.

Of course, everything went out the window when the kid started talking about abilities.

Jonathon felt the first flickers of panic since he'd woken up. It had not occurred to him the others would also be able to do things. Careful to keep it off his face, the twenty-three year old sneered internally. How convenient for Yellow Eyes to leave out that detail. Still, it changed nothing in the long run. The outcome of this would still be the same and Jonathon was determined to come out on top.

Hearing he was among a potential mind-reader was of immediate concern, but the idiot of a girl was overly trusting. She confessed right away that she was too weak to read more than one person at a time. Which shifted her from top of his list to second, so long as she kept her focus on Andy and off of him. Which left his crosshairs open for the kid playing at leader and trying to take control of the situation. A person who could make people do anything he wanted with just his voice would have to go immediately, before he tried to use that power on Jonathon.

Especially since the kid knew about the yellow-eyed man. If he'd been getting training in his dreams as well, then he was the biggest threat, by far. And while he didn't seem to want anything to do with the violence Yellow Eyes demanded, he could easily be lying to them, keeping them off their guard so he could strike first.

Well, not Jonathon. He wasn't going to give this kid time to trick him. And if it wasn't a trick, well, then this would-be leader was a pushover. And Jonathon wasn't.

"I know he's a demon," the pushover was saying, much to the other kids' shock and disbelief, "and he's got plans for us."

Covertly, Jonathon patted down his pants, ignoring the mindless and useless chatter happening around him for the time being. He checked his front and back pockets, then more cautiously the cargo folds on his right side so as not to draw attention to himself. He might not have gone to sleep wearing them, but if they were his pants then his pocket knife should still be in there.

Yes, there it was!

Jonathon felt the reassuring weight of his SB440M tactical blade hanging in his pocket, the bulky shape of it a familiar comfort beneath his fingers. He and that knife had been through quite a lot together the last few months. Still exercising caution, Jonathon slipped his fingers into the slit of fabric and withdrew the knife, transferring it to his front pocket so it was out of sight but easier to reach quickly.

He would take the kid out before he could speak. Target the throat. Getting in close wouldn't be a problem, it was Jonathon's specialty. But the actual kill itself…

"If we work together, we can all get out of here. Alive."

Well, that was as apropos a cue as Jonathon was ever going to get. His fingers wrapping securely around his switchblade, he focused both his physical and his mental eyes on his victim. Then, with intense concentration and steeled nerves, Jonathon disappeared.

-o-o-o-

"I know he's a demon, and he's got plans for us."

Amanda Figuerro wanted to trust Andy. She did. There was something charming about his carefree demeanor, even in the middle of a nowhere ghost town, having woken up with no clue how or why they were there. The problem was, she was having a very difficult time coming to terms with all that herself, and it was hard to trust someone who took it so easily in stride.

Did he know something? Was he somehow a part of it? Was he just crazy?

That's why she'd worked so hard to hear his thoughts, something that had shocked her when she'd first woken up in the small town. Amanda assumed she was alone, because she'd heard nothing but silence. Even locked in her bedroom in the back of her house in a fairly suburban part of Berkley, she still heard everything. A passing pedestrian walking their dog, reminding themselves to replace the poop-bag roll when they got home. A car passing by, the radio loud enough she could hear it through the walls, but worse, the man singing along with it. Even in his head, he was terrible. Their backyard neighbor who was nervous for a date coming over that night, and spent more than three hours picking out an outfit. She was very concerned about the size of her boobs, or what she perceived as a lack-there-of.

She'd spent all of that time over thinking most of it. Given what Amanda had been stuck hearing from both of them for hours into the night, the date had gone just fine. Although the guy had, repeatedly, thought about how much better it would be if the chick had bigger boobs.

Amanda had wanted to take a drill to her skull that night. She'd probably have taken it to the dude's skull, if she could have managed to leave her room, let alone her house. Because that, all of that, had just been inside her home, locked away as much as she could be because she could no longer handle being out among others. It was so loud, and people were so terrible, and there was nothing that could block it out. Despite several different friends, family members, and even a shrink trying to convince her, worryingly, that she might be having some form of breakdown, Amanda knew she wasn't crazy. She just knew. But, in so many ways, it didn't matter, because she was still going crazy.

But here, waking up in an old ghost town she didn't recognize in a State she was pretty sure wasn't California, Amanda had almost stumbled straight onto the kid without hearing a thing first. And once she realized Andy was there, she could hear a kind of muffled chatter, like being underwater and hearing people talking above the surface. It wasn't until she'd really focused on him, harder than she'd ever focused on anything before, that could she hear his thoughts more clearly.

Now, almost an hour later, she was starting to get one hell of a headache from it, though. But, considering Amanda had no idea where she was and he had been the only other person around, it was a worthy sacrifice.

Amanda wanted to trust him, and there wasn't really anything in Andy's mind that told her she shouldn't, other than that he was crazy because he believed in monsters and demons and people with yellow eyes. But, then again, she could hear people's brains and they were both in a ghost town in, she was going to guess, Nebraska. So what was crazy, really, anyway?

"If we work together, we can all get out of here. Alive."

She really wanted to trust him. She did. Andy had a happy-go-lucky calmness about him that she could really, really use right now. They all could, she figured, given how terrified and uncertain Scott seemed as he stood beside her. Amanda had actually been a pretty trusting person before her twenty-third birthday, when she'd suddenly started hearing the thoughts of her friends and family and complete strangers. It had not taken long at all to learn that she was far too trusting and so very, very many people were not trustworthy.

But maybe this was a good time to try again. It wasn't like there was a great deal of other options available.

Andy turned his back on them, looking down the only road he and Amanda hadn't searched before running into Scott and Jonathon. And then something happened. If someone asked about it later, Amanda might not have even been able to explain it. It felt like she'd blinked and lost time. One second Jonathon was on the other side of Andy from her, and the next thing she knew…

Andy hit the ground hard, his body suddenly boneless as Jonathon blinked into existence right behind him, swinging his arm up and slamming a fist into Andy's temple. Amanda screamed, Scott scrambled backwards, and Jonathon was on Andy in another blink. He straddled the injured kid, opening his fist to reveal a switchblade, which he flipped open with a flick of his wrist and a metal click.

They were all going to fight each other to the death.

Amanda didn't know why she thought it, why she remembered Andy's words, so loudly in her head. The words that had rooted her, frozen, to the spot in terror she didn't understand and hadn't wanted to believe.

They were all going to have to kill each other to survive.

Amanda started shaking. Andy kicked his legs, pinned beneath the larger boy, and swung his arms but his movements were disoriented, his thoughts clouded with pain. Jonathon grabbed a fistful of Andy's hair, the kid crying out as his head was ripped back, throat exposed, and it was suddenly terribly, horribly obvious what was about to happen.

'Oh my god, oh my god, he's going to slit my throat!' Andy thought, at about the same time Amanda thought it too.

She slammed her eyes shut against the cry that was so much louder than any sound Andy made out loud. He was struggling for all that he was worth, she could hear them rolling on the ground – she could hear him in her head – and the sounds she couldn't block out with her hands over her ears or her eyelids slammed shut were so much worse.

'Stop, damnit, you don't have to do this! My powers don't work on you, you asshat!'

"Stop it!" Amanda suddenly found her voice, realizing in tandem with Andy just why Jonathon was doing this. Her eyes snapped back open in horror. "Stop, his powers don't work on us!"

But it was too late, and far too little. Jonathon didn't stop, didn't even act like her heard her, and she knew, just from Andy's earlier thoughts about them all potentially killing each other, that he probably wouldn't even if her words had made it through.

While Amanda had stood there trying to block them out and Scott was useless by her side, too scared to run, too scared to do anything, the two boys had clearly rolled in their struggle. But Jonathon still had Andy pinned, now sitting on his chest as the smaller man kicked out uselessly beneath him. His hands were wrapped around Andy's throat, open knife still in his fist. Andy was turning red, sputtering and struggling to speak through the punishing grip. He was gawping like a fish on land, and the sight was almost too much to bare.

Scott was frozen beside her, clutching at his head. Amanda didn't feel frozen. She felt way, way too aware of absolutely everything that was happening. That was about to happen. But she couldn't move.

Jonathon pulled one hand away to position the knife under Andy's chin, having to bat away the kid's hands as he tried to stop him, slicing open Andy's palms and the pads of his fingers and a good stretch of his wrist as he fought off his own death.

The skillet was heavy in Amanda's hand and her fingers tightened around it with sudden realization. She wasn't frozen. She wasn't, and someone had to do something to stop Jonathon. Amanda surged forward before she could think about it, raising the iron pan in two hands – the sure and firm grip of a batter – and swung.

-o-o-o-

'Oh my god, he's going to slit my throat!'

Andy struggled for all that he was worth as his hair was yanked back in a vicious grip, neck exposed and the intent of his attacker perfectly clear. He kicked and twisted, trying to get his legs under him, to buck this psycho the hell off him. The fight spared him precious seconds of not-bleeding-to-death-yet-again, as Jonathon lost his balance and his grip. Andy threw him off his back and scrambled onto his hands and knees. But the blow to his head hadn't been a joke, and he teetered to the side, hands shuffling in dirt and dried leaves.

Jonathon got to his knees far faster and launched himself at Andy again, taking the two of them back to the ground. The murderous lunatic managed to wrap his legs around Andy once more, pinning him to the ground and sitting, heavy and obnoxious, on Andy's chest.

"St-"

Hands curled around his throat with the kind of desperate speed that suggested a life or death struggle. Which was just plain ridiculous. Andy was the one in a life or death situation, here, not this crazy person! But even as Jonathon's fingers dug in hard enough that Andy could feel his neck bruising under the pressure and knew he'd have a crushed wind pipe if he didn't get out of this quickly, the Jedi realized what exactly was happening.

Jonathon thought his powers were a threat. He was keeping him from talking!

Andy struggled to speak through the grip, to tell him just how absurd and useless an idea that was, but nothing made it past the punishing hold. His neck hurt in a way he couldn't even describe, something hard but breakable inside his throat starting to creak beneath the pressure, soon to give, and he knew he'd be lucky if he walked away from this without permanent damage at this point. Andy scrabbled for Jonathon's hands, his fingers, his wrists, slapping and clawing at his forearms, internally reeling in pain as he caught himself on the knife still in the kid's hands, and yanked his now-bleeding arm away. But he couldn't stop trying. What would a nick to the wrist or a missing finger matter if he was dead? Andy swung his arm up to try and land a hit to the man towering above him, but Jonathon was built like a brick shithouse, and nothing was lessening the insane grip.

'It doesn't seem fair,' he remembered telling Dean, way back when in the safety of the Impala with that gun sitting in his lap and a distant future of bloodshed too unbelievable to imagine.

'No, it sure as hell doesn't, kid.'

Good god, he was going to die. Friggin' again.

'My powers don't even work on you, you asshat!' he screamed and raved and ranted internally at that unfairness, kicking his legs desperately. But the weight on his chest remained, and his vision started to dot black and white from oxygen deprivation. He heard Amanda screaming, but it was muffled and far away.

Amanda. She and Scott needed to run. This psycho would surely turn on them as soon as he was done murderizing Andy.

Then the chilling pressure of cold metal was back at his neck, just beneath his jawline. Jonathon still had the knife, and he'd released one hand from Andy's neck in order to finish him off. Andy grabbed at that hand, but a slash to his palm and another catching two of his fingers weakened his body's resolve to fight, and worse, any grip he might have had even as he forced that fight to keep going.

'Top of the neck,' Andy thought in response to that cold metal touch, really far too rational for everything else his body was screaming. 'That's where the larynx is.'

The paranoid son of a bitch really was going after his voice, and was gonna friggin' kill him to do it.

Burning pain ripped across his entire neck and Andy suddenly found himself with a whole new problem. Liquid, thick and hot, flooded his throat, clogging his airway, and he was choking on his own blood. The weight from his chest vanished in an instant and Andy scrambled to roll over, desperately thinking he had to make gravity a friend and not his death sentence. He clutched at his neck as blood spilled from beneath his hand in a terrifying tidal wave of dark, deep red. It splattered on the dusty ground beneath him and he choked and gasped and spat out gobs of it.

He could still breathe. Andy couldn't quite wrap his head around the fact that, despite the blood dropping out of him like Niagra friggin' Falls, and the thick, sticky clogging in his throat that tried to choke him, he was still breathing. Well, mostly. The panicky, shallow, hyperventilating way his lungs burned and his brain screamed in terror wasn't great, but his vision wasn't spotted anymore, and he was actually getting oxygen to his brain.

His airway must still be partially clear.

That, and the fact that he wasn't spurting blood six and a half feet away in a fountain of red the likes of which Quentin Tarantino would be creepily inspired by, meant Jonathon hadn't hit his carotid artery. Of course, that didn't mean the amount of blood spilling to the ground and running down his arm wouldn't still kill him.

God damn it, he was not dying like this again! It hadn't even been a whole twenty four hours since the last almost-bleed-to-death fiasco! He wanted to file a complaint with the manager!

"Andy!" He heard Amanda's cry and felt her over his shoulder, a hand on his back, another to the side of his face but he tried to pull away. "Oh- Oh my god…"

'Oh god, don't touch it,' he through frantically, terrified of the pain she'd inflict while trying to help. Not that it mattered; he was gonna be dead in about three minutes, if his math was correct. Which it probably wasn't. He was terrible at math. Not that that mattered, either.

"Move!"

That was Scott. Where was Jonathon? They needed to run. They should probably run. Andy was a goner, and he really didn't want them to be next.

The pressure of Amanda's hand on his back vanished, and Andy wanted to cry in both relief and absolute terror. He knew what he'd just said, what Amanda could probably hear through the panic and the pain. What they should absolutely be listening to and doing. But he also really, really didn't want to die alone.

And then a new hand was pulling his hand away from his neck and he tried to cry out – and that was a bad mother effing idea! – but nothing came out except gargles and globs and trickles of blood and pink-tinged bubbles, and oh god, he took it back, death was okay, now. Any time. Totally fine. Just let it be over.

Then a hand wrapped around his ruined throat, slick and slippery in the blood and split flesh.

"Sorry, I'm sorry, just hold on. This is going to hurt, I'm so sorry" Scott said frantically, leaning half over Andy as he clamped his hand down on the wound.

Andy tried to scream, the pain of foreign touch on a fresh and fatal injury so intense he just wished it would end. All of it, whatever that meant, whatever it took. It could just end now and that would be fine by him.

Then something so, so much worse happened. Fire erupted in his throat with a jolt through his body, traveling like an electric charge. Every muscle in his neck and shoulders seized, his whole upper body shook with a vibration so strong it was almost numbing, and the last thing Andy knew was the smell of his own flesh burning.

-o-o-o-

Amanda swung her skillet hard enough at Jonathon's head to wrench her good shoulder, but that wasn't what shocked or worried her. The guy straight up disappeared. In the span of a single blink, she'd been aiming for his head and then swinging clear through empty air. Jonathon was, just…gone.

Andy made a desperate, gargling cry beneath her, rolling over onto his hands and knees and Amanda's mind blanked at the sight of blood. So much blood. So…so much…

She stumbled away from him as a damn waterfall of red fell from his neck and hit the ground before he could begin to staunch the flow with his hand. Even that didn't do much to limit the outpouring of red.

So much blood…

Movement made her jump, and she immediately raised her makeshift bat, ready for a second swing. Jonathon was a dozen feet away, in the open alley beside the nearest building, staring at them. He had blood on his hands and shirt, and he regarded them with a look Amanda had never seen on another human's face.

And then he was gone. Another blink, another disappearance.

"Where'd he go?" Scott asked, voice trembling as he spun around, back almost flush to Amanda's. She understood why, it felt like safety in a situation that was anything but.

Andy made another pitiful, terrible, horrible noise and Amanda decided it didn't matter where Jonathon had gone. She dropped to her knees, skillet still clenched in her hand, her other settling uncertainly on Andy's back.

"Oh god…" There was so much blood. She didn't even know how to help. Their makeshift weapon hit the ground as she raised her second hand to try and…she didn't even know. Staunch the blood flow? There was no use! "Oh- oh my god…"

"Move," Scott suddenly said, the urgency in his voice making it the most steady she'd heard since meeting the nervous young man. He pushed her out of the way and she let him, shuffling a foot to the side. Scott leaned over Andy, keeping clear of any contact other than to pull the poor boy's hand away from his throat by his wrist

"I'm sorry," Scott muttered, and Amanda got a terrible feeling as he wrapped his hand around Andy's bleeding, slashed throat. She had to look away from the two hanging, jagged pieces of flesh folding beneath Scott's hand. "I'm so sorry."

Then Andy was screaming and writhing and shaking. He shook like he was having an attack – a seizure – and Amanda screamed again. She stumbled away from the horrific sight as a terrible smell filled the air. Scott was…oh god, Scott was electrocuting him.

Amanda slapped her hands to her ears to block out Andy's ruined, gurgled screams, ripped out through clenched teeth and a locked jaw, but she could hear so much more, his full anguish, straight into her skull.

"Stop, stop, you're killing him!"

Scott did stop, but not before Andy passed out, collapsing to the ground in a heap of blood, bonelessness, and seared flesh. Amanda stood to the side, shaking, hands trembling against the sides of her head. She stared in horror at the cauterized wound, no longer bleeding, but a hideous sight of mangled, blistered, melted red flesh.

"What…what did you…?"

Scott grabbed the skillet off the ground and backed away from Andy. He was shaking himself, enough so that the iron pan visibly trembled as well. He was panting, though not from exertion as much as sheer terror.

He'd never used his powers on a human before. And though he'd been trying to save Andy, his screams… and the smell of burning flesh…

Scott turned away, anxiety spiking to the point of physical pain in his chest. He might have killed him anyways. Might have let the electricity travel too far. Get too strong. Fry his insides like hamburger meat. Like Mr. Tinkers all over again.

Or maybe he'd just stopped his heart.

"I…I can't…" Scott couldn't breathe. His chest hurt and his heart pounded and he was pretty sure he was having a heart attack. "I can't be here."

"No, wait-" Amanda started to say, Scott's intention to run clear in every inch of his panicking body. But he stumbled away from her, turned and took off before she could stop him. Panicking herself, she glanced between Andy's unconscious body and Scott's retreating figure, taking the only weapon they had with him.

She never got to make that choice. A shift of air from behind brushed against her hair and clothing. A tremor of fear ran through her. Strong arms wrapped around her from behind before she could turn around. Before she could scream, in the blink of an eye, Amanda was gone.

The road was as empty as the town but for Andy Gallagher's bloody, unmoving body.

Chapter End Notes

A/Ns: …okay, but I didn't kill him? [insert weak smile here]

Really, this is all your guys' fault. I was gonna let Andy walk away from Cold Oak relatively unharmed, just traumatized enough to go seek out some corner of the world where he could smoke a bong till the end of the world (I swear to Chuck, that was the original plan) but nooo, you all wanted him to stay in the story! And Draconis Domini was like, just slit his throat and he can stay, problem solved! And I was like…huh. I can do that.

I am, after all, a woman of the people. [insert weak ass, slimy politician smile here]

(Draconis, I promise, another A/N is coming further down the line where I don't throw you under the bus for this idea :D)

On a Slightly More Serious Note: There was a lot of jumping back and forth in both POV and timing this chapter, which as you know is not quite my usual style. Again, please let me know if was confusing or didn't really work and I'll address it for future readers.

Up Next: The follow-up should be posted in a week. I may bounce back and forth between one and two week updates for a while going forward, but as long as I'm leaving you with nasty cliffhangers, I won't make you wait more than a week for the next chapter.

Chapter 81: Season 2: Chapter 48

Chapter Notes

A/Ns: Boy, did I struggle getting this one up today, guys. Partly because I was very busy this week with RL which is being quite difficult lately and then Halloween prep for a party last night. But also partly because I was very listless today and it took me the entire day to edit this. Bah Humbug.

Posting Delay: I am off to paint a mural in my sister's nursery next weekend (I'm going to be auntie to another niece!!! (for anyone confused on turnaround times, it's two different sisters (okay, it's a sister and a best friend but, really, no difference there))) which I am very excited about. But it means I'll be very busy traveling and getting covered in paint, so they'll be a two week delay between this chapter and the next. Luckily, this is another very long chapter! And it doesn't even really have a cliffhanger for once! Well...mostly.

Chapter Warnings: Andy continues to have not good times! Because I'm apparently a monster. Dean and Sam are on their way, though. Not that it's going to end up helping, it turns out, because I am a monster.

Actual Chapter Warnings: Nothing as descriptive as last chapter, but there's a couple paragraphs involving some blood, of the spitting-up-oh-gross-my-throat-just-got-slashed-and-also-fried-and-it-turns-out-that's-quite-nasty variety.

See the end of the chapter for more notes

-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-

The Road So Far (This Time Around)

Season 2: Chapter 48

-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-

When Andy woke up he was alone, the sun was lower in the sky, it was freezing and absolutely none of that meant anything to him because he hurt. God, the pain in his neck was unbearable. Andy immediately tried to climb off the ground he was lying face down on. The movement alone had him doubling over as he got to his knees, forehead pressed to the dirt in a silent scream. Tears leaked from his eyes and he couldn't touch his neck – wanted to so badly, wanted to grab that stinging, stabbing, burning pain from chest to cheeks, rip it out of his skin and throw it far, far away – but he couldn't.

Oh god, it hurt. Death would have been better than this. He would have been fine with dying if it meant not waking up to this.

Andy's stomach heaved and he was damn lucky he hadn't eaten anything in more than a day and a half, because just the bile alone coming up through the damage almost knocked him back out. His vision whited as he hacked and spat onto the dirt. Globs of blood, both congealed and fresh, spattered the dirt like a Halloween rendition of the world's worst water balloon fight. Andy was pretty sure chunks of flesh came up too, given the gooey, bloody, disgusting mess beneath him and the additional searing, raw agony inside his throat.

Oh god, he was going to throw up again.

It was the longest five and a half minutes of Andy Gallagher's life. On his hands and knees, fingers clawing at the dirt, tears streaming down his face as he fought each panic attack that came with every bout of nausea, Andy tried to focus solely on breathing. But even that hurt. Everything hurt. His hands looked like they'd lost a fight with an overly aggressive paper shredder, his head was pounding, and his heart didn't feel right. It pounded away in his chest, way too fast and painfully hard beneath too-tight muscles. It kept skipping erratically, setting a harsh, unpredictable beat beneath his ribs.

Andy gave it a minute, and then another dozen, before he tried just a simple, single swallow. His fingers shook against the hard ground in anticipation of the pain, and the pain did not disappoint. His throat convulsed, neck straining as he unconsciously stretched his head forward to physical get away from the clamping sensation of his neck internally strangling itself. His eyes slammed shut, face and body clenching up at the fresh wave of pain, searing and unbearable. Oh god. Andy dug his fingers into the ground, dirt caking under his fingernails, and tried not to scream. Not that anything would come out if he did.

It took time – what felt like hours but was surely only minutes – for the pain to subside from an eleven back to a meagre nine, and Andy made a mental note to just not swallow. Or breathe Or move at all. How hard could that be?

Slowly, and with his eyes only, not daring to turn his head, Andy chanced a glance around him. He was still in Cold Oak, but he was alone. It was growing dark around him, the sun touching the tips of the trees that surrounded the mining town. The ground beneath his palms and lodged beneath his fingernails was hard and frigid. Far colder than when he'd woken up here the first time. Andy shivered in his t-shirt, wishing once again for the jacket he'd left behind in Rivergrove, blood stains and all.

He didn't see Amanda or Scott anywhere. Or Jonathon, for that matter, though he was significantly more relieved for that.

Even slower, and with still trembling limbs, Andy climbed to his feet. He kept his head stuck out in front of him like a turtle, moving his neck as little as possible as he got legs that felt like jelly beneath him. Gingerly, very gingerly, he reached shaking fingers up to prod around the least painful sections of skin on his lower neck. The damage was incredibly localized, but the pain wasn't. Just that light pressure on clear skin made him flinch, and he quickly pulled away. His fingers came back sticky with partially dried blood, and he looked – slowly – at the ground he'd been lying on.

There was a puddle of red already turning into an ugly brown, drying across the ground in a disturbingly large spread. Although it was speckled with the fresh blood he'd just spent the last however-hellishly-long coughing up, the majority of it didn't look fresh. Whatever Scott had done to him clearly stopped the bleeding, but given the pain he was in, it had also damn near killed him.

Still might, he figured.

Maybe that had been Scott's intention. Maybe he'd been trying to kill Andy. The psychic started to shake as he looked around again. He was still alone. If that was true, if Scott was just as bad as Jonathon, then Amanda was in danger, if she wasn't dead already. But Andy didn't know that for sure and, despite the possibility and overwhelming pain he was in, he didn't want to believe it. Scott hadn't seemed the type. Unlike Jonathon.

Yeah. In hindsight, turning his back on that one had been a serious misjudgment.

Andy stared at the two roads running through the abandoned town. There were four directions to choose from, and just the energy it would take to make that decision sounded exhausting. He needed to try and find Amanda and Scott. Try to learn what had happened after Jonathon attacked him. But the task seemed monumental. Insurmountable. It would be dark soon, he was unarmed and utterly unprepared to defend himself should Jonathon (or Scott (no, not Scott, he'd been trying to help, Andy was sure of it)) still be around. In fact, death pretty much awaited him in every shadowy doorway and darkened window. It really wouldn't take much at this point. The next stiff breeze had as good a chance of offing him as anything else, Andy figured.

Even now, alone in the cold and the dimming light, he was pretty damn close to passing out just from standing. There was no relief from the pain, which pulsed away at a steady, unbelievable nine. No give and take, surge or relief, and Andy really didn't know how much longer he'd be able to stay conscious. Keeping his feet under him and body upright was already possibly the hardest thing he'd ever done. Walking sounded so much worse. Searching was out of the question. Even breathing was a struggle, forcing air through the damage that burned and seared and cried for an end with every inhale. He was pretty sure his trachea was partially collapsed, if not sliced up and then somehow sealed shut in the most painful procedure ever. Andy shook just remembering the pain.

So now he was faced with a choice he never, ever wanted to make. A choice that wasn't even a choice, but still Andy faltered to make it. Dean had told him to survive. Whatever it took. And right now, he wasn't even sure he could make it out on his own. Half bled out, shaking like a leaf and about an inch and a half from being back on his ass, Andy knew he wouldn't be any good to Amanda or Scott even if he did find them.

That still didn't make leaving them behind any easier.

The Jedi stared at the town around him, water filling his eyes for an entirely different reason. Survivor's guilt was already kicking in, even though he certainly hadn't survived yet and didn't know the state of anyone else. Swallowing past the lump in his throat almost sent him to his knees. That was probably the only reason Andy managed to pick a direction at random and stagger down the road as fast as he could. He would head for the forest and his original plan to hike out of this Hell.

-o-o-o-

He found the skillet lying in the middle of the road two hundred feet from where he'd first woken up. There was no evidence of a struggle, no trail to follow or clues as to how it got there. Just an iron pan lying, abandoned, in the middle of an equally forgotten ghost town.

His fingers and resolve shook as Andy picked the weapon up from the ground, but he resumed his path for the trees.

-o-o-o-

There was something in the forest with him.

Andy was sure of it. He'd left the town behind, surrounded on all sides by endless trees that only grew more ominous with each inch of light lost. His breath puffed out in clouds of misty white as dusk fell around him, and he'd spent the last fifteen minutes of his walk rubbing at his bare, goose-pimpled arms. At least he was still cold. That was good. Awful. But good. Andy knew it was when he stopped feeling the cold that the real danger of hypothermia set in.

The ground was hilly, more than he'd hoped when he'd first set out of the relatively flat mining town. In the limited light, he struggled over the uneven terrain, rocks and roots catching at his feet from under a thick carpet of dead leaves. He'd fallen once, and that was just about the worst experience of his entire life (not really, but he wasn't in a mood to reflect on the actual worst experience of his life). The landing had jarred his entire body and snapped his chin right into his neck.

Andy had curled up into a pathetic little ball and cried. Cried and cried and cried on the hard ground and wet leaves, and it hadn't even made him feel better. Mucus gathered thick in his raw, swollen throat, causing him to choke and hack up more blood and flesh. He wasn't even ashamed of his breakdown at this point. He was so far past that. This sucked, and as far as he was concerned, could end any damn time now.

Only, no, it really couldn't, because a branch snapped behind him and to the left, at least a dozen feet away. But that was about six thousand feet too close, and Andy was back on his jelly legs in a heartbeat, that heart beating its new, terrified, erratic rhythm as he surveyed the trees. It seemed that survival instinct had once more won out against his morose acceptance of the inevitable end. Andy couldn't decide if he was glad or annoyed. Mostly he was just exhausted.

Still eyeing the empty woods around him, knowing something was there even if he couldn't see it, Andy pulled out his phone and checked service for the third time. Still nothing. He slipped the phone back into his pocket, concerned about his slowly draining battery. Concerned about a lot of things, really.

It took a lot, most of what he had left, to get his feet moving again. To turn his back on whatever it was that was following him, and hope it wasn't hungry. At this point, though, he was focusing all his good will and happy thoughts on it just being normal. Like a raccoon. Or rabid, vicious wolf.

The next branch to snap a handful of minutes later was accompanied by the giggle of a small child and Andy froze.

Oh god. Oh god oh godohgod.

That was not a rabid wolf. Damnit, why couldn't it have just been a feral, bloodthirsty, dangerous animal?

'Because you're a Winchester,' Dean's voice rang out in his head, a memory of something he'd told Sam once when the younger brother had gotten a little tipsy and pessimistic one night in a motel in the middle of a nowhere hunt. He'd rambled on about the end of the world until Dean had gotten fed up, more hurt than angry, but with Dean it wasn't easy to tell. 'Our lives suck, it ain't fair, but we deal with it. Cuz we're Winchesters.'

The words had been for Sam, but Andy couldn't help but resonate with them. He wasn't a Winchester, but his life had sucked, it sure as hell hadn't felt fair, and the brothers had been there for him through it. They'd become oddly like family over the last so many months. More family than Andy had ever really had before. His adopted father was a decent man, but Andy kinda had a feeling any real bond they might have had died in that house fire along with the man's wife. He had raised Andy, but he hadn't been a father so much as a guardian. And he wasn't even going to talk about the evil twin brother thing.

While Andy sure as hell hadn't been happy chasing monsters and running from demons after losing the only person who'd ever truly cared for him, he'd still gotten something he'd never had before. He'd been a part of something, at least. He'd mattered. At least, Sam and Dean had made him feel like he did.

'They'll never know what happened,' Andy thought, fear freezing his legs and something a lot closer to sorrow tightening in his chest. 'They're coming, Dean said they would come, but even if they do they'll never find me. I'll be dead and rotting in some god forsaken forest!'

The anger in that, knowing the look that would cross Sam's face when they found nothing but an empty town, the fury that would overtake Dean until he started destroying whatever was closest until Sam got through to him, gave Andy a new resolve. A determination to live. To spare his brothers – more than Weber could have ever been – that pain. And if he didn't live, he'd sure as hell go down fighting like they would.

The Winchester's resident Jedi spun around, one hand fisted around the skillet, raising it defensively, the other reaching up to hover protectively over his neck. He couldn't help it, the thought of taking any more damage there terrified him more than death itself, he was pretty sure. But he would face whatever the hell was stalking him like a true Winchester. Stalking him and giggling. Creepy ass mother fucker.

There was nothing there when he turned. Andy wasn't really surprised, though he'd certainly worked himself into a tense, shaking mess. One thing he'd learned from fighting the supernatural was that even monsters wanted to make an entrance. So he kept his weapon raised, eyes surveying the darkening woods around him, and waited.

A light breeze, just the errant movement of air, across his back raised the hairs on his neck and Andy tensed. Slowly – god, so slowly – he turned again.

It was a little girl. A little girl with dirty blonde hair, an askew bow tying her tangled bangs back, and rags of clothing that might have once passed for a dress. A little Frontier girl standing two feet in front of him, staring up at him with innocent, dark eyes.

Oh, great.

Andy swallowed. A creepy…ghost, maybe? Andy hoped it was a ghost. Ghosts were nothing to scoff at, but at least some of them weren't homicidal. And iron worked against them. Iron was what he had. All he had. Andy's grip on the skillet tightened.

Her eyes suddenly glossed over with a metallic sheen, the surrounding skin darkened to a terrifying black, like miniature black holes sucking her eyes into her skull, and her fingers lengthened into savage claws.

Oh god, definitely not a ghost!

The thing hissed and Andy scrambled backwards as she swiped at him. Her claws sliced into the iron skillet as he blocked her attack with it, creating a burst of sparks and the creature's entire hand exploded into smoke. She screamed – a high pitch, terrible, deafening noise that Andy would have sooner associated with a harpy than a… whatever she was – and flew backwards. The little girl didn't even bother with feet, just shot backwards, edges of her body blurring and fading into wisps of smoke.

A demon, Andy thought. Reactive to iron, body made of dark grey, blackish smoke. Wanted bloody murder and screamed for it. Yup. Definitely a demon. Probably a demon. Okay, Andy's guess was just about as good as a rock's at this point, but he didn't see anyone else around to offer suggestions. He was going with demon.

His hand shook around the skillet as he stared at the shifting body of a mostly corporeal and absolutely terrifying little girl. The smoke flowing from her wrist like a fog machine solidified into a hand, snapping into place in the same beat as the dread formed in Andy's stomach.

She launched another attack with a horrific screech, feigning right. Andy met that claw with the skillet, only to realize the trap too late. She latched onto his wrist with her other hand and slashed across his forearm. The hunter cried out, muscles in his arm spasming as flesh tore open beneath the onslaught. His tightly fisted hand, tendons straining under the weight of the heavy pan, flexed all on their own. The skillet dropped to the forest floor.

Andy tried to stagger back, knowing a second attack was coming and he was wide open for it, utterly unprotected. His t-shirt ripped beneath her claws as she made for a second swipe, but he managed to stumble away with nothing more than raised, red scratches across his chest and no broken skin. Thank god; he'd had enough of being clawed up and bleeding out to last a life time.

She jerked towards him again, clawing wildly back and forth as he dodged each swing the best he could. Whatever she was, she was fast. Fast enough to nick him more than once. Fast enough for Andy to realize, pretty quickly, that she was playing with her food. She kept him away from the only weapon that could harm her, abandoned and useless among the leaves. All Andy could do was keep his hand over his damaged throat to protect the one place he knew he couldn't take a hit. But he couldn't keep this up forever, and she knew it.

His left heel caught on a rock and he very nearly fell, staggering to keep on his feet. There was no way he could keep this up. Eventually he'd trip, or misjudge the distance, or she'd get tired of toying with him and just charge.

It was the right foot this time, tripping over an exposed root, that almost sent him down on his ass. This time, though, the little girl caught up with him. Andy cried out as he gained four new, freshly bleeding wounds across his thigh. He knew from experience now that they weren't serious, but they hurt. Everything hurt! He was clawed up and bleeding from numerous cuts and gashes. He was so damn done with bleeding out! He couldn't talk, he had nothing to defend himself with, he was useless, and he was going to die in some Podunk backwoods where no one would ever find him or know what happened.

The stupid little girl just grinned, holding her hands up like she was showing off how he would die. And he knew he was going to die. Worst twenty-four hour second chance to live, ever. The creature, whatever she was, launched herself at him one last time, and Andy, royally pissed off and utterly done, threw the hand covering his throat out in front of him like he could halt her with a friggin' traffic signal.

'Stop!'

He screamed it inside his head with everything he had left, loud enough that an instantaneous headache split his skull and Andy ended up clutching at his temples. The pressure there was unbelievable and the psychic staggered, trying to keep to his feet under the onslaught. Blood dripped down his nose. He could taste it on his lips. Had the little girl got him in the head or something? This was…god, this was worse. Way worse. How could this possibly be worse? He took it back, let him bleed out!

But as the pain started to subside enough that he could at least see straight, a second attack never came. He lowered his hands cautiously, expecting to find them once more spattered with blood. But they were clean. Well, they were filthy, running around in an abandoned down, napping in the dirt, sprawling on leaves, spitting up blood and covered in a dozen or more defensive wounds, but they weren't coated in the fresh, sticky red he'd expected.

Andy's eyes flicked hesitantly to the little girl, terrified of what he'd find. Another attack as soon as he made eye contact, or maybe even worse. But she was still in the same spot, the edges of her form wispy and her feet completely dissolved into dark grey, coiling smoke. The edges of her body spasmed as she stood there, more of her appearance lost to smoke before it would convalesce back into a little school girl.

It seemed to be a cycle, like a record skipping. But she…she was just standing there. Er, floating there. Watching him with weirdly expectant eyes. Like she was waiting for something.

Andy took a step back, and then another. The girl – was it a demon? The smoke was kind of demon-esque – didn't move. Just watched him with glinting, dangerous eyes set in a blank face.

The Jedi hunter blinked. Then blinked again.

Had…had she stopped because he'd told her to? Or was this just a trick? Pointless trick, really…. She'd had him. He'd been good as dead, and now she was just…floating.

'Can you…hear me?' he thought very cautiously, not really sure what he wanted the answer to be.

The little girl blinked metallic eyes but didn't move, and Andy thought…holy shit.

Holy. Mother of Effing. Shit.

He was shaking again, but shaking was great. Shaking meant he wasn't dead. Wasn't bleeding out in the frenzied attack and spray of blood and pain that he'd fully expected to be his end. Andy raised a trembling arm and wiped his bleeding noise with the back of his hand, still staring disbelievingly at the demon.

Holy shit.

Andy took another unsteady step backwards, but the demon (probably a demon…) didn't move. Growing more daring, the hunter tried for a step to the left. Then another. It wasn't until he tried one forward (diagonal, actually. No way in Hell was he getting closer to the thing that had definitely almost killed him) did the demon shift. Her form broke, giving way to smoke which shifted and shuddered and swirled, reforming into a little girl back in front of him. She bared her teeth, but still didn't advance. Didn't raise those claws or attack him. Just… blocked his way.

'Let me pass,' he thought, swallowing roughly through fear and pain. He remembered what Weber had been capable of. What he'd made Tracy do without uttering a word. What he'd promised to teach Andy. Well, his goatee-less evil twin could suck it. It looked like he'd figured it out all on his own. And all it had taken was almost dying. Twice. Twice and a half (the throat thing totally counted.)

The little girl bared her teeth again, smoky edges vibrating with displeasure. Andy could tell she didn't like that order one bit.

'Let me pass,' he repeated, trying to keep his thoughts firm. He was in charge. He was in charge.

She hissed, head jerking forward in displeasure and Andy scrambled back a half dozen feet before he could stop himself.

Yeah. Right. He was in charge. And also the Queen of England.

Hands shaking, Andy gathered every last inch of false confidence he'd ever possessed, and straightened up, shoulders back and chest out.

'Let me pass!'

"Hungry!" the thing suddenly hissed, breaking apart in a mini smoke explosion had Andy damn near wet his pants at the realization that it could talk. Jesus. Her voice was like nails on a chalkboard, and Andy shuddered. "Want blood!"

'Yeah, well, you're not getting mine,' he bit back darkly, not even sure the demon could really hear it. Or understand. But the way she sort of imploded back into the shape of a little girl, whose glittering eyes shifted over Andy's shoulder to the woods behind him and the town beyond that, made Andy think she had heard him just fine.

She was setting her sights on the food she could have.

'No.' Andy moved an inch to the right, into the demon's eyeline, blocking her view from whatever she was contemplating. And given the glint in those eyes, Andy really, really didn't want to know. Amanda and Scott could still be back there. Or in the woods. He couldn't let this thing go after them.

"Hungry!"

'No!' Andy yelled again, his head exploding with pain at the furious cry. The demon's smoke form burst back out, edges vibrating in contained anger, but she didn't move. Andy's shoulders sagged under the tension in his neck and head, the pain partially whiting out his vision, but he pushed through it. With a hand to his forehead, pressing back against the explosion contained behind his skull, he straightened up and glared at the creature for all he was worth. 'They're just kids!'

But the demon didn't care, and Andy could tell he was losing his tentative control over her. Okay…Okay maybe a compromise. She clearly needed…uh…blood (Andy was not thinking about that. He wasn't, he really, really wasn't). Maybe there was another solution. Morally speaking, not a great one, but Andy was running a little low on options and a lot low on patience, energy, and fucks.

'Okay,' he thought, eyeing the demon warily. 'Okay, you can kill, but only Jonathon. Only the one who tried to hurt the others. You only get him.'

Andy was offering up another human being on a silver platter. Jonathon. His life for Andy's. For Amanda's and Scott's. Maybe, if they were still alive, if Jonathon hadn't gotten them yet or if they'd managed to escape, the decision might even save their lives.

…Yeah. He was okay with that. Sort of. Mostly.

'You let the others leave,' he added, realizing that orders to a demon probably had to be pretty damn specific. Loopholes had probably been invented in Hell.

The demon bared her teeth again, wispy edges agitated. She didn't particularly sound or look like she was pleased with this arrangement. But after a minute (a damn tense eternity), the smoke convalesced fully back into the little girl, solid as any living, breathing kid. Then she smiled. The freakiest, creepy smile Andy had ever seen in all his life and would surely have nightmares about for years to come.

For a terrifying moment, Andy wondered if he'd just screwed himself. His hands weren't exactly clean. He'd hurt people; he'd killed people.

But the thing just giggled – giggled, the sound echoing in the empty trees, and yup, Andy was definitely going to have nightmares – and smoked away, zigzagging back towards town in an eager stream of grey and black.

Andy turned to watch it, not quite ready to believe that was the end of it. That he was safe. For now, at least. The last of the adrenaline that had definitely, absolutely just saved his life, was draining, and fast. Shivers wracked his frame and, once they started, he couldn't make them stop. Andy wrapped his arms around himself in a pathetic hug – it did little – and gave it another minute – gave himself another minute – before he started moving again. He picked up the skillet, having to waste precious seconds and even more precious energy searching the leaves for it. It felt even heavier in his hands, and Andy wondered how long he'd be able to carry it.

The hunter moved at as fast a pace as he could manage, limping on his newly bleeding thigh, and watching the ground with the kind of concentration that bordered on obsessive. He was pretty sure if he went down again he wouldn't be getting back up.

He just had to make it out. Out into the world of cell service, shotguns, demon-warded Impalas, and Sam and Dean.

-o-o-o-

The Winchesters were gunning down a barely paved single lane road Dean remembered well. If you'd asked the man from 2016, he never, in a million years, would have ever thought he'd be flying down this road again at borderline dangerous speeds beneath quickly darkening skies in hopes of rescuing a missing brother from Cold Oak a second time.

With his luck, he'd be doing it a third time when they went after Sam.

"Anything?" he asked, glancing sideways as his brother lowered the phone from his ear, shaking a mop of brown hair.

"Still not going through," Sam answered, voice tinged with frustration and worry. They'd hoped as they got closer and closer to the abandoned mining town and still had service themselves that they might reach Andy. They weren't talking about the possibility that his phone was dead, possibly along with its owner.

A ringtone bursting out in the dead silence of a tense car caused both Winchester's to jump. The younger practically fumbled the phone in his hand in an attempt to answer it, telling himself it was just going to be Bobby, not to get his hopes up, but as he turned the phone over it was Andy's name and goofball face flashing up at him. The kid had stolen Sam's phone a month ago, when the younger Winchester had been on a food run, and taken about three dozen selfies. Half of them had been with a trying-to-act-annoyed-but-actually-more-annoyed-that-he'd-never-thought-to-do-this-himself Dean in the background. As punishment, Sam made one of those pictures his contact photo for the idiot.

"Andy!" Sam yelled as he hit the green call button, immediately switching the phone to speaker so his brother wouldn't crash the Impala trying to listen in.

The line crackled with static. It was very obvious the connection was shoddy. Wherever Andy was, it was right on the edge of a tower, and Sam immediately worried they might lose him again. But there was something else down the line. They could hear the background noises of a person moving – walking through undergrowth – and heavy, labored breathing.

A long, utterly irritated noise – a frustrated huff – broke the minimal sounds coming from the other end of the line, and Sam and Dean shared a worried look. The frustration in that breath of air was worrying but, worse, it was damn near heartbreaking for the Winchesters, who could tell something was very wrong.

"Andy?" Dean tried, clenching his hands around Baby's wheel and trying not to imagine one of a thousand terrible, horrible scenarios for why their friend wasn't – couldn't – answer them. "Andy, man, you there?"

They got a series of noises, almost grunts, that were desperate and pained, like someone struggling to speak, and Dean's stomach dropped straight through the seat to be left sitting on the road miles behind them. But then a new noise – an exclamation of air alone that could only be described as a non-syllabic eureka – came down the line, followed by shuffling, more huffing, and then the sound of a tree branch snapping, right next to the phone if the volume of it was anything to go by.

"Andy?" Sam tried again, equally worried as his brother about what condition their friend was in that left them with a mostly on-sided phone call. At least the latest noises, a shift from frustrated pain to invested pain (not much of an improvement, but Winchesters took what they could get), steered them away from worrying that Andy might not be alone on the other end. That this was a ransom call instead of a rescue. Or a butt dial during a life or death struggle. "We can't really hear you. Are you hurt? Where are you?"

A series of taps – short and flat – started coming through the phone. Dean took his eyes off the road to stare at the device. It sounded like…like Andy was tapping something against the phone. Sam blinked down at it, equally confused.

"Andy, man, talk to us. You still there?" Dean voice cracked with a whole new level of concern as he glanced at Sam.

But the younger Winchester was staring at the phone, brow furling as the taps kept right on coming. Suddenly, the younger hunter was a flurry of movement, reaching into the backseat for his backpack and digging through it as he talked into the phone, "I got it, Andy, we hear you! Hang on, let me grab something to write on!"

"Sam?" Dean asked, bouncing his attention between the road, his brother, and their injured friend coming through the phone. That attention was no nowhere near equally (or safely) split. "What's going on?"

"Morse code!" Sam exclaimed fervently as he landed back in his seat, a worn notebook and pen in hand. He tore the cap off with his teeth, spitting it out to be found at a much less important date. "He's tapping Morse code. He's trying to talk."

Dean frowned, but the minute the taps started up again, he realized Sam was right. "Son of a bitch. Andy, keep going. Where are you?"

The taps stopped, then started up again, and Sam wrote out each letter. Thank god both kids were total nerds, Dean thought.

"Cold Oak," was the first thing out of Sam's mouth as he got the word almost completed on the open page.

"Okay, man, we're already on our way. Ten minutes out, Andy. We're coming for you." Dean leaned over to speak closer to the phone, voice almost at a shout, which was completely unnecessary. Andy could clearly hear them, he just couldn't talk back. The amused, if not still frustrated huff they got in return was evident of that. Dean lowered his voice, but remained leaning into the passenger seat, all but talking into Sam's hand with eyes still (mostly) on the road. "You keep walking, we'll find you. Are you hurt? Why can't you talk? Are you safe? Or being followed?"

"One question at a time, Dean," Sam admonished from the passenger seat, knowing that they'd only get confused. "Andy, are you hurt?"

But the kid was already tapping back, and as Sam recorded the responses and read them aloud, 'K', 'Yes', 'Throat', 'Safe', and a long pause, then 'ish'. Dean couldn't help but laugh. Andy was still Andy, and the relief alone flooded Dean like friggin' morphine. Or really good pie.

"Okay. Okay, buddy, hang tight, keep walking, we'll be there in no time."

The tapping started up again, this time faster and a little more frantic.

"Hang on, hang on," Sam muttered, trying to keep up with the taps and translate multiple words into a half-stringed sentence filled with short hand. "Okay, wait, Dean, he's not in the town. He's in the woods."

The Impala came to a stop with screeching breaks and a painful lurch to the passengers within. Sam didn't say anything, but he did have to catch himself on the dash to keep from meeting the windshield up close and personal.

"Shit, does he know where he is?"

Another huff of air through the phone was easily interpreted as, 'He right here and can hear you, you know.' Dean ignored it as the tapping started up once more and he watched Sam's hand intently on the open page of the notebook.

The long answer was something about southwest out of Cold Oak and an approximation of how far he'd walked. The short answer was Dean dug out his phone, pulled up the network website on a data stream so slow he almost chucked the phone through the windshield multiple times, and activated the GPS on Andy's phone, complete with a map of his location. They'd probably ring up a small fortune in data charges, but Dean didn't give a shit about that right now and it wasn't like they planned to pay them anyway.

"Okay, Andy, you're about a half mile from the road we're on," Sam translated Dean's bark of 'go left' into something the clearly exhausted and hurting kid could actually use. It was the younger Winchester's turn to lean into his brother, reading off his phone. "Head to your left, as much of a ninety degree turn as you can, and just keep walking. Even if you don't manage a straight line, you'll hit the road."

A long tap, a short tap, and a long tap followed.

"K," Sam translated aloud, not that Dean needed him to for that one.

The older Winchester slid the car back into drive and handed his phone to Sam, GPS location of the Andy's cell still pulled up. They would track it as they drove and meet him wherever he came out. Sam kept a running dialogue to the silent kid on the other end of the phone, Andy only stopping his trek through the woods when responding was imperative.

Six minutes later, Andy tapped that his battery was about to die. A minute and forty five seconds later the call dropped. Sam and Dean sat in a tense, rigid silence for the remainder of the drive, Sam's eyes locked on the GPS location of Andy's phone, blinking steadily on Dean's cell and moving ever so slightly every couple of refreshes. Dean kept glancing over, if only to confirm the little red dot was still there. Eventually, the Winchesters came to a point in the road closest to that marker, and Dean slid the Impala into idle.

It was the longest four minutes Dean had sat through in a long, long time. Then Andy was stumbling out of the woods to their left, onto the road a hundred feet ahead of them, right into the beam of Baby's headlights.

"Andy!"

Both Winchesters were out of the car, running to him before he could even turn their way. He was carrying something heavy in his left hand, dangling from fingers barely able to grip its weight. It was an old frying pan – an iron skillet – and it hit the ground with a heavy, flat clang as Andy spotted them. The kid was a wreck. His clothes were torn and dirty, his skin equally so. Multiple cuts and scratches marred his bare arms and face, and his neck-

"Oh god," Sam whispered as they got close enough to really see the full extent of the damage. There was something wrong with Andy's neck. Really, really, terribly wrong. Dried blood covered most of his throat, the neckline of his t-shirt completely soaked through with it, and beneath the blood, the skin was…it…was…melted.

Andy's legs gave out beneath him as soon as they reached him, most likely out of relief, and the Winchester's caught him, lowering him to his knees. His teeth were chattering, arms covered in goosebumps, and shit, he was in nothing more than a goddamn t-shirt.

"Jesus, kid," Dean breathed out, eyes locked on his neck even as he shucked off his jacket and his flannel, wrapping the kid in them. It was fucking November in South Dakota, for Christ's sake. Sam helped Andy get his arms through, and the shivering Jedi hugged the newfound warmth tightly to himself. He opened his mouth to respond, lips moving wordlessly, nothing but puffs of air coming out, before he frowned, the frustration on his face quickly morphing into so much more. Desperation and fear and pain and hurting.

Sam grabbed him by the shoulders, large hands curling over shaking, drooping shoulders like a gentle giant, trying to anchor him. They'd both been there. That realization that you'd survived. That the ordeal was over, but you shouldn't have made it. Never thought you would. And now you had to deal with everything you'd shoved to the side just to get through. It all came flooding back, and that could be just as terrifying, just as overwhelming and gut wrenching and heartbreaking as the ordeal itself.

"It's okay, Andy. It's okay. You're safe, and it's going to be okay. Just breathe." Sam kept the contact to just his hands on Andy's shoulders, not wanting to risk more out of concern for any post-traumatic reactions or injuries they didn't know about. And he definitely wanted to steer clear of that neck wound. God, he could see cartilage, matte and glaringly white through patches of abused, bright red, glossy skin.

Something had melted Andy's damn neck. No wonder the kid couldn't talk.

Sam looked at his brother. They needed to get him a hospital. This was far beyond their ability as hunters to handle. Andy needed professional help, major help, and soon. Dean understood the look, glancing back the hundred feet to his still idling baby.

"Andy, are you hurt anywhere else? Is your neck the worst?"

Sam patted down the kid's chest as gently as he possibly could, barely even putting pressure on his stained and ragged shirt, let alone skin or muscle. The slashes he'd last seen in Andy's shirt, sliced across his chest and soaked red, were no longer there. He had a whole new set of injuries and none of the old.

Andy started to shake his head, grimacing immediately as the movement pulled at his brutalized neck. He reached up towards it, but hesitated at the last minute, choosing not to touch it. Instead, he held the same hand out, palm flat, and shook it back and forth as a surrogate 'no' instead.

Sam met Dean's eyes and nodded. The older Winchester rose to his feet and took off ahead of them for the car, intent to drive her the remaining distance and get Andy the hell away from here. Sam started moving towards getting the kid back on his feet.

"Okay, we're gonna get you out of here. Can you stand?"

Andy gave him a look that told him to stop asking him questions he couldn't answer, but flapped the hand up and down as a 'yes' of sorts. The kid let Sam pull him up, the younger Winchester supporting his weight well before Andy actually got on his feet. Dean had reached the Impala and gunned her forward the last hundred feet, at way too fast a speed given the short distance. The car lurched forward as he slammed on the breaks, threw her into park, and hopped out to get the back door open.

But as Sam guided their injured friend towards the backseat, Andy put the brakes on, suddenly digging his heels in and shaking his hand back and forth frantically. Sam blinked back at him, momentarily at a loss.

"What is it?"

"Come on, kid," Dean urged, gesturing to the open rear door. "Let's get the hell out of here."

But Andy kept shaking his hand in lieu of shaking his head, insistently if not a little hysterically. He wouldn't move any closer to the car, and instead gestured with a thumb down the road. Back towards the ghost town he'd just escaped from.

"You want to go back?" Sam asked, at first incredulous. But, as Andy paled at the question, Sam adjusted his words and tone to be softer. "We need to go back?"

The hand flapped yes again, Andy's dark brown eyes filled with pain and exhaustion and fear, but the latter was taking over and Sam suddenly realized it wasn't all for himself. The younger Winchester straightened as the full situation dawned on him – Andy's injuries, the state of him, his panic – and looked down the dark and empty road towards Cold Oak.

"There are others. Other kids," he realized quietly, looking back to their resident Jedi, who kind of sagged in his arms as he got it. Sam swallowed thickly. Azazel's Battle Royale had begun, and he couldn't help wondering what state those kids could possibly be in if Andy was this bad off.

They were probably dead. He didn't want to say it, could see that it would break Andy to hear it. But then, it didn't matter if they were, the younger Winchester realized. They couldn't just leave them in that place. And if they were alive, they needed the rescue as much as Andy.

Dean stared between his younger brother and his younger, younger (actually they were the same age) surrogate brother. The dawning horror of the exact same realization and what Andy was asking them to do fought for control of Dean's expression, warring with the need to get the kid somewhere safe, somewhere with help. His duty as a hunter was now battling his sole purpose as a big brother.

"Andy, we need to get you help. We'll come back," Sam tried to reason, realizing Dean wasn't going to be able to say that in anything even remotely resembling reason or calm. As soon as he'd said it, though, it became clear it was the wrong thing to say. Andy's shoulders hunched with a sob he tried to fight down, but forced its way out of his throat. The sound raw and painful, and he practically choked on it. Sam kept the poor kid from doubling over, still supporting most of his weight, and Dean took an aborted step towards him, concern and helplessness stretched across his face.

Andy started gesturing frantically, lips moving but nothing coming out, tears streaming down his face and Sam didn't understand. Their friend was breaking down, but all Sam could do was keep the kid upright. It was Dean that finally got it. Dean, the older brother who'd had to make the same choice Andy made, more than once, and saw it in his eyes.

He grabbed the kid by the bicep, waiting until a dirt and tear streaked face met his. "Hey, it's not your fault, Andy. You did what I told you to do. You survived."

Devastated brown eyes closed, face crumpling as water leaking free from crinkled corners. Dean would have hugged the kid if he didn't think it would only cause more pain.

"Okay," the older Winchester muttered, squeezing Andy's arm with a decisive nod. He gestured to the back seat with his head. "Get in. We'll go back for them. But you're staying in the car."

Andy's eyes snapped open, his body rigid with tension and eyes frozen wide in clear fear. Sam, still supporting him with one hand on his back, felt the change immediately and tensed as well. Andy's pulse was rocketing. Sam could almost feel his heart race beneath his skin.

"Andy?" he prodded, looking at the kid with worry. But Andy's breathing was staggering, coming way too fast, he was shaking his head in short, aborted gestures, the mangled skin of his throat pulling with each movement. Sam recognized the signs of a panic attack a mile away. There was the PTSD he'd been waiting for and the cause was obvious. "Breathe, Andy. It's okay, you don't have to go back there, okay? We won't take you back."

The poor kid was still trembling, but nodded, then winced in regret, and flapped his hand up and down.

Dean glanced at Sam, frustration formed more from confusion than actual anger. "Alright, we'll head for the hospital."

Andy's grip on his forearm immediately said 'no,' to that option, and Dean actually growled.

"Kid, if you won't leave and you won't go back, what do you want me to do? Those are your options!" But Andy just stared up at him, all stupid big, scared eyes that made Dean's big brother heart squeeze so, so damn painfully. Realization that there was, in fact, a third option caused the anger, boiling just beneath the surface and having nothing to do with the kid, to take over, as was wont to happen with the older Winchester. "We're not leaving you here, Andy."

The psychic flinched at the suggestion, the sound of it so much worse than the mere thought had been inside his mind, but Andy canted his head ever so slightly (actually he went too far, winced, winced again from the first wince, righted his head, and mentally told himself to stop doing that.) Dean let out another, louder growl.

"We are not leaving you here," he repeated, firmly, like the first time must not have been clear enough. "Not an option. It's not happening.'

Yes, it was. It had to, Andy insisted. Scott and Amanda needed the Winchesters. Andy had left them. No matter what Dean said, he'd left them for his own safety. Well, he was safe now (-ish) and they weren't. And that was his fault. He was the one who'd run his mouth about their powers, he was the one who'd turned his back on a clearly psychotic kid. He was the one that had taken responsibility for them, who'd told them they'd find a way out. He was the hunter, he was the one who'd known what was going on. He'd known when he'd found them that he had to be responsible for them. A choice he'd made, knowingly. And he'd failed them.

But his limbs shook and his heart pounded, still skipping a beat when it shouldn't, still hurting and not quite right beneath a too-tight chest, at the thought of going back to that town. That town with a man who had slit his throat, with a demon roaming its streets, streets soaked in blood. Andy's blood. He knew it wasn't logical. He knew what fear and trauma did to the mind. He understood that, and because he thought he understood it, he also thought he should be able to control it. Push it to the side for the twenty minutes it would take to go back to Cold

Oak and save Amanda and Scott. It's what the Winchesters would do. He could freak out later, Andy told himself. Tried to tell himself. But his body wasn't having it, and he hated himself for it.

And, beneath all of that, there was just…nothing. He had nothing left in the tank, no fight left in him and no energy, either. He couldn't go back there. He knew he couldn't. He wouldn't survive. He'd barely survived the first time. And as much as death had seemed okay an hour ago in the face of a blood-thirsty demon, five hours ago when he was being electrocuted in the middle an abandoned town, twenty-four hours ago as he bled out in a school in Rivergrove – hell, even if it still sounded somewhat okay as he stood, rescued and safe (ish) with these two men he'd somehow come to adopt as family – his body wasn't moving from his spot. Wasn't facing death down again.

The Winchesters could, though. They could survive anything. And if Scott and Amanda were alive to be saved, Sam and Dean would save them.

'You have to go,' he thought, speaking the words even when no sound came out. Dean didn't seem to hear him, not like the demon had, but the words on his lips were enough. Either Dean could read them or he just understood.

"Andy, we can't leave you here," he said, softer this time. The kid was hurt. Bad. And he was still shaking, even in Dean's extra layers. That wasn't all from fear. Andy was pale – too pale – and had spent hours in near freezing temperatures in nothing but a t-shirt and what looked like significant blood loss. He needed help. They needed to get him help. "I won't do it."

The kid just held out a thumbs up and offered a wary, weary, watery smile that was more misery than encouragement, but suck it, he was tired.

'I'll be okay, Dean.'

The older Winchester wanted to bury his hands in his hair and pull every last strand out. But he looked at Sam and could already see that they were going to do it. This insane, stupid, reckless, terrible, no good, dumbass thing. They were hunters, all three of 'em. Saving people was what they did. Saving themselves was something they sucked balls at, always had.

Dean growled low in his throat, but started pulling Andy by his arm towards the nearest tree. He tossed his head towards the Impala and called out over his shoulder, "Sam, get the salt."

The younger Winchester nodded, already on the move as Dean got Andy settled at the base of the largest tree just off the road. He helped Andy lower himself back onto the ground and the kid gingerly leaned against the trunk, realizing Dean's intention. The older Winchester hesitated for a second, staring down at him, before he shook his head with another noise close to a growl, and jogged back onto the road. Dean swiped up the iron skillet Andy had dropped, walking back to the downed hunter.

"Iron," he said, like the word was a weapon all itself, and shoved the skillet into Andy's arms and against his chest. The way his hand held it there against the kid was a clear indication that he expected Andy to keep it on him. Like a shield. Andy just offered that same weak smile and ignored the way Dean looked at him like this was a terrible, dumb, awful idea and he didn't want to do it.

Sam made it back over to them carrying a large bag of road salt and just about every warm article of clothing they had between the three of them. He dropped the clothes next to Dean, who immediately started bundling the shivering kid up, taking his own jacket back in exchange for warmer options, while Sam started a liberal circle of salt around the base of the tree, wide enough to encompass Andy's stretched out legs. Once Andy was in enough layers to look like a toddler prepared for his first snow day, Dean pulled his gun from his side and slid the magazine out of the base.

"You see that?" he asked, kneeling beside Andy and gesturing to the top bullet. Andy blinked at the metal casing, which had a small carving of a five-sided star etched on the tip. He knew what that symbol was. "That's a devil's trap. Shoot a demon with it, it'll paralyze them."

Dean slid the magazine back into his gun, grabbed it by the barrel and held the weapon out to Andy, grip first. The psychic stared at the offering in shock. He looked up at Dean, then back to the gun. Dean's gun. Dean's favorite gun. The ivory-inlaid one his father had given him when he'd turned eighteen, with the initials D.W. carved into the grip. Andy had asked about that gun once, the matching pair both brother's had. Dean had been so damn proud as he told the story.

Andy's hand shook as he took that gun.

"You sit here, you stay in the circle, and we'll be back in…" Dean glanced at Sam as the younger Winchester completed his salt circle, leaving the half-empty bag to the side and standing just over Dean's shoulder. Dean looked back at Andy. "Two hours at the most."

As he said it, Dean dug into the front pocket of his jacket, removing his phone and handing it to Andy. The kid's, if it was still on him, was dead and no good to them now.

"If we're not back by then, you call Bobby. Speed dial two." At the words (bossy demand), Andy gave him a look and Dean rolled his eyes, realizing his word choice wasn't spectacular in this situation. "Text him. Whatever. You get a hold of him, he'll come get you. He's seven hours out. And kid, I don't care if we have to break you out of a hospital, you think you're gonna pass out, you call 911 and get an ambulance on its way. You hear me?"

Andy took the phone, the smallest amount of amusement in his eyes that left Dean just reeling at the strength of this kid. A damn good kid. Dean shook his head as Andy had to juggle the skillet, gun, and phone, but he took it all in stride. He ended up with his arms crossed over his over-stuffed torso (Dean had gotten about six layers on him), hugging the pile of defenses to his chest like a scared kid with too many stuffed animals to hold.

"I'll have my phone too," Sam added as he crouched down beside them, long beanstalk legs looking like a cricket. He had something else in his hand, which Andy realized belatedly was the Winchester's med kit. "You need anything, text us. We'll keep in contact as long as we have service."

Dean nodded in agreement, and the younger Winchester got to work opening the kit. He didn't dare wrap Andy's neck, even if he knew they should. Burns were the most susceptible injury to infection, and they would have to deal with that, hopefully at a hospital that would have even stronger pain killers than what he was about to offer the kid.

"Morphine," Sam said as he held out the small clear bottle, a needle in his other hand. "We can't give you much, but it'll take the edge off."

Even as he said it, he wished he could give the kid the full dose he more than deserved and obviously needed. Sam wasn't even sure what was keeping Andy on his feet. Or, well, his butt now that he was sitting. But a proper dose of morphine would leave him too vulnerable if something did come looking for him. Not to mention too incoherent or unconscious to stay in contact with the Winchesters or call for that help should he need it.

Dean stood as Sam readied the needle into the bottle, withdrawing a miniscule amount into the syringe. The older Winchester pulled his knife from his side and started carving a basic warding symbol into the tree above Andy's head, just something to keep away anything interested in doing harm. It wouldn't work on anything stronger than, say, a wandering spirit, but it should keep away anything completely-normal-just-hungry that might be found wandering the South Dakota woods at night.

Sam moved to administer the needle to Andy's elbow, but the kid grabbed his wrist with a sluggish movement. He looked like he was struggling to figure out how to say something, and Sam realized that was entirely the problem. He needed to tell them something.

"Use the phone," Sam offered, nudging his chin towards the device resting between Andy's chest and forearm. "Type it out."

When Andy ended up juggling the three things in an attempt to get a proper hold on the phone, Dean leaned down to take the gun from his left hand, laying it in his lap instead with a fond roll of his eyes. Andy got the phone into his hand and started to type one handed. He ended up tucking the skillet beneath his other arm so he could use both hands for speed. After a moment of quiet clicking in which both Winchester's waited as patiently as possible (one far more patient than the other, but Dean was doing an admirable job for it being him), Andy turned the screen towards them.

Sam ended up taking the phone gingerly to read aloud, "Good kids: Scott, emo. Amanda, girl. Bad kid: Jonathon, blonde asshole."

Dean snorted beside him, but Sam kept reading.

"Demon – question mark – in woods, little girl. Claws. Wants blood."

"Well, that's not creepy at all," Dean muttered, Andy sharing a look with him. But that unbreakable spirit that was Andy Gallagher started to falter, the smile fading to be replaced with tentative fear. Fear for them. Dean took the phone out of the kid's hand, putting the gun back into it and pressing his arm back across his chest like a shield once ore. Andy stared up at him with way too vulnerable brown eyes. "We'll be okay, kid. We got it from here. You did good."

Andy didn't feel like he'd done anything close to good, but he nodded anyway (very carefully) and clutched his little pile of weapons closer to his chest. Sam administered the partial dose of morphine, and Andy sank back into the tree as the very edges of his awareness and pain clouded over into blissful fog.

He opened his eyes again to nod at the Winchesters, not only to let them know the drug was working (and really, ridiculously, so much appreciated), but that he was okay. He would be okay. They had to go now.

The two exchanged hesitant glances, but both nodded, telling Andy they would be back soon – two hours, max, Dean promised – and to stay safe. Stay in the circle. Then they were leaving, jogging back to the car and peeling out. The faster they left, the sooner they would make it back.

Andy watched them leave, dizzy with conflicting emotions. Or maybe that was the morphine.

Chapter End Notes

Why Isn't Andy Dead Dear Chuck You've Like Killed Him Six Different Ways in Two Days You Monster: Okay, I just, I have to say it because…well, I just have to. I know this is not how injuries work and Andy should be like almost dead or really dying and definitely not left alone for another two hours. I'm absolutely pulling from the show for this one. You know, the show that has Sam take an undercut to the jaw from a man with super strength and sends him flying twenty feet away through a wooden fence, but no, he's totally fine and wins that fight. Yeah. That show. I think I'm still safely canon here XD

The Boys Leaving Andy: So I thought this up, thought 'that's cool, I like it' and then thought '...but would they really leave him? Am I forcing it?' So I took some time and realized...no, I don't think the boys would ever leave Andy there. Not really. But...do I think the show writers would have done it anyways? Absolutely. They do stuff that's borderline out of character all the time Which then makes it canon and...so...it becomes in-character by default...and, just gah!! Anyway, I am trying to keep in the spirit of the show as much as possible so...yup, totally doing it. And hopefully I pulled it off as believable and mostly within character for the Winchesters.

Also, I loved the image of Andy, bundled up and holding onto a skillet and a gun sitting in a salt circle while the boys went back to save Amanda and Scott. There was something heartwarming and also heartbreaking about it? Dunno. I went for it.

Dean's Gun: Soooo, I think I once read a story (I think it was Family Matters by 29Pieces/29Pieces of Me) that had the D.W. carved into Dean's gun, and S.W. carved into Sam's, and they were given to the boys by John when they turned 18. Then I did that thing I do where I adopted it as head-canon (cough remember Uriel with actual character depth? cough) Only, I convinced myself over the years it was actual canon. Turns out? Can't find anything to that extent, but I like it a lot so I am most definitely adopting it for this story :D

Special Thanks: Goes to Draconis Domini for the idea of slitting Andy's throat and killing his ability to talk, therefore letting him stay in the story longer. (Look, DD, a note where I don't throw you under the bus! :D Well, mostly.) When Draconis mentioned it, I had just re-watched the season 2 Battle Royale, where Andy developed a secondary power which always bothered me. Not the ability itself, but because it felt thrown in last minute just as a way to get Dean to Cold Oak and was not used for anything else the entire episode. But DD's idea of removing Andy's ability to talk meant that power suddenly made sense, and I loved it as a fix-it :D Plus...I apparently like hurting that boy...

Please Review! I love hearing from you guys and as RL still sucks at the moment, I could use the smile your comments always bring.

Chapter 82: Season 2: Chapter 49

Chapter Notes

A/Ns: Guys, guess what? It's my 30th birthday this weekend (holy crap, right?) I can't even. No, really. I can't. Anyway, I think an early chapter is a good birthday present for all, and I do like to spread the love ;)

(Also I won't have time to post properly on Sunday XD But sure, let's go with the altruistic reasoning, yeah?)

Chapter Warnings: Well, after a fun post like that ^ I regret to inform you that absolutely nothing in this chapter is fun. No one has a good time in Cold Oak! (Don't feel bad, Andy, it's not just you!) But oh boy, guys, it's a bad chapter to be an OC…

Actual Chapter Warnings: Lots of off-screen death in this one. Oh, and Jonathon gets what he deserves ;)

See the end of the chapter for more notes

-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-

The Road So Far (This Time Around)

Season 2: Chapter 49

-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-

Cold Oak was a bloody mess.

It wasn't obvious at first. It took time, both Winchesters jogging quickly down the three empty streets that made up the town, checking inside pitch-black buildings in the silent night. There was a decent moon out, but that didn't help them inside. The two hunters swung flashlights inside each interior as quickly as they could, trying to hit all the dark corners and crannies, but they were on a time limit and searching an entire town took time. Too much time. All the while, a feeling of eyes on them persisted. Human or other, though, they didn't know. One brother always kept watch, shotgun in hand, while the other searched for the missing kids, but nothing came out of the dark for them.

The Winchesters found the first body about ten minutes in. Scott, going off Andy's description of an emo male.

"God damn it," Dean muttered, turning away from the body. The kid was on his back, eyes wide, terrified and sightless, staring up at the ceiling of an old general store. He'd been strangled and stabbed. The bruising on his neck was grotesque, finger-shaped dents pressed so far into his skin they were more black than purple, and his chest was a bloody mess, shirt punctured in more than half a dozen spots.

Sam stared at the innocent kid – a kid just like him – and closed his eyes, lips forming a silent prayer. They couldn't have saved him, he told himself. His skin was cold, the blood congealed and drying. He'd been dead for hours. They couldn't have saved him, but it still hurt. Still made him angry.

Another life stolen by Azazel's pointless game.

"We should burn the body," Sam said quietly. This kind of death was just asking for a vengeful spirit and Sam didn't want Scott, whoever he had been, to suffer that fate.

"Later." Dean was already headed out of the store, not out of a lack of respect for dead, but because they were on the clock. "We got more kids to find."

Both could only hope they'd find the other two in a different condition. A futile hope, it turned out.

They found Amanda next. She was four stores down in what had probably once been an apothecary or doctor's office of some sort. Her neck was riddled with the same, deep bruising, her chest covered in even more stab wounds than Scott. Dean was really starting to hate this Jonathon kid.

There was a lot less remorse when they found his body. Dean didn't even bother with a moment of silence or regret for not finding the kid alive. He just grabbed one bloodied, shredded leg while Sam grabbed the other. They started dragging the kid back towards the others. As they pulled him down the road, they left a trail of blood and a lot of body parts, internal and external, that they'd have to go back for. The demon Andy spoke of had done one hell of a number on the kid.

Dean didn't have a shred of sympathy for him.

Sam eventually called it, telling Dean they'd have to do more cleanup dragging the body in pieces than just getting the other two and burning them right here where Jonathon lay. The more they left behind of the man, the more chance they took that something would get missed and Jonathon would come back an angry spirit, emphasis on the angry. Cold Oak had enough of that already.

So they left him in the middle of the street and went back for Amanda and Scott. There wasn't time to make a clean burial for each; all three bodies would have to be put on one pyre. Andy didn't have the luxury of them doing this right, and no way was Dean spending the night scouring those woods or this town for wood. It was regrettable, but as far as both Winchesters were concerned, the living was their priority.

Dean carried Amanda back to where they'd left her killer, Sam a couple dozen feet behind him with Scott's body. They laid the two of them down with a hell of a lot more care than they'd dropped Jonathon, and the Winchesters started gathering wood. Dean wasn't shy about it. He ripped loose panels right off the buildings and walkways around them while Sam ventured into the woods for what bigger logs and limbs he could find.

"Stay in sight," Dean insisted, as he had when they'd first entered the town and Sam suggested splitting up. No way in hell was Dean letting his little brother out of eyesight in this town. Not this town. They were tempting fate and the damn timeline plenty enough just being here, and the sensation of being watched hadn't ceased since they entered the damn town.

Both Winchesters had already spotted a ghost each, the incorporeal specters watching silently from windowsills and doorways. There had been no sign of the demon Andy had mentioned, and Dean hoped she'd fucked off back to the woods.

The woods Sam was currently scouring the edges of for fuel.

So the younger hunter didn't push. He stayed within eyesight. He knew what Dean had witnessed once before in this place and he had no plans of making his brother repeat that experience. He took care to stay where Dean could see him and didn't venture further than a half dozen feet into the woods. Sam felt Dean's eyes, as well as others, locked on him the entire time.

It took them forty minutes to build one large pyre. Probably not large enough, given the three full-grown humans they needed to fully burn atop it, but it would have to do. Dean was already growing anxious to return to Andy, and Sam was right there with him. He'd sent the kid a text just before they lost service, telling him they were almost to the town and would text as soon as they were on their way back. But he knew if their places were switched, Sam would spend every one of those one hundred and twenty minutes wondering if that text would ever come or if he'd just be left waiting, wondering what had happened.

"We shouldn't have left him," Dean muttered for perhaps the twelfth or thirteenth time as he climbed down off the pyre, having gotten the last of Jonathon up on it. The rest of the pieces of him they just chucked onto the stacked wood as they picked it up piece by piece. Kid was in more sections than a jigsaw puzzle. Dean still didn't feel a shred of sympathy.

"Andy'll be okay," Sam insisted with far more confidence than he felt. But he had to believe it was true. They couldn't lose Andy now, not when they'd just gotten him back. He was going to be fine, and in the meantime, this was something they had to do. Something Andy needed to do and couldn't. So the Winchesters would do it for him.

"He could have waited in the car," Dean argued, still muttering darkly. Sam spared him a look as he picked up one of the two gas cans they'd both gone back to the Impala for once the pyre was fully built. They didn't split up. Not in this town.

"I'm surprised you didn't make me stay with him," Sam said it in lieu of telling his brother that he understood exactly why Andy didn't want to come back here, no matter the protections the Impala offered. How Dean should understand that too, even more than Sam. The man from the future probably did, he was just too worried not to be angry about it.

The look Dean shot him was not a pretty one, and despite Sam standing in the middle of Cold Oak about to light a massive fire and call the attention of every supernatural thing in a mile radius, that look was a parent daring their kid to make them turn the car around.

"No one comes to this town alone," Dean finally said, the words a declaration of a rule that hadn't been spoken aloud previously but might as well have been carved in stone in the Winchester's mind.

Sam actually stopped chucking gas onto the wood to stare at his older brother. His older brother who would never admit to not being able to do something on his own, especially if it meant keeping his kid brother safe. But Dean hadn't said Sam wasn't allowed to come to this town alone. No, he'd very specifically included himself in that.

The older Winchester ignored Sam's staring, circling the wood pile to dump more gas on the back. "It's taken enough people, Sam. No one comes here alone."

The younger Winchester stared a moment longer, a quiet, private part of himself taking that moment of silence, of condolence, for what this Dean had lost here. It spoke volumes to Sam, as it would to anyone watching their loved one grieve them. Even another version of them. Then Dean was circling back around to him, and Sam emptied the last of his canister on the pile. He stepped back as Dean dug a handkerchief out of his back pocket, soaking it in the last of his gas and lighting it with his Zippo. He chucked it on the wood pile, and the thing went up in flames in mere minutes.

"We should burn the whole town down." The man from the future watched the fire take, orange light flickering in his eyes. Sam huffed in agreement before he realized Dean was serious, and then he was once more staring at him, this time more out of worry.

"We can't," he replied cautiously, still not quite sure Dean had been serious. But the older Winchester sure as hell looked serious, staring at those three bodies as their clothing started to catch along with the wood. "Dean, we can't."

"Why not?" The older hunter turned towards him, shoulders back in a clear challenge. But Sam knew it wasn't him Dean was angry at. "This place is no good, Sam! It's soaked in blood, and I'm not just talking those kids!"

He threw an angry arm out, finger pointing at the burial fire. Sam knew that. He did. This town was once so haunted all its residents fled in fear of their lives. A demon in the woods was hardly the only thing lurking in the dark. They'd both felt it. They were both surprised nothing had attacked them yet.

That would change in a heartbeat if they tried to burn the place down. Sam knew that, too. And two hunters, Winchesters or not, weren't a match for an entire town of ghosts and evil spirits.

But that wasn't the only reason not to do it.

"This doesn't end with them," Dean added darkly, no longer looking at his brother but those burning bodies. He hadn't stayed behind to clean up Cold Oak the first time. Sam's death had been all consuming, but he knew how many bodies they would have found in that town had he and Bobby stuck around. How many more funeral pyres would have been built. How one of them would have been for Sam, and still could be. "Azazel won't stop. Being stuck down in Hell isn't going to hold him back for long. He'll bring more of you here, and they'll die too."

'You'll die too.'

Sam was quiet, hearing what his brother hadn't said as much as what he had. The brunet watched as flames licked against the night sky, illuminating the buildings around them in flickers of light. He could still see the ghosts, hovering behind rotting wood and broken glass. They were watching the Winchesters, orange and yellow dancing in their sunken eyes.

"If we burn it down, he'll just find another." Sam turned to his brother, shotgun in hand and a knowing pain in his eyes. "A place we won't know. If Azazel takes me, takes Andy again, heading here is still our best bet, Dean. Your best chance to stop it."

Because he no longer believed they could prevent it. Neither of them did, not really.

Dean sucked on the thought like it was a sour lemon, face screwed up in anger and distaste. But he didn't argue and he didn't bring it up again.

When they were sure the fire would continue to burn and the bodies with it without supervision, the Winchesters headed out of the town. They made it back to the Impala with the eyes of a dozen ghosts on them, but nothing tried to stop them. They never did find Andy's demon in the woods.

It had been an hour and fifty minutes since they'd left him.

-o-o-o-

When Sam gained service again on their mad dash back to Andy, his phone pinged with three missed messages. But only one was from Andy, acknowledging his text that they were entering Cold Oak. 'Please be safe' was all it said. Sam was happy to have obliged, even unknowingly. He texted back the minute he could to let the kid know they were on their way back. Then he shot a reply filled with only good news to Bobby, who'd been wondering on their progress repeatedly for two hours.

With Dean driving at ridiculously unsafe speeds, Andy didn't even get a text back to them before their headlights were illuminating the kid in the darkness. Their Jedi was still sitting at the base of that tree. He was a bit shaky perhaps, but still in that circle of salt, weapons pressed to a chest buried beneath a half dozen layers of clothing. He'd never looked so relieved to see a car barreling down a dirt road towards him in the pitch black.

As Sam helped Andy to his feet, Dean accepted his gun back with a grim smile, tucking it into his jeans. The younger Winchester pulled their friend into a hug, half under the disguise of warming him up and supporting him towards the Impala. As he pulled back, Andy smiling shakily at them both, the psychic looked between the two brothers only once before he caught both of their grim expressions. Andy realized almost instantly, and yet belatedly, that they were alone. Brown eyes darted frantically to the Impala, but the car was empty.

'No,' he mouthed, then again, and again. Sam took him by the shoulders as his expression crumpled and he tried to shake his head, pulling at his damaged neck. The younger Winchester immediately shifted his hands to either side of Andy's face, touch gentle – cautious – as he stilled Andy's agitated movement, which would only cause him pain.

"There was nothing you could have done," Sam said, trying to comfort their friend, this goofy kid who had somehow become a Winchester when they weren't looking. "You did everything you could have, Andy."

Even without knowing what had happened in that town, the wound to Andy's throat, the fact that he was even alive, was proof of that to both hunters.

Andy understood the logic, Sam could see it in his eyes, but it didn't take. Not really. It was the final straw in a never-ending night that had started more than forty-eight hours ago. Andy broke down against him, and it was all Sam could do to wrap his arms around him and support his weight.

He shouldn't have left them. He never should have left them. He mouthed it over and over into Sam's shirt, soaking the plaid fabric with tears and slobber and snot, but no sound came out of his wrecked throat. The younger Winchester just held him all the tighter.

Dean stared helplessly at the two, meeting Sam's equally lost and grieving eyes, looking for guidance. Hesitantly, the older hunter reached out, settling his hand on Andy's back, fingers curling over the edge of his shoulder. He squeezed lightly, wary of hidden hurts.

"You can't save everyone, kid," he started quietly, knowing that truth was little comfort here. He'd been on the other side of this, too many times. "And it sucks, we know that. But you survived. You kept yourself alive. Man, if you'd been one of those bodies we found back there…"

Dean faltered, voice cracking as the reality of just how bad that could have been, of just how much Andy had come to mean to both of them and how close they'd come to losing him, hit Dean like a punch to the gut.

Damnit, like he didn't have enough adopted strays to worry about.

The older Winchester swallowed heavily, knowing he didn't mean a word of it. The flood of water he was angrily blinking back was proof enough. He swallowed past the growing lump in his throat, stinging pain he knew was nothing compared to what Andy was fighting through. Their Jedi was tough as nails, breakdown and all.

"Kid, I know you're hurting, but you did exactly what I told you do. You stayed alive until we could find you. And I'm…I'm so damn proud. So damn happy you're alive." He met Sam's eyes as he said it, so friggin' bad at any form of heartfelt declaration that he couldn't even do it unguided. Emotional affirmations really weren't his strong suit. But the equally watery smile his brother shared with him told him he'd been right to say it.

"Me too, Andy." Sam tilted his head down, chin brushing the top of Andy's hair as he held the kid, wary of his injuries. "We don't want to lose you."

Andy's shoulders shook beneath Dean's grip and the hunter risked more pressure. He settled his second hand on the kid's back, feeling him shudder with sobs, silent not by choice but by something taken from him with force.

"Let's get you out of here," Dean said quietly, and Sam nodded in agreement.

"You need a hospital," the younger Winchester added, voice equally soft. "And drugs. Lots of really good drugs."

A choked sound escaped the kid's mangled throat, and it almost sounded like a broken laugh. Dean patted their favorite Jedi on the back before he pulled away and made for the Impala's back door. He held it open as Sam got Andy settled on the seat, and the two Winchester's took their places in the front.

They headed away from Cold Oak at as equally pressing speeds as they'd entered it, Dean gunning it for the nearest hospital and the most distance he could put between them and that hellhole town.

-o-o-o-

A passing ranger driving down FSR 297 on a fairly routine night drive through the National Forest spotted what looked like smoke rising above the treetops to the northwest. It was hard to tell for sure, even with an almost full moon high in the sky illuminating the dark night a silvery blue, but Ranger Danson thought he saw a faintly orange glow to the trees.

Forest fire.

He reached for his radio to call in the potential blaze, turning his patrol car in the direction of the old mining town that lay that way. Danson passed only one other car on his way to the scene and, at the time, he didn't think much about the sleek muscle car flying past at far too fast a speed as was safe on these back forest roads.

A forest fire trumped some yahoo thrill seeker any day.

-o-o-o-

Andy was quiet in the backseat on the drive out of the forest. Not that anyone was really expecting him to be otherwise, for both physical and emotional reasons. The woods stretched for miles, and Andy shuddered to think about being stranded, alone, so deep within them, in the dark and empty. He tried, and failed, to turn his thoughts to other things.

He understood what the Winchesters were trying to say and appreciated their compassion and care. Logically, and even from a philosophical and psychological standpoint, Andy understood what happened in Cold Oak hadn't been his fault. There had been nothing more he could do for Amanda or Scott. But that didn't stop his brain from turning the events over and over again in his head, searching for where he'd messed up, what he'd done wrong that might have ended with all three of them walking away if he'd made a different choice.

So, yeah, he understood what Sam and Dean were telling him, but it didn't really change anything, either.

The woods around them didn't thin but the roads got better paved, then bigger, and then turned into an actual highway with other cars. Eventually the National Forest ended and the Impala's windshield shone with the lights of an upcoming city.

Andy made a choked, adverse noise from the backseat as Dean pulled off the highway at the first sign for a hospital. At the sound, the older Winchester all but slammed on the breaks, cars blaring their horns as he made somewhat of an emergency pull off to the side of the road. Sam turned in his seat (though only ever so slightly more, considering he'd spent the entire drive partially turned towards the backseat, not so subtly watching Andy for signs of discomfort or worse), but all Andy did was shake his head, wince, and then raise and shake his hand.

"No hospital?" Sam hazarded, tone incredulous. His fingers gripped the top of the Impala's front seat tightly. "Andy, you need a hospital. Your neck…that's not something we can patch up ourselves."

Not to mention the kid was still shivering. Even with the heat blasting on full in the front, Dean having stripped down to just a t-shirt, and Andy with his seven layers of clothing, the kid was still shaking away in the backseat.

The Jedi made a frustrated noise at his inability to communicate. He considered, just for a second, trying to talk to them the same way he'd talked to that demon. The memory of the headache he'd had for more than an hour afterward ultimately ended that idea. He was too tired and too drained to try something like that, anyway. So instead he made a broad pushing motion with his hand, trying to tell them they needed to go further.

Dean and Sam exchanged glances, and Andy kinda wanted to hit them both. He was too tired to do that, either.

"You…want to go to a hospital further away?" Sam tried again and this time he got the hand-flapping Andy had been using as a surrogate yes.

"Kid, you need a doctor," Dean argued, though there was no heat in his tone, only worry.

Movement followed but faltered as Andy clearly tried to figure out how to communicate what he was thinking. Frustrated, he pointed at his eyes, then looked around for something. When he couldn't find whatever it was he wanted, Sam dug his phone out of his pocket and handed it to the struggling kid. Andy looked even more annoyed that they hadn't thought of that sooner, and started typing. After only a moment, he handed the phone back.

"Yellow Eyes," Sam read aloud. Dean caught on first. Andy wanted to go someplace Azazel wouldn't find them.

"He's gone, kid," the older Winchester said, though the way he couldn't quite meet Andy's eyes told the psychic there was a lot more to it than that. "He's not coming after us. Not anytime soon."

Andy didn't understand.

"Cas exorcised him," Sam offered, one shoulder raising up as he put his arm on the back of the seat. He sent a cautious look Dean's way, adding to the dull alarm bells ringing in Andy's head that all was not right.

'Cas?' Andy mouthed, looking between them. The last thing he remembered from Rivergrove was Azazel asking him to give the angel up and Andy refusing. That…hadn't been pleasant. None of that had been pleasant, actually, and Andy had been doing so good at not thinking about it. Granted, the only reason why was that he'd had plenty worse to focus on since.

"She's okay," Sam was quick to say. Too quick. Those muted alarm bells got a little louder. Dean was downright rigid in the front seat, refusing to look at either of them. "She was injured, but she'll heal. She went back to Heaven so her, um, brothers can help her."

Yeah, something was definitely not right. More than that had clearly gone down. Andy remembered how nervous talking about Heaven made the Winchesters, especially Dean. The man was so tense right now and trying not to be that clearly their opinion on the place hadn't changed. But Andy was too tired to think about it, so he chose to accept Cas would be alright and hoped it would turn out true.

He made the shooing motion with his hand again, adamant, and Dean frowned.

"Andy, I get it, I do. But we're seven hours from Bobby's, which is the only safe place between us and, well, anywhere. And I don't think you should wait that long."

Bobby's was the only place they'd be truly protected from Hell; a place with another hunter watching their back and a panic room available for the worst case, need be. Every hospital in between, be it the one a mile in front of them or the one in Sioux Falls, would be the exact same level of safe or not safe if a demon really came looking for them.

Dean glared at the road sign a hundred feet ahead, a large, reflective white "H" and arrow pointing them in the direction of the Regional Health Rapid City Hospital. He understood Andy's need to get further away, and given what they'd left behind in Cold Oak, it wasn't even an outlandish request. But the kid shouldn't wait the hour and a half to the next town east, and no way Dean was making him. Clearing his throat, the older Winchester made a decision. "We'll go a town away, alright? Sturgis is half an hour north of here. But then we gotta get you looked at. Burns are…they're just not something you leave alone."

That was putting it lightly, Sam thought, casting a furtive look at Andy's neck. They'd given him another dose of morphine once in the car, and Sam had wrapped his throat with a single layer of gauze as incredibly cautiously as he could. Andy had only been able to take three laps around his head before he was calling it quits, tears streaming down his face and looking a half a breath away from passing out.

He didn't look thrilled now at the idea of staying so close to the forest, which stretched north a good distance, but he conceded because he was too exhausted, too emotionally numb and finished, to argue further. Dean pulled back onto the road. True to his word, they turned away from the sign to the hospital and traveled another thirty minutes to the town of Sturgis.

-o-o-o-

Sam and Dean flashed their FBI badges the minute the doctors and nurses starting asking questions. And boy, did they have a lot of questions. Luckily, the Winchesters didn't actually have a clue what happened to their friend, which made their declarations of confounded cluelessness (edging towards irritated cluelessness for one brother) very convincing.

The hospital staff wheeled Andy away on a gurney, surrounded by medical professionals shouting stats and needs loudly and insistently over top him as they unwrapped the gauze from his neck and assessed the incredible damage. Both brothers watched, somewhat helplessly, as their friend disappeared from sight in a whirlwind of commotion and efficiency.

Sam settled into a chair in the now-too-quiet waiting room with a long, low sigh. Dean started pacing in front of him, and the younger Winchester wondered where he was even getting the energy. They'd both been awake for more than forty-eight hours now, through some of the most traumatic events they'd ever had, both in physical demand, sheer stress, and emotional upheaval. Suddenly, Sam was all but boneless in that hospital chair. His limbs felt like they'd tripled in weight, and he braced his arms on his knees just to breathe through the abrupt adrenaline crash. His hands were shaking again, but he was pretty sure that, for once, it had nothing to do with the persistent buzz in the back of his skull. He'd managed to forget about that for the last so many hours they'd spent searching for Andy.

Dean paced for another six and a half minutes before throwing himself into the chair next to Sam, restless energy a mask for the fear, frustration, and uselessness that had kept him on his feet.

"He'll be okay, Dean," Sam consoled quietly, hands clasped lightly between his legs to hide the fact that his fingers were still trembling.

Andy would be okay. They'd had worse hospital waits when the fate of the loved one behind surgery doors wasn't known. But Andy's injuries weren't life threatening. They most assuredly had been, but the kid pulled through all on his own for hours. Traipsed through haunted woods, fought off a demon, and survived it all. He'd keep surviving, Sam was sure of it.

"I know," Dean replied, tone both exhausted and terse at the same time. He started up that absent-minded rubbing across his sternum, and Sam knew he was thinking of Cas.

"She'll be alright, too."

Dean dropped his arm after casting Sam a warning look. Not a topic he wanted to talk about. He sat up straighter, leg starting to jiggle against the metal leg of his chair as he stared past the nurses' station at the doors Andy had disappeared behind. He didn't want to think about Cas, because there was nothing they could do about it.

At least, not right this second.

Dean bit his cheek and pushed the thought away. They had enough on their hands taking care of Andy. He'd just have to trust that Sammy was right (since he usually was), and Cas would be fine until they figured out a way to get her back.

-o-o-o-

In Washington D.C, as the sun rose on the city of politicians, agencies, and museums, Victor Henriksen was only an hour into his day and already elbow-deep in reports. Cross-checking the files beside his keyboard as he typed, the FBI agent looked up from his work when David Attingwood, a relatively young data analysist known for a rock steady work ethic and even more so for his enthusiasm on the job, tapped the edge of a paper he was holding against the surface of Victor's desk. Given the thickness of the cardstock and the glossy sheen of the white back, it was a photograph of some sort.

"You are not gonna believe what just came in."

Victor raised an eyebrow at the overly chipper agent. David had taken a strange liking to Henriksen almost from the get-go. He was just about the only one, given Victor's propensity for burying himself in his work with ferocious concentration (the agency shrink had called it obsessive, if he remembered his psych eval correctly). So a junior agent not being terrified of him was the talk of the town, given that everyone at the water cooler was fairly sure the young man was gay and just about no one could get a proper read on Victor, despite his referencing multiple ex-wives over the years. In fact, the 'multiple' part was most likely what added fuel to the fire that was the J. Edgar Hoover Rumor Mill.

It irked the astutely professional Agent Henriksen more than it probably ought to. Data Analyst Dave didn't even seem to know there was a rumor mill, let alone that he was a monthly feature, at least.

David eagerly held out the photo, flipping it around so Victor finally got a look at what it was. The reports only half finished on his computer were completely forgotten about as he reached forward and snagged the photo from David's hands. He blinked at the grainy, black and white image before looking back up at the data analyst.

"Where was this taken?"

"Black Hills National Forest, South Dakota," David answered with a grin. "Six hours ago. A Ranger spotted smoke and headed for the scene, only it wasn't a forest fire, it was a funeral pyre in the middle of an abandoned mining town."

"How many bodies?" Victor asked, practically on rote. He stared at the photo in his hands, the best lead he'd gotten yet in the largely stagnant, often outlandish case he'd been working on for the better part of six months. It was a nighttime capture of a '67 Chevy Impala, black or a very dark blue, license plate KAZ 2Y5. But what Victor really cared about were the faces of the two men riding in the front seat. The passenger was half turned towards the back, but even partially obscured and only a profile, that was very clearly Sam Winchester. And the driver was undeniably an angry-looking Dean.

They had 'em. They finally had 'em.

"Three: two male, one female." David rolled on the balls of his feet. "Partially burned, about eighty-five percent, so identification is going to be a while. Rapid City and Custer PD are both working in junction with the Forest Service, but given that Ranger Danson's 'dash cam winner of the week' here alerted us the second they ran facial recognition, it's about to become a federal case."

Henriksen stood from his desk, reports now completely forgotten, and pulled his suit jacket off the back of his chair. "Get me on the next flight to South Dakota."

"I'm not your secretary," Agent Attingwood huffed in wry amusement, smirk wide and only the least bit smug, as he handed over a second piece of paper. A freshly printed flight itinerary, the United States Air Force seal bright on the top of the page. "But already done, boss. You leave in two hours."

Chapter End Notes

A/Ns: Dun dun duuuuuun! Booyah, FBI not only on scene, but really on scene! (Run, boys!)

Amanda and Scott: ...so...I did it again, apparently. I went and made minor or original characters likeable enough that people didn't want them to die... I want to apologize, but making OCs feel real seems to be a thing with me. I didn't even know it was before this story. Straight up, Angela Garrett taught me this about myself. But I do apologize for any attachments formed. I'm not trying to be that cruel. I save that for the intentional crap I pull with Dean and Cas XD.

Cold Oak/Season 2 Ending: Many people were thinking this was it, that this was a clever way to kick of the Season 2 Finale, with Sam in Cold Oak. And I...I...guys, you mean I could have WRAPPED it up HERE?! turns to muse WHY DIDN'T YOU THINK OF THAT? Nooo, we have to have ANOTHER TWENTY CHAPTERS to this season! head thud head thud head thud

The muse's response, you might wonder? That bitch shrugged, said something about Uriel and Heaven and Cas tied up in need of rescue and Gabriel coming into play (not necessarily in that order) and then she just sauntered off set to find a lollipop or maybe take a nap.

-_-

Chapter 83: Season 2: Chapter 50

Chapter Notes

Medical Mumbo Jumbo: So I do a lot of research for this story – like a stupid amount. Like looking up actual haunted mining towns in South Dakota, finding the one with the closest name to Cold Oak, then using it's county and local Forest Service Roads to keep the story as accurate as possible because I am a freak who enjoys that sort of stuff buried in stories – but one thing I am no good at is medical research. That stuff takes multiple layers of combing through to get a handle on and there's a lot of contradictory information out there on the internet. I like research, I hate going in circles. So there's gonna be some winging it in this story when we come to injuries and treatment! Hopefully I managed to cleverly disguise my utter lack of knowledge beneath broad statements and general vagueness that doesn't read like vagueness :D

Review Replies: I am quite behind in this, but hoping to get back to the majority of you throughout the day! I seem to be on an every-three-chapters schedule. Also, I have to confess to the ff dot users that I am better at answering comments on A03, as their system is easier for it. But I am still trying to get to everyone, because answering you all, even with a simple thank you, is important to me!

Chapter Warnings: The boys finally, finally get a break. Andy needs patching up via actual professions, Sam and Dean need sleep via actual beds, and Persephone needs other things entirely via a drunk Prophet and the Winchester's personal stash.

See the end of the chapter for more notes

-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-

The Road So Far (This Time Around)

Season 2: Chapter 50

-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-

Chuck stared at his editorial assistant, less than subtly, from the safety of his writing desk. She'd finished the most recent chapter almost a full minute ago, lowering the papers into her lap and now was just…

staring at them. The writer was trying – and failing – not to notice. Or think about it. Or let it get to him once he did think about it. Or think about how much he was letting it get to him that he was thinking about it.

Steph was being quiet. Really quiet. She didn't often have much to say about the story, but she wasn't usually quiet, either. Hesitantly, and with the kind of nerves of steel that whispered 'well...she hasn't told you you sucked yet…?', Chuck cleared his throat.

"What- uh…what did you think?"

Stephanie turned to him with a deep inhale in and an oddly blank expression, as if she'd forgotten he was there altogether and the discovery of him was less than enlightening. Man, he knew quiet wasn't good. Quiet was never good. He should have just stayed quiet.

"Azazel is gone?" she asked, voice finally breaking the weird tension in the room created entirely and felt only by Chuck. The writer blinked at the question, the least of what he'd been expecting her to say, if she was going to say anything.

"Uh…well, not forever." The writer shrugged a little self-consciously and then tried for a smile, thinking maybe his editorial assistant was worried about where the story might go now. "Just back to hell. Can't kill my best villain."

The curve of her round face twitched in a smile that was anything but happy, and Chuck tried, again, not to read too much into that terrifying look. It reminded him of that woman in a blouse and high heels that he'd first greeted on his doorstep three months ago.

"And To- the other demon that was with him?"

Chuck blinked again. Even slower this time. And again for good measure.

"Uh…" What a weird question. The demon – which Chuck was referring to as Tom in his head because he had an uncle named Tom and he'd needed some sort of name for him other than 'that other demon, number uh maybe sixteen I think' – was kind of a nobody to the story. Sure, with Azazel back in Hell now, he figured the demon might become a somebody now…. Huh. He might actually have to name him for real in the story.

Wonder if 'Tom' is really the way to go…

"Right, the uh…Azazel's other protégé…demon…guy." Chuck flapped his hand in a dismissive wave and turned back to his computer. "He's a minor character. He'll get a new meatsuit quick enough."

That seemed to end whatever tension Chuck had imagined all on his own anyway. Steph lingered in her chair for another few moments, then got up and placed the chapter on his desk, beside his laptop. He paused in his writing, keys silencing as his fingers stilled, and looked cautiously over and up at her. She was still standing there. Usually she'd be back in her chair by now or packing up. It was actually past the usual time she left…

Steph smiled at him prettily, and this time Chuck was definitely reminded of that woman on his doorstep with her terrifyingly tight hair bun and ugly purse. "Chuck?"

The writer gulped.

"Do you know how to hotwire a car?"

-o-o-o-

It was well into the early-hours of the next morning before the Winchesters heard any news. One or two of the nurses had come out now and then to inform them of Andy's state, what stage of surgery they were in or what test they were running. X-rays for his throat, MRI's for the head trauma the brothers hadn't even known about, heat wraps and fluids for the blood loss and hypothermia, and an astronomical number of stiches for the defensive wounds to his hands and arms, as well as an array of other cuts and scrapes across his body.

Boy was beat up, apparently. Not that the Winchesters were surprised. They'd seen the damage firsthand.

"What about his neck?" Dean would ask every time. What the hell had happened to their friend's neck, and what kind of damage were they looking at, what kind of treatment, here. But the nurses would only shake their heads, a pitying kind of horror crossing their faces each time. It wasn't until a doctor emerged in the early hours near dawn that they got any sort of answer.

"You gentlemen are with the FBI?" were the first words out of the doctor's outh, tone a touch skeptical, as he finally emerged from behind the double doors. His ID hanging from a pocket of his pristinely white lab coat read Dr. Richards, and he was regarding them and their less than pristine jeans and flannels with obvious hesitation.

Rude, Dean thought, though he didn't necessarily blame the guy.

"We were off duty when we got the call," the younger of the two Winchesters answered the question that hadn't been asked with a shrug and a weak smile.

The story they'd given the rest of the hospital staff was that they were on the trail of a killer – couldn't say any more, confidential case – and Andy, their junior agent, had gone missing in the middle of it, almost twenty-four hours ago. They'd been out searching for him when they got a call from him, and the kid was able to Morse code them his location. The most believable lie, after all, was the one closest to the truth. In the meantime, this guy could judge or doubt them all he wanted, just so long as he patched up their friend.

"Is he alright?" Dean asked gruffly, in a far less amenable mood than Sam.

"He's not in any immediate danger," Dr. Richards confirmed, holding his hands out in front of him like every doctor explaining medicine ever. "But he's got a long road of recovery ahead of him."

Sam and Dean exchanged relieved, though complicated, glances.

"Before I get into the extent of his wounds…" Hank Richards hedged hesitantly, looking between the two agents and their obvious concern for the third currently being stitched up in his OR. "I need to ask. Usually, at this point in an attack as severe as this, we would be informing the police…"

He let the words trail off in a clear indicator that the ball was in their court for next steps. Hank didn't actually know the protocol when an FBI agent was involved; Sturgis didn't see a lot of federal officers in their hospital.

"Our supervisor's already on it," Sam answered quickly, but not too quickly. He might still be pretty green when it came to committing a felony, but he'd been lying his whole life. "He's got local LEO's and the Forest Service securing the scene."

"You can call him if you feel it's necessary." Dean dug into his back pocket, pulling out his wallet and Bobby's bullshit business card – the FBI one – from within. The way the Doc took the proffered card and slid it into his front pocket with a nod, not even looking at it, reassured the Winchesters that he'd never feel the need to make that call. "In the meantime, we'll handle the interview of our agent ourselves."

No need to involve the police.

"That's going to be a bit tricky, I'm afraid." Dr. Richards followed the card with his hands, sliding both into the large pockets on the front of his coat. "His throat wasn't just burned. It took us a while to get at it, since we weren't expecting that level of damage when we first went in, but… It looks like his throat was slashed."

"Slashed?" Sam echoed, head ducking forward in disbelief. He looked at his partner, distress clear in his expression, and for good reason. The other agent looked a bit green around the gills.

"Yes, someone made a rough, shallow incision from here-" Hank raised his finger to point at a spot on the left side of his neck, tucked beneath the edge of his square jaw- "to here, high up on the neck and just under the chin. We had to do a lot of repair work on the inside of his throat, but he's lucky, really. Up there, you start running into extra layers of muscles controlling the jaw. It's more to cut through to hit the carotid, which curves inward there to dip under the jaw. Most wounds to the lower throat bleed out in minutes. The location of the cut probably saved his life."

"That's where the larynx is," Sam mentioned, voice oddly quiet, knowing what Andy's assailant had likely been after with such an attack.

The doctor spared them a sympathetic look. "Yes, and it took the full brunt of the slice. We might have been able to salvage his vocal chords from the cut alone but…the burn was electrical, which I can't even begin to understand, let alone explain how or what caused it." Here, Dr. Richards shook his head in a little disbelief of his own. He slid his hands back into his pockets, offering the two men a small, compassionate shrug of his shoulders. "I've never seen anything like it. But due to the current that traveled through his system, there was a lot of damage to the soft tissue and muscles in his neck. His vocal chords were completely fried; there's nothing we can do to repair them."

"So he'll never talk again," Dean muttered, running a hand over his mouth and working his jaw to keep from clenching it. "Okay. That's… that's fine, he'll pull through. That's what matters."

"Agreed," Hank said with a small smile. Talking to the relatives and friends was always hard, but he'd learned firsthand that those able to accept and move towards treatment were already ahead of the game. He shouldn't be surprised from federal agents, he supposed.

"Doctor, is there any other damage from the electrocution?" Sam asked, big brown eyes filled with worry for Andy's future. He'd hazarded half a guess that the burn hadn't been from fire, given the lack of charred skin when he'd inspected the wound and helped Andy wrap his neck. An electric burn, like a lightning strike, had been a possibility, but made less sense than some other form of heat. Not to mention it came with far more secondary risks Sam wasn't ready to consider.

"We shocked his heart out of AFib," the doc mentioned completely casually, and Dean jerked. Sam understood what he'd been asking, but Dean clearly hadn't thought as far as heart complications. Dr. Richards wasn't startled by the reaction but did seem to realize his mistake, and directed his next words specifically to the shorter of the two agents. "It's a perfectly normal procedure. The electricity knocked his heart out of rhythm – atrial fibrillation, AFib for short – and we simply put it back on beat."

"Right." Dean didn't seem nearly settled by that, but the lack of concern by the doctor and, even more so, Sam helped him relax. Well, sort of. As relaxed as he'd been before he found out they'd been shocking Andy's ticker. Which was to say, not relaxed at all.

Dean had rather personal feelings about electrocution and damaged hearts, after all.

"The rest of the damage is minor. He lost a lot of blood and his core temperature was pretty low, but he's already mostly back to normal levels now, and we've got him on his second transfusion. We don't expect any lasting complications from it. His MRI scans came back clean, we're running the gambit of antibiotics through his system, and we'll be monitoring him for a couple of days to be sure he doesn't pick anything up from that burn. There was some significant ulterior bruising to his windpipe and esophagus beneath the rest of the damage that will take time to heal."

Meaning someone had tried to strangle the kid before they'd upped the ante to a knife. Dean was really, really starting to hate this Jonathon kid.

"He'll be on intravenous nutrients for the next twenty-four hours, then we can switch to a liquid diet and, eventually, soft foods. But nothing solid for at least a week, I'm afraid," the doc continued, not noticing (or at least not calling out) Dean's increasingly dark mood. "There were defensive wounds on his hands and arms that we're stitching up, some cuts and abrasions, one hell of a skinned knee. All consistent with running in a wooded area. Looks like he might have tussled with a wild animal of some sort, too. We found some evidence of claw marks, but given you said you found him in the Park, and he would have been stumbling around at night covered in blood, running into a predator really isn't that unheard of. Luckily, he seems to have fought the creature off with minor injuries."

"He's a tough kid," Dean practically growled out, and Sam nudged him with an elbow. The older man cleared his throat and repeated his words with a more encouraging ring than the dark thing they'd started as.

Hank had seen far worse reactions, so it didn't really faze him. "I can't begin imagine the entire ordeal he's been through, gentlemen. I'm only in charge of his physical recovery, but I caution you both to get him some psychological help, too. Surviving an ordeal like that is going to leave the kind of scars we can't fix here."

"We understand, doctor. He'll be taken care of," Sam assured, tone still very gentle. It wasn't quite his speaking-to-a-victim voice, but it was definitely his hospital-staff-please-continue-to-fix-my-friend-slash-family voice. "Can we see him?"

"He's heavily sedated now," Dr. Richards answered with a steady shake of his head. "And he'll need to stay on the heavy duty pain killers for at least the next couple of days. Frankly, I can't believe he was conscious when you brought him in. He needs to rest."

"We won't disturb him," Sam insisted, words as placating as his hunched over body language. "But we need to file a report. We'll need his clothes, take pictures of the wounds, that sort of thing."

Anything to get them in, to see Andy with their own eyes, and then ward the shit out of that hospital room.

"We've already taken photos of his injuries. Standard procedure in any attack. I can have them sent to you, and if you leave the nurses with your contact information, I'll be sure to file a complete report for your investigation." The doctor nodded with the end of his sentence, a finality that had both Winchesters frustrated. Hank seemed to pick up on it, though. He hesitated, realizing that their push to see the injured agent had nothing to do with duty or responsibility. The man bit back a sigh and tilted his head, relenting. "You can see him, if you're quiet and don't disturb him. No more than five minutes, and only one of you."

The doctor put extra emphasis on the last words when both men lit up with relief. The two exchanged a quick glance, speaking a silent language that Dr. Richards didn't even try to decipher.

"Thanks, Doc." Dean grinned his first real smile since before they'd left Baby a mile outside of Rivergrove, Oregon and walked right on into this nightmare.

Dr. Richards nodded absently at their gratitude. "Now, if you gentlemen don't mind, I need to get on that report."

It was a dismissal if they'd ever heard one. Sam reached out to shake the man's hand gratefully. "Of course, thank you, doctor."

Hands back in his pockets, Dr. Richards gave them a nod in farewell and then turned on his heel. He checked in briefly at the nurse's station, then headed back through those double doors to see to his patient. The woman behind the counter stood as he left, gesturing to the two men.

"I'll show you to your friend's room. Just one of you, for now. Doctor's orders."

They both nodded while Sam stepped forward, the two already having agreed on which one of them would check on Andy in the six-second glance they'd shared. Dean, in the meanwhile, would ward as much of the hospital as he could covertly get his hands on.

"I'll meet you outside," he said to his brother. Sam nodded at him before he followed the nurse down the hall to see their friend. Dean watched him disappear around a corner, then rubbed a hand through his short hair and headed for elevators. He'd start with those first, then make his way to the lobby, and every other entrance. No demon was getting within a hundred feet of this hospital.

-o-o-o-

Chuck had not known how to hotwire a car. He'd stared at Persephone for several long moments of confused silence – enough so that the woman had to resist the urge to snap in front of his eyes to make sure he was still in there – before confessing that, uh, no, that…wasn't really something he'd ever done before.

"Not even for research?" she'd asked sweetly. "The Winchesters hotwire vehicles all the time."

Chuck rubbed at the back of his neck, avoiding her gaze. "Ah- no…I… sort of gloss over those parts. I just say they did it and then…you know."

Persephone, knowing the writer rather well by that point, just hummed, noise filled with as much disapproval as she could fit in it. It did the trick. The man all but tripped over himself pulling up the internet browser on his computer and a website called YouTube. She leaned over his shoulder as he began searching for videos on how to properly hotwire a car.

She had one such video pulled up now on Chuck's phone, which she had misappropriated after encouraging the man to imbibe in several more evening drinks than was his usual. He shouldn't miss it, or his credit card, until tomorrow morning, and Persephone would be sure to return them before then.

With the phone propped up on the dashboard and video playing, she reached under the steering column of the car once again, grabbing the ends of two wires she had already cut and stripped. This would be her seventh attempt to hotwire the vehicle. It would seem, Persephone was realizing, that humans greatly exaggerated the ease of such tasks in their entertainment. Why, she could not fathom. If movies and television made this task far more realistic, it would certainly discourage people from attempting it. She would have just stolen Chuck's car keys instead of his phone.

The wires sparked and the engine rumbled to life. Persephone dropped them in surprise, and the engine died.

"To the crows with you!" she hissed in Sumerian. Modern curses were still…unfamiliar on her tongue. Though there were several she was coming to like and needed to practice more.

Grabbing for the wires, Persephone pressed her cheek to the steering wheel once more, cautious not to lean too much of her weight to it. The first time she had, the thing had made a god awful blaring noise, and Persephone had incidentally learned where the horn was located, as well as spent the next five minutes on lookout for anyone who might have heard the noise. The two ends sparked once more, and this time the woman was quick to twist them together, permanently entangling them as the video instructed. The engine remained at a steady rumble as she cautiously released the wires and leaned back, waiting. When the car continued to run, Persephone let out a whoop of excitement, striking the edge of the steering wheel with the heel of her palm.

"Ha!" She took the phone off the dash, turning the video off and chucking the device into the passenger seat beside her. With a congratulatory huff of air, the woman composed herself and wrapped one hand around the gear shift. "Alright, step two."

Step two was driving, which couldn't possibly be as difficult as getting the car to run.

-o-o-o-

It only took three tries to hotwire the next car.

As it so happened, crashing was exceedingly easy, driving less so. Persephone confused both gear directionality, as well as the gas and brake pedals, applying far too much pressure to both at opposite, and ultimately very incorrect, times. The vehicle had not handled being driven into the parked car directly behind it very well at all. Persephone had also learned what a car alarm sounded like. Several of them going at once, in fact. Which was why she'd had to relocate entirely to find her next car.

The noise could still be faintly heard, actually, from her new location several blocks away.

A few more YouTube videos and Persephone was confident she would not make any of those mistakes a second time. She was, however, never trusting human entertainment ever again. It might prove problematic beyond this fiasco, given the majority of her education in modern society was via that medium. Perhaps she could discuss an alternate, more realistic source of information with Chuck when she returned his wallet and phone.

Persephone slid her second stolen vehicle into drive – YouTube had also taught her the difference between the little letters and numbers beside the gear stick, a valuable lesson for her second attempt at making the car go in the correct direction at the correct speed – and pulled away from the curb.

-o-o-o-

Sam did, indeed, ward the shit out of that room. Given that the hospital thought Andy was a federal agent and there had been an attack on his life, the kid had a private room, which suited Sam's needs well enough. The beanstalk of a Winchesters pulled a small pouch of salt out of his jacket pocket the minute the nurse pulled the door back closed behind him. He got a generous line going across the single windowsill and again on the small ledge atop the doorframe. He drew a general ward against all things evil into the back of the door, then shrugged out of his coat and hung it on the hook, the fabric covering the symbol quite inconspicuously.

The hunter eyed the rest of the room over his shoulder while he rifled through the pockets of his hanging jacket. Sam pulled out a hex bag. Their last. Dean had come back from a trip to the Impala about two hours ago, after the nurses gave the most recent update and it sounded like they might actually see Andy sometime soon. The older Winchester had come with salt, a Sharpie, canteens of holy water, and a hex bag which he pulled out of his pocket and handed over to Sam.

"It's the last one we got," he said, voice casual but they both knew what he was thinking about. Or, morelike who. Cas was the one who had gotten them the ingredients and without her, they weren't even sure they could restock. There were other ways to ward and hide themselves, of course, but nothing quite as succinct. That had been the whole point of the angel's hex bags to start with.

More than that, it was just another reminder of where Cas was (and wasn't).

Azazel had taken and burned Sam's hex bag. Andy's too. Dean walked out of Rivergrove (or, well, flew out) with his intact; apparently a session of Beat-The-Crap-Out-of-A-Winchester by Demons Anonymous did not require the removal of it. That, or Azazel's minions just hadn't thought to check for one.

"Baby's still got hers," Dean added, since technically it wasn't their last, last one. But removing the Impala's primary source of cover from eyes demonic and celestial alike was a last resort if Dean had ever heard one. Keeping her off radar also kept all manner of trackers, spells, and eyes off the Winchesters.

Also, after the last one had gone missing via suited-angel-douchebag-of-the-week, Dean had made the new one's location a lot more discreet.

"We'll call Bobby," Sam had replied, voice still soft, trying not to trigger any of his brother's multiple emotional constipated traumas at the moment. "See if he can get any of the ingredients. We'll work on the ones he can't."

Dean nodded, though they both knew that if Bobby Singer couldn't get his hands on something occult, the Winchesters sure weren't going to have any more luck.

So, Sam slid their last hex bag between the frame of the hospital bed and the mattress, making sure to tuck it far enough in that no nurse would stumble on it accidentally when changing the sheets. It would keep Andy out of visual range of any demon looking for him, at least for now. But that wouldn't keep Andy safe alone. Not completely, at least.

The younger Winchester pulled one last protection of out of his front jean pocket. Sam stared at the small, crudely formed Persian sleep coin, the head of a long-dead emperor staring up at him. With Azazel exorcised and trapped back in Hell, he didn't even know if Andy would need it. But he wasn't willing to risk it, either. Sam slid the coin between two of the four pillows propping Andy up at a forty degree angle. For drainage, most likely, Sam thought, as he pulled back and studied his sleeping friend.

The doctors had wrapped his damaged throat, a hell of a lot better than Sam had managed, leaning over into the backseat of the Impala. Andy was pale, the circles beneath his eyes an unsettling blue-black, but his breathing was even. Despite the pallor of his skin, he looked pretty peaceful, considering everything the kid had gone through.

Sam sunk onto the edge of the bed slowly, staring at his friend. Their friend. At the moment, one of their only friends. Dean might say that was going to change, but Sam was more comfortable dealing in the present. And right now, Andy was their closest friend.

Probably the closest Sam had ever had. The only real one, actually. Brady had never known about his past, his family's business. And, it turned out, he'd been a demon for two of the four years Sam had thought they'd been friends. Before that…Sam didn't really think much about before Stanford. Certainly not in terms of friendships.

The young hunter's shoulders sagged as he finally let himself feel – really feel – everything that had happened. Rivergrove and the virus, Azazel, losing Andy. Finding him again, in the kind of state where Sam still couldn't quite believe they hadn't lost him permanently.

God, he'd thought they'd really lost the kid. Yes, it had been logical to insist Andy was alive the entire time they were searching for him. It wouldn't have made sense for Azazel to stash Andy away only for him to bleed out in minutes. But Sam hadn't known. He really, truly hadn't. Staring at Andy now, injured, mute and powerless, but alive…. He didn't know how to feel.

Guilty. Incredibly guilty. Relieved. And happy, if he wasn't currently consumed by so many other, more pressing, negative emotions.

Sam scrubbed at his face and the water welling in his eyes. It wasn't just Andy. It was his own fear, experienced at some level almost constantly for the last forty-eight hours. Self-loathing, for the buzzing beneath his skin, his own weakness, a craving he had, even now, and an inability to protect those closest to him.

Azazel had only taken Andy, only hurt Andy, because he'd wanted something from Sam that the hunter hadn't been prepared to give.

It was Dean, too. And Cas. His brother was falling apart, keeping it together in appearance alone. Sam could read it in every tension-filled line of his body, every rigid muscle and stiff movement. Dean was radiating fury and fear from every pore, and Sam knew the older Winchester was approaching limits of his own.

It was three people lost at Cold Oak. Three 'special' kids whose lives Azazel had stolen. Like he'd stolen Max Miller's.

Sam sniffed back the rest of the waterworks in the near-silent room, wiping at his cheeks and eyes for the few tears that had slipped free. He climbed back to his feet, pulling the last item he had to give from his back pocket. Sam tucked the kid's phone, now fully charged, into Andy's limp hand, curling his fingers around it. It would be the first thing he would notice when he woke. The hunter crossed back over to the closed door, digging around his jacket some more for the charger. He made sure to plug the device in, though it was a bit of a challenge to get behind the heavy hospital bed frame to the only plug within distance. He'd have to bring an extension cord on their next visit or talk to the nurses.

Now Andy would have a phone that would never die, within reach at all times. Both Sam and Dean would be keeping their own phones on them twenty-four-seven. At least until they returned at the start of visiting hours tomorrow.

Sam squeezed Andy's hand, took a quick moment to scribble a note – 'You're safe, the room is safe, text us when you wake up.' – on a small memo pad beside Andy's bed, and headed for the door. He checked the room one more time, eyes scanning over potential weaknesses or flaws in his warding, but the hunter nodded with satisfaction and slipped back into the hall.

Andy would be safe until the Winchesters could come back in the morning.

-o-o-o-

Dean was waiting for him outside the hospital, leaning against the Impala, parked in the drop off rotunda outside the main entrance. At four in the morning, there really wasn't a lot of traffic – foot or vehicular – at the Sturgis Hospital. Sam sucked in a shivering breath of cold, early-winter, early-morning air that was thick with humidity. It was supposed to start raining soon, possibly in the form of sleet, or so the weatherman had reported several times throughout their time in the hospital, the local news running on a TV that hung in the corner of the waiting room. Sam resisted the urge to rub his arms.

How Andy had survived these temperatures in nothing but a t-shirt, wandering the woods for hours, Sam really didn't want to think about. He was just glad the rain hadn't come sooner, or they would have been looking for a popsicle out there in the woods.

If Dean noticed Sam's lack of jacket as the younger Winchester wound around to the other side of the car, he didn't say anything. Just cranked the heat as they both climbed in, pulled away from the curb, and headed to the nearest hotel. Dean had gotten friendly with one of the older, scarier nurses in the hospital in order to get them some additional information on Andy's condition. He'd come away with a good hotel close to the hospital, one or two decent restaurants nearby, and when they could return in the morning (a full thirty minutes before visiting hours, even. It was amazing what a well-placed compliment and a little shameless flirting could get you.)

The Winchesters had six and a half hours until visiting hours started. They needed sleep (as much as they could spare), a resupply run, and a plan. At least some sort of a plan. Any sort of a plan, actually. For what they were going to do with Andy. What they were going to do about Azazel and Hell. Did they even need to do anything? It sure as hell felt like they needed to do something. Hell was getting too brazen, too daring. Too close. Something had to be done.

And then there was Cas.

Sam was under no illusion. The time would soon come when Dean would not be put off by his brother's calm and logic any longer. He would need action. Movement, however useless. An achievable goal with a strategy to get them to it.

In other words, a plan.

Well, they had six hours, Sam thought sarcastically. Plenty of time. But first, before anything else, sleep. In a very heavily warded motel room. And then an overdue call to Bobby in the morning.

-o-o-o-

She stood in front of the 1967 Chevy Impala, staring at the Kansas plates, the edges of her sneakers wet from the puddles still drying on the uneven asphalt of the parking lot. The car was a sleek black beneath fresh droplets of water, not all that different from the several renditions she'd seen on various covers of the Supernatural series. Persephone stared at the vehicle, then shifted her glowing green gaze to the motel room it was parked right outside of.

Sam Winchester was in that room. A dozen feet away, if that. Sleeping. Completely unaware. Perfectly vulnerable.

Persephone stared at that door, gaze sliding over to the window, curtains pulled closed, everything beyond dark and hidden away. Then she dropped to a crouch in front of the Impala's trunk, running her fingers over the lock cylinder. She dug out Chuck's phone once more, video already pulled up and ready to go, along with a set of lock picks from her purse. Courtesy of Chuck's stolen credit card and a hardware store three blocks from his house.

At this point, she was under no illusion of how difficult picking a lock would be, considering how easy the video in her hand made it look.

It took precious minutes, in which Persephone had to resist glancing towards that motel room door more than once. But when the trunk popped open of its own accord, the struggle was decidedly worth it. She stood, pulling the cool metal the rest of the way up, wincing slightly when it made a groaning sound louder than she'd expected. Green eyes did glance back towards the curtained window then, but no light turned on inside.

Breathing out more than her first relieved breath since Chuck had passed out drunk on his couch and this endeavor began, Persephone reached into her purse and pulled out the papers the writer had gifted her almost a month ago. He'd had no idea what he had handed over when he'd given her the recipe to a hex bag capable of paralyzing demons, but Persephone didn't plan to let that information go to waste.

Unfortunately, the Winchester's personal supply was the only place she knew where to get the ingredients.

It had been a risky choice, coming after the same location Tom would first set his sights on the moment he got a new meatsuit. But with Azazel exorcised back to Hell (and what the hell had that creature in Rivergrove been, capable of performing an exorcism of that scale on a Prince of Hell? Chuck hadn't specified, only calling her 'Cas'. The writer had been mysteriously – smugly – tightlipped when she'd asked him about it. Persephone feared she knew the answer, which made this moveall the riskier) and Tom missing a meatsuit, this was possibly the only chance she'd have to get those ingredients. The demon's first goal after he found a new host would be to relocate the Winchesters. Particularly so, since this 'Cas' person had not only iced his Boss but also transported the boys back to Sioux Falls, South Dakota (not completely confirming Persephone's suspicions, but certainly not dismissing them, either). Between identifying or killing that creature and finding the Winchesters, Tom's top priorities would be filled, leaving Persephone at least a few items down the checklist. Which meant, for the first time since Azazel had dug her out of her own personal hellhole, she had temporary freedom. Multiple days, at least, where she wouldn't be leashed to a motel room, under the supervision of a demon when he was around or she wasn't babysitting the Prophet.

The potential of turning that temporary freedom into a more permanent one was worth the risk.

Persephone reached into the trunk, lifting the trick bottom the Supernatural series had been pretty specific about, and stared at the arsenal of weapons, paraphernalia, and spell components within. Everything a growing hunter might need to battle the paranormal. With another look towards the room, lights still off and all else quiet, she started digging through the supplies for everything on Chuck's list.

-o-o-o-

Despite the fact that he hadn't slept in two days – Cas's chest-draining making that number feel a lot closer to ten – Dean did not sleep well. He might have been out as soon as his head hit the pillow, but there was anything but rest in the three hours he managed to get.

He dreamt of Hell. Of fire and darkness. Of an empty void he was eternally lost in, searching for someone he couldn't remember. He dreamt of Cas, trench coat tossed over the library chair, sleeves rolled up to his elbows, eyes a magnificent, terrifying, horribly wrong red as he stared at Dean with a smile that promised he'd skin the flesh from the hunter's bones and enjoy it.

Dean woke up gasping, chest aching and sweat leaving his t-shirt damp.

The man from the future rubbed viciously at the hole in his chest, but no amount of pressure or friction could reach it. Dean climbed to his feet, leaving sweat-soaked sheets behind as he stumbled to the bathroom to splash cold water on his face. He stood in the silent room afterward, lungs still too tight, needing too much air. The walls too close, the room too small. Sam's familiar breathing was a comfort in the too-dark room. Dean leaned back into the bathroom, switching the light on and pulling the door almost completely shut as he did. It wasn't much, but the disgustingly yellow light gave the illusion of warmth in an otherwise cold and empty space.

At least, Dean told himself as much.

Unable to get those red eyes out of his head or the warmth back in his chest, Dean crossed the room, walking right past the empty bed. He knew he wouldn't be getting anymore sleep. Collapsing in the chair next to the window, his back to a corner with Sam safely in view, Dean took another deep breath and tried to expand his lungs past what they seemed willing to give. When had he lost all his lung capacity? Was it something Cas had done to him, or something she'd taken away?

Movement – the flutter of the edges of the curtains resettling after he'd sat down – drew his attention to the window. Dean pulled back the dingy fabric, just a couple inches, and glanced through the rain-speckled window to the wet, dark, and quiet night.

-o-o-o-

Persephone took deep, even breaths, back pressed to the far side of the Impala, and counted off the seconds in her head. When she reached five minutes without the sound of the motel door opening, the woman chanced a glance around the edge of the muscle car. The curtains were swaying ever so slightly in the window, the faintest light coming from beyond, but all else was silent and still. She stared at those curtains, waiting for Dean Winchester's face to appear once more, but nothing happened.

She should leave. The ingredients were safely in her purse; she had what she needed. In fact, she'd been in the process of closing the trunk when that window had lit up. It hadn't been a full light, like the main room would surely give off, but to her enhanced eyes, the shift in light had been as obvious as night and day. Persephone had to drop to the ground, holding the damn trunk closed so it wouldn't pop back up and give her away.

She counted off another three minutes. Still nothing. Slowly, Persephone stood from the cold ground, jeans now annoying wet, and eyed that window and the hunters she knew were just a sheet of glass away. Slowly – quietly – the woman leaned on the metal surface until the trunk clicked shut.

Still no movement.

She really should just leave. But there was one more thing Persephone had planned to do, and it would be a shame to give up on it now, having come all this way. The woman eyed the driver side door. She knew where Dean had hidden the last of those hex bags that warded them from all manner of creature. Their only one left, if Chuck's writing was accurate. Persephone tapped her finger against the side of the car in contemplation, staring at that door. If she did it, she wouldn't have time to pick the lock, not in full view of the hunter should the older Winchester forgo sleep and decide to check the parking lot again. Not with her currently lock-picking skill level, at least.

Persephone strode over to the door, eyes darting to the window one last time, and pulled the vehicle door open, heedless of the crunch as the lock gave beneath her strength. Dean was going to be pissed, but what did she care? She didn't plan to stick around for that reaction. Persephone dropped to a crouch once more, sliding her fingers along the driver's side dashboard, around and over the lip of the air vent.

According to Chuck, it hadn't worked for years, so it made the perfect hiding spot for something small. She pulled the ventilated plastic covering off with a dig of her nails and a sharp tug. It came free silently, and Persephone stuck three fingers into the dark, rectangular space. With little struggle, she pulled out the hex bag, it's tied off top pinched between her pointer and middle fingers.

The woman sat it in the palm of her hand and stared at the innocuous little thing beneath a clouded over moon.

If she took it, the Winchesters would be back on Hell's radar by dawn. While that didn't particularly bother her – Azazel was too good to lose track of the hunters permanently, so what did it matter if they were found sooner rather than later – she did rather despise Tom, in particular. It would be particularly disappointing if anything she did here tonight aided in his efforts to relocate the Winchesters. But having a handy-dandy invisible shield against demons and angels – archangels in particular– was too tempting to pass up. Perhaps if she could just open it up and get a look at the components, she could figure out the rest by herself.

Of course, she should have left the trunk open if she was going to make a second supply run.

Persephone glanced back towards the motel room, her eyes glowing green in the night as she weighed each option.

-o-o-o-

Dean fell asleep against all intentions, sitting in the chair in the dimly lit room, head lolling back against the drawn curtains. He didn't dream again, but when he jerked awake two hours later, it was to a feeling of eyes on him and someone in the room with them.

He was up, knife in hand, blinking at the empty space, still lit by the partially cracked bathroom door and rising sun outside the window. There was no one there but Sammy, still snoring away and getting a much better night's sleep than he had managed.

Chapter End Notes

A/Ns: Gotta be honest, I'm torn by this chapter. I read it, and I like it. So I walk away, and I find myself thinking… 'what even happens in this chapter? Where's the good stuff?' Then I scrambled back to my computer for another read-through, thinking I have to improve it, which leaves me like…huh, no, I like it. So I walk away aaaaaand I find myself- head thud, head thud, head thud

Despite being the kind of reader who enjoys the plot development and low-key chatter chapters more than the action ones (though I do, oh-so love the action), as a writer I seem the opposite. Like, if I'm not keeping you all hyped up on chaos-chaos-guns-explosions-chaos-and-that-sweet-sweet-adrenaline, y'all might not like the story anymore - . -

Human brains are dumb, guys.

P.S. Do not feel like you need to assuage my insecurities. I'm just rambling cuz it's good for you all to know where my head is at, and even better (I suppose) for me to know where my head is at.

But, um, where's Henrisken? Siiiiiigh He's coming.

And Cas? bigger sigh Also coming.

And what about- Look, I'm VAF and I can't help it! Back on chapter 46, I decided to sit down and plan out the rest of Season 2 chapter by chapter, just for an estimate of how many we had left. I briefly (veeeery briefly) outlined chapters 47-63, which got me to the season finale.

I have since written up to Chapter 58, and guys…I have only crossed off the events of 47 and 48 in my outline. Two events….took….TWELVE….CHAPTERS….GUYS.

head thud, head thud, head thud

Okay, I lied. Assuage me. Tell me you all like the fact I'm so verbose it hurts. Because it friggin' huuuuuuuuurts!

head thud, head thud, head thud

No, no, deep breaths. Deeeeep breaths Silence. Who cares how long the story gets? Or how many years it takes you to finish? As long as you're still enjoying, and they're still enjoying it, and your verbosity is neither boring nor pointless. Right?

…Right?

Guys?

Are those crickets I hear out there?

Guuuuuuuuuuuuuuuys!

Till next time,
Silence

P.P.S. Remember that you all can tell me to stop posting such long A/Ns at anytime. Although, not gonna lie, I get great enjoyment (translation: weird satisfaction) out of talking (cough ranting cough) to you all.

Chapter 84: Season 2: Chapter 51

Chapter Notes

A/Ns: Hi guys, welcome back! Going forward, I'm going to try to be more aggressive about Chapter References for you all. We had a lot of people who (very helpfully!) admitted they forgot Persephone was in the story or didn't remember much about who she was. Thank you for being honest about that, guys. It is definitely something I need to keep in mind. This is a beast of a story and you all only get to read it a little bit at a time. Some characters or sub-plots don't come up for ten or so chapters, which is the equivalent of about four months for you guys (Oi vey!) So no worries, there. I will try to be better about putting things-to-remember at the start of each chapter.

Please continue to flag things you don't remember reading about or feel I should mention at the start of a chapter :)

Chapter Reference – Human Toe Mushrooms: For those who might not remember what is inside Castiel's hex bags, see Chapter 58: Season 2: Chapter 25 for a refresher! The important thing to recall are the Japanese Mushrooms that look like human toes ;)

Chapter References – Bleeding Heart/Azazel's Girl: For those who don't remember waaaay, way long ago when we introduced Persephone, Sam mentioned she had been angry in his vision about the loss of life in Gomorrah. At the time, Dean wondered why Azazel would go dig up 'some bleeding heart.' See Chapter 53: Season 2: Chapter 20 for a refresher. Last Dean and Sam heard/knew of Persephone, she had phoned Bobby under false pretenses to get the boys to go to Rivergrove, Oregon. Dean recognized the trap, and he and Sam realized Azazel had an unidentified girl leading them around. (Sa also recalled bumping into her in the bar). See Chapter 73: Season 2: Chapter 40 for a refresher.

Chapter Warnings: The boys give Bobby a long overdue call about their no-longer-missing Jedi, Bobby's being awesome as always (because of course he is; he's Bobby), the Winchesters are in for a surprise when they head to the hospital (Dean is piiiiiissed), and Andy's finally waking up to face some facts he'd rather keep right on not facing.

See the end of the chapter for more notes

-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-

The Road So Far (This Time Around)

Season 2: Chapter 51

-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-

"'Bout time you boys called. Ya idjits.'

Sam leaned his head back against the headboard, the cheap thing thudding into the motel wall with his weight. It wasn't secured all that well. Definitely could use some screws tightened. The younger Winchester closed his eyes, both drinking and breathing in the irritated, tough love of their surrogate father figure, coming through the speaker of Dean's phone. It was a balm, really. Sort of telling of their childhood, that Bobby's gruff voice was at the top of Sam's comfort zone.

He'd barely gotten a full four hours of incredibly restless, nightmare-filled sleep before their alarm clock went off. Dean was already upright on the other bed, bare feet flat on the ugly carpet, phone in his hand and that hand on his knee. Given his wet hair and the damp towel around his neck – already showered and half-dressed less than five hours since they'd first gotten to the cheap motel – Sam doubted his brother had slept any better.

"Yeah, yeah," Dean groused back, running one end of the towel over his freshly washed hair, sending a spray of little droplets onto the mussed sheets. "We've been kinda busy here, Bobby."

There was a pause down the line, one both Winchesters could practically envision, before Bobby asked, voice a tad gentler, "How's the kid doing?"

Green eyes met hazel, but Sam let his brother do the talking. The younger Winchester was exhausted, in a bone-deep, buzzing sort of way that didn't speak of good things to come.

"He's a mess," Dean answered honestly. "Throat's all hacked up. He's never gonna talk again."

All information that Bobby already knew. They'd kept him updated as possible through a series of texts stretched over the hours, at least until the older hunter had called it a night, keeping his phone on him for emergencies. Seven hours away with his own hospital patient to keep half an eye on and having been woken in the middle of the night the previous day by the same rag-tag group, Bobby wasn't gonna have a lot of help to offer from afar. Fresh eyes in the morning would do them more than a grumpy, tired old man in the middle of the night. Reasoning the Winchester hadn't rightly been able to argue with.

"Yeah, well, he's tough. He'll pull through."

Bobby had only met Andy twice in the three months he'd been puppy-dogging the pair of brothers. The first was in the middle of a hunt, neither Sam nor Dean available to talk to the older man as he walked them through how to kill the freak of the week. So the phone had been hastily tossed to Andy, who relayed Bobby's instruction from the sidelines as Dean fought a Daeva (yelling, all the while, about how the hell one fought a friggin' shadow) and Sam built a magnesium flare from the absolutely-not-flare-intended components they had lying around.

"Well…cool talking to you, dude. Thanks for saving our skins." Andy had grinned into the phone after the light finally burst into existence, bright and sudden enough to banish the shadow creature. Now they had time to put together the spell to eradicate the beast completely. At least, that's what Sam had said the moment they realized – belatedly and with wide, dread-filled eyes – just what it was they were dealing with. Up until the damn thing had pinned them down in the corner of an abandoned warehouse down by the docks, the Winchesters had thought they were dealing with a spirit. Salt rounds didn't do shit to a Daeva. "You, uh, you know the ritual to kill it next, too, right?"

Bobby just huffed down the line and called him an idjit. A doubting idjit, at that.

The second had been face to face, on a routine check-in as the Winchesters drove close enough to South Dakota to warrant a stop at the Singer Salvage Yard. Andy tromped right on up to the gruff old hunter and gave him a hug, the words, 'I hear you're awesome, Bobby,' spoken with such confidence that they might as well have been laid down in law. Bobby just stood there blinking, slightly red, and definitely flustered with that I'm-a-grumpy-old-scary-man-I-have-no-emotions-you-will-not-make-me-feel-no-eew-get-away expression all hunters owned. It was practically a requirement to get into the job in the first place.

Needless to say, the kid had earned a place in Bobby's teddy-bear heart, reluctant as it may have first been given.

"Yeah, he'll be alright," Dean answered Bobby's firm claim that Andy would pull through, spirit and all. He didn't doubt it, but he also wouldn't blame the kid if it wasn't that easy. Andy had an indomitable spirit, an attitude that never wavered, but Dean couldn't help but think, maybe this. Maybe this one would be enough. Maybe this would be the time.

Losing his girl had done its best, but Andy hadn't laid down and died. Dean had no doubt that Tracy's death at his brother's hands had been chipping away at the kid, bit by bit. The temptation of a Crossroads demon in Mississippi was proof of that. But it hadn't conquered the kid. Azazel haunting his dreams, monsters and demons and things that went bump in the night, and near death experiences so near they might as well have been a Winchester Stamp of Approval death experience (those usually required actual dying, but for Andy, they both agreed he'd come close enough).

None of it had stopped their Jedi yet.

But losing his powers and his ability to communicate, all in one blow, all because he'd decided to associate with the Winchesters…

Dean wanted to think this spitfire kid would pull through despite all that, but he didn't want to put that on Andy's shoulders, either. Especially not when the Winchesters weren't going to stick around help to him through it. Not indefinitely, at least. They'd talked about it last night, on their way to the motel and before they'd both collapsed, dead tired, onto the uncomfortable motel mattresses.

Andy was obviously done. Both Winchesters had seen it in his eyes before Rivergrove, and Sam had only been further convinced during their desperate flee from the medical center with Andy's combined injury and possible infection. The kid wanted to be done.

Even if he did protest that, if he insisted he could go on, there was no way Andy could keep hunting with his current injuries, at least not for some time. After they healed up, he might have an argument for it, but they'd still have to find a way to work around his new communication limits. Not that it couldn't be done, just that it would be…a lot. A lot on top of everything that had already happened to him.

A moot point, Dean was already sure. Sam was too. Andy was obviously done.

Speaking off…

"So, Bobby," Dean began a little warily, starting off slow. "With Andy laid up, we need to find him a safe place to hole up, at least 'till we can get him back on his feet."

"You gonna beat that bush a little harder, boy, or you gonna come out and ask me to house the kid?"

Sam cracked open an eye from the other bed, head still tilted back against the headboard, and gave his brother the 'I told you so' eyebrow. He had told him so. Several times the previous night, when he mentioned Bobby as an option. Dean had hedged, because he didn't know how the old hunter would feel about them bringing him more strays to take care of. They already put a lot on Bobby, and put Bobby through a lot, too. Maybe Dean was more aware of it after ten additional years of crap they'd expected and needed from the old man than Sam might be. (Okay, fine, seven years, but in this new world it was going to be ten, Dean would make sure of it). But that didn't change the fact that they were about as bad at expecting unappreciated aide from the hunter as they were from Cas.

"He's not your responsibility, Bobby," Dean said quietly, voice in the rare spectrum of guilt and confession, all in one. The voice that said Andy was his responsibility. Not Bobby's. Not even his and Sam's. Just Dean's.

A notion Sam frankly found ridiculous. He was pretty damn confident what Bobby would have to say about that, too.

"Horse shit."

Sam snorted, both eyes open now and head picked up. There was amusement in his second 'told you so' expression, and Dean wanted to roll his eyes at it.

"Bobby-"

"Responsibility's got nothing to do with it, ya idjit." Bobby's gruff lessened, just a little, on his token, loving insult. Down the line, he blew out a sigh. "I'm already playing nurse maid to one invalid, Dean. Might as well make it official with two."

Dean closed his eyes to avoid the telling blur of his vision. It had just been a really long couple of days, was all. He was tired, in more ways than one (Dean had to fight down the urge to rub at his chest), and that's why something as simple as Bobby being awesome and a damn decent human being was bringing him to damn near tears. That was totally the only reason it would happen.

"You're a good man, Bobby," Dean said, voice totally betraying what he'd been able to hide behind closed eyes. Aw, shit.

The older hunter just guffawed, uncomfortable all his own, too. Peas of a pod, this family. "Your girl's doing just fine, by the way. I'll see you whenever you boys get back."

"Thanks, Bobby," Sam called from the other bed before the line went dead. Dean tossed the phone onto the comforter beside him.

"Don't say it."

Sam didn't have to. The look was still written all over his face. But, because he was tired, and tired of being tired, he decided to say it anyway. Because it made him feel all that much better.

"I did tell you so."

Dean threw a pillow at him, which Sam caught easily, and then the two got up. Sam got dressed while Dean packed up. They had a Jedi in the hospital to get back to.

-o-o-o-

Sam was the first out of the motel room door, and Dean promptly crashed right into his gigantor of a brother's back when the younger Winchester stopped dead less than a foot out the doorway.

"What the hell, dude," Dean groused, rubbing his dented nose with a hand weighed down by the straps of his duffle bag. But Sam wasn't moving, and the older Winchester knew that was, in no way, a good sign. He leaned around Sam's larger frame and stopped dead himself at the sight of the Impala.

Their last hex bag, the one he had hidden well inside the driver's side vent, was spread out on the hood. The bag had been unfolded into a square stretch of fabric, spread out across the gleaming, black metal of the car. Each ingredient and spell component it had once held was laid out all nice and neat on top of the bag. Even the twine they'd tied it shut with was coiled up in six perfect little rings, sitting on the cloth beside the dried-out toe mushrooms. Like an A-to-Z manual of making a hex bag.

All across the hood of his car.

"What the hell?" Dean repeated, for entirely new reasons now. He dropped his bag and drew his knife (because his gun was in his duffle, damnit. They were supposed to be safe and just on the way to the hospital). He glanced around the parking lot, then up and down the narrow sidewalk that lined the motel doors to their left and right, but there was no one around. It was earlier than most of the occupants of this type of fine establishment got moving, and the main road didn't host much pedestrian traffic this time of day either.

Sam set down his own bag as well before moving slowly towards the Impala. In the center of the dismantled hex bag was a single small strip of paper, flapping in the light breeze of a late fall morning. Sam lifted the rock that had been placed atop it – not a component from the hex bag, but none of the other ingredients would have been heavy enough to weigh the paper down – and picked the note up.

"Careful," his brother muttered, sliding his knife back into its sheath but keeping his hand on the hilt, eyes still wary of the potential threats around them.

"'Be more careful'," Sam read aloud, trepidation in his voice but an ironic eyebrow sent his brother's way as he looked at him over his shoulder. Dean came up behind him, still alternating between monitoring the parking lot, closed motel doors, and the freaky-as-hell hex bag laid out on his Baby's hood. Sam offered Dean the note. "Crowley maybe?"

While the message was clear – someone had obviously gotten to them and anyone could again – it didn't seem particularly nefarious. At least, not yet.

Dean growled low in his throat. He hadn't seen much of Crowley's handwriting over the years. There wasn't often an occasion for the King of the Crossroads or the King of Hell to be giving them written instructions. But he had seen it once or twice before, and this carefully scripted hand, damn near perfect type like it had come from a computer rather than a person, wasn't anything like the crossroad demon's usual scrawl.

"I don't know," is what the man from the future said, because he honestly didn't. He curled his hand into a fist, crushing the paper into an angry ball. "But whoever did this…. I find them, they're dead."

Sam gave his brother a look that didn't dare argue, but carried a lot more with it than just agreement. "We should get out of here. Switch motels tonight. And make sure Andy's still safe in the hospital."

The younger Winchester was already pulling out his phone to text the kid, who'd sent them quite a few back-and-forths that morning. He didn't really think Andy was in danger, not given the nature of the note and how its author had very specifically targeted the Winchesters. Still, if whoever had done this could get inside the Impala, they could get inside Andy's hospital room too.

Dean angrily swiped the hex bag components off the hood. That was the last of their ingredients and, while they could reactivate the spell with them, Dean was sure as hell going to go through every inch of them and make sure nothing had been tampered with before they did. Honestly, he'd rather throw the whole damn thing away – no telling what kind of damage someone could do by tweaking a hex bag – but they couldn't afford to. Not until Bobby got back to them with another way to ward themselves, or they got Cas back. So he'd make sure nothing had been altered before he tied the bag back up and reactivated the spell.

Dean's anger friggin' tripled – no, quadrupled – no, higher, but Dean didn't know the word for more 'pled's than four – when he rounded the car and saw the state of the driver's side door. The handle was intact and the door latched closed with no obvious damage, but he knew immediately when he grabbed the handle that someone had forced the lock.

Someone with superhuman strength.

"God damnit!" he seethed, throwing the door open and tossing the dismantled hex bag and his duffle into the backseat a lot harder than was needed. He pounded a fist on the roof of the car, silently apologizing to his baby for the mistreatment, both by his own hand and whatever asshole dared touch – let alone damage – his car. Sam raised his eyebrows from across the roof, asking an unvoiced question. Dean growled low in his throat. "They busted the door."

The younger Winchester, wisely, didn't say anything. There was nothing to say when it came to Dean and his Baby. They could fix it up once they got to Bobby's. Until then… Sam frowned, going to open his own door but it was still locked. Dean had to hit the button on his door for him.

"If whoever this was took the hex bag from inside the car, than it couldn't have been a demon," Sam reasoned as he tossed his own go-bag into the backseat, careful not to land on any of the hex bag ingredients, which had spilled across the seat in his brother's fury. The younger Winchester glanced at the roof of the car even as he straightened back up. There was a devil's trap under the headliner, put there during her remodel. Dean had assured him, more than once, that no demon was getting into (or out of) the Impala, and Sam believed him.

"Could have been an angel," Dean said through teeth gritted hard enough to hurt his jaw. He hadn't been able to fully angel-proof the car because he hadn't yet figured out a way to do that without locking Cas out, too. It was on his growing list of things to talk about with the angel when they got her back. Dean slid into the front seat, slamming the door closed with a loud bang that made his brother wince as he climbed into the car beside him.

"What I want to know, though, is how the hell they knew where to look. I hid that thing well, Sammy." Dean's fingers curled around Baby's wheel, and the hunter shook his head. Sam raised an eyebrow his way – not questioning him, just…empathetic to his frustration and worry. "I get someone searching the car, but that kind of thing takes time, even more when you don't want to leave evidence of the search."

Tearing apart a car for all the possible nooks and crannies – the real nooks and crannies and not just the under-the-seat and glove-compartment places moms and dads hid their stuff in their minivans – was messy. They hadn't been in that motel room long enough for someone to make that kind of search and put the car back together. No, this stank of someone knowing exactly what they were looking for, where to find it, and going right after it.

Which stank of angels, damnit.

"We're going to have to be more careful what we say or do," Dean said through teeth clenched so tightly they squeaked against one another. "If we're being watched…"

"Right," Sam answered, nodding his head. "Okay, so…no talking about future- uh…top secret stuff outside of the car – once we get the hex bag back up – or a warded motel room."

"And we're going to have to figure out how to ward against angels, even if it means locking Cas out until we can figure out another way."

Dean didn't like it. He didn't like it one bit, especially with the angel AWOL and no idea when – or where – she might come back. But they couldn't risk Heaven spying on them and there was no way they'd be able to police themselves a hundred percent. Dean knew that from experience.

"What angel would leave that message?" Sam asked quietly as they got on the road, voicing a question Dean had been avoiding asking himself. Because Angels spying on them? Totally in character. Angels removing a hex bag blocking the Winchesters from their radar? Sounded just like 'em. But leaving an only-semi-ominous but blatant warning that they weren't being careful enough with their warding? That was hardly Heaven's style.

Gabriel's, maybe, but Dean doubted that runaway (who wanted nothing more than to throw Sam and Dean to the wolves instead of facing his own family) really had anything to do with this. Gabriel would have burned the damn hex bag and let Heaven and Hell find them.

Or unwrapped it, breaking the magic on the damn thing in the process, then re-packaged it up and hid it back in the vent so Sam and Dean continued thinking they were perfectly protected when all they were doing was hauling around a deactivated and useless hex bag full of human toe mushrooms.

That was Gabriel's style.

Which, unfortunately, still left the question of who the hell belonged to this particular style (who wasn't also a demon, otherwise Crowley would be pretty spot on.)

"Ruby." Dean blinked at the realization that hit him like a lightning bolt. "This is exactly Ruby's style."

Except Ruby was a demon, which was the first thing Sam pointed out in reply. Given that the first thing they had both done upon climbing into the Impala was check the roof to make sure the devil's trap carved into the frame beneath the upholstery was still intact, it couldn't have been a demon that left them some OCD wet dream of a paint-by-numbers hex bag deconstruction. While Dean couldn't see the trap physically to be a hundred percent sure, there weren't any cuts, markings, or changes to the headliner, which meant it was unlikely anyone had managed to disarm the trap.

If they hadn't had time for a full car search, they definitely hadn't had time to reupholster the roof.

Maybe Ruby had a human helping her out. He wouldn't put it past the bitch. Though, that didn't explain how she knew right where to find the hex bag. There didn't seem to be just one answer to this riddle, and that made Dean nervous. He knew everything that was supposed to happen over the next ten years (and was pointedly ignoring the fact that most of it kept changing). This was new, and new was bad. New was very, very bad.

Dean almost hoped it was Ruby. While it might be exceedingly irritating that that nightmare of a demon could be on the playing field early, it also wasn't the worst thing Time could throw at them, either. Ruby had spent a good year, year and a half, pretending to help them out. At least half those times, she actually had helped them out in order to keep her cover. And now they knew her schtick. They could keep her on the end of a dangling string for quite a while with that. They'd probably have half a year at least until she caught on, Dean figured.

Still, he didn't like it.

If it was Ruby, then Dean was killing the bitch extra dead with her own demon-killing knife before she had a chance to dig her claws into Sam this time (regardless of that dangling string). But before that, he was definitely stealing the damn knife.

-o-o-o-

"Could it be Azazel's girl?"

Dean glanced to his brother just as they pulled into the hospital parking lot. Sam's brow was furled in concentration and he'd been quiet most of the ride from the motel.

"The bleeding heart telemarketer?" Dean countered, eyebrow up with incredulity. They didn't know much about whatever new creature Azazel had dug up, other than she had a soft spot for kids apparently, was probably pagan, had glowing green eyes, and liked to screw with them in bars and on the phone. Dean wasn't a fan.

"I don't think a 'bleeding heart' would have done that." Sam gestured with his thumb to the dismantled hex bag in the backseat. They'd have to get it fixed soon. They were on the radar of just about everything at the moment.

"Don't know, Sammy." Dean shrugged one shoulder, playing the devil's advocate role he usually slipped into whenever Sam got lawyer-y. The older Winchester wasn't even aware he did it, or how much it had honed Sam's debate skills over the years before he'd gotten into Stanford. Dean would never have called their family discussions 'practice', but they'd been half the catalyst for Sam wanting to become a lawyer in the first place. "She didn't take the bag. She could've taken it."

Or did the Gabriel thing and re-stashed it, utterly useless to them without their knowhow. Who knew, maybe she didn't have enough knowledge of witchcraft to know to do that in the first place. But something was telling Dean otherwise. First, pagan. Those guys were always all up in their different rituals, spells, and dark crafts (witchy or otherwise). Besides, you didn't go looking (or touching) hex bags if you didn't know how to handle them. Even the least knowledgeable of the supernatural knew that was just asking for trouble.

"No, you're right, she didn't take it," Sam agreed, but with a look. The lawyer look. Not quite a bitchface, just…lawyer face. "She just left us the message that she could have taken it if she wanted to."

"Yeah…alright," Dean agreed, pulling into a parking spot right in front of the hospital entrance. The lot was largely empty, for the most part. "That doesn't sound like a bleeding heart."

Guess they'd be adding pagan warding to the Impala's next upgrade.

-o-o-o-

Andy was bored out of his mind. He'd woken up around nine in the morning, confused and instantly panicking. It might have gotten ugly if not for the heavy dose of morphine running through his system – way stronger than what the Winchesters had chanced giving him – which kept him on the more acceptable side of calm. The cell phone in his hand was the second thing he noticed after 'hospital?', and the nurse coming into his room in response to his spiked heart rate was the third.

Her comforting smile and brief explanation of his location, injuries, and safety did nothing to calm Andy down until he spotted the note, Sam's familiar handwriting guaranteeing in not-so-many-words that the room was warded and this woman couldn't possibly be a demon. Then, and only then, was Andy able to relax enough that the doctor, when he came in, didn't feel the need to re-sedate him. As soon as the two of them left with the guarantee that his fellow 'agents' would be in by eleven to see him, Andy pulled up the phone and got to texting.

Dean's response was immediate. That alone, even more than Dean's message that they would be there as soon as visitor hours opened (ten thirty, Dean insisted, though Andy was really sure the nurse had told him eleven, not that he was gonna argue with a Winchester on a mission), made him feel a million times better.

As for the rest, well, the morphine was taking care of that for now. Until he had to do otherwise, Andy was taking a page out of Dean Winchester's book and not thinking about it.

-o-o-o-

Okay, so the not-thinking-about-it thing had been a lie. Not an intentional lie, but Andy didn't know how Dean did it. How was one supposed to not think about shit? Especially shit this bad?

Andy tried several very hesitant, slow test swallows. His throat hurt only in the way where his body told him it was hurting but his brain didn't actually register any pain. Morphine was fascinating. But there was a tightness and a pull across his skin deep within his throat that clued him in. It was going to be ugly when they weaned him off the drug.

He didn't like the thought, but Andy hoped that wouldn't be anytime soon.

The painkiller made him both sleepy and fuzzy, which in term made it much harder to control his thoughts. Which meant the inevitable, 'I'm never going to talk again, am I?' slipped out before he ever had a chance of wrangling it back in. It also meant, though, that the six follow-up thoughts (ranging from panic to regret to something like resignation, only more, hm, floaty) sort of fizzled off into the cosmos even as he thought them. Because his drugged up brain lacked any sort of attention span, too.

So, you know, could be worse.

Andy texted Sam and Dean no less than fifty times in the hour and a half it took them to head his way (both parties had agreed after Dean offered to be there in ten minutes, regardless of visiting hours, not to rush over. Andy knew he was safe in a room the brothers had personally warded, and harassing hospital staff so early on in an undetermined-length of stay wouldn't win them any bonus points).

The brothers had both showered and dressed (well, Dean had already showered before Andy's first text came through, dressing while he juggled phone and clothes, letting Sam sleep for as long as he could) while Andy snarked back and forth with them, complaining about being bored (Sam's response to that one had been an apology for not thinking to leave him a coloring book and crayons in the middle of the night after they'd rushed him to a hospital to be treated for a serious trauma wound. The jerk), about the lack of hot nurses (he could practically hear Dean's snort of agreement before a response very similar to just that had come through), and definitely complaining about the catheter ('You let them CATH me?! How could you I thought we were friends!' and Sam's answer of, 'Friends don't let other friends wet the bed, Andy.')

Andy was right in the middle of composing a truly spectacular reply to Dean's last remark (which he was actually fairly certain was Sam's, since Dean would most definitely be driving the Impala. Though how much was Sam dictating his brother's response and how much was the younger Winchester's own added opinion was hard to tell) when the door to his room swung open and Dean loudly announced that whatever Andy had to say, he could say it to their faces.

It was ten twenty-nine on the dot.

The nurse who had opened the door for them, still standing in the doorway beside Dean, arm outstretched on the knob, did not look happy at either their presence or volume, but she also had the resigned kind of laughter in her eyes that told Andy she'd already lost any argument she'd had against the older Winchester. He wasn't surprised. She left with a prolonged glare to each of them (longer in Dean's case, and more of a second thought for Sam), as well as a warning that her patient needed rest and if she had to come back in here because they riled him up or upset him, they would not like the consequences.

Dean turned back to Andy with exaggeratedly wide eyes and raised brows as Nurse Ratchet shut the door behind them. "I see why you're whining if you've been dealing with that all morning."

Andy beamed, and it was only, like, half driven by the morphine. Honestly, Nurse Ratchet, or Charlotte as she'd introduced herself that morning ('Lotte for short, though you better not be trying to say either of 'em right now with that throat injury of yours, hon'), was pretty wonderful. Stern as all get-out and took no back-talk (not that Andy was capable, though you'd be surprised what a single look could tell a person, apparently), but she was also kind and comforting. Without the Winchesters immediately around, Charlotte had been pretty awesome backup. She kind of reminded the kid of Bobby Singer, actually.

Just…slightly better looking.

Andy's smile only grew as Dean crossed over to the bed, dropping a duffle bag from his shoulder and nudging it under the raised hospital bed with his foot. It had a change of clothes for the kid, among other things, for whenever they got him out of here. Sam would be in charge of that talk with the Doc later today. Sam joined him as well, pulling something out of his bag and handing it over to the kid.

Andy snorted so hard at the coloring book and little pack of crayons that he actually did feel some pain through the morphine. He ended up wincing, reaching for his bandaged neck and ultimately aborting the move.

"Shit, sorry," Sam hissed, hands raising in apology, but Andy waved him off. This was the best he'd felt in, like, a week (morphine aside, because that was definitely helping), and he wasn't gonna regret a little pain to see Sam and Dean again. Alive, mostly in one piece, teasing him. Not a dream or a hallucination caused by the last firing neurons in his dying, deoxygenated, and blood-starved brain.

All was back to being right in the world.

Well, mostly. Sort of. Okay, really, barely at all.

Andy's grin faltered as those pesky thoughts slipped back through his mind, but he chased them away. There'd be time later, when he wasn't drugged and in enough pain to actually need the drugs, to think depressing things about his future. About a softball player from Berkley or an emo kid who no longer had one.

The smile came back with wavering force behind it. Sam seemed to understand. He took the book and box back, setting them on the table beside the bed. "It's going to be okay, Andy. Did the doctors talk about your condition?"

Sam waved his hand in an 'all of this' sort of motion, mostly aimed at Andy's throat, but really, encompassing pretty much all of him, if they were being honest. Andy raised his hand and made a wishy-washy motion back. Both the doc who'd been in to see him (a different doctor than the one that had performed the surgery last night, apparently, but familiar with his case) and the three different nurses he'd seen throughout the morning had avoided discussing the extent of his injuries completely. Andy guessed from their lack of directness that the prognosis was most definitely worse than the best-case-scenario. They were probably waiting to tell him until he was more stable, less druggy, and also maybe bolstered mentally by the presence of his 'colleagues'.

It was from all that that Andy easily reasoned he'd never talk again. People didn't get all hedgey with you unless there were consequences they knew you wouldn't want to hear. Andy couldn't blame them, and, honestly he didn't really wanna hear that truth yet, either. So he hadn't pushed.

Now, of course, facing Sam's big brown eyes of sorrow and sympathy, Andy internally sighed. There was no getting away from Sam Winchester when he switched those babies to puppy mode. He'd not met a single person capable of resisting that look. According to Dean, the older Winchester had yet to either. So Andy braced himself for the news he knew he didn't want to hear but would have to face eventually.

Might as well face it with the Winchesters by his side, he supposed.

-o-o-o-

Agent Henriksen landed at the Ellsworth Air Force Base at twelve forty nine pm, Mountain Standard Time, go-bag and jacket in hand. A captain greeted him, a car already waiting for him, and he directed his driver to take him to the U.S. Forest Service office in Custer, where he would meet with the District Ranger in charge and the lead homicide detectives on the case from both Custer and Rapid City.

From there, they would take him to Cold Oak, an abandoned mining town that was the scene of their triple homicide. And, Victor hoped, the first real break in the Winchester case.

Chapter End Notes

A/Ns: Aaaaand it took an entire chapter just to get Henriksen in there. Gaaaaaaaah! I was totally like, "I'll bring him into the middle of this chapter and then keep track of his movements throughout the chapter!" Nope. Took an entire chapter just to get to noon deeeeep breath in deeeep sigh out

Acronyms: For anyone who might not recognize North American acronyms or are reading this via an internet translator, AWOL is Away Without Leave. It's a military term for someone who has gone missing without permission.

(I will also be trying to add more of these descriptors after chapters for our non-English or ESL readers. Feel free to flag anything I miss and I'll add it)

Up Next: Andy contemplates a new existence without voice or powers, Sam has some ideas, Dean's contemplating Cas and gay porn (not in the same sentence or even context, and, I promise, still totally in character (I will win you to my side on this promise, just you wait!) ;), and Henriksen is on the move!

Chapter 85: Season 2: Chapter 52

Chapter Notes

Chapter Warnings: Henrisken is on scene and getting suspicious, Andy's healing up and contemplating things, Dean's mostly sleeping.

Actual Chapter Warnings: Baby cliffhanger warning! Like, as cliffhanger-y as we can get while the boys are having actual downtime.

See the end of the chapter for more notes

-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-

The Road So Far (This Time Around)

Season 2: Chapter 52

-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-

Persephone stared at the snoring, drooling, curled up ball of a writer sleeping on the couch, right where she'd left him. He hadn't even woken to her usual knocking on his front door. So Persephone had let herself in, bearing gifts for the Prophet. In one hand she had two cups of coffee in a holder made of some sort of compressed paper, in the other a bag of bagels from the corner store bakery a couple blocks away.

An apology for borrowing Chuck's credit card and phone without his knowledge.

(A well-intentioned apology, although she'd had to use the last of the money she'd withdrawn from the card to buy the coffee and bagels so…)

She sighed at the sight of the author. It was at least partially her responsibility, she figured (though, that's what the coffee and food had been about…). Persephone crossed into the kitchen, setting her peace offerings onto the counter, and taking a moment to slip Chuck's wallet out of her purse and back on top of the toaster, where she'd found it last night (an odd place to store such a thing, but she tended not to question the Prophet…much). His phone she could safely chuck on the ground somewhere between his desk and the fridge; Chuck wouldn't notice, let alone think anything of it when he finally found it.

A groan from the living room had her returning in short order. Chuck was upright, though he hardly looked awake or aware. He squinted at his editorial assistant, standing in the entrance to his kitchen at – it took Chuck three times to read his watch correctly; the sleeve of his robe kept sliding back over it before he could get the three blurry faces down to one (albeit, still blurry) – eleven fifteen in the morning.

Oh. She was actually quite late. And still way, way too early.

"Ugh, I hate you, why are you here?" Chuck slumped back over into the cushions, burying his face in the blessed darkness. His head was killing him, and the abhorrent hatred, loathing, and overall sensitivity to the dimly lit room suggested more than just a hangover. The couch was nice. It was dark and only smelled a little like Cheetos dust and dirty socks. Only a little.

"You have work to do."

The writer just groaned again, his objection somewhat muffled by the darkness. But the sound of something decently weighted being jostled in a paper bag caused Chuck to crack one eye back open and turn his head enough to take in the offering hovering inches from his face. The logo was a little crumpled, but he'd recognize it anywhere.

Aunt Sally's bagels.

Chuck sat upright in an instant, regretting the spike of pain straight through his temple only a little. He was greeted by another gift from on-high as his assistant held out a coffee from the gas station next to Aunt Sally's. Chuck took both offerings with an enthusiasm that bordered on desperate.

"Okay, you changed my mind. I love you again," the writer mumbled through his first bite of cream cheese and lox on a slice of breaded sesame heaven. He chased it down with scolding hot black coffee that only tasted a little burnt and a lot like sugar. Ah, gas station's finest.

"You shouldn't drink so much," Persephone said with absolutely no guilt, despite definitely being the one to encourage him to do so the night before.

"Not drunk," Chuck grumbled, raising a hand to rub at his forehead. His tone was only a tad defensive as he whined, "It's a migraine of inspiration."

Persephone raised an eyebrow. "A new idea for the story?"

Although she was loathe to admit it, Persephone found herself nervous at the idea of reading about her actions in the Prophet's writings, which would no doubt occur every time she inserted herself into the Winchesters' lives. Hopefully, as with the scene he had detailed in the bar that night with Sam, Chuck would not make any connections between the blonde-haired, blue-eyed woman he was putting in his story, and his new Editorial Assistant who happened to have blond hair, blue eyes, and the same damn fake name.

Persephone adjusted the strap of her stupid little purse, refusing to let her unsettled nerves show through her stoic face. The stolen ingredients were safe inside, waiting to be formed into the hexbag from Chuck's notes. The risks, while many (the woman's eyes darted, momentarily, up to the ceiling of the Prophet's home), were still worth the possibility of success.

Focusing on the present and the still groaning writer, Persephone walked a couple steps back from the couch, reaching across his desk to snag a bottle of pills. Holding it out to the man, she shook it a little when he didn't take notice. Chuck raised his head, eyes narrowed to tiny slits, and let out a grateful moan at the sight of his migraine medication.

"Did I say I love you? I meant I really love you." Chuck swiped the pills, dry-swallowing two as quickly as he could get them in his mouth and down his throat.

When the writer finally staggered to his feet, Persephone was already in her chair by the window, sipping at her own coffee (which she learned that morning she liked with copious amounts of something called French vanilla hazelnut creamer (which she assumed came from France, and must be what made it different than the plain cream)). She smiled at him as he blinked blearing at her. Then, adjusting his robe, Chuck stumbled towards his writing desk and slumped down in front of his computer. He hit a random key to wake it up with all the motivation of a man on death row.

He did have work to do, though, and writing usually helped with the headache, almost more than the pills did.

-o-o-o-

Henriksen surveyed the bare, lifeless town of Cold Oak with a clinical eye. He didn't pay much attention to the abandoned buildings or eerie feel in the frigid early evening air. Victor had no interest in the history of the place, spewed to him by the nervous Forest Ranger on their hour long drive into the Middle of Nowhere National Park, or the many rumors generated over the years by the abandoned town, another topic of conversation during the car ride over. No, he was only interested in the three lives lost most recently and the two men that might have taken them.

"This is what's left of the fire."

Ranger Danson, the one who first spotted the blaze and ended up stumbling across the funeral pyre, bodies still burning within, waved at the now blackened, half collapsed structure of wood and broken down building materials. Victor glanced around with narrowed eyes, focusing on the different buildings around them, sections of side boards missing, probably pulled off by the Winchesters. He'd have to get them all dusted for prints if the local LEOs hadn't already.

The Forest Ranger was still talking, though. He seemed to do that a lot.

"It took a while to put the fire out. Didn't exactly have a nearby water source. So there wasn't much left of the bodies-"

"Rapid City took what was left," District Ranger McMarsson, the head of the Black Hills Forest Service department, interrupted his nervous Ranger. The broad-shouldered man stood between Agent Henriksen and Ranger Danson, giving the Federal Agent a bit of a break from the man's rather continuous blabbering. Danson was a good man, great Ranger, but he did tend to keep on endlessly, even more so when he was uncomfortable.

On McMarsson's other side was Detective Sharron Wells of the Custer police department. She was a smartly dressed, sharp woman who'd shook Agent Henriksen's hand with a steady grip bordering on painful. McMarsson didn't know much about the female detective, but she'd given him no problems so far and worked well with his people. And she didn't make Danson so nervous he spewed history facts like they were going out of style. Which was a bonus for everyone.

Although McMarsson's people had already been over the town, Custer PD had been called in immediately for obvious criminal investigation needs. Rapid City had gotten involved when it was clear this case was going to be more than the smaller town of Custer could handle alone, and they seceded lead on the case to their RPD counterparts, primarily for use of their much bigger and better equipped labs. Between the three departments, Cold Oak had been gone through with a fine tooth comb.

McMarsson put his hands on his hips, staring into the depths of charred wood and murder. Things like this weren't supposed to happen in his park, and he didn't like it one bit. "The coroner is working on identification now. So far we know there were two males and one female, all in their early twenties."

"I'll want to see the remains," Victor announced in a professional, detached tone. He imagined the last hours of those three lives hadn't been pleasant, but it was not currently his concern. He had a job to do. Two killers to catch, so that they never hurt anyone like this again.

Ranger McMarsson shrugged his approval. It wasn't much matter to him. Forest Services knew they'd be playing chauffer to the fed as soon as they got the call from Washington that one was on his way. Apparently, the quiet county of Custer had been unlucky enough to host two serial killers for an unknown period of time. McMarsson liked that even less.

"We didn't find much in the rest of the area," Detective Wells took over, having been part of the initial sweep once her department had been called in. It had been late and she'd been on a rare graveyard shift when the call of three homicides in the middle of Black Hills went through the station. "We've located four potential scenes where the murders could have taken place."

"With three bodies?" Victor glanced over at her, eyebrow raised.

"There's two primary locations with blood evidence and signs of a struggle. We're pretty confident about those ones, though we sent the blood out to Rapid City's lab to confirm they're our victims. We should get that report in a day or two." Wells had her hands high on her waist as she addressed Henriksen, blazer hitched up around her wrists, and Victor found he appreciated her no-nonsense attitude. Unlike Ranger Danson, she wasn't intimidated in the least by the federal agent. "The other two sites didn't have much in the way of incriminating evidence; no significant blood pools or spatter, no murder weapon yet, and the coroner's still working on cause of death for two of the vics. But the interior of two buildings, one over there, the other a couple doors down, suggested a struggle. We're running prints and any DNA we could find."

Agent Henriksen nodded. It sounded like the police and forest services departments had this under control. Which meant he could focus solely on following the Winchester's trail. He turned to Ranger Danson, who over-straightened under his attention.

"Tell me about the car."

-o-o-o-

The Winchesters took turns with Andy in the hospital. For most of the first day, Andy slept. Once they told him about the damage to his neck, including the permanent consequences that came with it – which Andy had accepted with the resigned grace of someone already expecting it – the kid had pretty much passed out for the rest of the day. Fairly so, thought the Winchesters. Appropriately so, thought the doctors.

Still, the brothers stayed at the hospital throughout the day. Neither had wanted Andy to wake up alone, in case he did wake up. The kid drifted in and out on occasion, but the morphine kept him pretty out of it and he usually succumbed to the next round of sleep without much fight. The nurses kicked the brothers out at the end of visiting hours, Sam writing another note for Andy and putting his phone back in his limp hand. Then the brothers headed out for some sleep of their own. They had to find another hotel, this one a bit further from the hospital, which left Dean twitchy for multiple reasons. Their sleep was significantly less restful than Andy's drug-induced haze, which both Winchester's probably could have used, but it was sleep, at least.

Dean didn't dream of red eyes or wake to the feeling of someone in the room with them again, but he didn't wake up feeling like sunshine and rainbows, either.

The next morning, the two showed up at the hospital at ten-thirty sharp again, much to the partially amused, partially don't-push-it-gentlemen looks of the two nurses on duty who had apparently been warned by the previous days' shift. Andy was already awake and looking surprisingly more with it. They'd lowered his morphine dosage. Apparently, the doctors were quite pleased – and a little startled - with – the progress he'd made in only a day and a half.

Sam tried (and failed) not to wonder if Azazel had slipped Andy some demon blood as well back in Rivergrove.

Andy waved at them as they came into his room. He was upright and far more alert as Sam dug out a notepad and pen from the plastic bag he was carrying, something they'd picked up on their way back in that morning. It wouldn't be the fastest form of communication, but it might be easier than typing everything out on the small phone screen and passing it back and forth.

They spent the second day tag-teaming the kid again. If Dean went for food, Sam stayed with him and waited until the older Winchester got back before he'd go grab lunch himself. They didn't bring food into the room since Andy couldn't eat any of it, which the Jedi thought was sweet but also kinda silly. That was until his 'lunch' showed up with a nurse in tow and it consisted of mush, mush, and more mush.

Seriously. Was that baby food?!

(It was not, in fact, baby food, as the nurse explained given the very readable look he'd pinned her with. It was pureed apple sauce, pureed mashed potatoes, and pureed tomato soup. And he was to eat it slowly.)

(Andy did not lessen the look. Who. The Hell. Pureed. Tomato soup. By the very definition of being tomato and soup, it should have already been pureed as hell!)

Dean stared at the kid's lunch with equal horror. Sam could see the silent vow to sneak him something in for dinner, and hit his brother on the arm for just thinking it. The younger Winchester rolled his eyes as Dean whined dramatically, then turned to Andy to (as Dean called it) soccer-mom lecture him. The sooner he ate it, the stronger he'd get, and the quicker he'd move on to normal food.

The nurse beamed at the younger Winchester. The other two just glared at the suck-up.

'Yes, mom,' Andy mouthed and Sam shook his head while the psychic dug into his pureed puree.

Bon Appetite.

After that it was a tossup. They never left him alone, but the Winchesters were also trying to deal with the fallout of both Rivergrove and Cold Oak. Bobby was trying to find them the components needed to make new hex bags, there was something they weren't telling Andy (multiple somethings, he was pretty sure), and Dean was climbing the walls (and trying the hide the fact that he was climbing the walls) about Cas being upstairs.

Andy hadn't gotten much more out of Sam concerning that situation (he wasn't stupid; he'd waited until Dean was out of the room before bringing itup). Cas was apparently upstairs being healed by an angel Dean was very certain wasn't on their side. Which, yeah, Andy could see how that might drive him literally up a tree, control freak that he was. A worrying control freak.

A worrying control freak with a solid crush on the angel in danger (at least as far as Andy (a tv-trained professional matchmaker) was concerned).

But, as Sam pointed out, there wasn't much they could do.

Honestly…Andy was a little more worried about the fact that Sam didn't seem to realize Dean had a plan. Otherwise the older Winchester wouldn't be itching to get out and do it, whatever it was. Not to mention anytime Sam used that reasoning – that there was nothing they could do to reach her so they needed to wait – Dean would bite his tongue or the inside of his cheek. He'd done it twice in front of Andy already, something the Jedi picked up on with completely reasonable suspicion.

Oh, Dean definitely had a plan, he just wasn't sharing it with Sam.

He bet that conversation was not going to be pretty. Any plan Dean came up with that he didn't want Sam to know was guaranteed to be a doozy. Andy knew them well enough to know that. Given how any conversation he had about it with Sam would have to be written – either on a phone or notepad passed back and forth (the tedium of his current capacity for communication was proving more frustrating than anything else about this) – Andy was even less inclined to initiate it. Plus, bringing it up would almost absolutely spark an argument between the two brothers, and Andy wasn't quite ready to be in the middle of that yet.

So, for now, he said nothing. (See what he did there? Said. Ha.)

"I was thinking about something," Sam said late in the afternoon when Dean stepped out to take a call from Bobby, probably about Japanese mushrooms or human toes or something. Andy wasn't quite sure (and wasn't quite sure he wanted to know, either. Dean had started muttering under his breath when the phone rang, which was sign enough that Andy shouldn't want to know). "You said you managed to control the demon in the woods with your thoughts."

Andy's bandaged fingers curled ever so slightly into the blanket spread over his legs. It was the only outward tell of his sudden discomfort, because he knew where this conversation was going. He was surprised one of them had waited this long to bring up that little ability he'd managed. Gently, having finally learned over the last two days not to react with rapid movement, Andy shook his head.

Sam scrunched his face up knowingly. "It could help you talk again, Andy."

At least within his immediate circle. Sam, Dean, Cas. Maybe even Bobby, though they'd have to give the older hunter ample heads up that their Jedi was now a telepath.

But Andy was shaking his head again, picking up the pen to jot something onto the notepad next to his thigh. They'd been keeping it on him or within reach at all times. At the moment it just lived next to his leg and had a long list of single comments, often just one or two words. This required a little more.

'More like control people. Like Weber.'

Sam frowned when Andy held the page up. The younger Winchester both had and hadn't thought of that. He knew Andy's powers could be developed further, both from what Dean had told him about the kid's evil twin in his timeline, and from Andy's own story. But he hadn't quite connected the dots on how Andy would feel about learning to do the thing that had gotten his girlfriend killed. Or, if he had, he'd hoped those dots wouldn't be so obvious to the kid.

"It doesn't have to be control," Sam reasoned, shrugging one shoulder, but those big brown eyes were full of understanding. "Just communication."

Andy faltered, lowering the notepad, staring at it without reading any of the scribbles there. Controlling that demon in the woods had both terrified him and been exhilarating enough to terrify him. Andy could see how easy it would be to misuse that. It had been simple enough back when he'd actually had to talk to people to get what he wanted. This…this seemed way too easy to abuse, and Andy didn't trust himself. Not anymore.

"There's something else." Sam smiled gently when Andy looked up. "I don't know for sure, but the demon you described – a little girl? – it sounds like an Acheri."

Andy didn't see the significance, and gave a little shoulder-head-shrugshake.

"Acheri's usually take the form of young girls, and bring sickness and death from the hills and forests. They were pretty feared in small towns back in the day." Sam pulled out his phone, bringing up the internet app and handing it over to Andy. The kid skimmed a blog post with scanned pages of an ancient, hand-written book. There was an illustration on the page that was pretty damn similar to the thing that attacked him. Enough so that Andy put the phone down and had to take a deep breath. Sam's sympathetic puppy eyes were on full power mode as he took his phone back. "There's a legend, though, that the only thing that can stop an Acheri demon is a red ribbon tied around your neck."

Sam let the words sink in. Andy started at his curled hands, then blinked and looked up with a frown, staring at Sam until he got it. Fingers crept up towards his neck, and the younger Winchester nodded.

"Like I said, I don't know for sure, Andy. But I can tell you when we found you, your neck was definitely wrapped in red." With melted, sickeningly shiny red flesh, but Sam didn't need to say that part. Let Andy think he meant blood. "It might not have been your powers entirely. It may have been a combination of the Acheri's unique weakness, too."

And if it had been, it was more than possible the injury that had almost killed him twice also saved his life.

Sam's words did exactly what the younger Winchester had intended them to. The idea that maybe it hadn't been his powers alone that allowed him to control a demon helped lessen the terror that just acknowledging those abilities brought up. Andy took in a deep breath, thinking about what that meant, wondering if it even mattered in the scheme of everything. He let out a long, slow breath, and then nodded at Sam.

He'd think about it.

The brunet just smiled in return. Then Dean was coming back into the room, flipping his phone closed and asking why the two were smiling like that (then checking the space around him for some sort of prank just waiting to spring up) which made Andy laugh, body language clear as day even if no sound came out.

Sam didn't mention their conversation. It was likely he and Dean had already talked about it. Even if they hadn't, it was Andy's choice to make. The young Jedi watched the two start up one of their classic back and forth bickers about absolutely nothing important, and turned his thoughts inward to consider the possibility he previously hadn't even let himself think about.

-o-o-o-

Despite the gruesome nature of the three homicides in Cold Oak, the case itself was an exciting turn of events for Agent Henriksen. He'd only been on the Winchester's tail for half a year, and up until the two had been arrested in Baltimore almost a month ago, the case had been nothing more than a paperwork trail of tentatively related killings or crimes, possible sightings, and largely credit card fraud. Victor had done more joint work with the White Collar Crime Unit over this case than any actual bounty hunting. It had been…tedious. But Henriksen was nothing if not patient, and it almost always got him his man in the end.

This case, however, was the most tangible link he had to the Winchesters yet, and it was all in the evidence. They'd gathered more evidence in two days than he'd had on the Winchesters in six months. The brothers and their unique car had been spotted on one of only three roads leading towards the area of Cold Oak, which wasn't enough to tie them directly to the murders.

(Or, as the Rapid City homicide detective liked to remind him, the 'destruction of evidence' when it came to burning the bodies, as they had absolutely no proof that the Winchesters had murdered anyone or even been present for the crime. Detective Gray's money was on the three victims murdering each other. Henriksen thought Detective Gray was an idiot).

The lack of definitive non-circumstantial evidence didn't actually matter to Henriksen, at this point. He had more than a dozen similar cases in the Winchester's file, with nothing more than possibly related crimes, all of which had similar or even more tentative connections to the Winchesters than Cold Oak. It was always the two men being spotted within an area close enough to the crime or speaking to one of the victims. Never anything to prove them guilty or eliminate them as potential suspects. Just annoying, ambiguous grey land in between. But, like he'd said, Henriksen didn't care about that yet. Because eventually, that pile of evidence would become an undeniable mountain, and he'd bury those boys beneath it.

It had taken Henrik months to build those cases together, some going back decades (believed to be the work of their father, though his slowly thickening file and whereabouts were just as ambiguous and tentative as his sons'). It had been worth it though, as it always was. Because what had shown up in that slowly mounting mountain of circumstantial evidence that Henriksen hadn't even seen until now, the pattern hidden beneath the chaos of a senseless crime (the Winchester's calling apparently), was the funeral pyre. More than one of those cold cases involved trace human remains and bones found on burned-out funeral pyres across the nation. Funeral pyres just like the one at Cold Oak.

It was the closest tie-in he had yet. It was no smoking gun, but it sure looked like the beginnings of a solid modus operandi.

He had their car, too. Victor wouldn't normally put too much stock in that kind of find. Criminals like the Winchesters were smart, usually too smart to stick with one car for long, which was how the FBI had been assuming they operated. Up until now. Because Henriksen knew everything there was to know about Sam and Dean Winchester on paper. That included everything about their family, like the purchase of a '67 Chevy Impala by one John Winchester thirty-three years ago. There was no record of John Winchester giving it to either of his sons. There was barely any record of John Winchester after 1983, the year Mary Winchester died in a house fire and the remaining Winchester family fell off the map. Henriksen hadn't thought anything of it; the man had ditched the car at some point, as any smart criminal would have.

But the photo from Ranger Danson's dash car meant something spectacular. Something monumental to the case. Something, Victor was sure, was going to blow it wide open in the end. The Winchesters were sentimental. There was no other reason to keep that flashy and memorable of a vehicle while on the run from a life of crime. They'd kept the car for thirty years. A smoking gun all their own, that was going to keep right on smoking, and the Winchesters were too sentimental to toss it in the nearest river.

Henriksen was gonna make sure it was that sentimentality that he hung them with.

The plates on the muscle car were bogus, of course, leading to an elderly Hispanic man living in Arizona who had no clue what a '67 Chevy Impala even looked like, let alone that he had one registered in his name. Although tracking them through the car was a longshot, there was a chance the Winchesters might not think to change the plates. If they committed murders and destroyed evidence as often as the FBI was beginning to think and hadn't had a close call until Baltimore, they were probably used to getting away with minimal forensic countermeasures. Again, it boded well for Henriksen.

Not that he expected to catch the Winchesters this time. Oh, no, this was the long game and Henriksen was digging in. If the brothers stuck true to the pattern Victor had so far been able to put together on them, they were long gone from Custer County and Black Hills National Forest. If they were smart, which he knew they were, the Winchesters were no longer in South Dakota.

Still, just because Victor liked his i's dotted and t's crossed, the Rapid City PD had put a state-wide BOLO out on a '67 Chevy Impala with Kansas plates, and the FBI would be extending that to a nation-wide alert.

-o-o-o-

Andy did consider Sam's words carefully. He spent the afternoon thinking it over as the Winchesters bickered, brought him into the bickering, played cards with him, played cards with themselves while he napped or stared out the window in thought, and took turns stretching their legs and getting fresh air (guilty looks on their faces every time, which Andy just waved off). At one point, Dr. Richards came back on shift, and Sam took the opportunity to speak with him about an estimated length of stay, stepping into the hall with him for what was sure to be a lengthy conversation.

Dean was currently conked out in the chair beside Andy, one foot up on his bed, boot having been removed after a nurse glared so chidingly at the man that Andy had leaned forward and started untying the shoe for him just so she wouldn't wake him up. It didn't hurt that he'd gotten a sympathetic mother smile from the woman, who assisted him with the task, and all but patted him on the head like a good boy before heading back out. Dean had remained oblivious to the almost imminent threat on his life, which was testament to just how tired he was.

Which was fair, Andy thought. Rivergrove had been four days ago now, and he doubted either Winchester had gotten much sleep over that time. Andy had the luck (if you wanted to call it that) of a demon-infused refresher before waking up in Cold Oak, along with almost a full day of drug-induced rest since. And he was still exhausted.

(Granted, both the doctors and the Winchesters assured him that was to be expected after such physical trauma, but that wasn't the point, here.)

Andy paused in his coloring as a thought occurred to him, crayon hovering above his partially filled-in cartoon hotrod car as it sped around a race track (shut up, yes he was making use of the coloring book and crayons, so what? He was bored and the childhood activity was actually quite soothing in its mindlessness, even if his bandaged fingers made it a far more challenging task than he'd first anticipated.) He'd spent the last two hours doing nothing but going in moral and philosophical circles about his newfound ability. It was all about what was right versus what he wanted versus what he could have.

His powers scared him, in ways they'd never scared him before. In fact, the realization that fear brought on now (that he'd never been truly scared of what he could do before) scared him even more. What kind of person was he that he controlled others so readily, and didn't worry about any of the consequences? It had been different when all he'd wanted in life was a coffee or a pizza or some free weed. He hadn't felt like he'd been hurting anyone. Now, though…knowing what Azazel wanted him to do, what he expected him to do to survive (and knowing the yellow-eyed demon never expected him to survive in the first place…), well, it changed things.

In a life or death situation, what did he want? The answer should be obvious, but Andy was a philosophy junky. It was sort of his jam when he wasn't busy smoking the biggest bong load he could feasibly get (and often times pushing the boundaries of that feasibility). And while moral philosophy wasn't the field he'd had the most interest in (after all, no one liked moral philosophers), he'd still read enough about it to know this was a conundrum if there ever was one. Take that famous Trolley problem and add to it that you were also psychic and knew the future and had super powers.

Really, he should write a book. (Not that anyone would read it, and those who did would immediately assume he had a few screws loose due to the whole, you know, super powers bit.)

So Andy was caught in a dilemma. He didn't want to control people with his thoughts. That much was a known. The heart monitor attached to his finger would start beeping faster anytime he thought about the possibility. Probably a touch of PTSD, which Sam would tell him he could work through in order to access his powers if he wanted to. The thing was, it was incredibly obvious to Andy (probably the only clear thing going on in his muddled mind right now) that he didn't want to.

He didn't want to control people anymore. Not with this mind. Not through a means that had almost no limitations.

Yeah, his Jedi abilities had helped the Winchesters out of a couple of pickles over the last three months, but in the year he'd had these powers, they'd hurt far more than they helped. Tracy was dead because of them. Amanda and Scott were dead in part because of them. Others had more than likely been hurt by them, too. Even if the offenses seemed minor at the time, Andy couldn't actually know if he'd done any real damage to the people he commanded about, because he'd never thought to look.

That was a terrible thing, and he was a terrible person for it. He didn't want to be that person anymore.

So, controlling people with his mind was out. If doing it with his voice had left him without consequence or guilt, the unlimited control he could possess with his mind was a definite rabbit hole that would probably lead him straight to Hell. But, and this was what he'd spent the last two hours going in circles about, what if he could still use his powers for communication, but only communication?

Which he knew the answer to, even if he wished he didn't.

When he'd first gotten his voice thing, he'd had a terrible time at the start. It would have been scary if he hadn't been so busy being amazed at what he could do. There'd been more than once when he'd turned a simple turn-of-phrase into a command without ever meaning too. Looking back at it, he'd been so lucky that none of those times had been anything worse than a friend jumping off a bridge all of two feet off a dry creek bed or another friend wiping an entire table's contents onto the ground after Andy told him to 'knock it off.' But those things had clued him into his utter lack of control, and at least the most basic of consequences. Which had ultimately made him work harder at control.

Those slipups were still going to happen, though. He hadn't been trying to command people when he'd first gotten his powers, but he'd still done it. Even if he said he wasn't going to command people with his brain, there was always the possibility it would happen anyway.

He knew from experience how much time and practice it took to have complete control, and re-learning his powers using just his mind was going to be like starting from scratch. He could tell from the headache he'd gotten talking to the demon in the woods. So he was going to mess up, and that was where he currently was in his cycle of should-I-shouldn't-I's.

How much did intent matter when factored into something morally indefensible? And what if all his slip-ups were just small and harmless, like last time? Did that make them excusable?

Somehow, it didn't feel like it, and Andy didn't really know when that had changed.

Over the last forty-five minutes of listening to Dean's snores while coloring his little anthropomorphic racecar (from a kid's movie most imaginatively named Cars), Andy had been leaning towards dismissing the idea entirely. It wasn't worth it. Everything about his powers so far had led him to this. Sitting in a hospital bed, using crayons to color in a cartoon car, unable to speak because he'd gotten his throat slashed by a psycho. Andy knew it was probably PTSD and survivor's guilt talking, but he didn't feel like he had any right to just get over the fallout because he had super powers. Like there were, once more, no consequences for him. He couldn't do that when he knew it would cost other people their autonomy at least a couple of times as he figured it out. More so, Andy would be able to take that autonomy away completely, at anytime, to anyone, once he did figure it out.

Even if he promised himself he wouldn't, that was too much power for him to wield. At least when his powers had been verbal, there was some limitation, some sense of physical boundaries. He'd had to be within earshot of someone, for starters. With straight-up thinking something to someone's brain? Andy didn't even think there'd be limitations, and that was the real thing scaring him. He'd never been good with self-control or temptation. His life in Guthrie, low-key as his crimes had been before Weber had changed everything, was still proof.

And now, with the Winchesters in his life, the life they led, and Azazel's plans… the stakes were a lot higher than some free pizza and pot.

So telepathic communication was out so long as it came with even the most remote possibility of controlling others.

Which meant, telepathic communication was out.

Now, though, as he stared down at the half colored picture on the little table stand over his legs, Andy had a new thought. A new possibility niggling at the edges of his drugged brain.

His problem was that he didn't want to control people. Words, whether formed aloud or sent straight to the brain, would end up doing just that, one way or another. But maybe…pictures wouldn't. Andy blinked at the car, the thought suddenly exciting. If he could…if he could just beam images straight into someone's mind, it wouldn't be a command. It would be up to their brain to interpret what the image meant, which would remove his intent entirely!

He'd still be able to communicate. Sure, it might not be the cleanest or straight forward way, but he was okay with that. It would be faster than writing everything out. Bonus: his survivor's guilt and PTSD and all that were totally satisfied with the compromise. Partial penance, partial solution. Good enough for him!

If he could even do it, of course. He'd never tried before, but if he could send thoughts to someone, he didn't see why he couldn't send images instead. Of course, he'd need to practice, which meant someone to practice on….

Andy's gaze slid oh-so-slowly over to the sleeping Winchester, a wicked grin spreading across his face. He hadn't minded before when Dean fell asleep on keep-Andy-entertained duty, but now he was ecstatic about it.

Okay, okay. How to begin?

The psychic closed his eyes, deciding to start easy. He pictured Sam, as clear as he could, with his gigantor frame and his plaid over-shirts and floppy brown hair. Andy opened his eyes, image firmly in mind, and turned to Dean. Squinting at him with as much concentration as he could summon, Andy pictured himself physically pushing the image of Sam, like it was a Polaroid floating in a black void, towards the slumbering Winchester.

He had to try several times over several very long minutes – taking a break half way through to actually pant like he'd been physically exerting himself – but he knew something was happening when he started to get a headache. It was a familiar pain, front-forward in his brain, stabbing at the temples but feeling like a million pounds on top of his brow in the front. He'd gotten to know that pain pretty well over the last year.

"Sam…" Dean muttered, foot twitching on the bed as the hunter's head rolled to the side. There was a frown forming between his eyes. Andy stared with bated breath. The hunter kicked out again. "Five more minutes."

The older hunter tried to roll over in the chair, failing miserably but luckily not falling out or waking himself up. Andy, ecstatic with success to the point of silent giggling, clapped his hands together (quietly).

Oh, god, it worked!

Andy giggled again, practically jumping up and down in the bed, but stopping when Dean twitched, moving his leg and almost knocking it off the edge of the mattress. The psychic settled down. He still needed a test subject, so Dean needed to keep sleeping on.

Okay. That was a good first attempt, but it wasn't actual proof. It was possible Dean was just dreaming about Sam. Any scientist worth their salt (not that Andy was a scientist, but shush, he was enjoying this) would test their theory further.

Alright. Time for Stage Two then.

Closing his eyes once more, Andy pictured Castiel. He didn't have nearly as many memories to pull from for her, but he'd spent a couple of days total in her presence and was fairly confident of his mental picture. Once more, he slapped that beauty on the mental manifestation of a Polaroid picture and sent it floating Dean's way.

This time the sound Dean made was deeper, more upset, as he muttered Cas's name and pinched his brow.

'Yeah, she's fine my ass,' Andy thought as he took in Dean's clear distress between bouts of congratulations and patting himself on the back.

A wicked, truly inappropriate thought followed, and Andy had to bite his lip, looking away from the sleeping Winchester. Getting Dean to say Cas's name in a completely different way was an absolutely hilariousidea given their obvious unresolved sexual tension. And Andy was pretty sure he could make it happen. But, also, it was maybe just a little not okay while the angel was currently MIA, possibly in danger, and Dean was legitimately worried about her.

And, oh yeah, also, she was an angel. Making Dean picture those sorts of things about an angel was probably blasphemous six ways from Sunday. Not to mention sending Dean images of making out with Cas would require Andy had to picture it first, which was definitely not cool. Cas was his friend (he sort of assumed, at least) and Dean was definitely his friend. There was surely some bro-code somewhere that said picturing your friends getting it on was probably not-the-best.

But… Andy realized something as an equally wicked idea formed in his brain. What he really considered Dean as, more than a friend, was a big brother. A big brother who pranked him, bickered with him, pushed all his buttons. It was totally okay to mess with a big brother like that. Especially since the psychic had another, far safer idea than sending him images of Cas. It even stuck to the bro-code.

Well, mostly. Like eighty percent.

Okay, sixty five, but that was still good enough.

Andy gathered every bit of his extensive pornographic knowledge to him and re-set his sights on the sleeping Winchester.

-o-o-o-

Dean jolted awake, sweat pooling down his back and panic gripping his lungs.

What the hell.

What. The. Hell.

He had just…he'd just been…had he… Had he just dreamt about gay porn?!

There was…there was no way. No. Way. But, he'd…uh…he had been. There'd been flashes. Clips. Like he'd been in one of those old-time theatres with the projectors that were shit and often flashed between scene changes or skipped the reel.

A reel of gay porn.

What. The. Mother. Effing. Hell.

Dean hadn't even- he'd never- okay, there had been that one time, but it had been curiosity and nothing more. And, yeah, it hadn't been as bad as he'd been expecting, but it really hadn't done anything for him either. Enough so that he hadn't even finished the vid!

That had been years ago. What the hell was he doing thinking – dreaming – about something like that, right now?!

The man from the future was still having an straight-up mid-life existential crisis, hands white-knuckled around the edges of the chair he was rigidly perched on, when he heard an aborted, muffled choking sound. The hunter flinched first, realizing he wasn't alone after having woken up from a wet dream about mother effing gay porn! But as he turned to the source of the noise, remembering where he was when he saw Andy in the hospital bed, he immediately realized the kid was trying and failing with everything he was not to burst out laughing.

He was also holding his head like he had the world's most massive headache, and blood was dribbling down his face from one nostril. But he was grinning like an idiot.

Torn between immediately going on the defense, thinking Andy somehow knew what he'd been dreaming out, and calling for a nurse because the kid was bleeding, Dean sat straight up, foot falling off the bed with a thud. He was ready to do both, holler for help in case Andy had an aneurism or something, and spew whatever vitriol it took to make the kid forget anything he'd seen or heard. But Dean pulled up short, halfway out of his chair, when something else occurred to him.

Honestly, if you asked later, he might not be able to tell you how he knew. Maybe it was the knowledge that Andy's brother had developed his powers into something far more mental than physical. Maybe it was a vague memory of images flashing across his mind once before, of an old bell with an oak tree that Bobby recognized and had led them to Cold Oak. Maybe it was the way the kid's nose bled like Sam when he pushed his powers. Maybe it was knowing Andy had controlled a demon with his brain less than forty-eight hours ago. Whatever it was that clued him in, suddenly Dean knew exactly where that dream had come from.

Dean launched fully out of his chair, face reddening. "That was you?!"

Andy couldn't help it. Couldn't hold it back any longer. He burst into mostly silent laughter, huffs of air more than actual sound, almost crying with amusement. Dean wasn't much of a lip reader, but he could see the 'I can't believe it worked!' pretty clear as day across the kid's bloody lips.

Sam walked in less than twenty seconds later to Dean trying to strangle the shit out of the kid without actually making physical contact with his throat while Andy mouthed, 'Not the throat!' over and over again, still laughing hard enough he had tears running down his cheeks.

-o-o-o-

Dean was rubbing his chest as they left the hospital that night, Andy in better spirits than they'd seen since he'd woken up, and Dean still grumbling about the whole thing. Sam, who hadn't approached that fiasco with a forty foot pole, now glanced at his brother as they climbed into the Impala. His own carefully hidden amusement over Andy's weird antics (not that carefully, given the glares Dean was still sending his way), finally faded as he took in the older Winchester.

Dean had handled the little prank about as well as Sam could expect; he'd only tried to murder the kid, like, three times through the evening and night. Which was one less than Sam would have guessed, so that was good, even. But he was rubbing at his chest. He'd been doing that a lot since Rivergrove, but now Dean had been at his sternum since they'd left Andy's room: four floors, one elevator, and a walk to the car ago.

"Are you okay?" Sam asked, possibly the most direct question he'd aimed Dean's way since Cas had gotten them out of Oregon. The younger Winchester hadn't been there for the trap that had so gravely injured the angel, but Dean gave him the cliff-notes version afterward. Sam had seen Cas slap a hand to his brother's chest for the second time apparently, eyes flaring a terrifying and gorgeous blue-white, before all three of them had shown up at Bobby's.

He'd been avoiding asking just what that light had meant for the sliver of grace in Dean's chest, but Sam couldn't imagine it was anything good.

Dean noticed his hand, dropping it from his chest as soon as Sam's question registered. He settled his arm on the windowsill of the Impala, fingers tapping an impatient beat as they drove towards the motel. "I'm fine."

Sam let the silence hang for just the right amount of time. "And Cas? The, uh, one in your chest? Is he still…"

In there?

His older brother fidgeted, dropping his hand from the windowsill only to put it back up a second later, clearly uncomfortable. He chewed on his tongue, then on his lip, then twitched his mouth back and forth before finally admitting in a low, frustrated tone, "I don't know."

Sam let that sink in, looking out to the black night and the road passing beneath them. He hadn't really expected more than that. He'd hoped, maybe, that Dean knew what Cas had done to him, to that sliver of the other Castiel. But he hadn't held out a lot of hope for it, he supposed, given the way Dean kept rubbing at his chest.

"Does it hurt?" Sam cast a side glance his brother's way, but he wasn't pushing.

Dean gave up and starting rubbing those knuckled circles across his sternum again. "No. Yes. Not really." The older hunter shook his head, frustration clear on his face and in the way he huffed out his next breath of air. "It hurt when Cas did it. Like…a vacuum straight to my insides. But now… Look, I don't know, alright? I don't know what he-she did. If she just soul-searched me for a bit of extra juice, or if she took whatever was left of Cas. I don't know."

"Isn't a soul-search more, er, invasive?" Sam's brow was pinched, his gaze back on his brother, though mind far away. He remembered Dean giving him some brief details about an angel's ability to search a soul for a contract or for an energy boost, but Dean hadn't described it as anything pleasant. Not that what Cas had done to his brother was anything close to pleasant but… Sam shook his thoughts away. He just figured touching someone's soul took more than a palm to the chest.

"Hell yeah," Dean answered, but the comment was bitter at best, sarcastic at most. "They hurt like a bitch, and usually involve some elbow-deep action. But with a sliver of Cas's grace all tangled up in my soul, I figure, maybe he- she's got a direct line."

At least, that's what he hoped. Dean didn't know for sure what Cas had taken from him that night for a power boost, but he sure as hell hoped it had been a bit of his own soul. Some left-over juice. Even a full chunk if she needed it. Ridiculous, really, to hope that an angel had taken a piece of his soul instead of absorb what was left of his- her- (no, his?) own grace.

But, childish and utterly ridiculous as it was…Dean didn't want to lose that last bit of the Cas he knew. He didn't want to lose the last of his friend. And the feeling in his chest….

"All I know," Dean repeated, throat swelling with emotion he refused to acknowledge, "is that I used to have a supernova in my chest, and now I don't."

Which was a masterpiece in the art of understatement, but Sam didn't need to know about the hole that supernova had left behind. An endless pit, a scar from Hell that had never filled, an emptiness inside him that not even Famine had been able to contend with. A hollow nothingness that had been there for years and years, except for this last year. This last year, Dean had almost forgotten all about that hole. Had thought maybe it didn't exist anymore, not in this body that hadn't made a deal, hadn't gone to Hell. But that didn't make sense, did it? It was his soul that had been to the pit, and it was his soul Cas had sent through time. Of course it came with all its scars.

It's just that for the last year, Cas's grace had been filling that hole. Now it was gone and Dean was left more wrecked then when he'd first climbed out of his own grave with a chest that didn't feel like his. He'd almost forgotten what it felt like to be so damn empty inside.

Of course, Sam didn't need to know any of that.

His younger brother was silent for a long time. Long enough that Dean almost thought they'd leave this conversation in the dust as they pulled into the motel parking lot. But Sam, god love him, wasn't quite done.

"It doesn't mean he's gone," the beanstalk said softly, treading what he knew was a live-wire.

"No, it doesn't," Dean agreed, though his tone was hardly a positive thing. He turned off the engine and climbed out of the Impala. Sam followed as the older Winchester turned towards him, elbows on the top of the car, keys jingling in hand. "We're not gonna know what it means. Not until we get our Cas back."

The words were final. Firm and bitter and hard. But Dean didn't push it any more than that. Just headed for the door to their room, Sam trailing behind. The younger Winchester knew his brother wanted to be out there, looking for a way to get Cas back. He was glad, in some ways, that Dean hadn't just up and left yet. He knew that time was fast approaching. All the younger Winchester could do, though, was hope Dean gave him the time to get Andy safe and settled, so Sam could at least join his brother for whatever monumentally stupid plan he had rattling up there in his skull.

-o-o-o-

Henriksen entered the Custer Police station at a bright and early six am. He'd never been one to sleep in when there was work to do (in other words, he'd never been one to sleep in). Now that both Custer and Rapid City PD had cleared the crime scene, the Forest Service didn't have much more to offer than to keep an eye on Cold Oak to make sure no one suspicious returned. Not that Victor thought they would. That wasn't the Winchester's style. The investigation had moved to the Custer Police Station, but Henriksen planned to drive up to Rapid in the afternoon and check in with the team there. Sometimes a little FBI presence went a long way in getting those tedious reports back just that much faster.

Other officers were just getting off the graveyard shift when Henriksen settled at the temporary desk he'd been given. The morning crew was trickling in around him with bleary faces and not-yet-devoured coffee in their hands. Victor set his own morning brew down, pausing at a new folder in the little 'in' filing box on the corner of his desk. It was red, with a sticky-note attached in a handwriting he hadn't yet seen while in South Dakota.

The note just said, 'Blood Report, RPD'

Henriksen flipped the file open, surprised that it had come back sometime in the middle of the night or very early morning. One of the things he'd expected to put a little pressure on when he visited Rapid City later that day was the last of the evidence processing from Cold Oak. He wasn't expecting much from it, but he couldn't dot those i's or cross those t's until it was all back.

For reasons just like this one.

Victor stared in momentary shock at the freshly printed report, crisp black words on bright white paper. He reread it, heartbeat picking up, excitement following in its wake. The blood evidence, labeled number four, which Henriksen recalled was the puddle in the middle of one of Cold Oak's two intersections, did not match any of their victims.

There was a fourth victim. They had a missing body.

Victor dug through his files, scattering them in a mess across the surface of the desk, but that was of little consequence. He pulled the photo from Ranger Danson's dash cam, now famed in his mind as the first solid trail in the Winchester case, and stared at it for the thousandth time. But this time, he was looking at Sam Winchester's turned head, profile features lit by Danson's headlights, in a completely new light.

The younger Winchester was turned towards the darkened, obscured back row of the Impala, partially leaning over his own seat. Just like you would if you were checking on someone in the backseat, possibly injured or even lying down.

Henriksen turned to the nearest person, a young officer who was immediately startled by being addressed directly by their visiting FBI agent. "I need a map of the area and all of the hospitals within a hundred miles of Cold Oak."

Chapter End Notes

Acheri Demon: So I had that entire chapter between Andy and the Acheri already written out, with Andy controlling the demon, when I went to double check the description of the little girl and stumbled onto that fact about the red ribbon. And I just…blinked. Stared at the computer. Giggled. Maybe a little maniacally. I love when things happen to line up perfectly all on their own XD

Andy's secondary power: The ability to send images to other people (particularly gay porn) was taken from the show, and originally something I never liked the inclusion of. It always seemed like such poor writing that Andy showed up, just happened to have developed a power that could reach Dean, who-knows-how-far-away, to perfectly tell him how to find Sam. Seemed like a cheap way to solve the problem of getting Dean to Cold Oak. But, with his slit throat, that power development actually makes sense! And I am all for sticking to canon while also fixing things!

It also meant Andy could send Dean clips of gay porn. Cuz this is still Andy we're talking about here XD Acronyms: For those not familiar with North American acronyms, LEO is a Law Enforcement Officer. Most shows I've seen that deal with other agencies, like the FBI or CIA, refer to the cops at the crime scene as local LEOs. No idea if they do this in real life, but it has a nice ring to it ;) MIA is Missing In Action, a military term for someone who's whereabouts are currently unknown, usually last seen in the field.

Chapter 86: Season 2: Chapter 53

Chapter Notes

A/Ns: I know, I know, a Monday posting is just weeeeeird these days, but I took a trip this weekend and did not make it to the airport early enough either time to edit and post the chapter. So it's a teensy bit late ;) Or, really, it's a week early, if you think about it! Considering it's almost the length of two chapters, I did give more than a half-second thought to just waiting and posting next weekend instead XD

(We all know I'm too impatient and excited to actually do that, though...)

Chapter Warnings: Andy's playing Pictionary with other people's heads, Dean's fessing up that he does have a plan to get Cas back, and Henriksen is closing in, by both sheer luck and damn good detecting. Lucky for the Winchesters, they've got someone on their side. A certain someone who can't manage to hand over a bunker key without plans going horribly awry, but who can pull off a little harmless distraction with a modicum more success.

See the end of the chapter for more notes

-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-

The Road So Far (This Time Around)

Season 2: Chapter 53

-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-

By noon on Andy's third day in the hospital, his improvement was physically visible. He was no longer on a heart monitor, he'd convinced the nurses to let him get up and move around (primarily with the argument that he was capable of making it to the bathroom, so they could take the damn catheter out), and while he was still on a diet of mush, mush, and more mush, he was IV free and Dean was using his flirtatious nature with the nurses to sneak him extra chocolate puddings with all meals (he'd even gotten Lotte (nurse Ratchet) to bring Andy one as a midnight snack once). Despite Andy's complaints (delivered in the form of very expressive looks), all the mush felt good on his throat, and it was nice to actually eat something that wasn't in the form of an IV or nutrient-enhanced water. More that that, it was a relief each time just to know that he was still capable of eating (a serious concern when he'd first woken up to a liquid diet and a very swollen throat) and that he would get to eat real, solid food again in the future.

As an extra bonus, Sam talked again with the doctor on duty when they'd shown up that morning. The man seemed under the impression they could release Andy on an out-patient program within a day or two. Dean was very confident they could get that shortened, much to Sam's disapproval but ultimate agreeance.

All things considered, life was pretty wonderful.

Which was why, when lunchtime came and it was clear Dean was both bored of the same four walls and antsy for food of his own, Andy shooed them out with flapping hands. The Winchesters blinked at the motion, clearly meant for both of them.

"You sure?" Sam asked, glancing around like Andy might be shooing two other brothers out of his hospital room.

Andy nodded, then narrowed his eyes in intense concentration.

Sam grabbed at his head with a hiss and Dean practically reeled, both Winchesters assaulted by images, one after the other, a couple flashing too fast to process in the moment.

"Slow down!" Dean groused, straightening up with a wince as his head pinged in the after-rush that Andy's new abilities always caused. It never lasted longer than a second or two – like standing up too quickly from a bent over position – but Dean wasn't a fan, regardless. Of course, it could just be he wasn't a fan of anyone poking around in his head to start with. Even if Andy insisted there was poking, yes, but around, no.

"Ow," Sam muttered, rubbing at his temple. Andy's new form of communication didn't come across as clearly or as easily for the younger Winchester, probably because of their matched demon blood acting as a natural deterrent for Sam. To be honest, Andy hadn't even been sure it would work on him at all. They had both been surprised when the kid gave it a try the night before, only for Sam to wince, rubbing at his temple but confirming he'd received a flash of the Impala sitting in a motel parking lot. He'd also gotten a relatively minor headache, lasting longer than the brief head-spinning sensation Dean reported. The younger Winchester certainly had questions of his own about it, though they were formed more from a place of unhealthy curiosity rather than any real concern.

Nerd, Dean called him, only barely managing to hide his very real concern behind the insult.

Now Sam blinked a couple of times, trying to put the images together into something that made any sort of sense. Andy hadn't really mastered that part of this new power yet. His choice of pictures could be somewhat questionable, the images weren't always in a sensible order – often with multiple pictures coming through for the same concept, sometimes unintentionally – and the occasional visual word interspersed in between when Andy failed to form a picture for certain concepts. Those images were usually of other visual aids, like commercials from TV, billboards and others ads. Or, that one time, Sesame Street.

That time, Dean had insisted for three straight minutes that the kid wanted chicken for dinner. You know. Big bird. Roasting on an open fire. Which was not remotely close to what the kid had actually sent them. Andy threw a pillow at his head and tried again, the pictures coming through with a distinctly vicious tint at their edges the second time.

Right now, though, the older Winchester was staring at the kid with a bewildered frown. Like his brother, he was trying his best to piece together a cheap black wig on a creepy-ass, blank-faced manikin, a flash of a Star Wars lunchbox, a clip of Yosemite Sam getting kicked out a door to land on his butt, some random image of a person with a very bad hair day (or maybe a dude recently electrocuted? That sorta fit with Andy right now…), a cheeseburger and fries on a classic fifties diner placemat and tray, and last, but not least, a quick flash of that obnoxious kid from Finding Nemo freaking out and slapping at a fish flopping around on her head.

"Uh…You want us to stick your finger in an electric socket and then… go fishing for lunch?"

Andy wiped at the blood running from his nose – less and less each time he used his newfound ability – and gave them that look he always gave the Winchesters when he thought they were purposefully misunderstanding him. Which was only actually about fifteen percent of the time. Well, thirty when it came to Dean.

The brothers winced again at the next round of images, purposefully slower and with a sarcastic amount of delay between each one that carried palpable condescension.

"Enough, kid," Dean grumbled, rubbing at his head like he could physically brush off the continued intrusion. It was like knowing someone was staring at you, only, like, inside your brain. The three of them had had an adult conversation about it the night before when Andy formally asked for permission to test this new form of communication (and sort of apologized for the test he'd tried out on Dean). The man from the future hadn't been thrilled, but he also understood the kid's reasoning for pushing these powers. More than that, Dean had seen Andy's excitement, the first real smile spreading across his face. Not drug-induced, not forced because it was either that or start crying. The first real smile they'd gotten out of him since he'd gone missing, and the older Winchester wasn't about to destroy that for any reason, including his own autonomy. "We get it. We'll get out of your hair for a couple hours. I could use a real meal anyhow."

A real meal, in this case, meaning a greasy diner burger, fries, and pie, just like Andy'd pictured. Sam shook his head but said nothing. For his brother, that was a real meal.

"We'll go grab lunch," Sam agreed, knowing they could give the kid a couple hours of peace. He was doing well enough to be on his own, and while Sam knew he still had a long road to recovery and probably some serious PTSD to manage, he also knew Andy could use a break from the mothering presence of two older brothers. The Winchesters could probably use one themselves, actually. "When we get back, we should practice slowing the images down and getting them in order."

Andy made a face at that, like a chastised school kid, but didn't argue. He wasn't the one going through flashes of epilepsy-inducing motion sickness or lingering headaches every time he wanted to say something.

"Yeah, it'd be great if talking to you didn't end with us nauseous. Not that that's much of a change from before." Dean snickered with a wink in the kid's direction. He grabbed his coat off the chair beside Andy's bed and threw it on. "And no practicing on the nurses while we're gone. Don't need them keeping you here any longer cuz of blood loss."

Or, you know, freaking out at random images popping into their brains. Like gay fucking porn.

This time, Andy stuck his tongue out as them as they left, and they both winced as they got the mental image equivalent once they'd turned their backs. Dean flipped him off on the way out the door, and they all got to learn, together, just how far Andy's range of mental projection went.

The answer? Well past the end of the parking lot, where Sam finally had to text him to stop because Dean needed to be able to see straight to drive.

-o-o-o-

Dean stared at the diner menu for the third time, but nothing really looked good. Which was absurd. It was his usual fair, all of it, all the things he normally loved. But he just…wasn't hungry. Also ridiculous. Ever since that stupid black hole in his chest had sprung back up, it was like all of Dean's torso and internal organs were busy being sucked into the damn thing. A constant reminder of what wasn't there anymore.

The hunter made a frustrated noise in the back of his throat and tossed the menu back down. Its laminated surface slid a half foot across the table, and Sam stopped it with his hand before it could go any further. Dean rubbed absently at his chest and looked around the diner, glaring at the hand-written and barely legible specials in chalk above the counter.

Sam waited until the waitress came to their table to take their orders, Dean settling on a plain old burger and looking mildly unhappy about it, before bringing up what he knew was bothering Dean. What he also knew Dean wouldn't want brought up.

"We should talk about Cas," Sam started. When the older Winchester gave him a furled brow and a 'let's not' look, Sam's gaze dropped to his brother's chest. Dean's arm fell from his chest, face more annoyed than defensive. "I know you want to get her back-"

"You said it yourself, Sammy: no way we can do that. Just gotta wait." Dean's words where clipped, bitten out and bitter. Sam knew his brother too well for that.

"Andy thinks you have a plan."

Dean pulled his head back at that, brow all sorts of furled. He scoffed, then flexed his fingers – an abbreviated gesture of the way he'd often throw his arms out when defensive or frustrated – then scoffed again. He folded his arms over his chest like a pouting child.

"So the kid can read minds now, can he?"

Sam smiled, but it wasn't because the situation was in any way laughable. "God, I hope not. But he knows you pretty well, and you've got tells."

Dean narrowed his eyes at that, trying to suss out if Sam actually knew what he was talking about or if he was just talking out his ass. "He hasn't been around long enough for that."

This time Sam snorted, and the smile was a little more real. "Oh, I don't know. He picks things up pretty quickly. And you're not that subtle."

The older Winchester rolled his eyes at that, but Sam knew by the slight slump to his shoulders, the way he stopped holding his arms across his chest and let them slid apart to settle on the table, that his heart wasn't really in the fight. Which meant Sam just had to wait.

Dean stared out across the diner, working his jaw as he observed the rest of the patrons. The waitress was pouring coffee for a trucker and the cook slid two plates onto the window, ringing a clerk's bell as he did. The sound made Dean think laughably of Cas, that same noise ringing through the Impala before she'd disappeared a couple months ago. Right after they'd picked up Andy, actually.

'Every time a bell rings, an angel gets his wings!'

Dean snorted at the memory of the old black and white film. Hadn't Meg called Cas 'Clarence' just because of that line in It's a Wonderful Life? Yeah, that was Dean's angel. An angel he apparently couldn't go ten minutes without thinking about. Obstinately, the hunter looked away from that bell, something pulling tight down deep in that aching chasm of his chest. Dean pulled at his t-shirt and rolled his shoulders to avoid rubbing that feeling away. Not that it ever really worked.

"It's not a plan," he finally said, keeping his gaze away from that stupid bell, but not looking at Sam, either. The younger Winchester shifted in his seat, not necessarily trying to recapture his attention, but succeeding at it regardless. Dean finally met Sam's gaze, a grumpy look taking over his face. "It's a friggin' cry for help, is what it is."

The younger Winchester frowned, not only because those words weren't really something his brother had ever said before, but also because he couldn't picture what a cry for help in this situation could even mean.

"There are other angels," Dean explained with a slight shoulder shrug, picking out a sugar packet from the square container on the table. He fiddled with it between his fingers. "A couple of 'em sided with Cas over the years, or at least seemed to care about him. It's possible they might answer a prayer if it's about him being in danger."

When Sam didn't answer right away, brow furled in that typical way he had anytime he was concerned and thinking through the logistics of an idea, Dean fidgeted. He didn't need to explain himself or his ideas to his brother. Really, he didn't. It was just…he didn't like silence. Or judgement. Or, okay, fine, he probably needed to explain this to his brother before he just up and did it with nor warning and no backup.

"They could at least check on him," Dean added as the silence lengthened, kinda proving a point he hadn't needed to prove because nobody was asking and damnit he didn't have to talk about this, he was just being…nice. Whatever. The twitchy hunter glanced down at the sugar packet, tossing it uselessly onto the table in front of him when he realized just how much he was fidgeting. Speaking of tells. "Maybe they could find Cas in Heaven, make sure he's okay, and deliver a message, or something."

'Get the hell away from Uriel before he kills your ass, you idiot. Oh, and I told you so.'

Dean would have to paraphrase, of course. Any angel that did answer his prayer was just as likely to write him off the minute he started accusing one of their brothers of treason. Plus, they wouldn't get the point of telling someone you'd told them so. Probably call it redundant or obvious or some shit like that.

Sam's frown didn't grow or lessen as Dean continued to talk, unprompted. He just kept logic-ing his way through the pros and cons while still watching his brother carefully. The thing was, Dean already knew the logic: there wasn't any. He knew the pros and cons too. It was an insane and truly stupid idea (monumentally) with almost zero chance of success. Which is why he hadn't told Sam, hadn't done it yet, and definitely wouldn't be bringing his kid brother along when he did do it.

Hell, the only dick brother of Cas's he even remotely trusted with this might not answer him at all, making the whole thing moot.

"Okay, well…" Sam trailed off, clearly still thinking through all the ways this idea could go horribly, horribly wrong. (There were many. Dean had counted, gotten past three, given up counting, and accepted he was probably just gonna wing it anyway). In the end, Sam just shrugged. "If you think it's worth a shot, we might as well try."

Dean blinked. Then blinked again. He'd been expecting his baby brother to come back with all the reasons they should absolutely not do this. Because there were plenty and they should absolutely not do this. They shouldn't even considering doing this. Not that it was going to stop Dean from going and doing it, of course, but he'd at least expected to hear all the reasons his brother had.

Which meant now…Dean hesitated, going back to chewing on the inside of his cheek. Well, shit. "Uh…we can't, Sammy."

Sam frowned at his brother's particular choice of emphasis in that sentence. The frown was quickly replaced by that smoothed-forehead-of-danger he always got when he got pissed, which usually came after understanding where his brother was going with some train of thought. Sam worked his jaw, brown eyes hard as he stared Dean down.

"You're not doing it alone."

"It's not what you think," Dean muttered, looking away. He knew Sam had immediately fallen back into age-old worries, thinking the older Winchester wasn't trusting him with this. "I'd rather have you with me, Sammy, trust me, but we can't. If this guy answers, and that's a big if, he's a total dick. He was good enough to Cas, but he never was a big fan of humans to start with…"

Dean, in particular.

Sam ground his teeth, then looked away, running his tongue over his molars to keep from spitting out what he wanted to say. Because he knew what Dean was getting at. He just didn't like it. Sam slid his hands into his lap, left hand going for his still-injured right palm, rubbing at the stitches wrapped beneath gauze. The pain helped ground him, enough to speak with a level tone.

"I can't go because I'm the 'boy with the demon blood,'" the young hunter finally said, only just keeping himself from putting any sort of connotation on those last words. Across from him, Dean's shoulders slumped more, his jawline tense with unrestrained words of assuagement that Sam didn't need to hear.

"I don't know how any of them will react to me, Sammy. Claiming to be the Righteous Man, if I gotta go that far." Dean hoped he wouldn't have to. He hoped he'd be able to just tell the damn angel he was a friend of Cas's, the guy was in trouble, could you please find him and tell him to get his ass back down to Earth and away from dick traitors. Easy as that. "I don't wanna risk them freaking out on you or blowing any of this out of proportion because they've got some holy stick up their ass."

Sam was still looking away, vein in his jaw twitching, and Dean sighed. He rubbed at his short hair, then leaned forward, leveling a single finger his brother's way.

"Don't let an ass-backwards opinion of a bunch of winged dicks make you feel like crap, Sammy. That isn't you, you're not the 'boy with the demon blood'. You're Sam Friggin' Winchester, and none of this is your fault."

Sam took in a deep breath and released it. It took a moment – another deep breath – before he was able to let go of his wounded hand and put his arms back on the table, fingers lightly clasped. Looking into Dean's determined, angry eyes, Sam felt calmer, in spite of the anger still buzzing just beneath the surface.

"But I still shouldn't go." Despite the speech he'd just made, Dean looked guilty. Sam sighed. "At least promise me you'll give me a heads up, Dean. Don't just disappear, alright?"

The older hunter grinned. Though, again, there wasn't much laughable about any of this. "Yeah, I can do that."

The bell rung over by the kitchen window and Sam leaned back in the booth as their waitress brought over their orders. She set them on the table and both Winchesters mustered up appreciative, if not tired, smiles before she walked away. Sam picked up his fork, moving bits of his salad around on the plate without really digging in. Dean just stared at his meal, and the younger Winchester tried not to let that worry him as much as it did.

"I still think you should wait it out," Sam finally said, though the resignation in his voice made it clear he knew Dean would do no such thing. "She's going to be fine, Dean. Cas can handle herself until she makes it back down here. It's the safer plan."

And the one that didn't leave him behind.

"I know." Dean picked up his burger and bit into it, trying to ignore the way it taste more like ash than grease and meat. He chewed through it, swallowing heavily to get it down. "And I'm trying. Just can't make any promises I'll last that long."

Sam nodded, a rare sort of understanding between the two of them, coming from a level of open communication they'd never really had before. The younger Winchester stabbed a forkful of salad, diving into his own meal, and tried to feel good about that fact. He was only moderately successful.

-o-o-o-

They stayed away from the hospital for nearly three hours, keeping in not-quite-constant contact with Andy via texts, making sure he was still good on his own. The kid didn't seem to mind the extended break away from the Winchesters. He probably needed it, what with how both Sam and Dean tended to Mother Hen in their own ways. And so the boys took the opportunity to restock some of the supplies they'd lost in Rivergrove, taking the time to hunt down anything on Cas's ingredient list for hex bags that they might find in Sturgis, South Dakota. Which was not a lot, but they hadn't expected much to start with.

Sam insisted they stop at a pharmacy and get some more medical supplies, not just to replace what they'd spared for Andy, but also because the kid was going to have some longer term needs for at least the next month. They couldn't just buy morphine, unfortunately, but the brothers agreed to find a new supply, either purchased illegally or stolen from a place that could afford to replace it. When they got back to Sioux Falls, they'd talk to Bobby about it. He might know a guy. The old hunter usually did.

As the Winchesters pulled back into the hospital, Dean balked at the almost completely full parking lot that greeted them. He stopped Baby, idling at the first cross-section of aisles, the entire lot filled with cars, shining in the afternoon sun.

"What the hell?" He glared at the surrounding vehicles, then at his brother. "Is there some hospital convention in town we missed?"

Sam shrugged, seeming nonplussed about the whole thing as he glanced around the lot. "It is Saturday. It makes sense that more people would come visit on the weekend."

Dean grumbled. "It wasn't like this this morning."

It had been wide open that morning. In fact, the entire time they'd been in Sturgis, there'd never been more than thirty cars in the parking lot. It wasn't a big town or a big hospital, and Staff parked in the back to start with.

"Just go park over there," Sam offered with the exasperation of a younger brother constantly having to play the older. He gestured to the side of the large building, where the parking lot wrapped around to the back of the hospital.

Grumbling, Dean turned Baby's wheel regardless. Thought he muttered and moaned about the loss of his front row parking the whole, slow drive. They parked in the side lot, then walked back around the Hospital to the front entrance, Dean still complaining under his breath about mini vans and screaming children and house wives visiting husbands with broken legs, not priority cases like electrocution and slashed throats that should get front row parking.

It was an ongoing diatribe that made little sense, but Sam just left him to it.

Just as they got to the front doors, glass panels sliding apart automatically with a burst of heated air to contrast the frigid winter weather outside, Dean's phone rang. He pulled it out of his jacket pocket, caught Bobby's name, and waved Sam on ahead while he answered.

"Hey, Bobby, any more luck with that list?" Dean stuck his free hand in his pocket for the sake of warmth and wandered away from the front doors, back down the wide walkway leading back to the parking lot. A couple feet away, another bystander lit a cigarette, taking a deep drag.

"Do you even know how hard half of this shit is to get?" Bobby immediately grumbled, voice extra gruff. No dice, then, Dean knew, just from the tone.

"If it was easy, I wouldn't have had to call you," the older Winchester tried with a cocky smile, hoping flattery might get him somewhere. He could practically hear Bobby's glare, though, and sighed. Yeah, he did know. It had taken a full-fledged angel almost a full half day flying all over the damn planet to get it all. That's why he'd called Bobby in the first place. "Let me guess. The human toe mushrooms are the problem?"

Bobby snorted, and Dean could practically see him rubbing his forehead, bumping his cap back on his head. "Yeah, well, you could say that. They only grow on one mountain in Japan, and they have to be picked fresh, at a certain hour of the day, to work for the spell."

Of course they did.

"So unless you got a fortune stashed away somewhere I don't know about…" Bobby huffed down the line, and Dean could all but see him sliding off his cap and resettling the old thing on his head. "Don't suppose you know the winning lottery tickets for this month?"

Dean joined him in that huff. Like they were that lucky. The only thing his future knowledge ever seemed good for was getting them into even more trouble. The man from the future ran a hand down his faced, dragging his fingers over his chin. Damnit, Cas. She couldn't have left them any less of a complicated spell list? The hunter sighed, officially giving it up. "Alright, we're gonna need another way to stay under the radar. Any ideas?"

A tickle in his nose caused the older Winchester to suddenly cough, the smell of cigarette smoke suddenly choking him, strong and obnoxious. Dean glanced at the man only a couple feet away, puffing away, and frowned. Smoke didn't usually bother the hunter. Hell, they stayed in enough cheap ass motels soaked in the stench that he was used to it. But as the guy blew out another cloud, Dean found himself coughing again, harder than before.

With frowny face in full swing, the hunter moved to the other side of the walkway, putting a good ten feet between him and the smoker. Must be a certain brand or something, he thought, waving his hand through the air to dispel what was left of the lingering smoke. Probably European.

"You alright?" Bobby was asking, only a tad sarcastically, as Dean refocused on the conversation.

"Yeah, fine." Dean put the whole irritation out of his mind, hand now on his hip, facing the parking lot with his back turned to the other guy, who didn't seem to care in the slightest, or even notice, Dean's annoyance. "You got any thoughts on warding us?"

"Couple," Bobby answered, shrug practically visible through the phone. "Nothing we can do at the moment, but when you guys get back here…"

"Yeah, yeah, I get it. 'Come home.'" Dean managed the words without choking up just at the thought of them. What Bobby hadn't said in so many words, but meant regardless (several times, with increasing doggedness each time over the last several days). "We'll take the hint, Bobby, soon as we can."

Something bright flashed in Dean's eyes, and the hunter found himself squinting, turning his head away from whatever was trying to blind him. Some woman who'd just climbed out of her car was busy putting on makeup, little compact mirror in hand and perfectly reflecting the sun overhead right into Dean's eyes.

"What the hell, lady," he grumbled, irritated for a second time in less than a minute, and turned to face the other direction, away from the parking lot, and from the smoking guy, and from the damn building. He was practically standing in the friggin' planters that lined either side of the entrance.

"I-…-out…and seven-…"

Dean frowned, eyes narrow as the connection went to shit and Bobby crackled in and out. He pressed the phone harder to his ear, trying to make out the older hunter's suddenly static-stricken voice. Ducking his head forward, Dean turned even further into the planters, trying to hear through the terrible connection.

"Bobby? You hear me?"

The line continued to static for another moment, Bobby's voice coming in and out in a mess of crackles and cut outs. Dean pulled the phone from his ear to look at it, completely failing to notice the man walk behind him, dressed in a sharp suit and tie, FBI badge already in hand. A man on a mission, who was equally oblivious to the stranger turned away from him, hunched over by the planters frustrated by a bad connection.

"Bobby?"

"Yeah, I hear you, boy. You still there?"

Dean let out an irritated huff as the phone line cleared completely, hospital doors sliding shut with a soft snick to his left. He glanced over at them, a figure he couldn't really see through the reflective glass disappearing further into the hospital. The dude with the cigarette was busy putting it out beneath his heel and the freshly done-up woman snapped her compact mirror closed, slipped it into her purse, and started for the hospital entrance. Dean put the phone back to his ear, wondering what the hell just happened.

"Yeah, I'm here. What were you saying about wards?"

-o-o-o-

Chuck rubbed at his face, stressed the hell out. He released a large breath of air, cheeks puffing up with the sigh. Man. Was that all too contrived? Too many coincidences in a row so that Agent Henriksen wouldn't spot Dean outside the hospital and ruin all the tension before it had time to really build?

The writer chewed on his lower lip, staring at the words on the bright screen.

Aw, well. It's not like his writing had ever been Pulitzer level to start with. Worst case, he could just say some cosmic deity was looking out for the Winchester.

Chuck snorted, putting his hands back on the keys. Like any of his readers would actually buy that.

-o-o-o-

Henriksen walked through the busy hospital lobby, his fifth and final for the day. It was weirdly full for a Saturday afternoon in a relatively small town. Thirty minutes away, Rapid City had a far larger population, along with a much bigger hospital and two smaller ones. Not one of those three had been as happening as Sturgis Hospital was today. The tired FBI agent had to wait several long, annoying minutes for an Administrator at the main station to have time for him.

"FBI," he began as way as introduction, not even bothering with his name. He likely wouldn't be here long enough for it to matter. The other four hospitals had all been a bust, and Victor wasn't holding out much hope of finding his missing fourth victim in this one. As the town furthest from Cold Oak but still bordering the National Park, it made little sense for the Winchesters to head this way. But he needed those i's and t's, and so here Henriksen was. "I'm looking for a potential victim from the Cold Oak case. He'd have an injury resulting in significant blood loss."

The woman just looked at him like every other Administrator he'd talked to that morning. The 'Honey, this is a hospital. That's half our patient list' look. The second woman he'd talked to hadn't bothered with the look, just launched right into the verbal version, which was why Victor knew what that look said verbatim.

"Anything strange or out of the ordinary," Victor added, his returning deadpan look a clear indicator that he knew he was barking up a useless tree. The three bodies found at the old mining town in the middle of the National Park might have made the news, but he'd found over most of his career that Hospital staff didn't matter if your case was widely known or utterly confidential. Victims were victims to them. To the woman in front of him now, his missing victim might just be a number on a page. Victor tried for a little humor, instead. "You won't be wasting my time; the government is paying me to be here, ma'am."

The look certainly didn't improve, but the nurse did start typing away on her computer with an amused harrumph.

"I'll see what we've got," she said, and Henriksen leaned against the edge of the counter, prepared for another lengthy and ultimately fruitless wait. Nurses, the occasional doctor, and relatives of the sick and injured moved around him in the din of the hospital, fighting for space and attention at the counter, or milling about, waiting for news.

-o-o-o-

Dean hung up with Bobby only a handful of minutes later. There wasn't much to talk about, really. He updated the older hunter on Andy's condition, which the Winchesters had done periodically enough over the last three days that there wasn't much left to share. They spent a few minutes bouncing warding ideas around, talking briefly about the pros and cons, not to mention feasibility, of a couple.

The man from the future headed back into the hospital as soon as the call ended. Dean was walking past the main lobby, unpleasantly filled with too many people for his taste (what the hell was up with this small town hospital today?), and heading for the bank of elevators left of the Admin desk, when he overheard a voice that stopped him cold. It was a voice he hadn't heard in years. One that, by all rights, he probably shouldn't remember in the first place but absolutely hadn't forgotten.

"Anything strange or out of the ordinary."

Dean's body moved more on instinct – an instinct remembered from fear and adrenaline and the case almost a near decade ago – and the hunter ducked around the corner of the nearest wall. He immediately pressed himself flat against it and fully out of sight. His heart was racing, and Dean took several deep breaths to calm it down before chancing a glance around the wall, wondering if he'd just imagined it.

Nope.

That was Victor Henriksen. Agent. Victor. Friggin'. Henriksen. Standing at the administrator's desk in a hospital in Sturgis, South Dakota, chatting with one of the women as she typed away on her computer.

Shit. Shit, shit, shit.

How the hell had the FBI found them?

Shit, shit, and had he mentioned, shit!

This was bad. This was so bad. Dean didn't know what to do. This hadn't happened the first time. They should still have… wait, what month was it? When had Henriksen caught up with them the first time? Had it been in Baltimore? No…after that… Dean couldn't remember, and it really didn't matter now.

The man from the future stowed that part away – the future wasn't going to be any help to him now – and started thinking like the hunter that he was in the present. He needed to get upstairs to Andy and Sam, without Agent Henriksen spotting him. Even if the nurse didn't come back with the fact that they were housing an injured 'FBI agent' and his two partners, which she absolutely would flag as soon as she saw it in the system, Dean couldn't risk Victor spotting any of them. They couldn't afford to get cornered in a building that only had three exits, two of which weren't easy to access outside of an emergency or being hospital staff.

It looked like Andy was getting out of here a little sooner than even Dean had promised.

With a deep breath and forced calm, the hunter pushed off the wall and headed for the staircase in the southwest corner of the building. No way would he risk the elevators, only twenty feet away from the waiting FBI agent who would no doubt recognize him on the spot.

Shit, he'd been lucky Henriksen hadn't spotted him outside. They must have just missed each other. Dean shook his head, stowing that useless bit of luck too, and bolted for the stairs as fast as he could without calling attention to himself.

-o-o-o-

Sam and Andy were sitting in the room, staring at each other with a level of concentration in total silence that would have been utterly creepy (or at least sure as shit easy to make fun of if he didn't have other priorities) when Dean burst into the room. It meant Sam was helping Andy practice his new powers again, another thing they didn't have time for (although the kid was progressing terrifyingly fast, given the lack of blood on his upper lip). Dean could tell from the way his baby brother was holding one eye a little more closed than the other that he was pushing through the headache from it, too.

The frantic hunter closed the door as gently as he could in the haste that he was in, flipping the lock on it and pressing his back to it once he was safely inside. Sam blinked at him, already half-raised out of his chair in concern, and Andy sat upright, a pillow toppling over behind his back.

"What is it?" Sam asked before Dean, who was out of breath from his run-don't-run-alright-run-again-wait-for-that-nurse-to-walk-by-okay-back-to-running, could get anything out.

"We gotta go," he said, words rushed. His heart was still racing, brain managing some level of panicked calm that was required in his pick of careers. But he knew the consequences of the FBI finding them here. Consequences they could not afford right now. "We gotta go now."

-o-o-o-

They moved like a well-oiled machine. Sam immediately said he'd find the doctor and fill in the last blanks they had about home treatment while Dean got Andy out.

"Don't make it obvious we're leaving," Dean instructed unnecessarily, since that was a given and Sam wasn't stupid. Any hunter who'd ever been injured enough to go to a hospital knew not to mention the words 'checking out' or 'AMA'. Legally, the hospital staff couldn't stop you, but boy did those people know how to work the system to slow you the fuck down while they tried to talk you out of it.

But Sam, ever the referee, just nodded, grabbing his coat off the back of the door. The warding symbol he'd carved into it three days ago was still there, but neither hunter was worried about hiding the damage right now. Sam twisted the knob, slipping out into the hallway and closing the door behind him as quickly and quietly as possible. He immediately caught the attention of one of the nurses and asked her to page Dr. Richards.

Meanwhile, Dean turned to Andy, who had already slid to the side of the bed, bare feet flat across the cold floor. The older hunter reached beneath the bed for the duffle they'd stashed there days ago, knowing something like this would be inevitable. Of course, Dean hadn't expected it to be under such stressful time constraints. The older Winchester threw the bag onto the bed, Andy digging into it as soon as it hit the sheets. He pulled out a pair of boxers and jeans while the older Winchester started tossing in the kid's phone, charger, coloring book (Dean wanted to roll his eyes, but he'd save it for when they weren't running from federal incarceration) and crayons.

Luckily, aside from some pretty thick bandages around his hands and wrists that covered a multitude of stiches to make even Edward Scissorhands jealous, Andy wasn't too badly injured anywhere but his neck, and was able to do most the dressing himself. Casting embarrassment aside in favor of not going to prison, Dean helped him button and zip his jeans and got his sneakers on and laced up. Andy threw a hoodie over his long sleeves and t-shirt while Dean slipped out of the room. While he was gone, Andy dug under the hospital pillows for Sam's sleep coin and the hex bag tucked beneath the mattress, not wanting to lose either of those things. By the time he'd gotten both objects tucked into the duffle bag's outer pocket, Dean was back with a wheelchair that he'd gotten who-knows-where.

Andy wanted to insist he didn't need it, but he could tell from Dean's expression that they didn't have time for that argument. He might not be severely injured anywhere but his neck, but he hadn't gotten his full strength yet, either. The psychic still tired pretty easily, and remained a little shaky at the best of times. So he chucked himself into the chair with a flair of acceptance and waved his hand in the air for his servant to push him forth hence.

Dean made it clear from his snort and the fact they didn't go anywhere for a solid three seconds (as much time as Dean could afford under current circumstances) what he thought about that roleplay.

The hunter wheeled the kid out into the hallway, eyeing the elevators on the other side of the nurse's station. Agent Henriksen would be coming up those any minute now. He turned Andy the other direction. There was another bank at the other end of the building. There'd be no reason for the FBI agent to use those elevators. It could buy them a couple extra minutes, even if it would take a couple extra minutes to get to.

Andy kept a completely casual expression on his face as he was rolled past the nurses, who didn't take much notice. The kid had been up and walking around that morning, so, in theory, they shouldn't flag anything weird about him being up for an afternoon stroll. Better yet, they couldn't even bitch about it taxing him, since Dean was doing all the hard work.

As he pushed Andy towards the far hallway, Dean spotted Sam by the nurse's station, chatting with the doctor. The younger Winchester caught his eye and subtly shifted a foot to the left, bringing the doc's gaze with him and further away from the escaping jailbirds. Dean gave his little brother a nod before pushing Andy quickly down the hall towards the back elevators, knowing Sam would meet them in the parking lot as soon as he had what they needed.

-o-o-o-

"Alright, here we go," the administrator – Sharron Bardur according to her ID badge – said as she tapped one manicured nail, extensions long and painted a vibrant pink, on her keyboard. Agent Henriksen tried not to look as impatient as he felt. "The only weird one we've gotten all week is the guy with the slit throat. But you already know about that."

Victor blinked, head doing a little shake that might as well have been a double take. He dropped his hand to the counter, a little extra bump in his heartbeat spiking with the very beginnings of an adrenaline rush. "Excuse me?"

Mrs. Bardur gave him a raised eyebrow, and he knew the sass of a woman who thought a man ought to know something. He'd been married before. More than once. "The patient, he's one of yours." When he still just stared at her, that eyebrow lowered into more of a frown. "FBI? Three of 'em came in, one with a certifiable crazy throat injury."

That little trickle of adrenaline became a torrent. Could it really be that easy? There was no way it could be that easy.

"They're upstairs now," Mrs. Bardur continued, a little more uncertain as it became obvious this FBI agent was not aware of his colleagues in the building. She was getting an uneasy feeling about that, too.

Agent Henriksen reached for the gun on his hip, but didn't draw it. He'd never expected to find the Winchesters still in the hospital. What he'd expected was another victim, dropped off at the hospital by a pair of serial killers that, according to the somewhat dubious connections to past crimes, occasionally had a conscience.

"Call security, have them meet me at that room."

-o-o-o-

"I don't see why we need to discuss this right now," Dr. Richards said, a little harried by the busy day. There'd been a pile up on I-90, just north of the city, which involved a truly spectacular number of cars and almost no serious injuries. Head bumps and broken limbs, which was honestly quite weird for a major, multi-vehicular accident at high speeds. That had been followed up, almost at the same time, with a stream of parents coming in with their kids, all of who had a rash not unlike poison ivy. All of them. All at once. The hospital was suddenly slammed with cases. Dr. Richards hadn't quite seen anything like it, even on a busy day in Sturgis. He felt like he was living a day in the life of Jumanji or something.

"I know you're busy, I just wanted to get things prepared," the FBI agent answered, a weak smile in place.

Dr. Richards liked Agent Frehley. He seemed like a kind and caring young man who had a good head on his shoulders and a much more reasonable disposition than his older partner. However, this really wasn't a great time, and as their injured agent would be in the hospital for another two or three days at a minimum, Hank really didn't see why they needed to discuss it right that moment. Mrs. Dunn had three children all exhibiting the same rash in places children should not be getting poison ivy, even if they tried. And Mrs. Dunn was famous in Sturgis, particularly at the Hospital, for her overbearing, mama bear temperament. Hank really needed to get back to her before she started throwing things again.

The man sighed and tried to remind himself that the agent in front of him had concerns of his own about his friend. It had sounded like Agent Criss didn't have much family outside of the two senior agents, so it would likely be on Agent Frehley to make sure he got the care he needed. As a doctor, Hank couldn't be annoyed at someone actually wanting to ask questions, learn, and do it right.

So, with another sigh, Dr. Richards motioned for one of the nurses at the station, walking towards the counter with the FBI agent in tow. "Amy, can you get a copy of the aftercare for Agent Criss printed up for me?" As the nurse nodded, already pulling the documents up on her computer, Hank turned back to Sam. "We can discuss it closer to discharging your agent, but those documents will have all the basics you'll need. Keeping the wound clean and staying on the anti-biotics for a full term will be the biggest things."

Dr. Richards pulled a pad out of his white coat, sliding a pen out of his breast pocket and scribbling something down on the prescription form. He tore it off and handed it to the FBI agent, who took it with a careful eye, reading through the scribbled writing.

"You won't need it until after he's been discharged, but those are the antibiotics." Thinking of the pain medication his patient would also need, Hank went ahead and wrote up a second prescription, handing that one over. "Don't fill them until he's been discharged, the insurance companies can be fickle about that."

Amy called for Dr. Richards, who turned back around and grabbed the stack of about fifteen freshly printed pages from her. He thanked her again, as did Agent Frehley, as he handed them over to the towering man.

"The rest will be about getting good sleep, no major movement or exercise in that area-" Hank gestures to his neck and lower jaw- "and making sure the wound stays clean and dry for at least two weeks."

Agent Frehley smiled, and Dr. Richards didn't regret spending the time to talk to him, despite his many other obligations at the moment. "Thanks, Doctor. I really appreciate it. I'll read over this and come back to you with any questions I have."

"Yes, well, as I said," Hank started again, unable to keep the exasperation out of his voice, even if it was no longer annoyance, "we'll have plenty of time to discuss it."

Agent Frehley's attention was elsewhere, though. Brown eyes focused on something behind Dr. Richards, and the man's shoulders drew back suddenly, spine straightening to his full height. Before Hank could turn to see what had drawn the agent's attention, the brown-haired man was shaking his hand again.

"Thanks so much, again, Doctor. I'll let you get back to your other patients."

"Yes, I..."

But the agent was already leaving, back turned on the doctor as he headed down the hall away from his friend's room, rounding the corner at a speed that seemed a little hurried. Hank glanced over his shoulder at Nurse Amy to comment on it, but she was already on the other side of the station, greeting a very serious looking, dark-skinned gentleman who'd just come off the elevator.

-o-o-o-

Security had not yet arrived when Victor got to the fourth floor. He wasn't that concerned about it. If the Winchesters were here (and they were here; a group of three FBI agents in the same part of South Dakota as himself, with no word of an injured colleague passing through headquarters that Henriksen had heard of? Oh, the Winchesters were definitely here, and they'd stepped up their game to impersonating law enforcement and committing felonies) then Victor would be catching them by surprise. Still, they should be considered dangerous in any situation, and he didn't want innocents caught in any crossfire, should the brothers resist.

The real FBI agent crossed over to the nurses' station, hand still on his gun, eyeing the room across the station from him that housed the injured, possibly wanted men. "Ma'am, I need you to clear this floor. Get everyone back in their rooms and away from 411. Quietly."

He held up his badge as he spoke, and the young woman at the desk, a nametag pinned to her scrubs indicating her name was Amy, blinked in surprise and slowly forming alarm. To her credit, she didn't think twice as four security officers arrived from the stairwell located beside the elevators. Though she eyed them worriedly, Amy grabbed the other nurse manning the station with her and between the two of them, they started herding people back into their rooms or further down the hall. With a gesture from the FBI agent, two of those four guards went to assist the nurses.

"What's this?" A doctor – the white lab coat gave it away – came around the desk, a professional frown on his face. "What's going on?"

"I believe you may have fugitives in this hospital, posing as FBI agents," Victor explained, drawing his gun now that the majority of people were cleared from the main part of the fourth floor. He moved towards room 411, the doctor and security in tow.

"Agent Frehley? I was just speaking to him about Agent Criss," Dr. Richards balked in disbelief, though it did look like the gears were starting to turn. The man was probably going back through each interaction with them, spotting the things that hadn't made sense then, little flags that might have been yellow at best, and were turning red in his mind now.

Victor, meanwhile, paused, hand reaching out for the knob, to turn and look at the man behind him. Frehley and Criss. Seriously? Two of the members of Kiss? He could only guess the third agent went by Simmons. Henriksen shook his head in disbelief. How the hell had the Winchesters gotten away with so much so far? It was like they weren't even trying. Victor let the thought go, turning his attention and all his focus back on the room. He wrapped his hand around the knob as quietly as he could, gun up and ready.

The two security guards flanking Henriksen pushed the doctor behind them, and the man shuffled awkwardly out to the side as he finally realized the very possible severity of the situation. Victor counted to three, listening sharply for any potential hints of what they might encounter inside. Then, he turned the knob and threw open the door hard enough to swing into the wall with a light bang. No one behind it. He cleared the rest of the room in three quick sweeps of both eyes and gun.

Empty.

"Wh- but- they were just in here!" Dr. Richards exclaimed, sticking his head into the room between the three armed men. His expression was truly baffled as he stared at the empty room, hospital bed partially made, no patient to be seen. "Agent Criss has a traumatic injury- he was not ready to be discharged!"

Victor resisted rolling his eyes at the doctor's misplaced outrage and pushed past him. "He's not an agent, he's a wanted criminal. You said you were just talking to one of them?"

Hank blinked, realizing that was what he'd said, and he had just been speaking to, well, apparently a dangerous fugitive. He swallowed thickly, but nodded at the intimidating man in front of him who was now in a hurry. "Just a moment ago, right over there."

That was all Agent Henriksen needed to here, not even looking to where Dr. Richards pointed. He took off at a run for the stairwell beside the elevators, all four security officers now following him. The Winchesters didn't have much of a head start and were carrying injured weight; Victor might still catch them yet.

-o-o-o-

Sam exited through the automatic glass doors of the Hospital at just under a run, his long legs carrying him a good four feet with each stride. He broke into a full run the second he saw the Impala, screeching into the drop off circle, tires smoking at the friction of the turn and the sudden stop. Dean leaned over, throwing open the passenger door.

"Sam!" With the way his brother called his name, the younger Winchester knew what he would see behind him if he turned. The doors of the hospital slid open with a distant, soft whoosh and the sound of pounding footsteps was far louder. Sam didn't turn.

"FBI! Freeze!"

There were several screams from inside the hospital. As Sam dove into the front seat, grabbing the door and slamming it shut all in one smooth motion, he turned to look back towards the building. There was a man in a suit, struggling to get through the large crowds in the lobby, frightened people now panicking at the apparent gun chase happening. A handful of security guards flanked him, equally struggling as they tried to clear a path.

Dean gunned it. Sam told Andy to get down and the kid slid sideways, trying not to jostle his neck too much. There was a crazy, fearful, excited grin on his face. Through the rear window, Sam saw the agent burst through the doors finally, gun in hand, leveling it their direction.

After a tense moment in which Sam expected to hear bullets hit the car and possibly the rear windshield shattering, the agent lowered the gun. They were too far away for a decent shot and Henriksen wasn't the type to shoot wildly. Then Dean was rounding the corner out of the parking lot onto the street, Baby drifting several feet on the rapid turn, tires smoking as rubber burned. The hospital and the FBI agent disappeared from sight.

Sam let out a breath that might as well have been the North Winds itself, the way it took all the remaining energy out of his body. He sagged against the front seat, finally releasing a death grip he hadn't realized he'd had along the top of the leather.

"Holy crap," he breathed, looking over at his brother. Dean fidgeted in the front seat, hands tight on the steering wheel, looking far too uncomfortable with the close call. Green eyes kept darting to the rear view mirror. "Who was that, Dean?"

"Henrisken. Victor Henriksen, FBI agent, all around pain in the ass and…somewhat decent guy when he's not trying to drag us to federal prison."

Andy popped up in the backseat, eyes wide and that almost crazy grin on his face. Images flashed behind both their eyelids, Dean flinching and the car swerving before he could correct for the sudden loss of vision. Andy's images didn't overtake his brain's ability to process the signals from his eyes, but it was hard to concentrate on one over the other, particularly when Andy's were so persistent.

There was a clock, and an FBI badge, and the kid from Back to the Future, and Dean got what the kid was asking, but he was also trying not to kill them all as they fled a federal offense. Several, actually. "If I crash, we're all going to jail, kid, so enough."

Folding himself into the backseat, Andy looked sheepish in the rearview mirror. A last image flashed in Dean's mind, less pushy then the others, of a board game box: Sorry.

"It's cool, just…go easy with the images," Dean conceded, feeling a bit guilty himself for barking at the kid. Andy was going through a lot, and Dean couldn't really blame him for utilizing the only good thing to come out of the last five days. The older Winchester glanced at Sam, who was unfolding a packet of papers. Dean only got a glimpse, but the information looked medical. "You get what we need?"

"Cliff notes version," Sam huffed, but there was the beginnings of a winning smile on his face, "but it'll do."

They'd just escaped the clutches of the FBI by the skin of their teeth, but it was a win. Dean let a grin of his own stretch across his lips. The FBI was on their heels – hot on their heels – way sooner than they should be, or at least in a completely new way, and Dean knew that was a whole new barrel of very ugly monkeys. But they'd made it out this time, and the tail of the adrenaline rush had him chuckling in the front seat.

Two more images flashed through their brains, both having an edge of hesitancy and infantile restraint. The opening title sequence of the movie The Great Escape, and the lead character, Hilts.

"Yeah, sure thing, kid," Dean said with a laugh.

Another series of pictures followed, with a little more confidence but no more pushiness. Baby, a flash of Dean, another of Baby and a couple other cars Dean could only describe as sexy, then Hilts again. The hunter pieced together the clues and grinned, revving the engine a bit as they merged onto the highway to get the hell out of dodge.

"Damn straight, I am," Dean said, a touch of pride in his voice that had Sam shaking his head.

"Let Dean drive," the younger Winchester scolded Andy, though there was barely any heat. "His head's big enough as is without you filling it."

Andy laughed silently in the back seat, air huffing out in little chuffs, and Dean spared his brother a glare, revving the engine again just out of revenge. Sam looked utterly unimpressed. But all was right in the world, with the trio safely heading for Sioux Falls.

-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-

Chapter End Notes

A/Ns: I am so interested to hear how many of you are thinking something along the lines of, "Huh…that…was way too easy and painless for our usually-no-good-dirty-rotten author…" and how many are of the opinion of, "Finally! The boys needed a friggin' win-slash-break without you breaking their hearts or bodies, Silence!" XD Either way, I think you're right XD The boys have won this round, but Henriksen's not out of the game yet!

Acronyms: AMA is Against Medical Advice. It's what they list on your paperwork when you check yourself out of the hospital despite the doctors telling you not to (pretty much so you can't sue them when something goes horribly wrong because you left before you were healthy). Note: I have no idea if this is how it works in other countries. This may be a super obvious one to my international readers, who could be rolling their eyes right now ;) Another potentially obvious one I've missed a couple of times is PTSD: Post-Traumatic Stress Disorder. I've kind of been figuring everyone knows that one, but I actually don't know what it's called in other countries, if it's called something different at all :)

Up Next: We have one last chapter of down-time before your no-good-dirty-rotten author gets back at it. The boys flee East with a puzzle of their own to solve: how the hell did Henriksen find them? Our favorite FBI agent is still on the hunt (and pestering his favorite tech analyst that many of you are very sure is a demon [insert evil grin here]) In the meantime, Tom and Azazel are back in the game! (or, well, they're trying to get back in the game…)

Chapter 87: Season 2: Chapter 54

Chapter Notes

Chapter Reference – the Baltimore Case: Before Croatoan, the boys were on a case with a dirty cop (Peter Sheridan) who murdered a lawyer and his wife, pinning it on Dean when he was found at the crime scene. Sam was also arrested, but Andy managed to pose as their lawyer and get Sam out using his Jedi powers (which was seen on the security cameras). Agent Henriksen showed up at the end to interrogate the partner, Diana Ballard, who helped the Winchesters escape. See Chapters 69-73 for a refresher!

Chapter Reference – the Shapeshifter in St. Louis: In this story's version of events, Sam and Dean were able to track down the shapeshifter in the sewers before he managed to impersonate Dean. See Chapter 12 in the main story and Chapter 3 of the Deleted Scenes for refreshers on how that case went down.

Chapter Reference – Cold Oak Kids: Just a quick reminder since it has been several chapters (and that equals several weeks in Real Life), the kids at cold oak with Andy were Scott Carey (emo-looking kid who had an electrifying touch), Amanda (Berkley University Softball player and reader of minds), and Jonathon Bailey (teleporter and all around asshole). See Chapters 79-82 for a refresher!

Chapter Reference – Meeting Andy: In this timeline, the boys met Andy while driving towards Guthrie, Oklahoma. Andy was fleeing the crime scene (Tracy's coffee shop) where Weber had killed Tracy and Andy had killed Weber. He swerved to avoid hitting the Impala, and crashed his awesome van into a tree on the side of the road. See Chapter 63 for a refresher!

Chapter Reference - God's Talk with Dean: At the end of Chuck's talk with Dean when the hunter showed up on his doorstep demanding he fix things, God told him that he was helping, as much as he could, even if Dean didn't believe him. Then he wiped Dean's memory of most of that conversation, leaving the hunter with the notion he had gone to chat with God, but couldn't really remember what they discussed or what God even looked like. See Chapter 38 for a refresher of their conversation.

Chapter Reference – Meg and Tom: Very quick reminder, not even a chapter reference really, that Tom and Meg are considered siblings under Azazel's tutelage, and Meg is dead in this timeline (killed by Dean via the Colt).

A/Ns: Man. Phew. I think I like action chapters more, there's way less I have to go through and mark than these chapters where we talk and puzzle and solve and recall all the things!

Chapter Warnings: We are talking and puzzling and solving and recalling all the things! The boys try and figure out how Henriksen got on their case early when he should have even less to go on this time around. Andy enjoys things worth living for, and Tom graduates to the big boy table.

Oh, and the boys stop at Starbucks.

See the end of the chapter for more notes

-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-

The Road So Far (This Time Around)

Season 2: Chapter 54

-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-

While his phone played annoyingly typical elevator music in his ear, Victor stared at the set of photographs, printed by the hospital for him. They would be included in the final report the staff at Sturgis Hospital sent to the FBI's – the real FBI's – but for now Henriksen insisted they give him hard copies. They couldn't afford any more mess-ups where the Winchesters were concerned.

Henriksen set the pictures onto the conference table. He was in a private administrative room that the hospital hastily offered up upon his request. (Really, it had been nothing short of a demand; Victor wasn't shy about that fact). The room would also serve as a base of operations for the Sturgis Police, when they got there. They had been called in to handle the paperwork shit-show this was about to become. Victor would be lucky to get out of there by nightfall, and that was with him passing off as much responsibility as he could to just about anyone else.

Glancing down to the top photograph, fingers spread across its glossy surface, the face of Andy Gallagher stared up at the FBI agent. The lawyer. Henriksen shook his head. Their missing body from Cold Oak was the lawyer from Baltimore that had so mysteriously aided in Sam Winchester's escape from custody. Victor had almost laughed when the hospital staff handed the photos to him.

The man's injuries, however, were anything but laughable. Mr. Gallagher – the FBI had run facial recognition on the CTV images from the Baltimore precinct and gotten a hit for an open warrant out of Oklahoma – was now a mute, according to the doctor who had dealt with the injuries that night he'd come in. The same night Ranger Danson found three bodies burning on a funeral pyre in Cold Oak.

An interesting turn of events, the significance of which was not overlooked by Agent Henriksen. The guy that Detective Diana Ballard and several other BPD officers testified could hypnotize people into doing just about anything, had been attacked and permanently silenced. Some coincidence.

"Yes, I'm still here," Victor growled into the phone as David Attingwood, his go-to data analyst, came back on the line. He was way too chipper for Agent Henriksen's current mood. He was always way too chipper for Victor's mood. "Did the blood match?"

"Patience is a virtue," Agent Attingwood said down the line, voice a little sing-songy. Victor snorted, rubbing at his forehead and pinching the bridge of his nose. David was a damn good analysis, Henriksen reminded himself, and he would not be as good if he had to work through a broken nose and two black eyes.

Victor took a deep breath in, then let it out way too fast to be calming in any way. "How long?"

He'd requested the unidentified blood they'd found at Cold Oak be sent to Guthrie, Oklahoma. There, the police could compare it to the unidentified blood found at the scene of a double murder. It remained an open case in Guthrie, with Andy Gallagher as the lead suspect. Given Mr. Gallagher's connection to both victims – the owner of the café and an employee – along with a witness claiming he'd delivered a message for Andy to head to that same coffee shop earlier that night, the young man had become an immediate suspect, wanted for questioning. The Guthrie Police never found him, but they did find his van, also covered in the same unknown blood, and the blood of both victims. No one could say for sure until they found Andy Gallagher, but general consensus and common sense suggested the man was a killer.

Victor had no doubts, considering the company Mr. Gallagher was currently keeping.

"Probably tomorrow at the earliest, Boss."

The FBI agent sighed. Ah well. Matching the blood to the open murder in Guthrie wasn't that crucial a piece of evidence in this. Confirming it was Andy Gallagher that had been injured in Cold Oak was not his primary concern. Finding him was.

"Alright, fine. While we wait for that, then, I want the records of every phone call and text made in this area for the last three days. Any number that pinged off the four nearest towers. If direction becomes a choice on those, go towards Cold Oak."

"Uh…" David sounded the most hesitant Henriksen had ever heard him. The kid lived to please, and Victor had definitely taken advantage of that more than once in his career. David cleared his throat. "That's going to be a lot of numbers."

"I don't care," the agent growled again. "I'll cross-reference them myself if I have to. I'll put money on the Winchesters chatting with each other, and with the kid. The nurses confirmed Gallagher had a phone on him and that the Winchesters respected visiting hours. That means they likely texted back and forth outside of those times, so look for three numbers chatting with each other and no one else in the area."

If they could get those numbers, they could get a warrant to track them.

David sighed down the line. "Alright, I'm on it. But you're signing my overtime checks this month."

Victor rolled his eyes and reminded himself, again, that his annoying little analyst was the fastest, and he would no longer be the fastest if he had to work with broken fingers. Henriksen slid the photo and medical report into a blue folder, tucking it under his arm and and heading for the door. Time to review the hospital security tapes. Maybe he'd get lucky and catch one of the Winchesters on their phones. Then he'd have a time stamp to cross-reference with the call logs.

-o-o-o-

It took almost half an hour of flipping through stations on the radio, driving away from Sturgis as fast as they reckoned was safe without calling attention from any highway patrols, before the Winchesters found what had tipped Henriksen off.

"There are no new developments as of yet on the three bodies found at the old mining town of Cold Oak, located in Black Hills National Forest," the female newscaster announced, calm and detached, through Baby's speakers. Dean glanced at Sam, the two sharing an identical look. In the backseat, Andy blanched, body going rigid. His hand crept up towards his neck. "The victims remain unidentified, but we are told police are working on sketches that they plan to release to the public. Anyone with any information is urged to come forward regarding the blaze or any suspicious activity in the area."

When the woman switched to the next news story, Dean turned the radio off and a heavy silence pervaded the car. Clearing his throat, the older Winchester glanced at Andy in the rear view mirror, but the kid wasn't looking back. He was definitely too pale, and Dean fretted internally about taking the kid from the hospital too soon. Not that they'd had any other options, of course.

"We should have stayed," he muttered, more under his breath than out loud, but Sam heard it all the same, and knew he was talking about Cold Oak. Probably because he was busy thinking it himself.

"We needed to get back," Sam added, just as softly spoken, like Andy somehow might not here them, sitting two feet away. Might not realize he was the reason they needed to get back. Not a decision either Winchester regretted for a second. "We didn't have an option, Dean."

Which the older Winchester knew. He hadn't even wanted to leave Andy in the first place. Part of him, even now, wanted to bitch about how it had been the wrong decision. The newscaster mentioned a blaze. The only reason those bodies had been found at all was because the Winchesters started that fire. If they'd just left the bodies where they lie or, better yet, not gone in the first place, Andy would still be recovering in a hospital where he belonged and Henriksen would be none the wiser.

Of course, then three bodies would have been left to rot without so much as a proper burial – a regrettable fate for two of the three – and left alone, the situation was more than perfect for churning out vengeful spirits. Plus, Andy never would have known the fate of Scott or Amanda, something Dean was very sure would haunt the kid.

It wasn't the wrong decision and, for the most part, it had worked out in the end. Except for the whole, FBI being hot on their heels, now.

"How'd he know it was us?" Dean asked aloud, realizing that three bodies on a funeral pyre in a ghost town should, in no way, lead the FBI to the Winchesters. Not yet, anyway. They shouldn't even be known by most of the agency. Not four at least another year. Dean glanced at Sam, who had one eyebrow up in silent question, and explained, "Henriksen. How did he show up at that hospital?"

The younger Winchester shrugged. "There was a lot of blood at Cold Oak." Sam winced even as the words left his mouth, glancing over his shoulder, but Andy still wasn't looking at them. It hadn't even been Amanda or Scotts. It had mostly been his. "They probably found at least some of it that didn't match any of the victims, and started searching hospitals for a fourth body."

"Right, but Henriksen was on our case specifically."

Sam frowned as Dean glanced between him and the road several times. He tried to go back through the brief interaction at the hospital, but didn't come up with anything that would give his brother that idea. He hadn't realized Henriksen was there looking for them, specifically, so much as he was on the Cold Oak case, looking for a missing victim, and happened to find them. "Last time, you mean?"

"Yeah, Sam. He'd been following us for months before he caught up. Since…" Dean frowned, going silent as he often did when trying to recall events from his other life. It was getting more difficult. He had two sets of memories for more than a year's worth of time, and every year forward was one more year between him and those original memories. Shit was slipping through the cracks every day.

Dean tapped his thumb on the steering wheel as he finally came up with the right memory. "Since St. Louis."

"St. Louis?" Sam's brow furled. He couldn't recall anything that would have the FBI on their tail. The only case they'd even worked in that town this year had been minor, at best. "What happened in St. Louis?"

Dean swore softly. This was definitely one of those double memories. "That shapeshifter. The one in the sewers."

Andy shifted in the backseat, attention drawn back to them ever so slightly. He always had enjoyed hearing about the cases the Winchesters worked before they'd run into him and become his life.

Sam, though, still wasn't following. He remembered the shapeshifter. Remembered Dean going a little overkill on the takedown, actually.

"Did…something happen differently last time?"

Dean blew out a breath that said yes, absolutely yes. "He might have gotten a sample of my DNA before we managed to take him down."

Well before, but Dean didn't really want to go into details.

Sam's eyes widened, eyebrows climbing into his hair, and Dean refused to look at him. It hadn't been his proudest moment, alright, getting kidnapped and tied up, stuck in the filth and smell of a sewer with that damn tarp draped over him while some psychopath went and murdered women with his face.

"Cops took him down, but he was wearing my face. I took all the blame. Five women murdered, and one dead Winchester to show for it."

"Holy shit," Sam said. At the same time, an image of a cow wearing a halo and angel wings flashed purposefully through both their brains. Dean sent Andy a raised eyebrow through the backseat, but the kid still wasn't quite making eye contact yet.

"So…you were dead?" Sam hazarded, ignoring Andy's well-timed and similar reaction.

"I mean, on paper, yeah." Dean shrugged a shoulder shrug, going for nonchalant and not quite making it. "Pretty sure me showing up in a Baltimore Police Department months later on another murder charge kinda drew the attention of the FBI at that point."

"Wow." Sam turned back to the windshield, a little shell-shocked to learn his brother had fake-died in another universe. Fake-died after being framed for the murder and rape of five women. Including the sister-in-law-to-be of one of Sam's closest college friends. Holy Cow indeed. "That sucks."

"Yeah," Dean huffed out, voice more amused than bitter, but bitter all the same. He was pretty damn glad they'd avoided that incident this time around, too. Although, it still begged the same question they didn't have an answer to. "But St. Louis didn't go down that way this time. So what tipped Henriksen off?"

"Well…we still got arrested in Baltimore." Sam's tone stayed even, but Dean was pretty sure he heard the 'no thanks to you' comment in there.

It did not help the case when Andy sent several images, the first of Dean, the second of a kid wearing a dunce cap, and the third, probably what he'd been trying to send all along, was a composite image of the two; Dean sat on a stool, dunce cap on head, frowny face on full. But the image was fuzzy at the edges with an overall blurry quality, not nearly as clear as what had all previously been things he'd seen firsthand.

Still, the message behind it was clear enough.

"Shaddup," Dean grumbled in Andy's direction, the kid looking inordinately pleased with himself. Like he'd told his 'lawyer' that day in the interrogation room: he didn't remember getting arrested on that case. At least, not till later, when it was entirely too late and unhelpful. "That doesn't answer my question. I still wanna know how Henriksen got from there to here. We didn't exactly take the time to be careful in Cold Oak, but what could possibly have tied it to us-"

Andy sat upright in the backseat, startling realization wide in his eyes and open mouth. Then they were bombarded by too many images to understand. Dean was glad he didn't get anything more than a mild head rush from the kid's powers. Poor Sam, on the other hand. The images themselves were enough for Dean, and he didn't get a real clear read on any one of them, except they all had a unifying theme: blood. Blood, blood, and more blood. Enough blood to be seriously concerning on where Andy's head was at.

"Andy, slow down, we don't understand," Sam managed to say through a clenched jaw, automatically rubbing at his temple and the headache that spiked there.

Andy leaned forward, hands curling around the top of the front seat, knuckles going white, as he tried again. He started slow, attempting desperately to get the message across well enough to interpret. What came next to both the Winchester wasn't an image so much as a feeling. A memory, really. Less of one seen and more something physically felt.

Sam didn't move, he knew he didn't move, but he had the distinct impression he was tapping his hand against his chest.

Then the feeling cut out abruptly, replaced by an image of Wiley Coyote, a blinking arrow pointing to him in only the blatant way of Looney Tunes comedy. That didn't make much sense, but then it was replaced with a different cartoon character, one Sam didn't recognize, holding up a sign that read 'That's me!' and finally, an image of Andy himself. Then the Wiley repeat, red arrow blinking on and off.

'It's me.'

The distinct feeling of patting his chest came back, and Sam realized it wasn't just a memory or a thought. Andy, remembering that he was half a foot away from the two of them, that the brothers had eyes and he had more than just his powers as a method of communication, started animatedly tapping his chest. He was mouthing the words.

'It was me.'

"Okay," Dean said slowly, getting better at seeing both Andy's persistent images and the road at the same time without swerving or drifting into the other lane. Well, mostly. "How?"

Another flash of blood, too much blood, followed before Andy was able to wrangle control back from his brain. They'd discovered over the last two days that he often thought faster than his control could handle.

It was the first set of images he'd tried to send, only slower this time. Dean wished he hadn't asked. It wasn't a set of images, it was a memory. Like a video, only Dean had no control over the play and pause buttons.

He was on his hands and knees on hard-packed dirt. Only it wasn't his hands beneath him. He didn't necessarily recognize it as Andy's hand, but Dean had a pretty damn good idea what he was seeing. His other hand – not his hand – was out of sight, but the hunter knew where that was, too. Clutching a throat that wasn't his, recently split open. Blood poured to the ground below in a god damn waterfall of death and Dean knew what he was witnessing, like he had lived it, firsthand.

The older Winchester's hands tightened dangerously on the steering wheel, Baby's leather creaking under the undeserved punishment.

Then the image was gone, thank god, and Dean heard Sam let out a slow, measured breath beside him. Practiced calm in the face of a situation – a god damn memory – that was anything but. Four images followed before either Winchester was ready to see any more. It was a clip from a show Dean didn't recognize, but the CSI-style lab was obvious enough, with a person in a white coat running something through a spectrometer. A small kitchen soaked in blood was next – red splattered on the walls, pooling on the floor, dripping off a knife – with a very obviously dead woman lay in the middle of that kitchen. The same girl, alive and smiling, turned towards them in the next clip, her face lit up with a smile that practically made her glow. Sam wouldn't recognize that girl, but Dean knew who she was. Tracy. Andy's girl. The one who Weber had tried to make jump off a dam in another lifetime. He'd done a lot worse in this one. The last image was another memory, like the one of Tracy smiling. It was the inside of a car, a steering wheel covered in blood and the sensation of shakily raising a hand to an injured head. Steam rose from a crunched in hood, visible through the cracked windshield. Dean had never been inside Andy's van, but he'd seen the end result of that accident enough to piece together the clues.

"Blood," Sam said aloud, connecting at least that much, though that much was the easy part. "You think they were able to identify the blood at Cold Oak as yours?"

Andy shrugged. Hadn't some of the evidence against him in Tracy's murder been blood at the scene? Blood the cops would have later found in his van? He'd left one hell of a puddle of that same blood back in Cold Oak. If the cops tried running it, looking for a match, they'd eventually get his name from the open murder case in Oklahoma. And since all three of them had been caught on camera in Baltimore, his name would lead the FBI right to the Winchesters.

"They'd have had your face from Baltimore. From the cameras," Dean worked through the same equation out loud, glancing in the rear view mirror as Andy nodded along. "I'm sure the FBI got called in to deal with the whole scandal. They would have run facial recognition on all of us."

"Which would have led them Guthrie, Oklahoma," Sam added. "A search on Andy's face would have gotten them to his warrant."

"Okay, that's all back in Baltimore, though. It still doesn't explain how the hell Henriksen figured out we were here. Any other cop or even FBI checking hospitals for an injured vic from Cold Oak, I'd buy." Dean rapped his knuckles against the steering wheel. "But Henriksen himself? Doesn't running blood take, like, time or something? It hasn't even been three full days!"

Dean huffed in frustration, thoughts circling back through that night and everything they'd done. They hadn't been careful while torching those bodies, but what could they have possibly left behind that screamed Winchesters loud enough that somebody thought to call the FBI. He got how Henriksen might have been on their case in Baltimore due to security tapes and the fact those cops had their names, but it wasn't like there was CCTV in Cold Oak.

His brain came to a stuttering halt.

That car. They'd passed only one car on the way into and out of that stupid town. Dean hadn't paid it any attention, far more concerned with their ailing third member, shaking in the backseat as the next round of morphine started to kick in and the car just started to warm up. But if it hadn't been some random passerby to spot that blaze in Cold Oak, if it had specifically been a ranger… Then a LEO had gotten a visual on the type of car they drove and probably a loose description of the two men in the front seat.

"Shit," Dean muttered. Sam eyed him for more to go on. "That car we passed, you think it could have been a Ranger? One that got our license plate or managed a police sketch?"

Even that, though, was a leap to landing in Henriksen's lap. Sure, the Impala had been included in Baltimore PD's report the last go around, but this time… Dean didn't think the cops had ever caught sight of it. Baby hadn't ended up in impound, and had stayed relatively safe and out of the way with Andy. But, really, Time was a bitch who liked to screw with them, so what did Dean actually know anymore, anyway?

In the end, the how didn't matter so much. If the plates were what tied them back to Baltimore and ultimately the feds, they'd have to change them ASAP.

"Some Forest Service vehicles are equipped with dash cams," Sam reasoned even further, though the subject wasn't something he knew a lot about. He hadn't even noticed another car passing them in Black Hills; he'd been busy taking care of their passenger struggling not to pass out in their backseat. However, Sam had seen a documentary once on illegal logging, poaching, and vandalism in State Parks. It had been four in the morning, several years ago when he was still a freshman at Stanford struggling with keeping a non-hunter's sleep schedule in a room not nearly warded to his father's standards, listening to an unfamiliar snoring in the bed across from him. Sam had watched a lot of mindless documentaries those first few months. "If they got an image of us…"

"Facial recognition takes a lot less time to run then blood." And a lot less guess work than a police sketch. Dean shook his head, realizing that possibility was even more likely than the license plate. Even if it wasn't, they should still change them out at the next stop. Henriksen likely did get a look at those plates as they tore away from the hospital. "Damnit. We should have just left the bodies there."

Andy retreated away from the front seat slowly, like he was hoping maybe they wouldn't notice as he sunk into the back and tried to disappear into the seat. Of course, he had no such luck among these brothers, who noticed immediately. Dean swore softly under his breath, glancing in the rear view again. Andy wasn't as pale as he'd been the last few days, but he still looked quietly stricken, realizing Dean was talking about Scott and Amanda.

"I'm sorry, kid." The apology was sincere, and brown eyes flickered to Dean's in the mirror. Andy shrugged and raised a hand, three fingers spread out, pointer and thumb forming a circle.

'It's okay.'

"We need more information," Dean switched topics, or at least circled back to the original one with the kind of conviction that screamed guilt and avoidance. The other occupants in the car didn't call him on it, though, or the way he had to clear his throat to get the words out.

In the passenger seat, Sam shrugged. "Find me a place with wifi decent enough for a hack and we'll see what the police reports say."

It took them almost another twenty minutes to find a place with free wifi. God, Dean missed the days where friggin' McDonalds had free wifi, and it didn't matter anyway because Sam could have just done all of it on his phone to start with. Those were the good days; the past sucked.

-o-o-o-

They ended up in the parking lot of a Starbucks. Dean went in to get the wifi password (had he mentioned he also missed the days where places no longer cared if you were a paying customer?) and was about to grumble out the most basic order he could think of in the frou frou coffee shop, when Andy bounced into the store behind him. He beamed at the lady on the other side of the counter, then tugged on Dean's elbow like a five year old getting their dad's attention. The hunter was, unsurprisingly, accosted by seven different images.

"Pick an easier order," he growled beneath his breath, but Andy shook his head, smiling that innocent little piece-of-shit smile of his. He repeated each image, slightly slower this time, and Dean tilted his head back, praying for patience from a God he knew wasn't listening but oh, he hoped He was if only to have Him share in Dean's annoyance firsthand. The older Winchester lowered his head back down, meeting the understanding but also amused eyes of the barista. "Large decaf white chocolate peppermint mocha, extra whip cream."

Deadpan green eyes slid to the beaming idiot beside him in a pure glare of deep-seated, big brother loathing. But Andy was holding his hands out in a the-fish-was-this-big gesture Dean didn't understand.

"I said large," he grumbled defensively, since Andy was clearly indicating size.

"It's called 'grande,'" the young woman behind the counter piped up. She smiled widely at Andy's enthusiastic thumbs up. Now Dean wanted to murder two people instead of one. Yay, him.

"Grande," he repeated, the monotone a flat, palpable thing in the coffee shop. The barista caught his look at her smile dropped, tinged with embarrassment. She ducked her head, ringing up the order and moving them along as quickly as she could. Andy gave her another thumbs up, which got him a shyer version of that conspiratorial smile, then the kid was pushing at Dean to move to the pickup spot at the end of the counter.

"I can't believe I just dropped five dollars on a drink that's more whip cream than coffee," Dean grumbled as they headed out of the café. "Is there even coffee in that thing at all?"

Andy turned to him, whip cream mustache game going strong, and raised his forefinger and thumb in the tiniest of pinched positions. Dean snorted and rolled his eyes, opening the driver side door and sliding into the car.

"Espresso one two three. No caps, no spaces," Dean said as he plopped onto the seat. Sam already had his laptop out, looking over expectantly. Before he could start typing, however, Andy climbed into the back, slurping loudly at his whip cream. Sam cast a judgmental eyebrow his way.

"Are you even supposed to have caffeine right now? Or…that much sugar? Or hot things?" Mother Samantha was rearing her head, apparently. Which, hey, they did just bust the kid out of a hospital a couple days earlier than was medically recommended and after the worst injury either hunter had ever seen. So…touché, Mother Samantha. But when the younger Winchester turned that scolding look on Dean, like it was somehow his fault, the older of the two raised his hands like he had nothing to do with it. Andy slurped a little louder, smacking his lips happily at the first thing worth living for that he'd gotten to enjoy since his (multiple) near death.

This was what life was all about. Whip cream and peppermint chunks.

Sam rolled his eyes at another loud mouthful but eventually let the argument – if you could even call it that – go. Andy was a grown-ass adult, if drinking that hurt his throat, he wouldn't do it. Well, probably anyway. Instead, the younger Winchester got to work looking up any information the local news channels had concerning the Cold Oak case. There wasn't a great deal readily available, which was unsurprising, given the FBI were involved.

"It looks like it was a ranger that spotted us – two men in a classic car, black or dark blue, heading away from the scene. They are wanted for questioning." Sam cleared his throat, uncomfortable with the police – the FBI – having even that much on them. "None of these articles have much more than the radio report did. Three bodies were found in a deliberate fire at Cold Oak by a Ranger who spotted the smoke." Sam looked up from his screen, casting a far-too-casual look towards Andy, who had gone quiet, though he was still sipping his drink. Sam's voice was slightly more hesitant as he continued, "They're as-of-yet unidentified. Custer and Rapid counties are looking into missing person reports."

Andy swallowed his miniscule sip of peppermint mocha a little too hard, wincing at the pain. He was still on a small dosage of morphine, as the Winchesters did not have much of a supply to start with, at least until they had time to fill the prescriptions Sam got off the doctor. The morphine did help take the edge off, but Andy felt too-quick movements a lot more thoroughly now that he wasn't at the hospital on steady doses of painkiller. Dean promised they would get those pain meds as soon as they were far away from Sturgis to make that kind of stop safely.

Andy concentrated on an image in his mind, picturing it as clearly as he could before sending it to the Winchesters. Composites – images that weren't just memory but bits and pieces put together to create a new image – were a lot harder to maintain. Sam had reported on each attempt so far that what got through was always fuzzy, lacking details and solidity.

Luckily, this one was not so complicated.

"I don't know if that's a good idea," Sam hedged cautiously as the image of an ad for an anonymous tip hotline – the number too unclear to make out, but the rest easy enough to read – faded from his mind's eye. He turned in his seat so he could look at Andy fully. He wanted the sincerity of his hesitation to come across as more than just concern for their safety. Sam understood this was about Amanda and Scott too, not just the Winchesters and Andy. "With the FBI after us now, we may need to lay really low."

"We can look into it," Dean added, meeting Andy's eyes in the rearview mirror, despite the fact that they were still parked.

Although it sounded like nothing more than meaningless conciliation, Andy nodded, believing the older Winchester. Dean was usually pretty good about his promises, and even better when guilt-tripped into them. It was something Andy had seen Sam do more than once in their three months together, and Andy had used the trick once or twice himself.

Tracy always said he was a fast learner.

Andy understood Sam's concern, really, he did, but he didn't want Amanda and Scott's families to live the rest of their lives wondering what happened to them. He didn't know Amanda's last name – she'd never told him it – but he had her first, her college, and the fact that she played on the softball team. That would be enough to find a missing persons report from the Berkeley area, so long as the police or FBI went nation-wide.

Andy dropped his gaze, head hung as he stared into his whipped cream mocha, fighting back the fresh flood of guilt. The hospital had tried to get him to talk to their stationed psychiatrist, but they hadn't gotten far. And only partially because Andy couldn't actually talk.

"Hey." Dean's voice, soft in volume but confident and in control as always, called Andy's attention back to his green eyes. Dean could always look so damn certain when it came to everyone else's problems. Andy had always liked that about him. "It wasn't your fault, kid. We'll do what we can to let their families know, alright?"

They could get a friend of a friend of a hunter's other friend to make an anonymous call, need be. Something that could never be tracked back to the Winchesters or any of their known associates. Between their Roadhouse contacts and Bobby's, that shouldn't be too difficult.

Sam, though, was thinking about something else entirely. "A black, classic car," he murmured, currently considering hacking into the Rapid City police data base to see if they had anything more specific than that. If all they had was the Ranger's eye witness report, they were probably fine.

"We should change Baby's plates," Dean said in response. They always carried spares in the trunk, able to change them out quickly should the Impala ever be spotted fleeing a crime scene. It was a necessity not only as a hunter, but especially as a hunter with such a memorable car. Of course, there was no way the Winchesters were ever walking into a fight without Baby. She was one of the team, after all.

"Yeah," Sam agreed, though his thoughts were clearly elsewhere, tone absentminded. He shifted in his seat again, a small frown pulling furrowing his brow as he looked back over at his brother. "It was a good thing the parking lot at the hospital was so full this morning. An FBI agent would have spotted the Impala before he ever made it through the doors."

"Huh." Dean made a face at that, having been annoyed earlier at the inconvenience that seemed out of nowhere. In fact…something distant and far away, like a word stuck on the tip of your tongue but going no further, swam lazily through the fog of Dean's memory. The hunter frowned. What was that? Something…something about someone helping them as much as they could…but still not enough?

The older Winchester shook his head. That made no sense. This was an overfull parking lot they were talking about, not a favor from some hunting buddy. It was a lucky break for once, which they rarely got, or a hell of a coincidence, which was much more likely.

Dean cleared his throat and the thought drifted away. He glanced back over at Sam. "You wanna see if they know more, or we good?"

The younger Winchester gave the thought of hacking the police website another half second before shaking his head. He closed his laptop and slid it back into his bag. "Wifi's too spotty for that. We can do it when we're back at Bobby's."

Until then, it didn't sound like the local cops had enough to go on for the Winchesters to truly worry. They pulled into an alley behind a grocery store in the same lot as the Starbucks. There was a large blind spot in security cameras that Dean took full advantage of. The older Winchester swapped out Baby's Kansas plates for an Ohio pair in the same amount of time it took Andy to finish off his peppermint mocha cappuccino whip cream whatever.

The whole stop took less than half an hour in total before the boys were back on the road. In the backseat, Andy licked the last remains of whip cream from the inside of his empty cup and Dean threatened him with a death more painful than the last five days combined if he even thought of tossing that thing onto Baby's floor.

-o-o-o-

Tom stared at the chalice of blood, thick and silent, with a great deal of distaste. His new meatsuit itched, this apartment wasn't nearly as nice as his last borrowed-slash-I-murdered-your-previous-owners-so-your-mine-now place, and, as Azazel's sole surviving protégée on earth, it was now his duty to contact the Prince of Hell. Who was currently trapped in hell.

It was times like this that Tom would have been quite happy to have his sister back alive.

The demon cleared his throat self-consciously, prepared himself for his father's ire, and reminded the two rotting human corpses in the corner of his vision that he wasn't the one who'd gotten himself exorcised. He was still on Earth, and it was Azazel who needed his help. Tom didn't need the reminder, of course. But those two measly humans hadn't even known who it was who'd killed them. Tom was merely reminding them of the honor they should feel, and not bolstering himself up in the slightest in preparation of talking with this father.

He put his hands on either side of the chalice and began to chant.

"Find me a door."

Those were the first, furious words that bubbled out of the blood in a language that wilted the fresh flowers sitting on the quaint kitchen counter. A guilt-laden purchase by the male owner of this apartment for his female partner, who had no idea he'd spent the previous night with a hooker rather than 'working late at the office'. Culpability made humans do the stupidest of things. Tom did not miss the days when he'd been one himself.

Well, the flowers were as dead as their cheating owner now, so, that ought to teach the adulterer not to waste money on such an impermanent and ultimately futile gift.

"That will take time," Tom reminded his father. While it would be easier to locate and open a small door to the underworld – nothing more than a hole the size of a button – from Earth's side than it would be from Hell, it was still a tedious endeavor. One that would take Tom away from the Winchester's trail, away from the trials his father had begun on his special children, and no longer able to check in on Persephone.

Not that Tom thought the last even counted as a real reason. He was no babysitter and everything he'd seen from the woman so far only convinced him his father's plan for her was a waste of time. But it had been Azazel who told him, very strictly, not to leave her unattended for long, not to unleash her unless in the presence of the prophet, and absolutely, under no circumstances, to trust her.

Like he was foolish enough to do such a stupid thing. That didn't mean he saw a point in watching the creature like a hawk when she was clearly a glorified nanny and nothing more. A long distance nanny, at that, given her only contact with Sam Winchester was through the prophet's writing. For all the good she did them, Tom could keep a better eye on the hunter than that bitch.

"We don't have time!" Azazel hissed, the blood bubbling viciously, drops spattering onto the table with his annoyance. Tom winced, grateful this conversation was not in person for his father to see such a reaction. "Open the cemetery Hellgate."

Tom stared at the blood, wondering for only a moment if he'd misheard the command, or if his father had truly lost his edge. They had the Colt, so they could theoretically unlock that door, but they didn't have a human under their control yet to get to it. In fact, his father had just wasted their best bet; a human he had chosen to send to Cold Oak right before springing their trap on the angel in Oregon.

Jonathon Bailey had been their first and best option to cross Samuel Colt's iron rail lines to open that gate. He was eager to prove himself, enjoyed gorging on his newfound abilities, had a blood-thirsty streak that guaranteed the boy a first class ticket to Hell, and was easily manipulated with a simple promise of glory and power. He'd been a shoe-in! But Azazel wasted him in round one, and now their best shot at Fossil Butte Cemetery was dead.

Not only did they not have a human to work for them at the moment – and getting one last minute would mean involving Crowley, something his father had avoided from the beginning for obvious reasons (the man was a snake, even by demonic standards) – but they weren't ready to open the gate. Their contingent of demons so far amassed on earth, increasing every day with each demon slipping, one by one, through the holes and doorways they could find out of Hell, were not gathered in one place. They'd have no defense against the forces of Heaven that would surely be sent out to investigate the Hellgate opening. Even if that force remained nothing more than the current earth-bound unit they'd had on the planet for centuries, a dozen angels would still be enough to thwart much of their plans.

Every one of those demons that escaped the Hellgate would be needed in the coming battle They couldn't afford to lose any to a skirmish with Heaven so early on. More importantly, their primary purpose in opening the gate to begin with was freeing Lilith. Tom might not know the end goal of his father's plans, but that much had been crystal clear. Hell was going to war with Heaven, and they didn't stand a chance without Lilith topside.

"Father, unless you want to deal with Crowley's people, we don't have someone to cross the lines. Jonathon Bailey is dead. All the children from Cold Oak are dead except the Winchester's pet, who escaped," he explained, voice tight to keep the majority of condescension from his voice. Azazel should know better than this. Both messes were from his short-sidedness and, frankly, Tom was unimpressed with the temper tantrum his father was putting on through the blood. A Prince of Hell should handle a little set back better.

Oh well. It was only an opportunity for Tom to shine.

"I suppose we could send the Princess over the lines-"

"No." The word was fierce. Spoken with the kind of spitting disgust Azazel had been born from. "I don't want the Colt within a dozen feet of Persephone. Under no circumstances are you to give her that gun."

Tom rolled his eyes, knowing his father couldn't see him. Yet again, on with the woman like she was a real threat. They had all the leverage they needed to keep her in line. Granted, the Colt could kill a demon, so Tome wouldn't exactly want to be in the same space as their borrowed captive when he gave the weapon to her.

"Then we don't have a guinea pig and I can't get you out of Hell without abandoning everything else." Tom let the words sink into the blood, the bubbles settling with general aversion. Then, fighting back the urge to smirk, he added, "You are the one that said we didn't have time to pull anyone out of Hell if they got themselves exorcised-"

The chalice rattled with the inhuman growl, blood spilling over the silver rim and sliding down its ornately curved sides. More blood spattered the desk, the viscous liquid boiling with Azazel's rage. But Tom knew there was nothing his father could do about it. Sure, he might suffer his father's wrath if he ever did make it back to the surface – and he would, eventually – but by then Tom would prove himself. He'd finish Azazel's plans all on his own.

As silence descended in the small room, smelling heavily of iron and rot, the blood eventually stilled. With a ripple, Azazel's voice came through, calmer, though still spoken through gritted teeth. "Very well, son. Continue the plan for opening the Hellgate. And gather the next round of children. Tonight."

"Cold Oak is compromised," Tom replied, almost lazily. The first thing he'd done upon getting himself a new meatsuit was get back to his appropriated-by-murder apartment and look at Ruby's map. The little fire that was Sam Winchester's demon-tainted soul had been burning small and bright on I-90, trucking right on towards the haunted mining town. "It's the first place the Winchesters headed."

"How did they know to go there?" Azazel's voice was like ash and fire, spitting from the rim of a volcano. Tom was glad he wasn't around to feel the burn. "One angel alone is not enough to explain all of this…"

The demon waited for his father's conclusion, looking more bored than anything else. Tom didn't have a clue how Dean Winchester seemed to have all the answers. A halo in his chest was bad enough. Now, however, it really was starting to look like he might have all of Heaven on his side. That, or Hell had a mole. Tom dismissed the thought. A demon turning on one of his own was like a human breathing air, but a demon working with a hunter, especially one with an angel all up in his soul? Hell was closer to freezing over.

"It doesn't matter. We move on as planned. Find somewhere else."

Easily done. Tom grinned. He already had the perfect place in mind. It was simply too bad it wasn't the right year to make the experience a truly interesting one. Still, even outside of an intercalary year, the place was plenty haunted to provide Azazel's special children with all the weaponry they'd need.

"I'll get the kids there by the end of the week. Anything else?"

The blood gurgled with hesitation and Tom straightened, interest finally flickering across his features. Azazel never hesitated, so whatever this was about had to be good. Tom leaned unconsciously towards the cup.

"Father?"

The Prince of Hell growled down the line, the blood bubbling with it.

"There's more to this plan that you don't know." Azazel sounded terse and impatient. He had kept most details of this grand scheme of his and Lilith's to himself, and Tom was all the more eager to hear it now. "Was Sam Winchester immune to the Croatoan virus?"

Tom shrugged a shoulder. "He hasn't turned, so I'd say it's safe to say he is."

"Good. Now…for our plan to work, he needs to be the last child brought to Cold Oak – or whatever new location," Azazel corrected himself with another low growl.

Meanwhile, Tom's eyes narrowed slightly on the chalice. He had already known the Winchester boy was to be in the last group tested, so what exactly could it be that his father hadn't told him? He edged forward in his seat, gaze locked on the bubbling blood.

"And he needs to lose."

Tom blinked. What? But…that made no sense. Sam Winchester had always been his father's favored special child. The one to beat. The rumored General to lead Hell in the upcoming battle, as preposterous as that may sound to any demon.

"I don't understand. He's been your favorite since the beginning-"

Azazel's voice was quite clear as it came through, thick and demanding. "It's very simple, boy. Either Sam Winchester loses or you make sure he doesn't leave that place alive."

Tom – son of Azazel, turned by the yellow-eyed Prince of Hell himself – stared at the blood. That…made even less sense. Unless…unless their end goal was something entirely different than he'd been led to believe. The smile was slow to form, but wicked once it got its start. Tom leaned his elbows onto the table, eyeing the chalice of blood with newfound interest.

"Father…what exactly is this plan?"

Chapter End Notes

A/Ns: OMG you guys. I had to start another word document for this story. Season 2 point 1 was over 350 pages, 190,000 words, and took more than two minutes to save every time - . - Now I'm onto Season 2 point 2. Good. Mother. Effing. Grief.

It's been at least three chapters since I said it, so I'm just gonna say it. Verbose. As. Fuck.

Up Next: The boys finally get back home, Bobby is Bobby (aka pure awesomeness), Andy's got all the feels, and Dean decides he really just can't do it anymore. Time to activate Operation Monumentally Stupid!

Chapter 88: Season 2: Chapter 55

Chapter Notes

A/Ns: Merry Christmas and Happy Holidays to all you beautiful readers! (extra presents and joy to my wonderful, amazing, encouraging reviewers/commenters :D) I am once more in an airport. It's kind of ridiculous how many of these chapters go up in airports around the continent….

Chapter Reference – Persephone and the Impala Hex Bag: Quick reminder that Persephone broke into the Impala back in Sturgis, the first night Andy was in the hospital. She dismantled the hex bag, leaving it spread out on the hood of the car for the boys to find as a warning to be more careful with it. See Chapter 84 for a refresher.

Editing Warning: This chapter feels off to me, but I think it's just the compacted/bounce-around way I recapped time passing at Bobby's. (I also wrote this chapter three separate times and kept having to edit the different versions together. I think it shows…) Anyway, not 100% on it but am out of time to edit further, so feel free to share your thoughts.

Chapter Warnings: The boys enjoy (well, sort of) their last bit of downtime before the hectic life of a Winchester picks back up with a big bang. Well, a vision of a big bang. Well, okay, someone else's vision of a big bang.

See the end of the chapter for more notes

-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-

The Road So Far (This Time Around)

Season 2: Chapter 55

-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-

Andy gave Bobby a big hug the moment they walked in. If the gruff old hunter was trying to hide the way it warmed his cheeks or brought an embarrassed, awkward smile to his face, he failed miserably. Coming into the house behind the kid, Dean snorted, covering it up with an awkward cough when he got one hell of a glare for it. Behind him, Sam was caught somewhere between a smile and a smirk at the scene. Dean would have called it sweet enough to rot teeth, which was only half of Sam's amusement. Then the kid was pulling back and Bobby found himself accosted by images too fast to register, let alone interpret.

"Ack," the older hunter grunted with a wince, hand raising to rub at his temple and the fading spike of not-quite-pain that had jolted through it. Realizing what he was doing, Bobby covered the move by grabbing at his cap and re-adjusting it on his head. Both Sam and Dean shared a sympathetic look, having warned him well ahead of time.

"Yeah. He does that now," Dean griped, though there was a half smirk on his face as he came to stand next to Andy, tossing his go-bag on the couch.

"You kind of get used to it," Sam reasoned as well, offering a one shoulder shrug while Andy gave each of them a mock glare in turn.

"Yeah, well, that might work for us, kid, but it won't fly with the rest of the world." Bobby reached behind him to his desk, snagging a book off the surface and tossing it to Andy. The psychic caught it – a touch clumsily with his bandaged hands – and stared down at the cover with a curious expression.

Sign language. Andy blinked down at the book on the silent language. He…hadn't even really thought about communicating with the rest of the world. Hell, he didn't really interact with anyone except the Winchesters and Bobby. Except, well, maybe on cases. But…he hadn't really thought he'd be hunting anymore. At least, not for a while. Maybe not ever, if he was being painfully honest with himself (which he'd only been once since waking up in the hospital. While the time was coming to revisit that thought, Andy didn't really feel up to it right this second). He supposed it was only practical to assume there would be times he'd talk to other people again. At least, it would be good to maybe have the option?

He glanced between the brothers and Bobby. Sam, ever the bookworm, held his hand out and Andy passed the book over. The sasquatch started flipping through it.

"There's videos on the web," Bobby continued, crossing his arms over his chest and leaning back against the edge of the desk. "Pro'lly easier to learn that way. Always been more of a book guy myself.

Which was an understatement, given the shelves and shelves of books that lined this room alone, not to mention the stacks of books in the corners throughout the house and half the basement. Bobby wasn't just awesome, he was a force unto himself. Andy thought he was intimidating as hell when he wasn't busy being a kind of awesome surrogate uncle.

"I'll learn with ya." The older hunter nodded with his head towards the book, still in Sam's arms. "That way you got someone to practice with."

Andy wasn't quite sure what to say to that. It made his chest all warm and gooey to think the old hunter cared enough. Although it was definitely in the stern, disciplinary manner of a vice principle who took his job too seriously. Andy didn't really like that prospect of this apparent deal, but still… The kid smiled widely, and sent an image of a thank you card he'd once seen in Tracy's shop and always liked. Never had the opportunity to buy it or give it to someone, though.

Bobby winced again, but at least he didn't raise his hand to his head this time. Instead, he raised it to his chin, palm flat and fingertips touching skin. Then he lowered it straight in front of him, meeting his other palm.

Andy blinked.

"It means thank you," Sam offered helpfully, glancing between the book in his hands and Bobby. He wouldn't be surprised if the older hunter had already made it entirely through the lessons and was already semi-literate.

The psychic scooted over to the younger Winchester, looking over his arm at the page covering basic interactions and manners. He read it for a second, then looked up at Bobby and made the gesture for 'you're welcome' the best he could with his wrapped hands.

Bobby snorted, and Dean used the wide grin spreading across his face to hide the fact that he was struggling with way too many emotions, bordering on the frightfully feely. He clapped a hand to Bobby's back, making the old hunter grunt and shift against the desk.

"You're the best, Bobby."

The hunter just rolled his eyes, pushing off the sturdy surface and grabbing the book out of Sam's arms. He tossed it back onto the desk. If he was gonna have a house full of kids being, well, kids, then he was at least gonna put them to work, and it was well past dinner time.

-o-o-o-

Dean brought the burgers in off the grill, kicking the back door closed behind him. He set the cutting board full of patties down on the counter beside Sam, who was making up buns with all the condiments. Next to him, Andy was in charge of toppings. Which was a terrible idea, it turned out. In order to know what each of them wanted, the three hunters got accosted with pictures of lettuce, tomatoes, onions, pickles, and, the one that got everyone to stop what they were doing and look at the kid, potato chips.

'What?' Andy mouthed at all of them when he realized they were staring. He shrugged his shoulders defensively. 'It's good!'

A couple feet away, Bobby made the signs for both those things with a pointed look. Andy managed to look both sheepish and put out at the same time. But he did repeat them, a bit unsurely and to the best of his ability given his four main fingers on each hand functioned more like one big penguin flipper while bandaged, and one of those flippers was waving around a butter knife. Bobby seemed to deem it acceptable on a basis of effort over success.

They ate dinner in relative silence between the four of them, the exhaustion of the last week catching up like dead weight. Dean made it through his entire burger (potato chips and all, which he did have to begrudgingly give to the kid; it was a good addition) before he called it, body reminding him just what it had survived over five days. Sam only got halfway through his meal, bun still sitting on the kitchen counter in favor of two large pieces of iceberg lettuce (the weirdo, Dean had said, Andy had pictured, and Bobby had translated into sign), but he did manage not to nod off at the table until Dean stood up first. The younger Winchester pulled a 'this is his idea, I'm just going along with it' move and followed along like he wasn't just as exhausted as his brother. Andy nodded to both of them when they seemed hesitant to leave him alone. Not like Bobby was gonna bite (okay, he might bark, but Andy could handle it…probably). The two of them had been protective enough around him to last the only child a lifetime; he sure as hell could survive the rest of the evening alone with one gruff, old hunter.

The Winchesters dumped their plates in the kitchen, Sam promising to clean up in the morning and Dean knowing Bobby would do it long before they ever got to it, then headed upstairs. The ceiling above Bobby and Andy creaked about for all of five minutes before everything went dead silent.

Andy glanced at his new roomie. The two stared at each other in the silence, one an actual mute and the other an elected mute. Andy offered a wide, overly-faked smile and Bobby just snorted, getting up to clear his plate.

-o-o-o-

Dean checked on Angela on his way to his and Sam's room. The sasquatch gave a cursory glance to the woman and the room, checking the machines from afar, though he was confident Bobby knew what he was doing. Sam wrapped a fraternal hand around Dean's shoulder, squeezing quickly, before he continued on his way down the hall.

The older Winchester stood in the doorway, as if entering the room might break some silent spell, and stared at the sleeping woman. Bobby had said there'd been no change but, with a braindead patient in a coma, that was a good thing. Not a telling thing, of course. They had no way of knowing if her soul was still attached to her body. Not without some spellwork of their own.

"Come back to us, Cas," he whispered to the silent room once he was sure Sam was out of earshot. Then, with a sigh, he pushed off the doorframe and headed to his own bed to get some much needed sleep.

-o-o-o-

Sam slept for fourteen hours. Dean kept it to a much more reasonable nine (which was already absurd for him), but the truth was, neither of them had really processed everything that had happened in the last week. Rivergrove felt like months ago, even if it was what had kicked all of this off. It made Dean's growing itch to get out there and find Cas all the more present. It had only been a week, but it felt like a lifetime. A lifetime where anything could be happening to the angel.

Cas could already be dead, and they'd never even know.

The Winchesters didn't talk about it. Not about their wayward angel, not about the three hundred and seventy people they'd lost in Oregon. Not about what Andy had gone through in Cold Oak or even the fact that the FBI was on their tail. Not more than was needed to fill in the blanks for Bobby. The old hunter had been keeping an eye on the news channels and tabloids ever since the zombie town. It took two and a half days, but eventually, something did turn up. It started in the tabloids. A town nuked by a secret government military test. Whole town wiped from existence. Three hundred dead or missing, and no one willing to talk about it or claim responsibility.

It was four days before an actual story emerged from a more reputable source. Rivergrove, Oregon had been the site of a tragic gas explosion. The entire town gone up with no survivors. Just one of those natural, terrible disasters that history would remembered and pretty much no one else. The story remained ridiculously hush hush despite the terrible nature of the accident and the number of lives lost. Only a few newspapers covered it nationally, a couple more in the State itself. Bobby kept it to himself until the boys arrived to hear it in person. No need to trouble them while they were in the hospital with the kid.

Hearing about it now, Dean had no doubt in his mind that Heaven was responsible, for both the disaster and the lack of attention or outrage it received. He'd heard firsthand what Heaven liked to do to towns that needed eradication. The hunter's fists clenched at his sides at the reminder of Uriel, of Cas and that damn Halloween town the two angels had almost wiped off the face of the earth.

He'd had to leave the room, eight little crescent marks dug into his palm and welling up red. The older Winchester went back upstairs to sit in Angela's room and stare at an unmoving vessel.

That same day, once Sam had woken from his 'beauty sleep' as Dean called it, the younger Winchester talked to Bobby about getting someone unassociated with them to call in a tip on Amanda Figuerro and Scott Carey's whereabouts. While the Winchesters slept, Andy did some digging through the University of Berkley's website, specifically their women's softball team, until he'd found her. Staring at Amanda's picture, the young woman smiling in a uniform, bat raised up on her shoulder, and realizing he'd been involved in depriving the world of that smile, had resulted in a meltdown that he'd tried to hide from Bobby. Tried being the key word, as the older man had come running at the first sounds of choking. He'd been so relieved the kid wasn't dying of some throat-related thing that he didn't care if he got covered in slobber and snot as the boy fell to pieces against his chest.

They hadn't spoken to the brothers about it. Some things stayed between men.

Bobby agreed to find a hunting buddy with no traceable relationship to the Winchesters who could call the Custer Police with names. Hunters knew how to leave anonymous tips, so he needn't worry about it getting traced at all, let alone back to them. Andy thought he would do better knowing their families wouldn't be left wondering what had happened to them. The truth might be terrible, but he personally thought not knowing, left hoping and wondering and imagining, for years, would be so much worse.

He wished he could apologize to the families in person, but he knew that wasn't an option. Knew from enough reading on philosophy, psychology, psychiatry, and trauma (some of his favorite subjects in a previous life), along with the assurances of the Winchesters and Bobby, that it was guilt urging him forward. What had happened wasn't his fault, and laying himself at the feet of Amanda's parents wasn't going to do anybody anything good.

Especially since the FBI probably thought he was the one who killed them. Him and the Winchesters. Yeah, that part wasn't helping with the whole guilt thing, either.

Bobby placed the call and Andy tried to let it go. He knew it wasn't going to be that easy, and on the second night when the older hunter stumbled in on another panic attack, he offered the kid a post it note with the number for a therapist who knew the life. He told him they'd figure out the talking thing, but if Andy needed someone who actually knew their shit enough to help him…they'd get it for him. Andy had taken it with shaking hands and a weepy nod.

That night, a floor above and a dream away, Sam woke to Dean yelling out Cas's name. The adrenaline in that cry had him on his feet, knife in hand, before he realized it was only his brother and there was no danger. Well, no immediate danger. Dean was sitting up on the bed, heaving for breath, hand clutching at his chest like he was having a heart attack.

"Dean?"

It took the older Winchester two more calls and a jerky head turn before he responded. "I'm fine."

They both knew it wasn't true, but Sam didn't push. Dean just bit down on his tongue and clammed up anytime Sam had asked the past few days. Eventually, the younger hunter laid back down, feigning sleep. Dean waited more than half an hour, Sam purposefully slowing his breath, before the older Winchester climbed out of bed and went and sat in Angela's room.

Lying on his side, back to the door, Sam stared at the moon out the window and listened. His whole body was tense, despite him trying to let the tension go. He was waiting to hear his brother's footsteps on the stairs, the front or back door open, the rumble of the Impala as Dean left him behind. But the older Winchester stayed in Angela's room until dawn, then went downstairs, put on a pot of coffee, and started cooking breakfast.

The younger brother knew the number of nights left before Dean did take off were dwindling fast. He closed his eyes and prayed to Cas again, hoping she would return before that clock ran out.

Sam woke up the next morning, only a handful of hours later, with a fever. It was nothing he deemed worth worrying about or mentioning. It took till evening for the tremors to set in, and by then Sam couldn't tell if it was the low-grave fever of a common flu, withdrawal, or the panic attack he'd just barely kept at bay for the last twelve hours at the thought of going into withdrawal again.

Dean noticed that night, but didn't say anything until the two were up in their room, readying for bed. Sam didn't have answers for him, so he was being honest when he told his brother he didn't know. It didn't feel like last time, but the amount of blood from last time to this time was vastly different. So was the time. It had taken a month at least after the whole jar. This might just be a cold.

Dean chewed on the inside of his cheek and Sam laid down. His dreams were as fitful as his brother's, and neither Winchester got much sleep that night.

Day three showed no improvement on the fever or the shakes, but Sam didn't get worse. Bobby pumped the kid full of vitamin C, Andy played nursemaid to the point where Sam told him to back off, it was only a cold. Their resident Jedi just grinned that shit-eating grin in response to the youngest Winchester's crankiness. The kid reminded him via multiple headache-inducing images, just how much of a pain in the ass the Winchesters had been for those four days he'd spent in the hospital. Sam conceded that point, but still insisted he was fine. Withdrawal or cold, it didn't seem to be getting worse.

His fever broke by dinner that night, and the entire Singer-Winchester-Gallagher household breathed out a relieved breath.

It was on their fourth morning there, the four of them sitting at the kitchen table eating breakfast like some sort of warped concept of a normal family, that Bobby brought out a dark blue folder and both Winchesters straightened. The older hunter tossed it on the table between them. Sam glanced at Dean before he picked up the case, flipping through it.

"It's not much," Bobby mentioned, tone purposefully casual. "Hunter buddy of mine called it in. Said he caught wind of it but ain't close enough to go himself."

The way the two boys glanced at each other now, Bobby was glad he'd opted not to bring it up until he'd seen both boys start to fidget. He figured three days was plenty of time for a hunter to sleep, rest up, and then become restless. Even with Sam's 'cold'. Dean spent too many hours checking in on Angela, sitting in a chair by her bed or standing in the doorway, muttering under his breath all the while. Sam rubbed the back of his neck, right where Dean said he'd taken a syringe full of demon blood and Croatoan virus. The kid complained about it like an ache from a good flu, but Bobby was pretty sure it was something else entirely. He'd also spotted Sam's new habit of pressing on that mostly healed wound on his palm, too. Bobby had found him, more than once, standing in the middle of a room, looking lost, rubbing at that freshly pink and white line. That one, though, the kid was aware of. Sam would often stop if someone else was around; it was the first and most blatant sign of any tell. A worrying one, at that.

Bobby had been keeping a careful eye on both of 'em and knew it was time for them to move on. Before Dean did something stupid (in his house) trying to get that angel of his back, or Sam got too caught up in his big brain and small sense of self-worth.

Sam passed the folder to his brother, already knowing they'd take it. But Dean glanced up at Andy. The kid was just frowning curiously, trying to read the file from across the table and failing. He might not be capable of hunting right now – hell, he might not even want to hunt ever again – but he couldn't seem to kick the curiosity bug.

Kid would make a fine research assistant, Bobby reasoned.

"Looks like a possible werewolf," Sam filled in the rest of the table, considering Dean still hadn't looked through the research Bobby had done. "In Lafayette, Indiana."

Dean shrugged, finally glancing at the thing before handing it back to his brother without seeing a word of it. That description alone wasn't enough for the timey senses to go on, but they'd been through that town a time or two. He glanced at Andy again, and this time the kid caught the look. He returned it with expectantly raised eyebrows. When Dean didn't react, Andy added a shooing motion with his hand. The older Winchester chuffed, going back to his egg sandwich.

"We'll look into it. No promises, though," he said through a mouth full of food, making Andy grin and Sam roll his eyes. Across the table, Bobby just shrugged. He had other hunters he could call if the boys decided they weren't ready to leave Andy yet. Bobby was pretty sure he knew what their answer would be, though.

-o-o-o-

"You sure about this, kid?" Dean asked, voice low, as he stood in the den that afternoon with Andy, go bag re-packed and flung over his shoulder. The kid just raised that same eyebrow his way and Dean could hearthe little brother sarcasm in the silent room. "Bobby's got other hunters. We don't have to go."

Andy rolled his eyes and made the shooing gesture again. The first few nights had gone better than he'd thought they would. On their way to Bobby's, the Winchesters had stopped halfway between Sturgis and Sioux Falls to fill Andy's prescriptions, Dean purposefully driving an hour north of the shortest route in case the FBI could track that shit (which Sam said they probably could). Andy had expected a downgrade in painkillers, but Dr. Richards had not slacked off. Nope, he'd been in high heaven for six solid hours that first night. Sure, he had to sleep propped up as per Sam's home-care and out-patient packet, but with how fuzzy his mind and body had been once the meds kicked in, Andy hadn't even been all that bothered. It wasn't much of a change from the hospital, after all.

Four days later and he'd progressed to a thirty degree angle instead of a seventy degree angle. Life was going great!

The kid raised a hand, thumb sticking straight up, as he smiled at Dean. He shoved his smartass default to the side temporarily, letting his sincerity behind his shooing them out come through. He'd be fine, and the Winchesters should be out doing what they did best. They were wasted milling about Bobby's house all day, waiting for him to break like glass while they crammed their own issues as far down into their respective psyches as they could.

Dean glanced over at Bobby as the older man came into the room, arms crossed. Sam, who'd been packing his stuff in the car, followed just behind. Bobby gave a reassuring nod, no words needed. He'd take care of the kid. The older Winchester smiled, though it didn't feel quite right on his face. He put a hand on Andy's shoulder and squeezed.

"We'll be back in a couple of days."

"If that," Sam added, the folder with Bobby's research in hand. It really didn't look like much of a case, if it even was one. They might be able to knock it out in a day and spend most of their time driving.

Andy nodded before his eyes narrowed in concentration, and all three got a clip of an old black and white film. The images never came with sound, something Andy said he was going to work on (Bobby had looked grumpy as hell at that idea, though he did reluctantly agree to help the kid with it), but Dean knew the film well, with or without the soundtrack.

'Stay out of trouble, kid.'

Dean rolled his head, but squeezed Andy's shoulder again. Message received. He dug into his coat pocket, pulling out the same hex bag they'd kept on Andy when he'd been in the hospital. He tossed it to the kid, watching him catch it clumsily with bandaged hands.

"You keep that on you at all times," he ordered. A 'stay out of trouble, yourself', in not so many words. Andy looked down at the hex bag, hefting the minor weight of it in his palm. The kid nodded at him, tucking it into the pocket of his hoodie. Then, with a wink and absolutely no emotion that was not manly as all hell, Dean headed out of the den past Sam, bumping into him fraternally on the way.

Andy caught Sam's eye when he was done shaking his head at his older brother's definitely younger antics. With his free hand, Andy raised two fingers to his own eyes, then pointed to Dean's retreating figure.

'Keep an eye on him.'

The younger Winchester nodded, coming forward to give Andy a hug farewell himself. The kid pressed his head into Sam's chest, a good foot shorter than the beanstalk of a man. Sam rested his chin on Andy's head for the briefest of moments. The kid gave good hugs, and Sam only felt a little guilty taking advantage of it, coming from a family of back-slapping and almost-died man-hugs only. "I'll watch out for him. You take care of yourself, Andy. We'll be alright."

Their resident Jedi patted his back in answer. As Sam pulled away, he held out his own parting gift for the kid. Andy blinked at the Persian sleep coin, held between Sam's pointer and middle fingers. He shook his head, pushing Sams' hand back.

"Take it," the younger Winchester insisted, grabbing Andy's hand and placing the coin in his palm. "With Azazel in Hell, you might not even need it."

And maybe Sam wouldn't need it either.

The look the Jedi skewered him with said he knew just as much and had half the faith about it that Sam did. But the younger Winchester only smiled, closing Andy's fist around the coin. He knew how much the boy struggled with dreams, whether or not a yellow-eyed demon featured in them.

"Keep it safe for me."

Then Sam headed out to join his brother in the Impala and the Winchesters left for the next hunt.

-o-o-o-

Andy and Bobby watched the boys head out from the front door. The coin was hot in Andy's fist, pressed into the depths of his hoodie's front pocket. His other hand gripped the hex bag just as tightly, and he tried not to think of the items like farewell gifts. Just…precautions, was all. Until the Winchesters got back.

As the Impala turned onto the main road and the trail of dust from Bobby's dirt drive finally settled, the kid turned to his roommate-slash-landlord. He gave the man a thumbs up and that same wide, purposefully weak smile from the first night, this time waggling his eyebrows.

Bobby rolled his eyes, signed something Andy only got half of, and headed back into his house. The kid had to chase after him to learn what he'd said (and then spent another five minutes as the older man corrected his hand positions and drilled them into his head until he'd never forget. Bobby was a slave driver when it came to learning, man.)

-o-o-o-

Lafayette turned out to be a total bust.

"Dude," Dean groused as they got back to the Impala, parked on a rain-soaked street on the west side of town.

"I know," Sam griped right back, trying to head his brother off before Dean got into one of those rants where it was all the smart one's fault (that's how Sam liked to see it, at least, since usually it was just Dean blaming anyone but Dean, and since Sam was the only target around that meant Sam, and if Sam was always going to get the blame for everything that didn't go Dean's way, he was at least going to set the terms of why he was blamed for everything).

"There's no werewolf here," Dean continued, tone still one of condescending petulance. Sam knew it well. The hunter wrapped his hand around the driver's side door, opening her up with a beloved groan of metal hinges. It improved his mood just the tiniest of smidges.

Sam gave Dean a smile over the roof that was absolutely not a smile and opened his own door. "I'm aware, Dean."

A guy had been stabbed in a parking lot two days ago. No big deal, Right? Except that for a week before the guy's death, there'd been animal attacks reported every night, bouncing between two different parks that not only neighbored where the guy lived, but also where he died. Like clockwork, the attacks stopped the night the guy got himself murdered. Couple that info together with the autopsy report of a silver-dipped blade being the murder weapon – the coroner had found the broken tip of the knife lodged in one of the guy's vertebrae – and ipso presto, you got yourself a werewolf case. A finished werewolf case, you'd think, with no regrets but the sloppy work of a hunter who didn't know how to clean up at the end of the job.

(The boys hadn't realized the possible werewolf was already dead until they'd gone to the coroner and learned about the knife).

Only, nope, not a case at all. Turns out, there dead werewolf wasn't a werewolf to start with. Just a dude stabbed in a parking lot and some really aggressive local wildlife.

"Actual animal attacks." Dean was back to grousing. "In a full-fledged city. In Indiana."

They'd checked. Twice. Sam had even gotten chased by the damn-near rabid raccoon responsible for the first attack. Dean wished he'd gotten it on video. They could be millionaires by the end of the week with that shit.

"I know," Sam repeated, climbing into the car. He hadn't found the animal attacks nearly as ironic or hilarious as Dean. Then again, Dean hadn't been chased by the damn scariest raccoon Sam had ever seen. Seriously. It had definitely gotten into something. The city did have a drug scene and, somewhere, Sam was very certain a tweaker was missing his stash.

"Go figure," the younger Winchester added as Dean slid into the Impala beside him, closing the driver's side door.

"Okay, but, what I don't get is someone stabbing the guy in the parking lot with a silver tipped knife." Dean shook his head, sliding the key into the ignition but not turning her on just yet. "Like…did some hunter fuck up and kill a nobody?"

Sam shrugged, but he hoped that wasn't the case. Most hunters made damn sure they had the right guy before doing something as permanent as killing them. At least, Sam hoped the majority out there did. "Maybe it was just silver coated. Ornamental, you know?"

Or maybe the coroner had been mistaken, or the lab guy who ran the blade.

The older Winchester shook his head, reaching forward to turn the ignition. "What normal person kills another normal person with an ornamental blade? Normal people, Sammy. I'm telling you, they're the real scary ones."

Sam shrugged in lieu of shaking his head, but there was a crooked smile in the corner of his mouth. "Maybe it was some crazy guy hyped up on the occult. Watched too much Buffy the Vampire Slayer or something."

There was something about the way he said it. Just a little lilt in the words that Dean picked up on it in an instant. He glanced his brother's way, eyes narrowed but brows all sorts of judging.

"You watch Buffy the Vampire Slayer?" The older hunter accused before breaking into absolutely-judgmental laughter, sliding Baby into gear. "All the crap you gave over the years about the family business, and you spent your down time at Stanford watching Buffy, the Vampire Slayer?"

"Shut up," Sam grumbled, already regretting having said anything. "It was Jess's favorite show for, like, all the years we were dating."

She'd had the entire DVD set, so he hadn't even escaped it once the show went off air. Not that he'd ever stood a chance. Jess had looped him right into 'Angel' next. It had been…pretty okay. Okay, fine, better than he'd have admitted, given the subject matter. Actually, if he were being honest, the characters had been interesting enough, the writing pretty funny, and-

Sam sniffed defensively. "Besides. Like you didn't watch it."

"Yeah, of course I did; the lead chick was hot. But I didn't watch it on purpose." Dean gave his brother a pointed look as they pulled away from the curb. "That's the sorta thing you get into cuz you fell asleep watching something good – like Dr. Sexy – and woke up to Buffy. You don't turn the hot blondes off, Sammy. That's the kinda thing a real man follows through on."

Sam might have rolled his eyes, shook his head, even groaned, but he was too busy making a face. "Who's Doctor Sexy?"

Dean's jaw flat out dropped, and he turned to slowly to his kid brother – so slowly that Sam immediately regretted whatever life decision had led him to that moment – with eyes comically wide and face a live rendition of the Scream mask.

"Uh…Dean?"

Then the older Winchester's expression shifted, a slow motion light up of a kid's face on Christmas morning. Sam was regretting asking even harder now.

"What year is it?"

Sam blinked at the unexpected question. Though, given his brother was a time traveling hunter from ten years in the future, it wasn't an unheard of question these days.

"Uh…"

But his brother was already six steps past his own words. "Oh, man, I think it should be out, right? It's two thousand and six. The first season should be on air!"

The brunet was slowly leaning further and further away from the older Winchester, until he found himself pressed into the corner of the car, regret a hardcore part of his younger brother life right now.

"Oh, you're in for a treat, Sammy." Dean's foot turned to lead on the gas pedal. Forget the bust of a hunt or being stuck in Lafayette for a night because they'd already paid for a motel. They had a new life purpose! "I am going to introduce you to Dr. Sexy, M.D., the sexiest damn doctor the city of Seattle has ever seen or ever will see again."

Sam looked like he'd rather be hunting down a killer werewolf or facing the crackhead raccoon again.

Dean ignored him, turning bright eyes shining with excitement back on the road. "Shaddup, it's based on a book, or something. That makes it good. You'll love it."

-o-o-o-

Sam feigned sleep somewhere during the second episode, snores so loud and obnoxious they were obviously fake. Dean had managed to find a channel showing back-to-back episodes of the first season. His excitement had flat out caused the younger Winchester to leave the room under the guise of 'getting ice', despite the room having no ice bucket and the motel no ice machine.

The hunter actually did fall asleep, for real, by the time the second episode ended, leaving Dean alone with the next doctor show the channel switched over to. It wasn't as good as Dr. Sexy, but Dean found himself mindlessly watching it all the same. Emphasis on mindless.

It figured, this whole case being a bust. Dean could have used a good hunt. Could have used a good distraction.

Now he was sitting in a cheap motel room that wasn't home, wondering if Andy was alright back at Bobby's, wondering if Angela was alright and knowing she was because comatose patients didn't change, and ultimately staring at the flickering screen of a TV he hadn't bothered to turn off despite the fact he really wasn't paying it any attention. Sam slept on beside him. Dean didn't want to sleep. Didn't want to have the same damn dream he'd been having since Rivergrove. Hell. The screams of the damned, his own included. Fire licking at his skin, hooks dug deep in his flesh. Then, always Cas in the library without his coat, those damn sleeves rolled up like they never had been before. Sam's breathless realization that that wasn't their Cas. Those blue eyes consumed by vicious, deadly red.

Some nights Dean saw the blade slip into Not-Cas's hand. Some nights he felt that sword slide between his ribs, looking for a heart that wasn't there because the black hole behind his sternum had devoured it. Some nights he watched Cas kill Sam first. Those were the nights he usually woke up screaming.

The older Winchester raised his arm, remote in hand and switched off the TV. Dean rubbed at his chest in the semi-darkness, sick of the damn empty that lingered there. It was a constant reminder of what wasn't there. If he had lost Cas – his Cas, that sliver of grace, that shadow of his best friend that had been with him through this all – if that Cas was gone…if Dean had lost him, again…

He dropped his hand from his chest and glanced over at Sam, softly snoring away. If Cas was gone, his Cas, then he refused to lose the other one, too. He couldn't lose them both. Wouldn't. Sam knew that. Sam understood that. Staring at his younger brother, off in dreamland for real this time, Dean chewed on his inner cheek as he contemplated the stupidity he promised his brother he would try not to do. Even if it might work. Even if it could get them Cas back.

Fuck it. Stupid-but-it-worked-out-in-the-end was kind of his thing. Coming to a decision with a flurry of silent motion, the hunter climbed off the bed, grabbing his shoes and pulling them on.

Dean might have promised he would tell his brother before he did anything stupid, but Sam hadn't been getting much more sleep than him. He needed the rest. Plus, Dean was still pretty sure Sam was going to insist on going with him. Follow him, at a minimum. And this was a stupid, stupid plan. Summoning Cas levels of stupid, with all the same risks but an added bonus challenge of it not being friggin' Cas they were summoning.

One Winchester had to survive it. Sam couldn't come with him. Not this time.

Still, he'd promised… Dean stood from the bed, walking over to the desk and opening the only drawer it had. There was a notepad, standard motel fair, and pen inside. He slapped them onto the desk, wincing at the noise and glancing at his brother. Sam slept on. Like Dean had thought, he needed the rest.

The hunter put the pen to paper, then hesitated. What the hell to write. He frowned at the ache in his chest, which felt a lot like guilt. But he knew it wasn't guilt. There wasn't anything in his chest right now; that was the whole problem. Pushing aside the little voice in his head that said this was an awful lot like a secret, he scribbled a quick note for his brother.

It wasn't a secret. It was just a delayed heads up, was all.

He left the pad and the pen on the nightstand. Should be the first thing Sammy saw when he woke up, right next to the hex bag they now kept with them at night, rather than leave it in the Impala. Dean might not like the warning they received at the motel in Sturgis, but he also had to give it some validation. Whoever had left it – be it Ruby or their mystery Pagan – they'd had somewhat of a point.

Much to the hunter's absolute loathing to admit.

Dean stared at the pad of paper, his scribbled handwriting not even readable in the dark. It wasn't a secret, he insisted, unsure exactly who he was trying to convince. He'd told Sam exactly what he planned to do. Besides, it might not even work. No point dragging both of them into it. And he was telling Sam. That's what the note was for.

Right.

Dean grabbed his coat, Baby's keys jingling softly in one of the pockets, and slipped out the door. He was gonna get a message to Cas. That was all. If it didn't work…well, that would be it. One and done. One try, Dean told himself as he closed the door as quietly as possible, hunching his shoulders against the frigid Indiana night. One try, and if it didn't work then he'd come right back, maybe with Sam none the wiser.

-o-o-o-

Sam woke to the sound of the motel door snicking closed. He sat up, more out of instinct then actual wakefulness, but as he took in the dark room, his brother's empty bed, and the notepad sitting on the nightstand between the two beds, he realized what had woken him up.

"Damnit, Dean," he muttered, swinging he legs off the bed, feet planted firmly on the ugly carpet below. He reached over, snagging the note. It didn't say much, and Sam sighed, running a hand over tired, sleep-puffy eyes. He glanced at the motel door, knowing he could still probably catch his brother if he left now…

Technically, he'd given Dean his blessing to go be an idiot and the idiot had, sort of, told him he was doing it, like requested. In the most cowardly, cheap-ass way possible, of course.

Sam tossed the notepad back onto the table, something between vexation and frustration making that buzz beneath his skin stir with interest (a confirmation that the damn cold back at Bobby's had been the flu), but not enough to make him follow after his brother. He'd told Dean he would stay behind for this one. Even if the older Winchester had made off like a sneak, Sam hadn't exactly been blindsided by it. He'd been expecting it to happen every night since the Sturgis Hospital staff had told them Andy would live.

The buzzing in his veins and in his ears was, unfortunately, enough to wake him up. Sam stood from the bed, rubbing at his sleep-mussed hair and trying to shake loose that vibration just beneath his skin. It was a sensation he was really, really, starting to hate.

A knock on the door caused the tall hunter to pause, looking over at the object in question with nothing short of surprise. Then the shock disappeared, shifting almost instantly into exasperation. Sam moved around the mattress, crossing the room with bitchface locked and loaded (when he saw it, Dean would probably label it a number five, or whatever stupid numbered list he kept in that brain of his). Sam pulled open the door with a little more force than was strictly necessary.

"You seriously ditch me in the middle of the night and forget your room key?"

But it wasn't his older brother on the other side. It was a woman: Caucasian, young, maybe his age at most, with big doe eyes and shoulder-length brown hair. Sam didn't recognize her, but by the way those pale eyes widened, pouty lips parting in a surprised intake of air, and the mix of awe and fear across her round face, she certainly seemed to know him.

"Oh my god," Ava Wilson whispered, staring up at the spitting image of the man she'd seen die in her dreams last night. "It's you. It's really you…. You're in danger!"

Chapter End Notes

A/Ns: Okay, shit ton of notes today. Please read through at least the FULL CAPS ones, guys!

Ava Wilson: But…But…Gordon's supposed to go after Dean! Why is Ava having visions of Sam still, you could have written her out of the story, damnit, Silence! [insert no-good-dirty-rotten grin here] For those of you not a huge fan of this character, and it seems like quite a few of you, I do feel ya. I liked her introduction more than her end result, so I'm gonna try to nudge her storyline a little back towards that first personality without going outside of what canon defined as her character. :)

Andy at Bobby's - 'Kid would make a fine research assistant': Okay, ChangelingRin, that line was JUST FOR YOU and all your pushing. Are you happy now? YOU'RE WELCOME. XD

(Also, thanks for all the pushing, friend ;))

Up Next: Who's been missing Cas? Yeah? Yeah? Well, too bad for you! No, I'm joking, even I'm not that cruel (usually). Cas and Heaven and Uriel are UP NEXT!

(cough finally cough)

ARC WARNING: We are now in a new arc: the I-can't-tell-you-its-label-yet-because-we're-not-actually-far-enough-in-to-do-so-without-spoilers arc! This arc is going to be a turbulent, high speed, roller-coaster type ride that spans chapters 56-64. We will be jumping back and forth between what's happening to Dean and what's happening to Sam, and there is a looooot happening with very little down-time for chapter cuts. Which means we're also looking at cliffhangers of various degrees for a while, too.

If you are the kind of person who does not enjoy waiting a week in between high-speed, turbulent, roller-coaster type cliffies, I recommend stowing this story for the next two months and coming back to read all at once!

(Note: It would be very nice of those people to leave a comment this chapter, though, so I don't feel the drop in readership and get discouraged by it, as I am being oh-so-nice in warning you ;) hint hint)

For everyone else, this has been your warning, you are now warned!

MILESTONE APPROACHING: Damnit, guys, this chapter had enough notes already! XD We are THREE freaking kudos away from 1,000 likes on A03. Holy shit, guys! I was totally ready to tell you all that back when we were ten away, figuring I had at least another week before we crossed the threshold. But then this week you all were like "TO HELL WITH YOUR PLANS, SILENCE, LIKE LIKE LIKE LIKE LIKE. WE'LL SHOW YOU HOLIDAY SPIRIT, WOMAN."

Hahah, not that I'm complaining! ;) However, we all know what Milestones get us: back-to-back chapters! Not gonna lie, I was totally not prepared for that to happen over Christmas. I have no idea if I'm going to have time to edit two chapters by next week. I wasn't even sure I was going to post over Christmas at all . But I might be able to swing it (mostly I just don't know how much down time I'll have with family. Could be tons!)

So here's the deal: you guys get those last three kudos in and I will do my absolute best to get you two chapters next weekend.

(P.S. Good. Damn. Timing guys. The first of Cliffhanger Row starts majorly next chapter.)

(P.P.S. Um…just a friendly heads up…Cliffhanger Row does not end by next next chapter… I did mention a high speed turbulent roller coaster type ride for, like, eight chapters, yes?)

(P.P.P.S. We are also 109 reviews away from 2,000 reviews on ff.net. Which means we are primed for back-to-back-to-back chapters (where your author dies an exhaustion, editing-related death, but with a big damn smile on her face). Merry Christmas and a Happy New Year indeed? Keep an eye on those numbers, guys, and you may get through this entire eight-chapter cliffhanger ride in, like, half the time XD)

Chapter 89: Season 2: Chapter 56

Chapter Notes

A/Ns: Crap crappity crap crap, guys!! It's SUNDAY. Did you know it was Sunday? Apparently some of you did! I was going through my e-mails (while waiting on my parents to leave for a movie) when I got three new ones all at once, from commenters/ reviewers just lightly poking me about that update. I was all...why is everyone poking me? It's like, Wednesday.

It is not, in fact, Wednesday.

You should have seen the mad dash out of the living room and to my bedroom for my computer in hopes I could scramble this thing together and post (even now, my parents are finally ready to go and I'm begging for another few minutes XD)

Anyway, here is the first chapter!! I will post the second when I get back from the movie, guys! Thanks for the reminder from the light pokers, you all ROCK! XD Sorry I got so distracted that I forgot what day it was, haha!

Previously On TRSF... The last time we saw Castiel, his grace had taken serious damage from the demon's trap in Rivergrove. He managed to return to Heaven, where Uriel gave him enough cursory energy to hide his injuries and throw Zachariah of the hunt, with the aid of Malachi. Then the anarchist angel assisted Castiel in entering a healing trance. Malachi was recruited by Uriel, along with several so-far unnamed angels, as a group primed to turn on Heaven and help raise Lucifer. Malachi warned Uriel that Castiel would be his problem to deal with if he caused them any more trouble or brought more attention to their secrets.

Original Timeline Reference - Malachi: I've noticed a lot of readers commenting about Malachi as they catch up on the story, generally about who the heck is he?! Since we're getting back to him this chapter, here's a quick recap :) Malachi was in all of one episode in Season 9, but he was introduced like this:

Castiel: "Who leads the other faction?"

Someone: "Malachi."

Castiel: hardcore stares "The Anarchist?"

And that's all we got. He was the angel in Season 9 that captured and tortured a human Castiel in his creepy dungeon building thing. And that is all we got of Malachi! He left the room, Castiel stole an angel's grace for the first time, and escaped. It was later mentioned Gadreel killed him off screen but…that was it, folks. I was totally unsatisfied that the most interesting thing about this guy – that he was an angel who was also an anarchist – was neeeever touched on. So I decided to expand upon him in this story, because that sounds like a brilliant badguy!

Chapter Reference - Persephone: Quick reminder that Persephone first met Sam in a bar, where she had on a silver warding necklace. She appears as a blonde-haired, blue-eyed, Caucasian woman when she wears it. She keeps it on when she's at Chuck's as well, to hide her not-humanness from Raphael. Sam has since figured out, from her Semitic accent, that the woman he met in the bar was very likely the same woman Azazel has been associating with. Respectfully, thosechapters are 61 and 73 if you want a refresher.

Chapter Reference – Gordon: Quick reminder that the boys ran into Gordon in this story the same way they ran into him in the original timeline. They caught a vampire case and found Gordon tailing them. Dean insisted they leave, let Gordon have the hunt to himself, but slipped up by saying a line Gordon had said to him the first time around. This set alarm bells off for Gordon, who later learned at the Roadhouse that Dean's psychic. See Chapter 60

Chapter Warnings: If you haven't guessed from all ^ that, we're back in Heaven! And Castiel is not having a good time! (Here's a little hint, in case you all didn't pick up on the nuances of my incredibly subtle writing: no one in this story has a good time.)

See the end of the chapter for more notes

-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-

The Road So Far (This Time Around)

Season 2: Chapter 56

-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-

Exiting a healing trance was not like entering one. Unlike the peaceful darkness that overtook you like a heavy hood sliding across your consciousness, awakening from a healing session was nothing short of disorienting. For a celestial being that rarely experienced unconsciousness, lapses in time, or the momentary confusion of knowing neither where nor when you were, coming out of a healing session was a truly unpleasant experience.

It took time for Castiel to identify the colors moving around him, blurry at first but slowly solidifying into shapes recognizable as objects. His location was unfamiliar, as were the several humans moving about him, oblivious to his presence in their dwelling. The fabric beneath him was soft, with a large amount of give that could only be described as cushiony. A couch, then. In what appeared to be a fairly standard living room of a family home in, given the décor and spoken language of the occupants, late twentieth century Spain.

It was not a Paradise Castiel was familiar with, and it took more precious time for the angel to recall how he might have come to be in it, coming out of a healing trance no less. Heaven had an infirmary building for the injured, which housed the Host's healers. A human Paradise was hardly the appropriate place for a healing.

Malachi. Malachi had helped him cover his time on Earth from Zachariah, because Uriel was unavailable. Malachi had assisted him into a healing trance. But Castiel could tell from the foreign grace still flowing through him, the grogginess of the trance beginning to fade, that Uriel had been the one to continue the healing. Which meant his trusted brother was likely the one to place him in a human's Paradise.

The unfamiliar surroundings began to make more sense. Uriel must have been the one to hide him away. Doing so in one of the Paradises he frequented – and was known for frequenting – would have been a poor choice. Should anyone go looking for him, but particularly Zachariah, he would have been easily discovered and his injuries revealed. Castiel was glad his brother thought of this. Uriel wasn't known for dallying in the humans' domain, so Castiel was honestly surprised the larger angel had thought to stash him in one.

Castiel struggled to sit up, gripping the back and sides of the couch for additional leverage. He glanced at one of those limbs, taking in the weak saturation of his grace. The healing trance had not been nearly long enough. Castiel could feel it in the ache of his being, in the tightness of his grace – like canvas stretched too tight across rough struts – and the still mending cracks in his grace. He really should not be awake. However, he had promised Sam and Dean that he would contact them as soon as he could. He did not need to be fully healed to do that much. While Castiel did not know how much time had passed in Heaven, more would have passed on Earth and it was a given that Dean would already be worried about his absence. Particularly due to the manner of his departure.

Dean had been distressed, and Castiel did not like when Dean was distressed. Something was telling him – something he was fairly certain had been absorbed from another version of him – that this human in particular did things when distressed that Castiel would not approve of or appreciate.

The door to the Paradise opened and one of the women moving through the living room – the host of this heaven – smiled at the newcomer.

"Oh, we have guests!" she called to the rest of her family, but Uriel completely ignored her as he moved into the room and past the human. She would forget him soon enough, the call of her memories a much stronger presence.

"Uriel," Castiel greeted, struggling to lever himself further upright. His brother was at his side in an instant, helping him to sit more upright on the human furniture. Behind them, the woman went about her memory as though Uriel had never interrupted it to begin with.

"You should not be awake," the larger angel admonished, one meaty hand tight but supportive on Castiel's shoulder. "I felt you stirring and worried something was wrong with the trance."

Castiel frowned, the colors of his pasty, pastel grace shifting towards confusion. "You were monitoring me?"

Uriel looked uncomfortable, or as uncomfortable as Castiel had ever seen him, and perhaps a bit angry to be found so uncomfortable. "You are injured enough for it, brother, and I am no healer."

Castiel supposed that was very true. He was injured enough for it, and had he been in charge of the care of a similarly weakened brother, he very well might have taken such precautions himself. "Thank you, Uriel, for your attentiveness."

The larger angel relaxed fractionally, nodding. His facial swirls shifted into lighter yellows and oranges, and the moment passed.

"We are brothers," Uriel said, the words heavy like boulders. "More than brothers, we are brothers in arms, in the coming war against Heaven."

It was not easy, but Castiel hid his flinch well, his own uneasiness with the mention of war. He didn't want it to come to that, was doing all that he could to keep it from coming to that, though everyone around him seemed certain it would. The Winchester brothers. His own brothers. Uriel must have picked up on his distress, however well-hidden the smaller angel might have made it, because he less than subtly changed the topic.

"You need to stop these visits to earth, Castiel." Unfortunately, the new topic was not much better. "They call too much attention to us, to our work."

Dropping his many eyes to his lap in a frighteningly human reaction, Castiel did not answer right away. He was at a loss as to how to respond. Uriel was not wrong. Castiel had known that his visits to the planet below would not go unnoticed for long. That was before Rivergrove. His own awareness of trouble just around the corner had not taken into account anything nearly as devastating to his continued secrecy as a grievous injury. He was putting more than just himself at risk. He was putting his brothers, their cause, and even Dean and Sam in danger.

But he had promised Dean he would return.

So he told Uriel as much. Told his brother of the haste of his departure and the lack of time he'd had to adequately explain why he had to leave. The humans would surely worry if he did not return as he had promised, and this Righteous Man was…particularly bad about situations outside of his control.

"One more trip," Castiel insisted with a nod. "I will inform them that I am well, and that I will be away for some time to finish healing and limit the attention I am drawing from Heaven."

Even as he said it, Castiel wondered if he could even make the trip in his current state. He was much better off than he had been before entering the trance, but he was far from well. His grace was stiff with the healing fractures, and the thought of flying on his wings, which felt rigid with disuse and a lack of proper grace flow – his body having drawn the majority of his power into his core to speed up the healing process – was an unpleasant notion at best.

But he also knew, through knowledge both his own and that of another Castiel, that Dean was worrying. Speaking of… Castiel should reconnect his awareness to the Ether. 'Angel Radio,' Dean called it often. It should provide him with a catalogue of missed prayers from any humans, as well. Before Dean had forcefully summoned him into his life, Castiel might not have even listened through the pleas. Now, he prepared himself to be thoroughly chastised by a human war-torn between worry and anger, which the angel was already resigned to never fully understand.

The ever shifting eddies of Uriel's grace darkened with displeasure as Castiel reconnected himself to the edges another level of time and space.

"Why do you feel such obligation to them, Castiel?" Uriel spat, voice heavy with disdain and disappointment. "They are mud monkeys, brother. They are not worth your time, let alone your concern."

Castiel tried not to feel the sorrow that welled up within his grace at his brother's words. The sentiment was nothing new, especially for Uriel. The larger angel had never thought much for humanity, despite multiple attempts from Castiel to show him otherwise. It did nothing but sadden the smaller angel, but Uriel was as he was. God built him as such for a reason, or so Castiel had always believed.

At least until he'd met a man named Dean Winchester.

The first of Dean's fevered prayers started to filter through once the muddle of angelic voices, some raised in song, some in conversation, others in whispered thought, started to fade to the background. His prayers were, indeed, angry, but they were also something else.

Something very, very, else.

Castiel stilled, unhearing of Uriel's continued complaints against his loyalty to humankind. His grace stilled as well; as slow as it had been previously, shifting and ebbing and surging at a quarter of its usual energy, it was completely unmoving now, pastel swirls frozen in time across his being. What color Castiel had regained since entering the trance disappeared entirely, leaving the angel a translucent, incorporeal mass of shock and disbelief.

"You cannot risk our entire operation just to comfort some human. I will not allow it. The others will not either, Castiel." Uriel was still talking, his words buffeting off of Castiel like water rebounding off a stone wall that did not have ears to hear with anyway. "More than that, you are not going anywhere until you have healed further. You are going to damage yourself beyond what is repairable, and then we'll really be caught."

Uriel grabbed his arm, and Castiel jolted at the shock of physical contact. He stared at the larger angel's meaty limb wrapped around his own. It seemed so much more possessive now than the comfort he had always thought it was meant to be.

"I will assist with the trance this time," Uriel insisted. Castiel's many eyes raised slowly to meet his own. The larger angel's facial colors were split by a myriad of muddled colors, coming out mostly brown. Like a smile on a human's face that wasn't remotely happy, even if that was the very purpose of such an expression. Castiel felt the first stirrings of apprehension replace his shock. "Lay back down, Castiel. We will discuss this further when you wake back up."

But Castiel did not lay down. He did not answer, either. He and his attention were elsewhere. Uriel's grace deepened, that muddled brown turning dark, dark brown. Like dried blood. Dried human blood, until it was all the smaller angel could see on his once-friend. Slowly, Castiel pulled his arm from Uriel's grip, awareness fully returned to the here and now with the last of Dean's prayers going silent. He had reached the end of a diatribe of horror and betrayal and fear that he did not want to believe.

"Castiel?"

His brother's many eyes, all of them always tinged a bluish silver that Uriel found fascinating in a way an angel probably never should, were wide. Castiel's grace was in a state of distress, his expression as disturbed as Uriel had ever seen it. And he had been in many a horrifying and terrifying battle with this brother.

"Brother?"

Castiel stared at him. Then, his grace began to churn and Uriel got an ugly feeling in his core.

"Uriel," the smaller angel began, voice tight and ringed with something his brother did not easily recognize. "Where do your loyalties lie?"

The larger angel pulled back, eyes narrowing. He regarded his brother cautiously. It was clear by the question – a non-sequitur in their discussion so far – that his brother had tuned back into the Ether. Had Malachi said something to the smaller angel? Uriel didn't trust the anarchist as far as he could throw him, and turning Castiel against him seemed like something the clever deviant would do.

"That sounds like a loaded question, Castiel," Uriel hedged cautiously, still regarding his brother carefully. Castiel's grip on the edges of the couch were tight, and Uriel had no doubt it was all that was keeping him upright. As he had told the angel, Castiel was not ready to be on his feet.

His words did not have the desired result, which was to gauge how bad the misdirection Malachi had sent was. Castiel's expression hardened into that of the Captain of his Unit. It was a look Uriel knew well. This was angel Uriel respected. An angel did not need his protection or best intentions.

But Castiel was only ever that angel in battle. Which begged the question…was his friend and brother preparing to go into battle? Uriel's limbs curled into fists where they lay against the couch.

"Do you plan to raise Lucifer? To release the devil on the world and start the beginning of the End?" Castiel's words were sharp. Reprimanding. It might have been a question, but his Captain already knew his answer.

Uriel's fists tightened. Damn Malachi! Damn him! It was not the message he expected the anarchist to send his brother. Uriel had expected Malachi to warn Castiel that he was in danger. That Uriel planned to eliminate him; an ironic but predictable lie. But this was no better. Damnit, Uriel needed to bring Castiel to his side slowly. His brother was stubborn. Stubbornly righteous and getting him to realize the truth of Uriel's stance – to join their cause of his own volition because he realized it was right – was always going to take time.

Malachi had taken that time from him. Now Uriel would be fighting Castiel's love for the humans and a Heaven-ingrained hatred of the Morning Star! Misplaced, manufactured hatred, but Castiel would not see it that way. Not now, not without the time Uriel needed to steer his opinion back towards truth.

"Whatever Malachi has told you-"

"We've been friends for a long time, Uriel," Castiel interrupted, colors as intense and sharp as his ailing grace would allow. "Fought by each other's sides, served together away from home, for what seems like forever. We're brothers. Pay me that respect. Tell me the truth."

Uriel stared, dark eyes going cold. The larger angel drew himself up, grace filling out his shoulders and chest, creating quite the intimidating sight. But it was never a sight that had intimidated Castiel before, and it did not now. Uriel's grace shifted, bleeding red. There were trickles of a sour yellow slithering throughout his form, like veins of gold in a ground soaked with blood.

Something in Uriel changed, and Castiel could not help but wonder where he had been hiding it all this time.

"Do you remember him, Castiel? How strong he was? How beautiful?" The larger angel's gaze grew distant. He still remembered the first time he saw the Morning Star. How radiant Lucifer had been. How better he'd been, than any of the rest of them. Uriel lowered his eyes back to his brother. "He didn't bow to humanity. He was punished for defending us." Uriel shook his head, a wry expression spread across his grace in bitter blues. "If you want to believe in something, if you're going to bow before someone, bow to him, brother. Believe in him."

Castiel's expression was dark, grace awash with blue for entirely different reasons than his brother. "Lucifer is not God."

No matter what Dean said God was, He was something Castiel had not yet abandoned, in hope or faith. Not ever, if he had his say.

Uriel merely scoffed, his own sentiments very clearly far and gone from the smaller angel's. "God isn't God anymore, Castiel. He stopped being our father, if he ever was that, the moment he created them. Humanity." The angel pulled as much of a face as a being without firm facial features could, wrapped in the ugly dirt greens of envy and hatred. "His favorites. The whining, puking larva."

"Are you trying to convert me?" Castiel spit out, angrier than he'd been in a century, at least. If this was his brother's idea of a pitch, he had sorely misread his intended target. In fact, Castiel was starting to wonder if Uriel had ever known him at all. Or vice versa, as much as it hurt his core to think it. But this wasn't his brother sitting across from him, prepared to end a world Castiel held dear. At least, not any brother he had thought he'd known.

"I want you to join me," Uriel insisted, voice as earnest as it had yet to be. If Castiel had a heart, he was certain it would be aching now, if it hadn't been so damn furious to be betrayed this way. "There are others, Castiel. But with you, we will be strong enough."

"Strong enough?"

"To free our brother. To raise Lucifer! Please, Castiel, don't fight me. Join me." Uriel reached out once more, but Castiel withdrew, and the larger angel's grace grew tumultuous with anger. The smaller angel could see slivers of regret, too, as much as someone like Uriel could regret. That tumultuous grace sharpened, swirling rapids of emotion hardening, turning to stone. Uriel reached forward more forcefully, curling his grace around his brother's arm before Castiel could pull away. He had nowhere else to retreat to and Uriel knew it. "Help us spread the word, brother. Help us bring on the Apocalypse and end this game once and for all."

Castiel wrapped his free hand around the hilt of his sword, hidden away in the Ether. But he knew a losing battle when he saw one. Still, it didn't matter. He closed those eyes that he could afford to, a leftover trait of a vessel he would not likely populate again, and whispered an apology that would never reach his human charges. His grace filled with regrets of his own. When Castiel opened his eyes, he leveled his brother with a dangerous look. One the larger angel had seen many a time, but never directed at him.

"You won't win, Uriel." Castiel drew his blade with his free hand. Even just summoning it made him wince, like pulling at a freshly healed wound. "I serve God."

His brother's grip on his limb tightened painfully. "You haven't even met the man."

"I don't have to."

Castiel struck with his sword, but Uriel was ready for him. The other angel blocked the attack with his own blade, metal ringing against metal in the relative quiet of the human Paradise. Castiel's arm was thrown out to the side, shaking with the effort to battle Uriel's significant strength. His other limb was still trapped in Uriel's own grace, and Castiel knew he needed to throw his brother off if he was to have any hope of escaping this encounter alive.

The larger angel lunged forward with a bellow, tackling Cas into the cushions before he could push off. Uriel knew him, knew his battle strategies, knew the way he thought and reasoned, too well. Their grace entangled in errant limbs and flapping wings as Castiel shoved his brother off of him and they both tumbled off of the couch, Uriel taking the smaller angel to the floor with him. They rolled, crashing into the coffee table and shattering the glass top. Uriel turned his wing, first as a shield from the glass, but then as a slingshot, sending the sharp projectiles straight into Castiel. Glass could hardly hurt an angel, particularly one without a vessel in a world where the material was nothing more than a memory, but it was a distraction. More than enough of one for an angel that had always been stronger to begin with.

Castiel got in a solid punch to Uriel's rigid jaw before his brother pinned his arms to his side, trapping the smaller angel against the floor with the bulk of his grace. Blade pressed to his brother's cheek, Uriel gave the angel an admonishing, disappointed look that was as painful for Castiel to witness as it was terrifying.

"There is no God, Castiel. No will, no wrath. We are proof of that." Uriel's limbs wrapped around him, encasing him, smothering and choking him. Castiel struggled to be free of the all-encompassing strength of his brother's intent.

Castiel closed his eyes, the battle was over and he was not the victor. He braced for the press of that blade, the flash of pain, the last he would ever feel. The end he knew was coming.

'I'm sorry, Dean.'

"You will join us. It's only a matter of time." Then Uriel's grace was overwhelming his, attacking Castiel's meagre defenses that he hadn't had time to rebuild after Azazel's trap, and the rebel angel was forced into a fitful healing trance once more.

-o-o-o-

Uriel pulled away from his entranced brother, staring down at the smaller, vulnerable angel. He could feel Castiel fighting the healing, and his frustration returned to replace the fury and hurt. Castiel would do more damage fighting the trance than he would if just left alone to heal on his own.

"Damn it, Castiel," Uriel hissed quietly, lowering his blade and disappearing it back into the Ether. "Why must you always make things harder than they need to be, brother?"

The larger angel crouched back down, grabbing his brother's wrists. He would tie Castiel up, ease the trance so his stubborn idiot of a brother did not further hurt himself further, and move him to another Paradise. It was a possibility that a passing angel could have heard their tussle or felt this human's unease and decide to investigate the cause of the discomfort. So Uriel would relocate his troublesome brother first. Then the angel would find another to help him deepen the trance properly.

In the meantime, if he found Malachi he would murder the bastard for turning his favorite brother against him.

-o-o-o-

"Okay, look, I know how all this sounds, but I'm not insane and I'm not on drugs. Okay?"

Sam pulled on a white t-shirt over his very bare chest, going for some level of modesty as he watched the woman pace his hotel room with the kind of nervous energy that he'd seen on a dozen civilians over the years after they'd discovered the existence of the supernatural. Each dealt with it in their own way. The woman in front him now was… well, unique to say the least. That was…a lot of nervous energy. Still, the younger Winchester knew when someone needed the reassurance of a complete stranger if only because they were utterly objective.

So he nodded as supportively as possible. It didn't seem to do much help in the comforting department.

"I am completely normal!" Ava insisted, clearly not believing that he believed her. Of course, her voice pitched a bit too high not to undermine her own words, and she jiggled her leg like she wanted to stomp her foot. It might have been nothing short of cute if she didn't also have a watery sheen over her eyes and look a few steps short of an actual breakdown. "And this…this is way, way off the map for me."

"Alright, alright, just…calm down, okay?" Sam stood from the end of the mattress, offering what he hoped was a calming hand. Ava fidgeted, big blue-green eyes darting between that hand and the random person whose motel room she'd just decided to track down and then invade.

Oh, god, she was totally going to get murdered.

"What's your name?" Sam asked, keeping his tone gentle and eyes as puppy dog as he knew how. Dean always swore he could win anyone over with them, and it looked like they were finally going to find out if that was true.

She chewed on her lip under the weight of those supportive, understanding eyes for only a second before dropping her arms. Oh hell. If he was some psycho murderer, she'd probably already be dead by now. "Ava."

"Ava?"

"Ava Wilson," she confirmed, resisting the urge to ask the guy if he was a skipping record player or something. That wouldn't exactly be fair to him. She was the one who woke him up in the middle of the night, to ramble about a grenade and a trip wire and a smoking shoe. She was the one that sounded crazy. At the moment, dude-about-to-die-in-an-explosion was actually being really decent, considering.

"Ava, I'm Sam Winchester, all right?" Sam settled back on the edge of the mattress, making sure to keep his distance from her (for her sake, not his, though Ava was back to chewing on her lip as she considered whether it was the other way around). "Now, you were telling me about these dreams of yours?"

She let out a huff of air, low and long and desperate and also completely resigned. Ava crossed her arms again, this time self-consciously rather than defensively. Sam tried to keep up; she was a little all over the place. "Uh, yeah, uh…okay, about a year ago I started having these, like, headaches and just…nightmares, I guess."

Well, that sounded like a familiar story, Sam thought. She was one of them. She must be.

That, or this was another trap.

The younger Winchester straightened as the thought occurred to him. Crap. Crap! What had he been thinking, letting someone into his hotel room because she had desperate eyes, a good story, and a plea that he was in danger?

Shit. This could be Ruby.

Sam eyed Ava as she started talking about a dream she'd had a couple weeks ago, about three kids in some old western town.
Okay, think, Sam. This wasn't Ruby. The room was warded, there was salt above the door and a devil's trap painted on a bathroom towel they'd spread in front of the door (a new trick they'd started using after Crowley showed up at their hotel room. Dean had said he wanted to use the guy, not trust him in the same space they slept in). Sure, Ava had eyed the towel with a curious frown and little headshake when he'd first invited her in, but she'd walked right over it.

Azazel's girl, then. The one with the glowing green eyes.

Only, Ava's eyes weren't glowing. But, they hadn't back in that bar, either. She'd been blonde and blue-eyed. Now she was…brunette and greenish-blue-eyed? And looked nothing like the woman he'd met in the bar. Ava was taller, and slimmer. Though, they were still similar enough, Sam reasoned. He knew there was magic for that, even so far as to change the height or weight of a person. Difficult magic – extensive magic – but still very possible. And they already knew Azazel's girl wasn't a demon, assuming she'd been the one to break into the Impala (which they didn't actually know for sure, but Sam had a feeling he wasn't so willing to dismiss).

Why had he just let her waltz right into his room? Dean was going to kill him, if she didn't do it for him first.

Sam kept nodding along with the girl's story, but mentally he was scanning the room. His nearest weapon was his knife, hidden beneath his pillow. That was at the top of the bed, and he was at the foot. Close enough he might have a chance. Not that he had any clue if a blade would do this woman any damage. Damnit, he should have been on his guard.

Dean had literally just left, some damsel in distress showed up on his doorstep, and he didn't think twice about that coincidence? Stupid. He was so stupid. If John Winchester were still alive, he'd rip him a new one. Hell, Sam knew Dean would gladly take up the role when he got back.

"Then, a couple of days later, I found this."

Sam's focus locked on Ava as her hand disappeared into her purse. The hunter's fingers tightened across his thigh and he considered the amount of time it would take to dive for that knife. But what she pulled out was nothing more than a newspaper clipping. Hesitantly, Sam reached out to take it.

It was from a three days ago, from the Peoria Journal Star, the headline reading 'Mining Town Massacre Victims Still Unidentified'. Sam stared at the black and white photo of Cold Oak, a partially burned funeral pyre sitting in the middle of the old buildings. There were three smaller photos along the bottom. Artist sketches from the remains. Sam lowered the page, a pretty dead-on rendition of Scott Carey's face staring back at him.

"I saw that guy die, days before it happened." Ava tapped the newspaper pointedly, finger right on top of Scott's face. Her voice wavered as those blue-green pools were overwhelmed with water she barely kept back. "I watched the other one stab him. And strangle him. And it ended up coming true."

Sam stared at her, eyes wide and hand slowly unclenching from a fist. The strangling hadn't been in the coroner's report. He'd hacked it while they were back at Bobby's because they needed to know how much of the bodies had been left unburnt. If they were going to have angry spirits they needed to worry about. And because Sam was a Winchester: nothing but a deep, masochistic well of guilt and self-loathing.

The stabbing had been in the report, but the strangulation hadn't. Scott's body had been about eighty percent consumed by the fire. Muscle and tissue damage hadn't been an option for identifying cause of death. The coroner hadn't looked much further than the stab wounds, evident by knife marks on Scott's charred rib bones.

How could Azazel's girl know that? There'd been no one else, at least no one among the living, at Cold Oak when the Winchesters discovered the bodies. He knew the difference between being followed and being watched. They had been watched, for sure, by the many spirits that haunted that town, but they hadn't been followed by anything living.

Sam handed the newspaper back to Ava, wondering if she might actually be who she said she was. A woman who saw people deaths before they happened. Another of Azazel's special kids, trying to do some good in the face of a demon who only wanted them to bring pain and death.

"Last night, I had another one," Ava was saying, sniffing as she folded the clipping back up and stuffed it into her purse. "About you. I saw you die."

The Winchester, still unsure whether he was falling right into Yellow Eyes' next trap, ran his hands over his sweatpants, thinking. He wasn't ready to trust this woman yet. Not again; he needed to be smarter about this. He needed more information. Enough to catch her in a lie, if she was in fact lying. "How did you find me?"

"Oh, uh, you had motel stationery. A note from some guy named Dean?" Ava shrugged, arms wrapping around herself again, back to self-conscious. "I googled the motel, and it was real, and so…I just thought…that I should warn you."

Sam's eyes slid to the note, still sitting on the nightstand. Too far away to read. He looked back at Ava. "What did the note say?"

"Um…something about going to get a message to someone? Cas or something? His handwriting kinda…sucked. Oh, and for you not to follow him like a…uh…" Ava cleared her throat, head bobbing back and forth before she rolled her eyes and spit it out. "Little bitch."

The hunter couldn't help the chuckle. That was exactly what Dean's note had said. And considering he'd left it less than thirty minutes ago, Sam finally let the tension leave his body. This really was another one of Azazel's kids. Another psychic.

If she was a psychic, though, then she was in almost as much danger as she claimed Sam was. Maybe not right now, maybe not tonight, but soon. Dean was right, Azazel wasn't going to stop just because Cas had kicked his ass back to hell. Ava was one of his kids, and that meant she might end up at Cold Oak, same as Scott and Amanda. Same as Andy.

Which meant Sam had a chance to save her, like they hadn't been able to save the others.

"I don't believe it," he said, eyes distant and a shaky smile spreading across his face.

Ava, however, laughed a frustrated, desperate thing, her face an expression of bitter resignation. "Oh, of course you don't. You think I'm a total nutjob."

"Wait, no, no, no," Sam stood from the bed. "I don't think you're crazy. I have visions too, Ava."

She dropped her arms and took an immediate step back from him. Another laugh bubbled forth, significantly more nervous this time. "Okay, so…you're nuts. That's great."

He held out his hands, hoping the gesture was a calming one. At least he hadn't drawn that knife on her. Then they'd be in a real mess. "Look, I believe you. And I want to hear about this dream you had, the one about me. But first, I need to make a phone call."

"Of course you do." Ava nodded along, looking like a woman ready to bolt at any moment. Her mouth was downturned in a cute trout-pout, and she sniffed again as Sam grabbed his cell from atop the nightstand. He moved towards the door of the motel, giving her a wide berth (again, for her sake, not that she saw it that way). "If you're calling the cops, tell them I said, 'hi!'"

Sam paused at the door, phone already dialing as he raised it to his ear. "I'm not calling the cops, Ava. I'm calling my brother. Dean?"

His eyes darted pointedly to the motel stationary still sitting on the nightstand, and she followed his look with a shaky turn of her head.

"Oh…uh…right." Ava moved a little hesitantly between the beds, picking up the pad to stare at the same note she'd seen last night.

Sam smiled as the phone rang against his ear. "Don't worry, he's kinda like me- like us. He can help."

"Uh-huh. Okay. Great."

The hunter shook his head at her disbelief. She was the one who'd come looking for him, after all. He stepped out of the motel, pulling the door only partially closed behind him. He didn't really need her overhearing him talking to his brother from the future, but he also didn't want to scare her, either.

Dean's voicemail started up as the ringing abruptly died, and Sam tried not to let that worry him. He was just going to have leave his brother a message, ask Dean if he knew anyone by the name of Ava Wilson, and what her vision might be about (Sam didn't know anyone currently after him. Maybe there was a case here, after all?) Then… Dean would get back to him as soon as he could. You know, when he was done pulling off his fool-hardy plan of summoning a potentially antagonistic angel alone, without his younger brother as backup.

Sure. He'd be calling back any minute now.

-o-o-o-

The climb to the roof hadn't been easy, or as quiet as he particularly liked to be when on a hunt. Luckily, his target had been distracted by the woman, whoever – or whatever – she was, so he'd been able to jimmy his way up the side of the building using an old maintenance ladder. He crossed the flat roof in a crouch and laid down along the edge, sniper rifle propped against the lip, all without alerting his prey.

The hunter adjusted his scope, butt of his rifle tucked to his shoulder, cheek braced against the side as he lined up his shot. He put his prey's head right between his crosshairs, centering the target on the phone as the man pressed it to his ear.

Gordon Walker let out a slow, measured breath, finger tightening on the trigger as his target turned his head perfectly into his shot.

Chapter End Notes

A/Ns: It has been faaaar too long since our last proper no-good dirty rotten cliffhanger, dontcha think? ;) Like, five chapters, at least!

Up Next: You all over on A03 KNOCKED IT OUTTA THE PARK!!! It is double chapter, back-to-back reward time for our 1000 kudos milestone!! I will get the next chapter up once I'm back from the movie!! Thank you all so much for your support, guys!

Chapter 90: Season 2: Chapter 57

Chapter Notes

A/Ns: Oh my gosh, guys, I'm sorry for the delay! The movie turned into movie and a dinner, then movie and a dinner and board games when we get home!? And guys, you can not turn my dad down when he wants to play a board game. Dude's eyes light up like a puppy at Christmas (which makes no sense, I'm aware…) But For Real. The eye game is stronger than Sam Winchester's. It's ridiculous. (Even more ridiculous that I did not inherit that skill grumble grumble damnit grumble)

So…two hour board game later aaaand here we are! Also, I'm a little tipsy. I'm a couple of ciders, a couple of eggnogs, and not nearly enough waters later…Oh, and I still have to go paint a painting for my sister, which I promised as her Christmas present (I'm…not late on that at all…) Friends (and totally sober family members) shouldn't let friends paint drunk, guys!

But friends totally let friends post fanfiction drunk. That…that is an excellent idea.

Speaking of…Quality Warning! This is probably unnecessary cuz I edited this a couple days ago but…author is tipsy and still posting! So…yup, let's just leave a good ole fashioned warning for that right here.

Chapter Warnings: Dontcha also think it's been faaaaar too long since our last proper no-good, dirty rotten, back-to-back cliffhanger? I most certainly do ;)

(You were warned…I did warn you, right? I remembered to do that? Pretty sure I did.)

See the end of the chapter for more notes

-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-

The Road So Far (This Time Around)

Season 2: Chapter 57

-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-

Dean closed the door to the Impala, staring at the darkened gas station. It had closed up for the night, the overhead lights off, the attached store dark, and the lot around him mostly abandoned. There were a couple of cars on the edges of the asphalt block that made up the parking lot, but they were equally dark and unoccupied. The gas station shared the lot with a mechanic's place, so Dean wasn't really worried about those.

He'd driven out of the town of Lafayette, about twenty miles to the southwest, before finding this gas station on the outskirts. There was no point driving any further out; any angel to answer his prayer would know that if Sam Winchester was with his older brother, he was going to be somewhere in the town of Lafayette. There wasn't another city equal in size close enough to really mislead them. Dean had driven far enough from the motel his brother was still sleeping in to not call suspicion to it, but not far enough away to make it obvious he was trying to hide the location, either.

It was an interestingly wriggly, winding, thin line to toe, but one Dean was familiar with. Cas had once told him the trick to finding someone who was warded was to look for what wasn't there rather than what was. Like an empty motel room where all other rooms were full. Which meant, in this case, making sure Dean put himself in a spot where there were enough actual empty rooms around – enough negative space in all the white space that was the population of Lafayette – that no one gap of nothingness called attention to itself.

Not that Dean was particularly worried. Lafayette was a decent sized town but it wasn't particularly busy on a mid-week, early December night. Which meant there were plenty of half-filled motels. All he'd had to do was a pick a direction and drive far enough away to put a couple dozen of those empty rooms between him and the actually-occupied room Sam was in.

Not that it should matter because, again, this wasn't even going to work. (And also he was supposed to be summoning an angel that should be friendly. Just so long as 'friendly' was a term used loosely.)

He'd actually driven further out of town than originally planned. Dean hadn't meant to make the outskirts, but there he was, standing beneath the last roof between Lafayette and nothing but farmland for miles and miles. The hunter had been forced to driver longer than he'd wanted to because Sam had friggin' followed him (because of course he had, Dean had known the kid wouldn't let him do this alone, despite what they'd agreed to. Especially since he'd only sort of kept his half of that agreement.) Dean had spotted the stolen car a couple miles out of the motel and decided to at least let Sammy know he'd been spotted. That way when the kid pulled up to wherever Dean decided to stop, he'd have to own up to following his brother against his word (and Dean could totally pull higher ground and ignore that whole 'told you through a note…while you were asleep…in the middle of the night…' bit…. Yeah. Total higher ground, there. He hadn't actually broken his promise. Just. Uh. Bent it. Yup.)

Losing Sam (which wasn't gonna happen, but Dean could at least try) meant the hunter had to drive further out of town than he'd wanted on quite the crisscross of roads, making a couple 'accidental' rights along the way. Surprisingly, the car turned off his trail and onto a side road after the first suspicious follow. Dean kept waiting for it to re-appear – his brother trying some clever trick to re-pick up the hunt – but it hadn't shown up again.

So not Sam, after all. Or Sam, but he decided to give up and turn back once he realized he'd been spotted. (So…not Sam, then.)

Of course, it could have been a coincidence. Dean was driving major roads in a city with a decent population and car count. He'd only spotted the car for a couple minutes and two turns before he'd started trying to lose them. So it could have just been the perfect line up of a normal Lafayette civilian taking the same route home after a late shift or early night. That did happen, on occasion. Somehow, though, Dean doubted it. His luck was never that lucky.

The hunter kept an eye out for the same car – or any other – but didn't spot anyone else suspicious right up to his discovery of the last gas station out of town.

Dean cast one more cursory look around the darkened structure and empty lot, double checking he was alone. Then, reminding himself of how stupid an idea this was (so, so stupid), he closed his eyes, shoved his hands into his pockets, and began to pray.

'Okay, here goes.'

The hunter took a deep breath, already feeling ridiculous. He'd never really gotten the hang of doing this, even when it had been to Cas. It always made him feel both stupid and awkward as all get out. And this definitely wasn't Cas he was planning on talking to.

'Dear Balthazar, you winged di- Angel…of…the Lord.'

Dean winced. Right. The asshole was never gonna answer if Dean forgot they didn't know each other in this timeline. At least in his, Balthazar gave as good as he got, but that was because the two of them had a mutual appreciation of hating each other. And good one-liners. Possibly the only reason they could stand each other long enough to actually get along.

'My name is Dean Winchester, I'm a friend of Cas's- Castiel's, and I need your help. Cas needs your help. He's stuck up in Heaven and I think he's in trouble. So…come on down here.'

Okay, that was better. Halfway decent, he supposed. Real civil.

Green eyes slid back open, quickly glancing left and right, even though Dean knew it would take an angel longer to appear than that. Balthazar would have to get out of a Heaven that was supposedly sealed up, find a vessel, and get to him.

Oh. Right.

'And get a vessel. I like my eyes not burned out of my skull, thank you very much.'

Okay. Slightly less civil. Not like Balthazar would be civil when he got there either, though. If he got there. Dean sighed, hands still in his pocket in the chilly air, and leaned back against Baby's side. He was probably in for one hell of a wait.

-o-o-o-

A thousand miles away, in a New York City penthouse suite of a sixty-five story skyscraper overlooking Central Park, a tall, lean man paused against the edge of his Italian marble bar, halfway through pouring himself a very fine beverage. His blond head tilted to the side, as if listening to something. Not that a human would be able to hear anything over the pulsating beat of the live DJ, the lights overhead flashing in a disco strobe effect, bodies thrashing and writhing together on the dance floor that made up two whole thirds of the room.

Then again, Balthazar was hardly the human he appeared to be.

The angel had paused mid-pour of his incredibly expensive and positively lavish Old Fashion. It was an Old Rip Van Winkle bourbon in his hand, aged twenty-five years in special barrels reserved from Kentucky's finest. He'd picked it up from a collector whose over-the-top security system had neglected to include angelic warding.

Honestly, Balthazar didn't even care much for the taste of human alcohol, but oh, the opulence of it all was the real indulgence.

Now he hesitated, tipping the bottle back to stop his pour, staring into the world well beyond the mirrored back of the bar, reflecting the bright lights and pulsating crowd. His human guests - featuring a who's who of the city's top socialites – danced and drank and lived on, mindless of their host's preoccupation. He doubted any of the people in this room would believe he was one to bother with prayer.

Of course, their version of prayer was to whine and demand and sob into a void that would never give them anything back. Balthazar, on the other hand, was that void, or a part of it. And now, there was one such human soul demanding his attention, as though he actually expected an answer. What was really surprising, though, was the angel was actually considering giving one.

Cassie was in danger?

Balthazar looked down at the Kentucky Bourbon, half the bottle still left. The human could be lying. Although, honestly, Balthazar imagined this 'Dean Winchester' was the very man he and Cassie had left Heaven to find. How else would a random human know his name, along with his connection to the Angel of Thursday? Balthazar was somewhat proud, actually, to think his friend had gone and done a thing as outlandishly disobedient as make contact with the human. He'd half expected Castiel to immediately head back to Heaven the moment they'd been separated.

His grip on the bottle slipped, the heavy glass bottom clinking loudly against the Italian marble. Luckily, it didn't break, or leave his grip completely. Not a single drop wasted.

Balthazar hadn't thought of his friend in some time. A lifetime, really – this newly human-ish one, at least. And now Castiel could be in danger?

The rogue angel set his bottle of ridiculously expensive liquor down on his equally extravagant bar, catching a glance of himself in the reflection. In and among the shelves of pricey bottles and knick-knacks he'd nicked from some of the world's most famous private collections, his vessel stared back. Blond hair, sharp cheeks, and blue eyes, dark in the dim, ever-changing lights. It wasn't his face, not truly, but Balthazar was rather fond of it all the same.

What help would he be to Castiel? If this wasn't some random human making a mess of things or a trap laid out by an angel who learned of his somewhat exaggerated demise, there was nothing he could do. He couldn't return to Heaven. Even if it was to help Cassie, Balthazar would be arrested on the spot. No, he would be no help at all, really. Worse, he'd likely add to whatever it was Cassie had gotten himself into this time.

There was nothing he could do.

Still Balthazar hesitated, the conclusion coming with a disappointing lack of something, leaving him more uneasy than resolved. The angel shook his head and picked his bottle of expensive caramel colored liquor back up and resumed mixing his fancy drink. Blue eyes focused on the mirror, this time only for his party-goers. He'd lined events up perfectly tonight for a Ménage à…whatever the French word was for twelve, and it had taken a surprising amount of work to do so. He couldn't rightly throw all that hard work away, now could he?

Castiel would have to get by on his own. He'd always managed in the past and Balthazar had little doubt he would this time, too.

-o-o-o-

Dean spent exactly twenty-two minutes muttering under his breath for Balthazar to hurry the hell up (it was friggin' cold out, man), which escalated to groaning, bemoaning, and eventually just cussing the guy out before he realized (begrudgingly accepted) that the angel wasn't coming.

Bag of dicks. Always had been. The asshole.

Whelp. That was it. That was Dean's one shot. He'd said one and done.

Dean gripped the Impala's keys tightly in his hand, looking over his shoulder at his slender, gleaming lady. Time to head back to the motel, maybe even before Sammy noticed he was gone. The hunter sighed, frustrated and pissy, but mostly disappointed and turning towards anger because it was easier than coming to terms with the fact he'd failed. Dean growled low in his throat, harsh fingers scrubbing at his short hair as he opened the driver side door.

The metal hadn't even finished groaning before he was slamming it back shut.

Fuck it.

Dean spun back around, striding several feet away from the car. He wasn't giving up on Cas that easy. Screw Balthazar. If that dickwad was too busy cramming feathers up his ass to show, there were others. Dean knew others, and maybe one of them would care enough to show.

The hunter slammed his eyes shut, screwed up his face (because, damnit, this was an even dumber idea and he said – he'd said – he wouldn't do this), and started to pray one more time.

'Rachel. I know you don't know shit about who I am, but my name's Dean Winchester. I'm the friggin' Righteous Man and Castiel is in danger.'

-o-o-o-

Rachel was training with several of her unit, markedly lacking their leader and second in command (though they were not required for training and so the absence was not particularly noted as anything suspicious) when the prayer came through. The voice itself was not jarring, but the news of her leader – well, second in command now – certainly was, and Rachel pulled up short. Her abrupt and distracted withdrawal from the spar allowed Samandriel to skim his blade along the edges of her grace before he could halt his forward momentum, creating the shallowest of cuts.

"Oh no!" The slighter angel pulled up short, several sets of eyes all equally wide in surprise and no shortage of terror. "I am so sorry, Rachel!"

Rachel lifted her limb, observing the sharp line of brilliant, leaking light without any of the alarm of her companion. Several of the angels sparring on either side of them halted as well, but she waved them on. As third in command of the Flight, with one gesture from her the other angels resumed their mock battles without question. Rachel lowered her arm and turned to the newe3st member of the Unit.

"It is nothing, Samandriel. You should not apologize for wounding your opponent when that is the ultimate goal of battle in the first place. You should be aiming for it, in fact."

Samandriel straightened to attention, raising his blade in a small salute to her advice. There were no young angels in Heaven as angels had no age; they had all been created by God within the span of a hundred years of one other, at the very age they would always be. They did not grow, they did not change. But Rachel could not help but think of Samandriel, who had only transferred into the unit less than a century ago, as quite young. He was new to combat, at least as his primary purpose, and fell heavily back on his previous duties, which involved maintenance and cataloguing of Heaven's assets.

In short, he was a better negotiator and weapons analyst than he was fighter, and apologized often for it. Which was illogical and pointless. Rachel would train it out of him, yet.

But that was neither here nor there for the moment. Currently, Rachel had Dean Winchester's voice in her head, asking for her help and insisting that Castiel, her commanding officer, was in danger at the hand of one of their own. Rachel disappeared her blade into the Ether, pleased when Samandriel took his commanding officer's lead and did the same.

"Samandriel," Rachel began, hesitating only for a fraction of a second. The slighter angel was known for his attachment to Castiel. Not in a way that the warrior angel was aware of in the least, not outside of that as a leader and teacher, but it was obvious enough to the rest of the Flight. Samandriel held Castiel in high regard, and was like a puppy to his master around the other angel, much to the unit's amusement. "Have you seen Castiel?"

If the other angel thought twice about the oddity of her question in the middle of a sparring session, he said nothing of it. Samandriel thought for a second, his grace swirling yellow with contemplation, but the colors and eddies ultimately settled into a more neutral tan. A no, then.

"Not since yesterday," Samandriel confirmed what his grace had already told her. "In the Archival Hall, I think. He was with Uriel in the morning, but I haven't seen him since."

Rachel felt herself pause, the never-ending movement of her own grace halting for a single second, before resuming its usual patterns of sharp lines and calculated angles as though the hesitation had never happened. Was there something to be seen in Samandriel's response, naming the one angel this human voice claimed was a traitor? A traitor potentially holding Castiel's life in his hands?

She was hardly inclined to believe the word of a human she did not know, particularly over a matter no human should know of or be involved in. However…every angel knew of Castiel's trip to Earth with Balthazar. He had spoken to few about it, but Rachel had been one of the few. She had counseled him in his grief. In their shared grief.

Castiel had spoken of demons, amassed, attacking him and Balthazar in mere minutes of being on Earth. Her brother had been very troubled by this, though he'd refused to go any further into it than that. Rachel had not known the cause behind his silence, but it had occurred to her that their superiors refusing to acknowledge this threat, forbidding him from discussing it with others, could very well be the source of his unease.

If Castiel had been on Earth to speak to a human, if this Dean Winchester was that human, and if he truly was the Righteous Man…

Rachel knew hastily connecting those dots with nothing but the limited information she had could very well lead to an incorrect and dangerous assumption, but it was difficult not to at least see the easily drawn line.

She dismissed Samandriel to resume sparring with another in the unit, to practice his precision. He still wavered in the final moment of each attack, worried he would hurt his compatriots. "Trust your opponent's skill," she insisted as she left him. "They are far more proficient in battle than you, Samandriel. They will block your attack."

As Rachel retreated from the battling unit, trusting in her brothers to continue the drills without her oversight, she spread out her wings and, with it, her awareness. The first thing she did was search for Castiel's signature. If he was in Heaven – and he was surely in Heaven, for the gates were shut and she had seen the pale nature of his grace when he'd returned from Earth, carrying with him no saturation but the guilt of Balthazar's death; he was not soon to return to the planet below without good reason – then she should be able to find him, anywhere.

Which was why she nearly tripped on the shining white, unnaturally smooth stones beneath her incorporeal feet when her senses did not succeed in finding him.

That…wasn't possible. It wasn't. Either he was on Earth or he was- No. She wouldn't think it. The unit had already lost one brother, it could not lose another.

Besides, Rachel had not felt his death. If he had been in Heaven, which Samandriel confirmed he was just yesterday, then every angel in the Host would have felt him perish. He had to be somewhere. But why could she not sense him?

Rachel hesitated again, stepping off the well-walked and yet never worn path from the training grounds to the upper Halls, so others could pass. She, herself, had no direction. She did not know where to go with this…revelation.

Well, there was one person – one man – who did seem to know something about it. Rachel drew herself up, grace hardening with resolve. If their positions were reversed, Castiel would do whatever was needed to ensure her safety. As her brother, her leader, her friend – regardless of how rarely used that word may be among angels – it was her responsibility to him to do the same.

She would locate one of the holes in Heaven's defenses – the ones Castiel spoke of to her in confidence in the quiet of the barracks the night he'd come back – and find this Dean Winchester.

-o-o-o-

He'd been reduced to scuffing the toes of his boots along the rough cement, kicking pebbles and the one beer cap he'd found across the uneven pavement. Dean was all of about three seconds from pulling out his phone and playing Tetris (he'd give himself five games before calling it quits and going the hell home like he should have eighteen minutes ago) when a woman suddenly appeared about four and a half feet in front of him. Close enough for the hunter to stumble three feet back on autopilot, hand settling on the hilt of the knife hooked to his belt.

"Dean Winchester."

Holy shit. He hadn't actually expected her to show.

He had to assume it was Rachel. It looked like the same vessel as the last time he'd met her, but to be honest, Dean wasn't sure he'd be able to point that woman out in a lineup if asked. He could count on one hand the number of times he'd met Rachel in person, and he wasn't a hundred percent that number was more than one. She'd stuck around in his memory though. Possibly because he could also count on one hand the number of Cas's family who hadn't tried to kill his best friend or him. Even this asshole militaristic one who'd told him and Sam to back off and leave Cas alone ended up staying in his mind. At least, enough so that she'd been the second person he thought to call.

Okay, so actually that wasn't true. Hannah had been the next angel Dean thought to summon. He'd certainly met and interacted with her more times than he had Rachel. But between the two angels who had both served as Castiel's second-in-command at one point or another, Rachel hadn't handed Castiel an angel blade and demanded he kill Dean as proof of his loyalty to their cause.

So Rachel it was!

But still. He hadn't really, actually expected her to show up.

So…what was Step Two?

"Rachel?" The hunter started out cautious, hand still on his knife, though little good it would do him if it proved he actually needed it. They really needed a solution to the only-an-angel-can-kill-another-angel problem. Like, yesterday. The hunter also found himself wishing there was a way to identify angels beyond their vessel or their word. Gadreel had taught him that lesson in the worst way, and he'd never really recovered from that particular brand of distrust. At the time, though, angels had been knocked down a peg on the ladder of 'badass and dangerous as hell'. Plus, they'd had angel blades literally falling out of the sky, so there was no shortage of weapons to kill the bastards.

"Indeed," the woman he was pretty sure was probably Rachel confirmed. She certainly regarded him with the militaristic rigidity he remembered from this particular angel. "You prayed to me?"

Dean straightened, composing himself with as much staunch strength as he could muster in a single stance. His hand stayed on the hilt of his knife. "Did you find Castiel?"

Rachel's face didn't move. She didn't even blink. Dean vaguely remembered her as the extra stoic type, even for an angel. Still, it would go a long way in that whole confidence-trust-building-thing if she'd at least let something come through.

"No. I could not locate him in Heaven. It is…troubling."

Dean almost snorted, but managed to bite it back at the last minute. Just barely.

"You are sure he is not on Earth?"

The hunter shook his head, finally taking his hand off his blade. "He said he was going back up to Heaven, and he left in a hurry. He was banged up pretty bad, said Uriel would heal him."

Rachel frowned at that. Samandriel had not mentioned any injury. In addition, if Castiel was injured enough to need another angel's assistance, he would not have been upright or even conscious for Samadriel to see. This was all ignoring how worrisome it was that Castiel had not sought a Healer, but rather one of his warriors.

"When was this?"

Samandriel had said yesterday morning. Perhaps Rachel could pinpoint the last time Castiel was on Earth and begin filling in the blanks.

"A week and a half ago. Last, uh, Tuesday. Nine days ago." It took Dean a moment to backtrack in numbers. God, it felt like so much longer than a week and a half. A month, maybe, since Rivergrove, if you'd have asked him. Weeks, at least, since Cas dropped mother effin' Uriel's name of all people and then went missing-in-action on them.

God, they needed a break. They needed a win, and then they needed a vacation. Aruba maybe. Dean had always wanted to go to Aruba.

Rachel calculated the difference. Earth moved much faster than Heaven, in varying ways at varying times, but the angel was accustomed to the difference and comfortable estimating the average. It was more than possible that Samadriel had seen Castiel yesterday morning in the Archival building, assuming the Power had then removed himself to Earth very shortly afterward.

"How long was he on Earth? Or with you?"

Dean felt like he was being questioned by the high school principle who'd just found a bag of questionable substance on him. He managed to hold back the snark before it came out with his answer, but it wasn't easy. "An hour, at most?"

He should have made Cas stay. He should have made him- her- (him?) stay, heal up with them. Warn her- him about Uriel. Regroup and figure out a plan. Dean should have made Cas stay.

"And you believe he is with Uriel now?" Rachel was no longer looking at the human, head tilted in thought, eyes distant on the uneven asphalt. The large angel and current commander of their Flight hadn't been present at their usual sparring today, but it was not uncommon for both him and Castiel to have other duties to attend. Such was the burden of leadership, as Rachel understood it.

"She- he said that's who he was going to. Look, I get it, alright, you don't want to trust some lowly human, but Uriel is bad news-"

"I believe you."

Dean blinked at Rachel's firm, no-nonsense interruption. She…what?

"I have never cared much for this particular brother," Rachel continued, dipping her head slightly as she spoke. "Uriel's attentiveness to the Flight is negligible at best, his overly-familiar regard for Castiel has always discomforted me, and, lately, there have been rumors of his association with the angel Malachi."

The double take the hunter did would have been damn near comical in any other situation. "The anarchist?"

Oh, Dean remembered Castiel telling him about that piece of work. He'd been newly graced up and avoiding details on both where that grace had come from and why he flinched anytime Dean or Sam touched him. Dean had been around torture enough to know what it looked like on a survivor. He'd spent ten years in Hell carving that reaction right out of those 'survivors'. Needless to say, Dean had drawn his own conclusions, complete with suspicions on just how a very human Castiel came by his information on the faction of angels opposing Bartholomew. A faction apparently led by Malachi.

Who had been, in all of that, a friggin' anarchist angel. Like that made any sense in their already messed up, crazy lives.

Rachel seemed surprised he knew the name, or any details on the angel at all. Her expression almost resembled something expressive. There was an ever-so-minuscule shift in her shoulders, and Dean realized she'd relaxed, probably as much as an angel like her ever did. It was entirely possible that until that moment, despite her words, she hadn't actually believed him at all.

"Oh, that's just great," Dean continued, ignoring the 'moment' between them since the angel probably hadn't even realized there was one. Instead, he focused on just how screwed Cas was if two brute assholes like Uriel and Malachi had teamed up in this timeline. God damn it, could Time not let them have a single win? "So Uriel's working with Malachi, and Castiel flew right to them."

Rachel shifted slightly, rolling her shoulders, and Dean hazarded that she was uncomfortable. Or worried. He wasn't great at reading angels other than Cas. Well, and Balthazar, but that asshat hadn't ever made what he was thinking much of a secret to start with.

"If you are certain that Castiel is not on Earth, then Uriel is somehow disguising the signature of his grace."

In turn, the hunter regarded Rachel with something she identified as concern. Or panic. Perhaps a mixture of the two? She was not very skilled at reading humans.

"Is that…bad?"

"It is not damaging to an angel. Merely inconvenient and highly suspect." This time Dean did snort. Rachel narrowed her eyes at the sound, but didn't waste the time it would take to question it. "Unfortunately, it will make locating him difficult. Stay here. I will return to Heaven and do what I can to find him."

Dean was shaking his head before she was even finished. "I'm coming with you."

Rachel blinked. It was an odd sensation – she had forgotten how much humans feel of their surroundings, at least physically – and she did it again more out of reflex than need. "That…is a terrible idea."

"Don't care," Dean insisted, even as inner Dean screamed that it was, in fact, a terrible idea ('listen to the smart angel lady, you told your brother you'd come right back!') Little did that voice know, Dean wasn't one to listen to it (that voice actually knew that quite well) and he'd already made up his mind. The hunter rubbed at his chest, at a phantom ache deep in the hole that felt nothing. Dean wished that feeling was more than just wishful thinking. "I'm going with you."

"No, you are not." Rachel shook her head and crossed her arms, weight shifting to one hip in clear protest. She might as well have been physically putting her foot down. "Heaven is no place for a living, breathing human. You will be a beacon of attention on a mission that can only succeed if we remain undetected."

"Don't care," Dean repeated through gritted teeth, even though he knew she had a more-than-fair argument. The hunter knew, at this point, he was just being stubborn because he was angry and scared, and he hated being both those things. Even more so when they added up to Dean being nothing but helplessness. He was going with her, and he was going to bring his best damn friend home.

Dean's phone started to buzz in his pocket and the older Winchester knew instinctively that it was Sammy. His brother was awake and calling to rip him a new one for leaving without letting him know. For sort of breaking that promise he'd made. The timing of his call couldn't be more perfect, of course. As if Sam knew his older brother was about to do something stupid – well, even stupider, now – and had every intention of talking (yelling) him out of it.

"You should care," Rachel scolded him immediately, words clipped and biting at the heels of his own. "If Castiel is in as much danger as you seem to think, than anything we do to alert Uriel or Malachi could end in his death."

The hunter sucked in a sharp breath, his resolve and stubbornness immediately wilting at those words. Crap. He couldn't even deny that she was right. More than right, damnit. He clenched his teeth, upper lip trying repeatedly to curl into a snarl that the hunter fought against. The angel didn't need to think he was any more of a rabid mess than he was already stubbornly acting like. Dean turned his head away to hide his lack of control, fists curling at his side.

Damnit, damnit, damnit.

"Fine," he spat out, still grinding his jaw. The phone in his pocket stopped buzzing, but it pinged one single vibration a minute later. A voicemail. Definitely Sam, then. No one else but Cas left him voicemails, and she- he- she (damnit, this was confusing as hell and getting ridiculous) hadn't even figured out cell phones. At least, not yet.

(Not ever, if they didn't manage to get to her before Uriel.)

Dean clenched his fists tighter, trying not to think about it. "Fine, you're right. Just…go get her back, alright? Him. Whatever."

Rachel eyed the volatile human. She suddenly had the distinct impression that leaving Dean Winchester behind would, in no way, be this easy. Which made little sense to her, so the certainty of that feeling was all the more perplexing. In fact, the angel found herself resisting the urge to tell the human to 'stay.' Not that he would heed such an order, she was also certain. So Rachel dismissed both the urge and the odd impressions she was getting off the confusing man. Instead, the angel uncrossed her arms and spread her wings, preparing to jump into the Ether.

Still, she found herself hesitating.

"Remain here," she reminded him, keeping the command as much of a suggestion as possible. Rachel supposed, in some ways, that was very similar to telling him to stay. Perhaps she had caved to the strange need anyway. "I will return shortly with Castiel."

Then she left, still with the very uneasy sensation she would regret something about this encounter.

Dean waited until she disappeared – in the blink of an eye and with a flap of wings – to snort again. Yeah, right. Despite the ability to literally transport anywhere in the world – and beyond – in under a second, angels never did seem fast enough in returning. Besides, he knew his best friend. Nothing Cas ever did went down easy. He was a Winchester, after all. Dean was going to be lucky if Rachel came back at all with his wayward angel, let alone in a timely manner.

The hunter sighed, hanging his head for a moment. God, he needed to be doing something! Anything rather than waiting. As his phone buzzed in his pocket again, a single short vibration reminding him of the missed call, Dean dug the device out. Well, might as well listen to Sammy chewing him out, then call the sasquatch to let him know he was still in one piece.

Dean raised the phone to his ear, the robotic voice telling him he had one new message. The hunter hit the '1' button without even looking at the keypad, prepared for a seriously pissed-off younger brother.

"Hey, Dean." That was, indeed, his little brother's voice, but Sam sounded way less angry than he'd been expecting. Hell, the kid barely even sounded pissy. Had he somehow not noticed Dean was gone? Yeah, right, then why would he be calling the older Winchester's phone in the middle of the night? "There's a woman here, at the motel."

Dean's head turned sharply to the side, a frown immediately taking over his features. A woman? Could it be Ruby? Or Azazel's girl? His fingers unconsciously tightened around the plastic casing of the phone.

"I think she's one of us. One of Azazel's kids," his brother continued, voice dropping lower and Dean realized that Sam hadn't just meant at the motel. Whoever this newcomer was, she was in the room with the younger Winchester. Dean's stomach knotted. His grip on the phone tightened even further, his other hand sliding into his coat pocket to wrap around the Impala's keys. Screw waiting around for Rachel; the angel could find him once he made sure Sammy was safe.

"She says she found me through a vision, Dean."

Something in the older hunter's gut shifted. It didn't loosen so much as change position; Dean's Timey Senses flared in response, but the man from the future didn't know why. Not yet. Sam's next words got him his answer, though.

"Does the name Ava Wilson mean anything to you?"

-o-o-o-

Hidden by the night and his higher ground, the stealth hunter drew in another measured breath, as silent and slow as the one he'd just released. The rifle moved with the expansion of his chest, with the slow shift of his collarbone and shoulder, but like any hunter worth his salt, his aim stayed true. He was too good for it not to. Once his lungs were comfortably full, he held that breath, one eye shut and the other focused through the scope. He adjusted his aim by a hair's width, the center of his crosshairs shifting from phone to skull.

Gordon Walker released the air from his lungs and squeezed the trigger.

The sound of the .223 caliber subsonic bullet leaving his Heckler and Koch SL8 sniper rifle was nothing more than a pop in the air. A shame, really. The crack of thunder that came from an unsuppressed rifle was one of the world's damned finest sounds, in Gordon's opinion. The bullet flew true; the time between leaving the barrel and impacting its target was a fraction of a second. His prey hit the blood-spattered pavement with a lifeless thud before Gordon was even done lamenting the silence of the kill.

The phone, sprayed with its owner's blood and likely more, clattered to the ground beside the body, screen lit with a call still in progress. The tinny, mechanical voice of a woman requesting the deletion, saving, or replay of a voicemail was the only sound in the dark, empty gas station.

Chapter End Notes

A/Ns: [insert even dirtier, even more rotten, even more no good grin here] Did I make you all think Gordon was going after Sam? Aw, shucks. Guess I am just that evil ;D*

*(…okay, but I did warn you this was gonna get ugly, right?!)*

So who has two thumbs and just killed our main character? This author right here! I feel like I can officially be inducted into the hall of Supernatural Writers now. Can't join until you kill one of the boys all proper like XD

Original Timeline Reference – Rachel: I didn't want to put this at the top because it would spoil the chapter, but for anyone who doesn't remember Rachel, she was Cas's second in command in season 6. She showed up to the boys just once, warning them to leave Castiel alone as he was busy fighting a war and didn't have time for them. She warned Cas a couple times about splitting his priorities, but seemed to genuinely care about him, and he seemed grateful for that. Ultimately, she discovered his plan to open Purgatory and told him to stop it or she would. Cas killed her to keep his secret.*

Up Next: Who's got two thumbs, is dead, and gonna go save Cas all on his own cuz he's gonna end up right where he wanted to be all along before he even knew he wanted to be there? That's right. This idiot Winchester right there! [points awkwardly at Dean with two thumbs]*

ANOTHER MILESTONE APPROACHING: Alrighty guys, we are within spitting distance of 2000 reviews on ff dot net, but it is a decent distance yet. Under normal circumstances, I absolutely believe we could those eighty reviews. HOWEVER, I do try to be a nice author when I can (when plot, emotional devastation, angst, and whumpage are not factors XD), so here's your heads up: Next chapter (58) is NOT a cliffhanger, but 59 will be (just a medium one, nothing like last or this chapter ;) So, if you don't want to cash in your chips now, you could space the reviews out over this chapter and next to try and hit that 2,000 milestone during 58 so you get 59 and 60 back-to-back :D*

This has been the rare appearance of your perfectly decent, nice and friendly author. That fulfills this year's quota, she'll be back in something like six months XD

Good luck and I hope you enjoyed these back-to-back chapters!

Chapter 91: Season 2: Chapter 58

Chapter Notes

A/Ns: I was like, sure, I can totally post this while I watch "The Boys'. It's not like I need to concentrate or anything. Just upload, quick scan through, write some Author Notes, and then done-o.

Whelp. That was about three hours ago now. facepalm

Also, holy crap. I had no idea that show was written by Eric Kripke. Sweet Beans. I just started watching it because A. supers and B. Karl Friggin' Urban. I want that man as my spirit animal.

Review Replies: Sorry I haven't had a chance to get back to anyone yet. Your reviews have all been amazing and awesome and you are wonderful human beings. I will be trying to get around to responses in the next week. I haven't been in a good place for about a week now, which means I'm pretty much useless, and when I'm not useless, I'm trying to force myself to write. Sigh. It'll clear up eventually.

Chapter Warnings: Dean celebrates his birthday in fake Aruba with Eliot Ness, then has a chat with Cas before shit gets real weird.

See the end of the chapter for more notes

-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-

The Road So Far (This Time Around)

Season 2: Chapter 58

-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-

Sam was laughing.

Dean turned his head at the boisterous noise. Something stupidly warm curled up in his chest at the sight of his beanstalk brother coming into the room, a big smile on his face and Castiel trailing behind. Sam was holding a beer in one hand, the brown glass still frosted with cold from the fridge. Cas was in his usual getup, tie still missing but dress shirt and tan trench coat properly rumpled. The angel was holding a bucket in his hands – an honest-to-god, tin bucket – filled with ice and a dozen popped beers. There was a smile on the angel's face, too, a rare thing for how wide and unhesitant it was.

Dean sat up, leveraging himself off the back of the plush and ridiculously comfy brown couch. They'd found it at a garage sale. Imagine that. Winchesters. Garage sale shopping. Sometimes, Dean still couldn't believe the domesticity of it all. The couch hadn't been the first piece of furniture they'd ever bought – that would be their amazing, spectacular, beautiful, world-altering, life-changing memory foam mattresses – but it was the first thing they'd ever bought for their new home that they hadn't technically 'needed.' That night the boys picked a spare room in the bunker, set up a flat screen, a DVD player with Netflix access, and built themselves a straight up Mancave. Dean had been in pure heaven. Sickeningly domestic heaven, maybe, but hell, there hadn't been a thing in the world capable of putting a dent in his ear-to-ear grin that night.

"Are you guys kidding me right now?" he asked now, smile a damn near duplicate.

"It's not Aruba," Cas started, sounding almost apologetic as the two of them stood practically shoulder to shoulder beside the couch. "But, we figured…"

"It's close enough," Sam finished with a smile, then pulled something out of his pocket. It was one of those mini umbrellas tiki bars put in frou-frou drinks. The Samsquatch popped it open, rolling the rubber-band up to the top of the toothpick to lock the parasol in place. He slid it into the opening of one of the bottles in Cas's bucket, pulling the now-frou-frou'd beer free from the ice.

Sam held it out to Dean by the neck, little umbrella sinking down to the canopy like an awkward hat. A festive beer hat.

"Happy Birthday, Dean."

The older Winchester laughed, swiping the drink from his brother. He plucked the little umbrella out of the top and took a damned happy swig. Dean remembered the offhand comment, something he had groused about to Sam just the week before (about how they needed a real vacation, maybe Aruba. Sunshine. An ocean that wasn't sporting the week's newest sea beast in need of battling. Drinks with little umbrellas in them. A cabana boy to bring them a bucket of beers on demand. (Sam had raised one hell of an eyebrow at that, and Dean rolled his eyes. 'They don't have cabana girls, Sammy, or you know that's what I'd have said.' 'Uh-huh. Sure, Dean,'had been his jerk of a brother's reply.)) For lack of a better place to put the decorative thing now, Dean tucked the umbrella behind his ear, still open. It sort of stayed there, tucked against his short-cropped hair, and Dean's grin could not be beat, though he welcomed any to try.

Sam rolled his eyes, but there was nothing but mirth and fondness in the expression. He stepped over Dean's outstretched legs to plop down on the far side of the couch beside his brother, holding out his beer in cheers. Dean clinked the neck of his bottle to Sam's, and the two shared a drink.

"Happy Birthday, Dean," Castiel said as well, settling a little more awkwardly on Dean's other side. The bucket still in his lap and Dean reached out with his own to tap the neck of one of the beers within.

"Grab one of those, Cas. This calls for a toast." Dean smiled at his angel, who obliged by selecting the bottle Dean had clinked. The nerdy little angel leaned forward to set the rest of the beers on the ground, between his leg and the hunter's.

"To…. Shit," Dean paused, beer held out in front of him, as he realized he had no idea what to toast to. Birthdays were total crap in his opinion. Never thought he'd live to see enough of 'em, anyways. He looked at his kid brother, then his angel. "To family?"

Sam held out his drink as well, the sound of glass meeting glass a pleasant ring in the small room. "To family."

Cas hesitated for only a second, before he met their bottles as well. There was something somber on his face, but a light in his eyes that kept Dean's grin from faltering. "Family."

As the three enjoyed their respective drinks, Dean leaned back into the couch, spreading his free arm out along the back. Yeah, this was the good life. A bunker, his brother, their angel, and a bucket of beers. Who needed Aruba?

"So what are we watching?" Sam asked, picking up the remote and offering it to Dean. A true birthday miracle right there.

Dean swiped it with a grin. "I think today's the day. It's time to introduce Cas to Eliot Ness."

His brother let out a groan – at this point, he could quote The Untouchables line for line, and that was not out of love like his brother

– but the noise was mostly for show. Sam might draw the line of birthday suck-upage at handing over the remote, but it wasn't like Dean had elected to make them watch another Dr. Sexy marathon. So Sam didn't say anything as his brother turned on the TV and started scrolling through Netflix.

The three Winchesters sat in their Bunker Mancave, finishing the bucket of ice-cold beers and watching one of Dean's favorite movies. The older Winchester snuck a glance at his family, Sam quietly engaged in the movie despite his groaning and moaning, and Cas tracking the moving images with his usual intensity, occasionally asking questions for what he didn't understand.

Yeah, Dean thought, leaning hard into his domestic little life with all its warm and fuzzies. Happy birthday to him.

-o-o-o-

Cas was at the sink in the kitchen, rinsing out the last of the bottles to put in the recycling the next morning. Talk about domestic; Dean thought buying a couch was the height of it. Nope, that honor belonged to an Angel of the Lord taking out the recycling. (He had told Cas to leave it, but the angel insisted on cleaning up, always). Dean was watching him, leaning against the island behind his friend, legs crossed at the ankles and sipping slowly at the last beer. Cas, the dude who had pulled him out of hell and saved his ass more than a million times, was doing the dishes in his kitchen. The thought made Dean chuckle, the warmth of alcohol mixing pleasantly with the warmth of an evening spent with family.

"You know, I missed you like this," Dean offered up casually. He gestured with the nearly empty bottle at Cas's getup when the angel turned to him with a questioning look. "Don't get me wrong, Angela was a nice change up. Dragon Lady aside, I mean. But I guess…I still think of you like this, man."

"I'm fine, Dean."

The hunter frowned, going still at the odd response. Castiel glanced over his shoulder at him, eyes wide and blue as ever, but there was a level of sadness in them that Dean didn't quite like. It crashed that inebriated warmth almost immediately.

"What?" Dean stared at the angel, who smiled, nodded, and turned back to the sink. Cas said something again, but Dean wasn't listening anymore. Something here…it wasn't right.

"I know. I'm…sorry, for what happened."

It was like…like there was a disconnect. Castiel was having a different conversation than him. But that wasn't right, either. Dean frowned, the edges of the thought as fuzzy as his buzzing body. No, he remembered this conversation. He'd had this conversation. Cas was on script.

Wait, script?

"It wasn't your fault. It was mine." The angel sighed. "Claire is… difficult, yes, but she has the right to be angry and hurting. I am not her father."

Cas set the brown beer bottle upside down on the counter, a dishtowel spread out beneath all the draining drinks. Dean stared at the red-striped fabric of the towel, brilliant against the metal counter top. Sam had picked up a set of kitchen towels earlier that month, all of them red and green and apparently on sale from the holidays. had snorted at the sight of them and their now Christmas themed discount shopping. God, they really had changed, hadn't they?

Changed?

Dean uncrossed his ankles as his brain slowly started to catch on, bit by bit. He set the beer down on the counter. Cas was still talking, pauses in his words like he was listening to someone else speak in the in-betweens. Dean finally pinned down just what the hell all this was as Cas answered a question no one had said aloud, but Dean remembered asking years ago. He remembered Cas's answer, too, which the angel delivered word for word.

"What can I do?" Cas was saying, and Dean remembered the way the angel's fingernails had dug into the white rim of the kitchen sink, the way his shoulders hunched around his ears, the exhaustion in every line of his body and words. "I took her father form her, Dean. And now, this body…it's mine. Jimmy's soul is in Heaven and Claire…"

This was a memory. Holy shit, this was a memory. What the hell?

Dean turned to his left and right, but he was in the bunker kitchen. A complete rendition, down to the smallest details. Like the damn Christmas towels, even though it was near the end of January and the Winchesters didn't do Christmas.

A djinn?

No, that didn't make sense. His surroundings lacked the distinct aftertaste of a djinn; that subtle but persistent feeling of wrongness Dean had always been able to identify among even the most perfect layers of happiness in every djinn dream. The cynical hunter had always just assumed it was because true happiness wasn't a thing Dean was comfortable with in any form. But this…this didn't have that wrongness. No, this had the right level of happy-but-still-just-a-touch-miserable-because-I'm-a-Winchester-and-that's-as-good-as-it-gets. This was…it was January, because it was his birthday. His thirty-sixth birthday, he remembered that. Which made it…Dean did the math in his head: 2015.

Oh shit.

It was supposed to be 2006. He knew that. Worse yet, 2015 had not been a good year. And this conversation, it had all started because of….

Dean swallowed with difficulty. There was a lump in his throat made of fear and self-loathing. His mouth dried up like the damn Sahara as he slowly reached across his body with his left arm hand curling close-to-trembling fingers around his right forearm. He couldn't feel the raised skin of the Mark beneath his over-shirt, rolled up above his wrists but never enough to reveal the red, branded skin. Dean knew it was there, though. He could feel it, now that he was thinking about it.

No, no, no, no. Dean's breath picked up and he slammed his eyes shut. This was a memory. It wasn't real, it was a memory. A happy one, actually, when he thought about it and not the thing branded onto his arm. His birthday, the little celebration Sam and Cas had given him, the beers and The Untouchables. Sam's stupid grin and teasing about the drink umbrella that stayed tucked behind Dean's ear for the duration of the movie. All of Cas's questions and adorably serious concerns over the validity of the plot. Even this conversation. All of it had been a good night.

Dean dropped his hand from the Mark and tried to let go of the feel of it beneath his fingertips, running through his veins. Yeah, this might have been a happy memory, alright, but it definitely still had the distinct Winchester-shitty-life quality to it, didn't it? Definitely not a Djinn.

"Thank you, Dean. I will take all the advice I can get." Cas was turned around now, leaning against the sink and drying his hands on a green dishtowel (and god, it was sparkly. Dean had forgotten about that (possibly because by mid-March he'd hidden every Christmas colored discount item around the bunker he could find, later to burn them all out back)). The angel was smiling gently at him now. It was sad, but it was warm, and Dean muddled through his memories for a minute, trying to recall what it was Cas was thanking him for.

Offering to help out with Claire. Because the two had come to an almost, sort-of understanding after she'd asked two of her friends to kill him, and he'd managed not to kill the two in return when they'd tried it. Yeah. Sort-of, almost understanding.

(An understanding necessary because he'd murdered her son of a bitch surrogate father figure and all his buddies who'd been doing nothing but using her, but that's not how she saw it.)

(Yeah, definitely the shitty quality of what constituted Dean's real life, right here.)

"I'm dead, aren't I?"

Dean blinked owlishly, even as he said it aloud. The realization had hit his brain about the same time the words left his tongue. Cas didn't even hear him, just kept on discussing parenting techniques with a future-and-also-past version of Dean that wasn't actually there.

This was a good memory. That's how Dean knew he was dead. Not a wish-fulfillment, but a memory, and a happy one at that. Despite the horror of having murdered a room full of people – dirtbags though they might have been – and realizing he'd enjoyed it only a month before all this, this had still been a good night. One of his few from that year, really. He and Cas had stayed in the kitchen until the ridiculously early hours of the morning, talking parenting tips. Which led to Dean recalling almost all of his favorite stories of Ben, both from the year he'd spent with the Braedons and the few times he'd gotten to see them after.

He missed that kid.

And Cas had been so eager to learn how to be a good father to Claire. Maybe not a father, but whatever she needed him to be. He was so earnest to help, to make it right, like everything the angel put his heart and soul into.

"Shit, I'm dead," Dean repeated. Because this was a memory from… more than three years ago, and also a decade from now. It wasn't 2015. It wasn't even 2016, which Dean still thought of as right when it came to the year. No, it was 2006 and Dean had been…he'd been trying to find Cas.

Cas who should be possessing a female vessel named Angela Garrett (Dragon Lady), and not Jimmy Novak in his trench coat and suit. Angela, a woman currently lying comatose in Bobby Singer's spare bedroom. And Cas, who had been severely injured by Azazel's trap in Rivergrove and gone back to Heaven for healing. After, of course, he dropped mother friggin' Uriel's name. Of all the brother's he could have decided to trust and then not tell Dean about.

(That wasn't entirely fair. Dean hadn't asked, either.)

The hunter had been trying to summon another angel to help locate Cas, because the damn guy wasn't answering his prayers. If Dean was lucky, that was because Cas was healing and not because he was fucking dead. But that didn't matter right now, because he'd succeeded. Dean remembered succeeding. Rachel had answered him, had agreed to search Heaven for Cas.

She'd also absolutely refused to bring him with her. So what the hell was he doing here?

"Shit, I'm dead," Dean said for the third time, suddenly spinning in the kitchen. "How the hell did I end up dead?!"

Maybe it was a ridiculously illogical leap for anyone else, but Dean had been to Heaven, more than once. He knew what the cycle of memories that represented eternal Christian Paradise felt like, and it felt like this.

Shit, shit shit. Who the hell had iced him? And when?

The older Winchester scanned his memories, trying desperately to recall what had happened after Rachel left. Had she come back? He had no memory of that and, despite the fact that he trusted Rachel only slightly further than he could throw her (which wasn't far to begin with), Dean didn't think she'd have killed him. If the angel wanted him dead, she'd have just done it. No need for a vanishing act or false pretenses.

No, there'd been something else.

Sam had called…. No, Sam had left a voicemail! Because Dean hadn't wanted to answer his phone with Rachel around. But the angel left and Dean got his phone out and listened to Sam's voicemail, and…

And that was it. That was the last memory he had.

What. The. Hell.

"Okay, Dean, think," he muttered, running a hand down his face. "What did Sammy's voicemail say?"

His brain short-circuited before it could come up with an answer as something entirely else shoved its way into his conscience. Something that took up all the room his befuddled mind could spare.

He was in Heaven.

He was in Heaven and Cas was also in Heaven.

Dean dropped his arm. Son of a bitch!

The hunter looked around the kitchen again before moving quickly for the open door. He left behind a memory of the angel, laughing with a warm smile and crinkled eyes at a story Dean should be telling him about Ben. But he didn't have time to relive a memory right now. Dean skidded to a halt in the hallway, looking left and right. The last time they'd been in Heaven and tried to go Paradise hopping, Cas had said to look for a road.

Alright, well that was easy in this particular memory. He just needed the garage and his Baby. Dean took a right and headed down the hall.

This might not have been the plan (it really, really hadn't been the plan. If it had been the plan, Sammy definitely would have murdered him first for even thinking it), but it was what had gone down. So why waste it? Dean was in Heaven, the one place he didn't think he could get to, the place Cas was (possibly in danger or at the very least still injured), and Dean didn't plan to waste that opportunity.

He was going to find his angel and drag that feathery ass of his back down to earth himself.

-o-o-o-

Gordon pulled away from the scope, using the unaided, sharp eyes of a hunter to stare at his downed target, only fifty feet away. Dean Winchester wasn't moving. Gordon climbed to his feet, rifle by his side, and waited another moment. The downed hunter still didn't move and that combined with the puddle of blood beneath his head was confirmation enough for Gordon.

He climbed down from the gas station roof the same way he'd gotten up; a disused ladder attached to the backside of the building and a dumpster he'd had to shimmy into place just to get to the bottom of said ladder, which was suspended a good ten feet off the ground. Gordon honestly hadn't been sure he could pull this hunt off tonight. After showing up in town a couple days ago to find his original target already gone – missing for more than a week, with a clueless and worried father sure his troubled son had finally ditched town – Gordon figured Lafayette was as good a town as any to set a trap for the Winchesters.

He'd been planning on something of that nature for a couple weeks now, and the lack of intended prey meant a perfect opportunity to not waste an opportunity. The right guy stabbed in a parking lot here, the proper phone call there, and the Winchesters were sure to get word of a case in Indiana. Those boys had their Roadhouse connections and Gordon had his. It wasn't hard to get someone to call Bobby Singer with a hunt that needed hunting, and everyone knew who his go-to boys were.

Gordon hit the ground, shouldering his rifle strap. He started around the building, forgoing his car which he'd parked about a hundred feet away after pulling into the lot with no headlights, hoping Dean didn't hear the near-silent engine. To be honest, Gordon had lost the older Winchester earlier on that night. He'd found the brothers' motel with pathetically little searching; that gorgeous car of theirs had been parked right out front of the third place Gordon drove by. He'd been scoping out the best vantage point for a sniper nest when Dean Winchester came out of the room near midnight and took off in that beauty.

So Gordon weighed his options. Dean or Sam. He wasn't one for murdering men in their sleep, even monsters, so he'd taken off after the older Winchester.

Of course, the trained hunter spotted a tail within minutes. Dean did the absolute bare minimum needed to ditch his follower, which told Gordon he wasn't taking it all that seriously. Probably thought he was Sam. Still, Gordon chose to turn off before his prey upped the ante with anything more confrontational. The hunter preferred the risk of losing his target and heading back to their motel than losing the element of surprise.

He gave himself thirty minutes to find Dean Winchester again. Gordon could search the direction the older Winchester had been headed for thirty minutes, looking for that slender lady of a car, before he'd call it and head back to catch him at the motel. Imagine his surprise when he'd actually found the hunter, twenty-two minutes in, at a gas station on the edge of town. Pretty much the last thing in town.

By the time Gordon had pulled up behind the building, gotten his rifle out, and made it up to the roof, Dean was talking with whoever he'd come all the way out here to meet. It was a woman, average looking with shoulder-length brown hair, dressed in a sharp suit. If Dean Winchester were anyone else, Gordon might have assumed a shady business deal was going down. But Dean wasn't anyone else; he was a hunter.

So it wasn't with complete surprise that the woman disappeared. In the blink of an eye, she was gone. Gordon's jaw tightened as he pulled away from the scope, staring at the lot below, now empty of all but his target.

Dean Winchester, consorting with demons. He could hardly say he was surprised, given what that bastard he'd exorcised down in Louisiana told him about the brothers. There were lines you didn't cross in this business. Betraying your own species was sure one of 'em. Associating with demons instead of killing them on the spot was another. Gordon lined his shot back up and didn't hesitate to take out the hunter that had become no better than the things he hunted.

Now Gordon stood over the downed Winchester, staring dispassionately at Dean's frozen face, eyes lifeless and entire right side splattered in blood. The vamp hunter bent down, picking the discarded phone off the pavement next to the man's lifeless hand. It was still working; the screen lit up when Gordon tapped a key. A shame, really. Everything he'd heard of Dean Winchester up until he'd met the man had been about what a good hunter he was. Gordon took no delight in depriving the world of one of their own. But when one of their own went rogue, it had to be done.

He tucked the blood-splattered phone into his pocket. Gordon would need it to lure Sam Winchester out next. Speaking of. The hunter pulled out his own phone, flipping it open and extending the device out over Dean's corpse. The flash of the camera was bright in the darkness.

Gordon checked the image, flipped his phone shut, and headed back for his car. He had preparations to see to.

-o-o-o-

Rachel stood in Arthur Staten's personal Paradise and tried to remain calm. She pulled from her millennia of training as a Warrior of God and forced down all distractions. Rachel found comfort in the familiar balm of old training.

The autistic man's memories were empty of Castiel. Each of Castiel's favored human retreats had been absent of the wayward angel. It was actually the second time she had checked this particular Paradise, because it just didn't make sense.

There was nowhere in Heaven Proper to hide one of the Host. Even if Uriel was the one dampening Castiel's signature, Heaven itself was built of the very same energy the angels were. She should have been able to commune with the walls, the archways, the plants and trees and stones. They would have told her where her commander was. Which meant his grace was not physically in contact with the walls, the plants, the stones, or the very ground they walked on. He was not in Heaven Proper.

Which left the Paradises. Unfortunately, there were, quite literally, millions of them. If Uriel was the one hiding Castiel, he could have picked one at random. Rachel was never going to find her missing commander, especially not before her ambiguous promise of 'I will return shortly' ran out and Dean Winchester took matters into his own hands.

Not that she knew what a human could possibly do in this situation, but the volatile manner in which Dean had insisted he accompany her back to Heaven had left Rachel…wary. Which meant she had to find where Uriel was hiding Castiel before that undetermined amount of time had passed on Earth.

The only variable that remained was how?

She could enlist the help of the rest of her Flight. With all of them divided and searching the Paradises, they just might find Castiel in time. She'd need a cover story for why the angel had somehow… misplaced himself in a human Paradise. And how Rachel somehow knew about it. And how no one was to discuss it with Uriel…

Standing in the middle of Arthur Staten's fourth birthday party – the balloons bright blobs of colors and the other kids moving wavelengths of energy and noise – Rachel let out an irritated noise. Her wings flapping restlessly and the balloons bobbed back and forth in the wind created by her agitation.

Wait. Of course! Uriel.

Her performance in this matter so far had been grossly inept, Rachel chided herself. How many centuries had she and Castiel studied together, testing themselves on strategy and tactic, all for her knowledge to fail them both so blatantly now? Uriel may have found a way to cleverly disguise Castiel's grace, but he would not have disguised his own. All she had to do was search for Uriel, who would eventually lead her back to wherever he was keeping Castiel.

Rachel exited the human Paradise, closing the door to Arthur Staten's memories behind her. The hall was silent, it's ethereal floor and walls a welcome calm from the chaos of the human's domain. Rachel was in the A's, still quite close to Heaven Proper, and could feel the hum of grace buzzing through the walls. She leaned her back against one, wings pressed flat to the white expanse beside Arthur's door. In the distance, the sound of her brothers' voices raised in song was a reassuring comfort, and Rachel pulled on her training once more.

She closed her eyes, extended her senses and-"I can't believe the Righteous Man ended up dead two years early!"

Rachel slid her eyes – all sixteen pairs of them – back open in a single, coordinated snap. What?

"He's not supposed to be up here at all," another voice added, far more hushed than the first but still quite clear in the long, resonating halls. This angel's words were distressed, ringing out with an air of wrong in the peace and calm of Heaven. "Zachariah is furious. I've never seen him turn that color red."

"Let's just…find him before the boss takes it out on us instead. Which way are the D's? I've never been down here before…" The voices carried away until Rachel could no longer discern them.

The Righteous Man…. If Dean Winchester had been telling the truth (and Rachel had been inclined during their initial meeting to believe him) then… He hadn't even waited an hour for Rachel to fulfill her promise? He had killed himself just to come find Castiel on his own?

Of all the imbecilic, self-righteous…!

The angel made another low noise deep in her core, feathers bristling in indignation and irritation. Seriously? Of course Castiel, an angel with the patience of a river carving its way through solid rock, would find the one human physically incapable of restraint! Not to mention boorishly insistent on doing things himself. Rachel pushed off the walls, immediately turning away from Heaven Proper and hurrying down the long corridor of A's.

She had been in and among the Paradises before – several times, in fact – and did know her way around. Mostly thanks to time spent hunting down an errant commander who enjoyed an autistic man's heaven and was often late to sparring sessions and Flight drills because of it. Rachel would get to Dean Winchester's soul before those other angels, give the human a firm lashing for not even giving her the allotted time to search for her brother safely, and then…deal with getting him back to Earth.

Somehow.

(For the moment, Rachel had neither the time nor the patience to question what business Zachariah could possibly have with the human soul. It was a relevant question, she knew, and one to revisit later. The only reason she could fathom off the top of her grace was that the Dominion wanted to send the soul back to Earth. If Dean was, indeed, the Righteous Man than his death had clearly been a mistake.

However, that was not Zachariah's department…)

-o-o-o-

Dean opened the door to the bunker's attached garage expecting his beautiful ladies and a road, and instead stumbled into a hallway that was obnoxiously white. Like…Martha Stewart running a mental hospital on steroids levels of white. Dear God, sterile much? Dean blinked in the brightness, the truly blinding existence of light which felt like it was coming from everywhere. Actually…it kind of was. The hunter squinted, sticking his neck out like a turtle as he stared at one of the walls around him. The smooth, white expanse of it really was glowing. And not like an opaque glass or plastic with a light source behind it. No, the surface itself, the material itself (whatever that was), was emitting light.

The hunter pressed his hand to the surprisingly cool surface. The edges of his fingers curved the light in a soft, golden-white glow. It was…kinda pretty. Calming almost.

Dean pulled his hand off the wall with a frown, glaring at the thing for daring to be…what? Peaceful? Yeah. That. The older Winchester spun around, taking in the weird hallway he was in. Aside from glowing, it was also lined with white lights, white frames, white arches, and white doors. They, too, were obnoxiously shiny: some kind of freshly polished silver, metallic material that gleamed in the diffused light. Each door had an equally polished plaque, names cut into the material and backlit by, you guessed it, more white light.

The one directly in front of him – the one he'd just stumbled out of – had his name on it. Along with the years, 1979-2006.

Well, that probably wasn't good.

Dean glanced down the hall to his left, which seemed to stretch forever, and then to his right. Same result either direction. Just white, light-lined archways, walls, and doors, endlessly repeating like something out of The Shining, only if The Shining had taken place in a dystopian author's wet dream of a sterile Sperm Lab in some underground, secret, billionaire's bunker.

It was like staring at one of those pictures on the internet where, if you looked long enough and hard enough and forgot to blink, the lines started to vibrate. That was usually right before the website told you there was a high percentage chance you were a psychopath. Dean remembered being damn proud of how fast his little lines vibrated, at least until Sam read the second part of the 'test' aloud. Then he'd just been uncomfortable and defensive, calling Sam a liar when the younger Winchester insisted the lines had only moved a little bit for him. Nuh-uh. If Dean was going down as a psychopath, he was sure as hell taking Sammy with him. Winchesters stuck together, after all.

"Hulloo?" Dean called out, wincing when his voice, even just that exaggerated whisper, echoed all around him and seemed to travel down both ends of the hallway for a ridiculously long amount of time.

What the hell.

The last time they'd 'hacked' Heaven, Dean had never left…well, his own memories. His and Sam's. They'd just traveled through different versions of them, always along a road of some sort. At least until they'd bumped into Ash, who had helped him and Sam actually hack Heaven the right way. But this…this place definitely wasn't in his memories. There was no road, for starters. As for Ash, that mulleted, loveable little freak should be passed out drunk (but very much alive) on a pool table in the back of the Roadhouse about this time.

So…where was Dean? Was this still heaven? Or had he gotten the whole memory-déjà-vu thing wrong from the get-go?

This still didn't feel like a Djinn dream. Maybe…a pocket dimension? Dean knew they were due to run into Gabriel sometime soon, though he couldn't remember down to the month or day. This could be the archangel and Dean just didn't remember bumping into him or getting tossed in here. Which meant Sam was probably in here somewhere too…. Though what the lesson was this time, Dean didn't have a clue.

The hunter squinted at the glowing walls again, reaching out a hand to poke one. He shook his finger when it remained very solid. Something about this place…the white, the gleam, the glowing plaque with his name… Sure, he would give Gabriel points if this turned out to be him. This over-the-top sterile, fake, light-obsessed environment was absolutely what Dean would expect Heaven to look like. Cartoonishly so, which was right up Gabe's alley.

But…it also stank so much of high heaven – with its hoity-toity, holier-than-thou odor, clinging heavier than a middle-aged French heiress' perfume – that Dean was actually pretty sure it was Heaven and not a cheap knock-off intended to make him just think it was.

He was just…seeing it differently this time.

Which was a mystery for another day. A day when he wasn't mysteriously dead or trying to find his angelic best friend in a hallway maze where he half-expected to find a pair of twins standing, holding hands, asking him to come play with them.

Alright, whatever. Visuals might have changed, but the plan hadn't. Dean still needed to find Cas.

Which…okay, he had no idea how to do.

Time to break it down into steps. Step one, pick a direction and go with it. At least his first decision was easy. Left or right, because the hallway looked like it just kept going in either direction and those were the only two options.

Dean glanced down both, shrugged his shoulders in utter indifference because he honestly had no friggin' clue, and went with right.

-o-o-o-

Rachel stood in the open doorway of Dean Winchester's Paradise and stared, something between stupidly and apoplectically, into the empty room. Just four walls and nothing more. No furniture, no décor, no memories to fill the space with warmth and personality and life. Because there was no soul in this Paradise.

"Are you kidding me?!"

-o-o-o-

He made it about sixty doors down (Dean had lost track somewhere in the thirties and kinda just figured he'd walked about twice that, so far), when he crossed another hall. It branched off to the left in a standard T-intersection from the one he was currently in. Dean stared down it, which turned out to be fairly pointless because it looked exactly like the one he was currently in.

Seriously. Glancing between the two identical paths made him dizzy and sort of short-circuited the logic portion of his brain.

Did he even still have a brain if he was dead?

Well, might as well turn left down the new aisle of doors, Dean figured. It was true that he was less likely to get lost if he stayed on his current trajectory of endlessly straight-to-the-end-of-all-eternity-including-his-sanity-and-good-god-only-sixty-doors-and-he-already-wanted-to-scratch-his-eyes-out-of-his-skull-seriously-what-was-with-angels-and-their-white-and-their-light-and-their-sterile-stoic-no-change-bore-bore-bore. However, anyone who might come looking for him (and they would, because 1. he was the Righteous Man and definitely wasn't supposed to be dead yet and B. last time he'd ditched his personal heaven, angels had been on him and Sam pretty quickly in the form of a weird, origin-less searchlight in the sky) would absolutely find him in less than a hot second, since all they'd have to do to spot him was look down a hallway.

So far, it had been nothing but a straight shot six hundred doors down with nothing to look at but him and the endless eternity that was the other end of this god-forsaken hallway. Anyone came looking for him, he was a dead man.

Er…Deader.

In short, Dean turned left.

-o-o-o-

Rachel was going to kill this particular human. Which, logically, she was currently incapable of doing. Dean Winchester was already dead. But if ever there was a human to test Rachel's ability to defy logic, it was this human.

He wasn't in the D's.

The angel had flown down the entire length of the corridor until it dead-ended at a T-intersection with the V's. She had not spotted a wandering soul for the entire length of the hallway, though she had passed two other branches that went into the H's and the R's. Now Rachel had to make a choice she had hoped not to make. What she had hoped for was to stumble over the human soul in his correct hallway. Even better would have been his correct Paradise, where he belonged. But neither of those had happened, had they?

Rachel debated between the four options available to her: the H's, the R's, and the two directions of the V's, one which led to the M's, the other to the F's. After consulting every bit of strategic data she had ever consumed, adding to it the (admittedly limited) human knowledge she possessed, Rachel decided to backtrack to the H's. It was the first turn Dean would have come upon and, if he knew he was on the run in a place he shouldn't be and possibly being pursued, it was the logical choice.

At least, it was the choice she would have made. Not that that was saying much, because Rachel wouldn't have chosen to leave her Paradise in the first place.

There was another option, of course. The human could have entered any of the Paradises along the D corridor. However, Rachel dismissed it as a possibility. For one, because no human soul should be able to enter another's Paradise (then again, Dean Winchester should not have been able to leave his), and two, because if he had, then she was never going to find him.

Like she was never going to find Castiel, at this point.

Rachel turned into the H's, taking off down the hallway at as fast a flight speed as she deemed safe in the fairly narrow corridor.

Chapter End Notes

A/N: See, That was almost entirely not really even a cliffhanger at all! (Actually, about half of this arc will be less cliffy, more stopping-kinda-in-the-middle-of-things-cuz-where-else-are-we-gonna-stop!?)

Review Responses: The previous two chapters and the holidays were such a whirlwind that I forgot to address some of the big questions/points/guesses that came up in reviews. I'm going to take a minute to do that now, so feel free to skip these notes if you're not interested in chatter.

Balthazar: Yes, Balthy is alive! Most of you guessed that he was ;) I really appreciate many of you mentioning that while you disliked his decision not to interfere, it was also in-character of him. It wasn't an easy decision for me to write him that way so I appreciate hearing it. I like Balthazar and I loved his friendship with Cas. What I want in this story is more of that, so it was hard keeping him as his early-asshole-self. (We'll get there eventually :D)

(P.S. Shameless plug: If you like Balthazar and my writing combined, you should check out my other story, Cadence. It's not complete yet (because I apparently can not work on two stories at once) but it is a fun twist on what life might have been like for Dean if it was Balthazar that had pulled his ass out of Hell instead of Cas XD In other words, another timeline AU, just waaaaaay shorter than this one)

Gabriel: A lot of people guessed that Dean would summon Gabriel, and as this is the second time that's happened, I'd like to address why Dean hasn't gone after our favorite Archangel. First, I love Gabe and I promise, he will have a big part in this story. However, I think there's a major difference between how we the audience see Gabe and how the boys see Gabe. We friggin' love him because, among many reasons, he's funny. The things he does are downright hilarious. However, if you were Dean or Sam, you probably wouldn't feel that way. What Gabe does is horrible if you have to live through it, and if not horrible, than incredibly frustrating and exhausting. There are Sam and Dean, with the entire fate of the planet literally resting on their ability to stop the apocalypse, and the one guy with enough power to actually help, who might just ally with them, won't stop playing games. That would be so damn infuriating. And when the angel finally agreed to help it was only because all of his pagan friends were going to die (we the audience can see more into his character, but I don't think Dean necessarily did) In 2006, all Dean knows is that Gabe wants the apocalypse to get started so it can finally be over. He doesn't have any leverage to change the angel's mind, so he's not going to actively seek Gabe out until he's got something tha'll get him to help.

Of course, Gabe's gonna interfere all on his own loooong before that XD Cuz, ya know, Time wants to stay the same and, also, Gabe's an ass ;)

Chapter Reference – Gabriel: I very quickly mentioned where Dean's head was at concerning Gabriel when he was brainstorming options to save Sam way back when the kid pushed too hard and almost died. See Chapter 16: Season 1 Chapter 15 if you would like that refresher, but it is just a paragraph (and that was two years ago so I will not be surprised if people do not remember it :P)

Up Next: We catch up with Sam and Ava, Gordon gets busy texting and rigging explosives (not at the same time), Rachel has a few choice words for Dean, Dean has a few choice words for whatever idiot designed Heaven (that would be God, Dean), and Castiel is surprised to find himself still alive.

Chapter 92: Season 2: Chapter 59

Chapter Notes

A/Ns : No one poked me this weekend to make sure I remembered what day it was! I can't decide if I am honored or neglected :D

Review Replies: I have still not gotten around to answering anyone yet, and for that I am very sorry! I still would like to, so it's on the to-do list for this week. In the meantime, thank you to everyone who comments or reviews, shares your thoughts or offers up encouragement, even when I don't always get back to you. I really appreciate every one of you that takes the time to 'pay' me for my work, if you will :)

Previously on TRSF… Sam woke up to Dean leaving their motel room in Lafayette, Indiana after they showed up on a case that turned out to not be a case. There was a knock on the door, Sam answered, and it turned out to be Ava Wilson, who seemed surprised to see him and tried to warn him he was in danger. Sam listened to her story about visions and his death, then left the room to call Dean. He had to leave a voicemail, since his brother didn't pick up. Meanwhile, Castiel awoke to Uriel helping him heal. He turned on Angel Radio and received Dean's prayers (warnings). He confronted Uriel about his plans to raise Lucifer, and the larger angel forced him back into a healing trance.

Chapter Reference – Cas's Panic Attack in Heaven: An earlier time in Heaven, Castiel and Uriel discussed Naomi and her memory tampering. Uriel confessed he had seen something like that happen to Castiel, in Egypt and again in Sodom. This realization that his mind had been tampered with sent Castiel into a panic attack, and he ended up fleeing Heaven to seek out Dean, Sam, and the grace in Dean's chest. See Chapter 54: Season 2, Chapter 21 for a refresher.

Chapter Warnings : Man, I am drawing a total blank for funny stuff here, damnit. Ava is unsuccessfully trying to get Sam to leave town, Sam is successfully heading right for his own death, Dean's already been there, done that, Rachel's pretty much ready to kill every human, and Cas is…well, Cas is just surprised to be alive.

See the end of the chapter for more notes

-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-

The Road So Far (This Time Around)

Season 2: Chapter 59

-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-

"Oh come on, why can't you just leave town?" Ava Wilson looked like she desperately wanted to stomp her feet up and down, but was holding back because she self-identified as a grown-ass woman. "Please? Before you blow up?"

"No, I can't," Sam insisted from where he was sitting once more on the edge of the mattress, tapping his cell phone into the palm of his hand, mind running a mile a minute and a hundred miles away.

Dean hadn't called back. Sam hadn't told Ava much when he'd come back into the room over two hours ago, just that his brother hadn't answered so he'd left a voicemail. But Dean was pretty good about answering his phone, and the fact that he hadn't... Sam knew he was out trying to summon an angel – not exactly the kind of thing you could take a call in the middle of – but no way that took two hours, with absolutely no available minute to check his phone.

Something about it all wasn't sitting right with the younger Winchester.

He needed to get dressed, get out there and figure out where his brother was. If Ava and her vision were right – that Sam was going to get himself blown up in some abandoned house – then someone was after him. That meant they could be after Dean, too. They could have already gotten to him and that's why he hadn't been able to call Sam back. His brother could be tied up in that abandoned house Ava had seen in her vision. Or he could be dead for all he knew.

Okay, so Sam was being a tad melodramatic. His brother wasn't dead, he just…wasn't answering his phone. Because he was summoning an angel. Which apparently took hours to do, on the one night another psychic showed up to tell Sam someone wanted him dead.

Great timing on that one, Dean.

"Oh, god, please? Please just leave? Why won't you listen to me?" The woman standing in his motel room looked beyond distressed. She'd passed stressed out and gone right into resigned despair somewhere after hour number one. Plus, she still wasn't sold on the idea that he wasn't crazy, which both irked and amused the younger Winchester.

"Because there's something going on here, Ava. I've got to figure out what." Sam climbed to his feet and grabbed his duffle bag from the floor, throwing it on to the bed. He needed clothes, first. "Besides, I'm not leaving without my brother."

Who would be calling back. Any minute now. Unless he was tied up and/or dead in an abandoned house.

"Do you remember that address, the one from your vision?" Maybe Ava's vision came true because Sam went to the address to try and find his brother. He knew about the trip wire now, thanks to Ava. He could avoid it and whoever had set it up in the first place.

"Okay," Ava breathed out, the word a little shaky. She ran her hands through either side of her hair. "Okay, you know what? No. Screw you, buddy! I came here to- to- I don't know, save your life, I suppose, when I should be at home addressing wedding invitations!"

She lifted her hands, one spread wide, the other pointing to a delicate, beautiful engagement ring. Sam's heart pinged for a moment, not only for this woman whose life was about to be – no, currently was – turned upside down, but because he had been her. A year ago, with an engagement ring of his own and someone waiting at home for him to come back to. Sam swallowed down the memory and turned away.

"Do you see this?" Ava continued, voice pitched in hysteria. She didn't notice Sam's discomfort, and carried on with her overly energetic bluster. "I am getting married in eight weeks, and I have a thousand things I have to finish before then. Instead of doing any of that, I drove out here to save your weirdo ass! But if you just want to stay here and die, fine. Me? I'm due back on Planet Earth."

Sam's phone dinged from the comforter beside his duffle bag. He picked it up, staring at a text from Dean. A message with nothing more than an address and the words, 'Sorry for radio silence found something'.

Six words. Just those six words; nothing about Sam's voicemail, a woman named Ava Wilson, or the fact that the younger Winchester was standing in their motel room with one of Azazel's special kids. Sure, it sounded like Dean, but anyone with Dean's phone could have just as easily scrolled through his text messages to pick up basic vernacular and syntax.

The hunter held the message out to Ava. "This the address?"

Her blue-green eyes widened, a watery sheen turning them into pools. "Oh god." Her wind-up speech about going home deflated right along with her composure. She looked up at him, those pools pleading. "Don't go. Please?"

"I have to," Sam answered, but paused as he pulled out a pair of jeans. He turned to her, looking the frustrated, frantic woman up and down with a sympathetic eye. She was freaking out, probably scared half to death, but she'd come here trying to do the right thing and was still standing in his motel room attempting to do just that. Sam gave her an encouraging and, what he hoped was calming, smile. "Look, I'll be okay."

"Yeah, sure you will."

He huffed out a vaguely amused breath of air. "I will, Ava. Thank you for coming here and warning me. But you need to go home, now."

The woman blinked, drawing back for a moment in pure surprise. "What? I- no…I don't...I don't think I should leave."

Sam's smile turned a little more brittle, but not because of her. All of Azazel's kids, at least the ones he'd met, were all something else. Kind or compassionate or brave or bold. Six months ago, it would have amazed him. Now, all he could think about were three dead bodies in Cold Oak and their friend in a hospital, muted for the rest of his life.

"I want you out of harm's way, Ava," Sam said, words firm and the conviction behind them even more so. He wasn't adding another body to that growing list. The hunter took a cautious step forward, telegraphing his movements loud and clear in case she rejected them. Sam knew she still wasn't sure about him. The feeling should probably be mutual, but everything in his gut told him Ava was telling the truth about who she was.

Instead of putting more distance between them, she just looked up at him with those big doe eyes. "What about you?"

"Harm's way doesn't really bother me." Sam offered a quirk of his lips and a semi-playful shrug. He settled an arm on her shoulder, a soft squeeze communicating his appreciation and his concern. "You did what you came here to do. You warned me."

"But…" Ava was shaking her head. She gestured to the phone in his hand. "You're walking right into my vision. I mean, this is how you die."

Sam squeezed her shoulder again before dropping his arm. "It doesn't matter. It's my brother."

Well, it could be his brother. He hoped it wasn't, but that text pretty much sealed the deal that it was.

"I- that…it should matter!" Ava protested. She let out a frustrated noise as Sam turned back to his pants, rifling through the bag for a shirt as well. "Maybe I could help. I may just be a secretary from Peoria, but there has to be something I can do!"

Sam paused, flannel in hand, to glance at her. Not in any sort of condescension, because secretary or no, that was a hell of an offer. One he didn't think she really meant, but appreciated anyway. Sam lowered his gaze, tossing the shirt onto the bed and starting to pull his pants on over his boxers. "You've done all you can, Ava. Just…just go back to your fiancé."

The word stung his heart like a perfectly formed barb, but it seemed to do the trick. Ava's resolve faltered, her right hand coming up to her left, twisting her engagement band around and around.

"Are you sure?"

Sam straightened, buttoning his jeans and turning back to her. He scooped his long-sleeved shirt off the bed, starting to put one arm it. "Yes, I'm sure. Go home, Ava. You'll be safe there."

She glanced over her shoulder at the door, her car parked just a couple rooms down from this one. Hesitantly, she turned back to the man who towered over her as he adjusted the flannel, fixing the collar. "Well, just…promise me you'll call then. I mean, when you get your brother, just to let me know everything's alright."

That he hadn't blown up, is what she didn't put into words.

Still ringing her hands, Ava pushed past him to walk over to the nightstand between the two beds. He watched her scribble down her number on the back of the same paper Dean had left him. She ripped it off the pad and handed it to him, waving the thin sheet insistently when he didn't take it right away.

"Alright," Sam agreed, folding it up and tucking it into his breast pocket. "I promise."

Ava Wilson stood there awkwardly for another moment before she nodded – twice – and then moved past him once more, heading for the motel door. Before she could open it, however, Sam's voice stopped her.

"Wait. Here." In a last minute decision, Sam reached across the length of the bed, digging beneath his pillow for his hunting knife. Before turning back around with it, he grabbed the sheath from inside the duffle, making sure it was fully seated and snapped shut before Ava saw it. Sam held the blade out to her, handle first. As unthreateningly as physically possible. "Take this."

Ava blinked at the offered weapon, then at the man holding it. "Did… you just pull that from under your pillow? Dude…who are you?"

"Uh…" Sam's genius mind ground to a halt, utterly blank. What could he say to that, other than 'exceptionally prepared' which any normal person would only take as 'incredibly paranoid.' "I, uh, just watch a lot of crime TV. Home invasions and…you know."

"Uh-huh." Ava took a few steps back into the room, still eyeing the ginormous hunting knife with trepidation. "And, uh, why do I need the world's biggest knife?"

"For…home invasions?" Sam tried, smile about as weak as the attempted joke. He flopped the knife back and forth as she stopped a few feet shy of taking it. "Look, remember that guy I told you about? The yellow-eyed demon?"

"Oh, yeah, I'm not gonna forget a story that crazy in…ever."

Sam resisted rolling his eyes and instead held out the knife again, pointedly. "If he comes for you, if you end up in an old Frontier town with other kids like us…just…keep this on you, alright? For protection."

"Protection, huh?" Ava took the last three steps hesitantly, but did reach out and take the weapon. It was clear by her awkward grip on both hilt and sheathed blade that she had no idea what to do with it. "I told you, the only protection I need is from my future Mother-In-Law."

And when it came to Brady's mother, there wasn't a knife on the planet big enough for that job.

The younger Winchester smiled tightly, his expression closer to a grimace than anything else. "I know. Just…promise me, alright? Keep it on you."

The woman chewed on her bottom lip. She'd never even handled a Swiss Army knife, let alone a blade this serious. Well…pointy end goes into the badguy, she figured with more than a little self-deprecation and sarcasm. After a moment, realizing Sam probably wouldn't let the subject go until she promised, Ava nodded. She twisted to tuck the hunting knife into her purse, still hanging off one shoulder. Getting it in there was definitely awkward, given its size relative to the size of her handbag. Which seemed hilariously – hysterically – ridiculous if you asked her. Ava nervously rubbed the palms of her hand on her thighs, her skin mysteriously clammy and really happy to be free of that blade. "You'll…um…call me, right?"

"Yeah." Sam nodded, and Ava stood there awkwardly for another moment, unsure whether or not to believe him, before she abruptly turned and headed for the motel door again and, this time, her car. Beyond that was home and a sleeping fiancé.

Once she was gone, Sam grabbed his jacket, wallet, and called for a cab on the motel landline. Dean had taken the Impala and all their weapons (again, nice timing, Dean), but Sam still had his gun, a backup blade he always kept in his boot, and his lock-picks. That would have to be enough.

-o-o-o-

Heaven was stupid.

Nothing there made since. Dean had been in a hallway entirely comprised of doors with 'D' names. Dean. Dean. A third Dean. Then Deandra, another Deandra, a couple more Deandras (who the hell was named Deandra, anyway, and why were there so many of them?) and then the Deidres started (Dean wasn't gonna even get into that one). Until finally, Dean had come to that left-ward hallway and decided to take it.

Now he was up to his neck in Humphreys, Hughes, and Hudsons. Why, in Hell or Heaven's name, would the H's connect with the D's? In what world did that make any sort of sense?!

A Winchester's world, Dean reasoned.

Anyway. Not his problem. His problem was Cas; he needed to find the idiot angel, but all these doors were clearly Human Paradises and not a place angels seemed to hang out.

(He'd opened one – just one – to investigate, only to bear witness something he could never un-see. Apparently, happy memories included happy memories. Also, Humphrey Beauregard the Fourth was very, very gay. Like, very gay. And into orgies. Which was not what Dean had expected from a man who died clear in the 1800s according to the date on his door (from what Dean was gonna guess was… Syphilis. Yeah, definitely Syphilis), along with being, as one could only assume from the interior décor and the name, very, very, very, very southern.

Gave a whole new term to the word 'buck.'

God, he needed soap for his eyes. And his brain. And his eyes. And his, just, everything. So, so much soap. Soap made from pure acid would be A-Okay by him.)

(This was Andy's fault. He'd been the one to start this. Dean was positive the kid was somehow to blame for the one door he'd dared to open in Heaven leading to more friggin' gay porn.)

He needed to get the hell out of these endless hallways. Especially since there was no way he was risking opening any more doors, which left him nothing but hallway. Endless, endless hallway. Dean needed to find the place with the angels. Wherever that was. Of course, him walking into a room filled with nothing but angels was gonna be the equivalent of Sam walking into a stripper joint just to order a salad. In other words, yelling "Look at me, I don't belong here!" at the top of his lungs and hoping to get a Caesar with tasty croutons out of it.

A bridge to be crossed (or straight up lit on fire) when he got to it, Dean supposed. Which he currently hadn't, cuz he wasn't gonna find an angel in these parts.

Which was the reasoning Dean would be giving anyone who might ask him later why he screamed like a little girl – "I didn't do it!" – shoulders hunched like a kid caught with his hand in the cookie jar, when a female voice shouted his name with sound and fury. Dean barely had time to spin around before he was being tackled into the wall, pinned against the glowing surface by an irate angel.

He blinked at the familiar face.

"Rachel?"

"I told you to wait for me!" she practically yelled, one hand shoved against his shoulder, keeping him pressed to the wall, the other firmly on his wrist, which he'd started to raise in some futile hope of self-defense. "You couldn't wait one hour for me to find Castiel? You reckless, self-centered, suicidal-"

"Hey, I was waiting!" Dean asserted loudly in self-defense, raising his other hand up, fingers spread in pure innocence. "I don't know how I ended up here! I just woke up and-" he flapped that hand, flashing his fingers open and closed like jazz hands- "here I was! I figured…why waste it?"

Rachel released the human even as he shrugged his free shoulder in sheer nonchalance. Was…was he serious? This human managed to get himself killed within ten minutes of Rachel leaving him, and he'd just…woken up in Heaven, essentially realized he was dead, and his first thought was to break out and find Castiel himself?

Who was this man? Besides that point, how? That wasn't even supposed to be possible!

"So…did you find him?" Dean asked.

Rachel a raw noise that the human easily interpreted as annoyance – could practically see her ruffled feathers – but she did withdraw from his personal space. She composed herself, tugging at the ends of her blazer.

"I was searching for Uriel when I heard of your death and had to go searching for you instead."

Dean beat back the flash of guilt at those words. This was not his fault, he hadn't planned to die. But, like he said, he wasn't wasting it, either.

"Uriel?"

"I was hoping he would lead me to Castiel."

"Great. That makes sense." Dean clapped his hands together. "So where is he?"

Rachel tried not to be irritated by the human but failed. Mostly, she failed. "I got a quick sense of his location earlier. He was in the Paradises, adding credence to my suspicions that he is hiding Castiel in a set of human memories."

Dean tried not to snort. He tried. He, too, mostly failed. He bit down on the inside of his cheek, instead.

The angel eyed him for a moment, her explanation on pause, before she continued without comment. "He was in the G's. I know the approximate location. We will split up and search the rooms."

Dean winced at the idea, though not for any reason Rachel could discern or guess. But then he was nodding and looking around, so she didn't concern herself any further with it.

"Alright, let's go. Lead the way."

Rachel stared at the human, long enough for Dean to start wondering if she was gonna blink or just let her eyes get, all, like, dried out. What she was actually contemplating was whether or not to return him to his human Paradise. Taking him with her was nothing but an unnecessary risk. However…Rachel got the feeling she should not surrender him to Zachariah's men. Though she did not know why.

"You are a liability," she finally insisted, though even Dean could sense her hesitancy.

"You're wrong."

The angel blinked at the human's rapid-fire and, frankly, preposterous response. Dean stepped forward, bringing his face surprisingly close to her own. Rachel regarded the move – possibly a method of intimidation in his species? – with curiosity.

"Just point me in the right direction and I'll find Cas myself. If you're so worried about my dead weight than fine. Seeya."

Rachel's face flickered towards annoyance. She supposed the feeling of not handing him over to Zachariah was coming from the man's own blatant stubbornness. If he was this determined to locate Castiel, Rachel had a growing suspicion her friend and superior would be equally irritated to learn she left Dean Winchester behind. Knowing her commander as well as she did, Castiel would likely insist they immediately return for the wayward human. Which would prove troublesome if Zachariah located him first.

"Very well," the angel sighed. "It will be faster if we fly. I will carry you."

"Uh, yeah, no."

Dean immediately stepped back out of her space, putting himself against the wall once more since Rachel had never given him much space away from it to start with. She wondered if this action, too, was a human custom: to immediately yield intimidation upon success. It seemed…counterproductive to her.

With the wall pressed flush to his spine, Dean didn't have many other movement options – and he needed to move, apparently – than to slide awkwardly to his left a couple steps. He stepped into the hallway beside her, the angel turning to face him every inch of the way. God, she was as awkward as Cas had first been. Even more so, cuz she wasn't Cas.

"I'm good with walking. I've got legs, I'll use 'em. You should too, or you're gonna get flabby."

With that, he clapped his hands together and looked left and right down the hallway they were currently in. Rachel just stared at him.

"So…is it this way, or, uh, that way?"

-o-o-o-

"Angels do not get 'flabby.'"

Dean blinked at the woman walking alongside him, voice as stiff and taught as her posture. The defensive tone alone would have had Dean choking back a laugh if they weren't in a somewhat time-sensitive and kinda dire situation. Still, he had to bite back the snort that was desperate to slip free.

"You might not, but your vessel will."

Rachel gave him a sidelong glance, head tilting ever so slightly in a way that was just reminiscent enough of Cas to make Dean's chest ache. What was it with all the angels on his side pulling that move? Was it just the equivalent of 'I'm-actually-innocent-and-well-intentioned-unlike-the-majority-of-my-dick-family' in angelic body language? Or was it a thing that Cas had, like, taught his people?

"I am not currently in possession of a vessel."

Dean sorta tripped over his own feet and blamed a crack in the absolutely crack-less tiles they were walking across. He straightened back up and stared at the angel with incredulous eyes as they kept up the quick pace. "You mean you actually look like a middle-aged Martha with three kids and a minivan?"

The look Rachel gave him was something between 'I have no idea what you just said' and 'I am perfectly aware you just insulted me, you little ingrate', but what came out of her mouth, with a curious lilt and none of the sarcasm, was, "What do I look like to you?"

The human had to cycle through several inappropriate or not-as-funny-as-they-would-be-if-said-to-just-about-anyone-else responses and settled instead with the truth. "A middle aged woman named Martha with three kids and a minivan."

That look definitely shifted more towards the 'You're insulting me and I'm going to kill you slowly*, ingrate*' end of the scale. Dean shrugged, only a little apologetically.

"You look like a normal lady. Caucasian, about five seven, maybe, without the heels? You've got brown hair, green eyes." The hunter fidgeted as they kept up the quick walk, feeling more than a little odd describing to an angel what she looked like.

"The vessel I possessed when I spoke to you on Earth," Rachel confirmed, nodding.

Dean glared at her. "That's what I said."

The angel regarded him again, sidelong, before nodding once more – just a single, sharp bob of her head up and down – this time in concession. Dean wanted to roll his eyes, realizing that because he had not, literally, said those words in that order to her, she hadn't connected the dots. God, angels, man.

"As I said, I am not currently possessing Sonya Salomaa." The angel took a sharp right, practically cutting into Dean, who was on her right and ended up muttering under his breath to give a guy some warning next time. He opened his mouth to ask why she looked like her vessel then, but Rachel cut him off. "I can only assume you are viewing Heaven through the limits of your previous body."

The hunter stared at her. "Huh?"

"It is your human perception. You are incapable of translating what you are seeing into anything that makes sense to a soul used to viewing its surroundings through human eyes." When he just continued to stare, she sighed. "Basically, your current existence has only ever experienced the world through light waves translated into readable data by your severely limited human brain-"

"Hey, watch it, lady."

"-and your soul, which can see much more than your human eyes ever could, doesn't know any other way to tell you what you're seeing." Rachel concluded her (frankly insulting) explanation with a firm nod, like she'd solved cold fusion.

Dean was caught between glaring and admitting that that sort of made sense.

"So…what am I actually seeing?" He both did and did not want to know. Of course, curiosity won out as he looked around the endless hallways of white, white, and more white. And then Rachel. What did an angel's true form really look like? Dean had always sort of pictured Cas as a big, flowy, rainbow ghost the size of the Chrysler building.

Like those underwater aliens in The Abyss. Shiny, elegant, even goddamn pretty. And also utterly capable of eradicating life as they knew it, should they feel like it. Yup, definitely Cas in a nutshell, that one.

"If you were to embrace that you were nothing more than energy now? No body, no physicality, no eyes to see or brain to process?" Rachel gave him that sidelong look again and this time Dean did scoff at the judgement there. She didn't think he could do it. Well. He'd show her. Uh…if he felt like it. Later. The angel returned her gaze to the hallways, gesturing that they were taking the next left before she took it, this time. "You would see Heaven as it truly is. I have two faces, five limbs, and thirty-two eyes."

Dean didn't make the turn, stuttering to a dead halt and staring after the angel.

Rachel stopped when she realized her charge had and turned to look at him, blinking serenely. Like she was doing it all on purpose. "Oh, and a single pair of wings."

"What, some angels have more than just one?" Dean joked weakly, voice kinda cracking at the mental image her words had conjured.

She tilted her head to the side again and Dean resisted the urge to rub at a chest he apparently didn't actually have right now. Friggin' angels. "Of course. The Archangels have three."

"Three wings?" Dean pulled his head back, frown on full and eyes all squinty. Now she was definitely pulling his leg. He hadn't thought Rachel was capable of humor, to be honest. "How does that even physically make sense?"

"Three pairs," the angel corrected, that look sliding from judgmental to impatient. She gestured for the hallway. "We need to keep moving. Especially if you insist on walking there."

Dean started moving again, passing Rachel as quickly as he could and still reasonably call it a walk and not a run. He refused to look at her, to picture what she actually looked like past his human perception, despite the several times his eyes and brain tried it. And he definitely, definitely, absolutely wasn't thinking about what Castiel must really look like.

Nope. Nope, nope, nope. He was good with the human woman and trench-coat wearing man, thank you very much.

Walking alongside him once more, the corner of Rachel's lips twitched. Dean didn't know if he'd said it aloud or, because he apparently didn't have a mouth and was just a ball of cosmic energy, it even mattered. Either way, she'd clearly heard him, because she shrugged one shoulder in as close to amusement as he'd seen her yet.

"Like I said. Limited.'"

-o-o-o-

When he woke, Castiel was very surprised to do so. He had not expected to ever wake again. Or to be alive at all.

He was bound – coils of Uriel's grace pinning his wings to his main mass with his limbs all tangled together – and in a different Paradise then before. He seemed to be further into the memory, as well. His view of the doorway out to Heaven was obscured from his current position on the ground, behind a piece of furniture. The memory of humans and the one this Paradise belonged to moved about him, heedless of his presence.

Taking stock of his condition, Castiel realized with a pang of dismay that he was worse off than before he'd been forced into the second healing trance. He did not know if that was because very little time had passed – he had no way of judging how long he had laid unconscious – or because the healing trance itself had been damaging. Castiel had never before heard of a trance being used as an attack. He was uncertain of the ramifications of a non-consensual healing.

He also did not understand the point of his brother attacking him in such a way. Why had Uriel left him alive? Why attempt to further heal him? Perhaps his brother did not want to kill him where it would be so obvious or so quickly discovered. Perhaps Uriel and Malachi had plans to take Castiel down to earth and kill him there, and stashing him away in a Paradise under a healing trance was merely a holding pattern until they could accomplish this.

Due to the coils of his brother's grace firmly wrapped around him, binding his grace as surely as they bound his physical form, Castiel could do nothing but wait to find out.

He felt so very foolish. Miserably so. Dean had warned him about this very thing happening, and yet Castiel still trusted the wrong angel. They were his family. His brothers. Though it pained him now to see the truth behind that familial term Uriel used in their last conversation, the larger angel had not been wrong. They had once been brothers in arms. Castiel had fought alongside Uriel more times than he could count. Perhaps more times than he wanted to count. While the two of them had their differences when it came to the manner in which they performed their duties, how they interpreted their father's words and superiors' orders, the two angels fought well together. They worked well together.

Did they not?

Were all the memories Castiel had of working beside his brother false? Implanted in his mind to cover countless times just like this, when he had discovered Uriel's true nature and rebelled against it? After all, Castiel's memories of their mission in Egypt, in Sodom and Gomorrah, were incorrect and he and Uriel had worked together then. Was it possible all his memories of his brother were false? Could Uriel have been a traitor all along, and Castiel was the one who caught him, countless times? But then, why was it Castiel who was punished? Castiel whose memories were removed and replaced to be something they were not?

The angel's injured, pale grace lost what color it had left, leaving him a quivering puddle of liquid light. Ugly grey and dull, pooling on the carpet of a dead human's precious memories.

How could Uriel be in the right and Castiel the one disciplined?

Overwhelming emotion collected in Castiel's chest, pushing at his insides, expanding his damaged grace, making him feel like the skin he didn't have was too tight. The swirls of his grace began to churn and toss together. He felt vaguely nauseous. Castiel was not used to such devastating sensation; he did not know what to do with it. Panic was not an acute experience for him, not really, but this was reminding him of the last time he had been in Heaven. The last time he had started to feel as though the walls were closing in. The last time he had felt like something was wrong with him.

How could Uriel be right and Castiel the one built wrong?

"He's not right," the smaller angel spoke aloud. The sound of his own voice was bolstering in the quiet, and so Castiel said it again, "Uriel isn't right."

Even if it turned out that Castiel was wrong – that this was not the path God wanted him on, that he was disobeying – that did not make Uriel right. Castiel may not know what his path was supposed to be. He may be 'winging it' as Dean and Angela would say. But he knew that raising Lucifer was not right. Uriel was not right.

Strengthened by the revelation, Castiel's determination to escape his brother's confines increased tenfold. Unfortunately, there was still very little he could do while bound, and he had yet to conceive an escape from his fetters. It was possible to find the door back to Heaven while restrained, using what he could physically see, rather than sense it with his grace, but it would take time. Worse yet, he was in no condition to be walking about Heaven. Even if he did manage to escape either the bindings around his wings or around his legs long enough to actually fly or walk the hallways, his grace was still quite damaged, and Castiel feared he would not make it far. Especially when he no longer trusted himself to recognize friend from foe.

Still. Those were not reason enough not to try. If he could find the door, perhaps he could find a brother not aligned with Uriel or Zachariah who would be willing to assist him. He had to try. For Dean.

Castiel attempted to get himself upright. It was difficult, between his injured grace, weakened state, and bound position. But he had to try. He needed to get back to Dean, to apologize for making him worry, for not listening, not heeding his warning. And to warn him about the extent of corruption in Heaven, something Castiel feared even Dean might not realize the true depths of.

Castiel had to escape. For Dean and Sam, for the coming Apocalypse, and the world.

The angel had not yet leveraged himself into a seated position, trying to brace his mass against the back of the upholstered furniture, when the sound around him shifted tellingly. The noises of the memory – of the life in a living room held precious to one human soul – became dull and muted and the sounds of Heaven became loud and encompassing.

Someone had opened the door to this Paradise. Uriel had returned.

Castiel froze, back pressed to the couch at an awkward, half-slumped angle. He raised his bound limbs above his head, prepared to attack. Footsteps landed, soft and mostly silent, along the carpet. The angel could feel them almost more than he could hear them. They moved slowly, cautiously around the far edge.

Uriel must know he was awake. He must have sensed his return to consciousness, monitoring him still. The thought, which Castiel had once found comforting, now sent shivers through his grace.

Something metallic was moved, a light screeching as something hollow but made of metal moved across the floor. Castiel tilted his head to listen, but he could not make out what part of the human memory had been adjusted. Then the footsteps resumed, more readily this time.

The sounds of Heaven beyond remained strong and Castiel blinked in surprise. His brother had left the door open. The angel took the equivalent of a human breath, first in realization and welcome relief. Then deep and calming, forcing the churning of his grace to settle. Uriel had left the door propped open for some reason. Which meant Castiel had one chance to overtake the other angel and make it to the door. He could lock Uriel inside the memory and find help.

One chance, and it was a slim one.

A shadow moved along the side of the carpet to his left and Castiel readied himself. He gathered his legs beneath him, prepared to launch himself at his brother as soon as Uriel rounded the edge of the couch.

-o-o-o-

The cab idled about a quarter mile from the listed address, which happened to be in the middle of nowhere. The driver glanced around, then at the meter, and then his fare in the backseat.

"You sure this is where you wanna get out?"

Sam dug through his wallet for a couple bills, reaching over the front seat to hand them to the guy. "Yeah, this is good. Thanks."

He climbed out of the taxi, shutting the door and watching the driver hesitate, then shift into reverse and start backing down the single-lane paved road they'd found themselves on for the last thirteen minutes of the drive.

Middle of nowhere. Perfect for a trap, especially one involving a grenade.

Sam took a deep breath, pulling out the note from his brother and checking the back, where he'd scribbled down the address beneath Ava's phone number. 5637 Monroe Street. He stared at it for a moment, wondering if this was just what she had seen him do in her vision, before Sam pulled out his phone and hit the first speed dial. Dean didn't answer, the call ringing until it went to voicemail, and Sam hung up.

The hunter started down the dirt road, towards an abandoned house that was supposedly up ahead and on the right. A house that better have his brother – alive – inside.

Chapter End Notes

A/N: Way nicer cliffhanger this time, no? Like…two baby cliffhangers. Itty-Bitty-Cliffies! I don't think I will ever top the killing-Dean-via-Sniper-Gordon cliffhanger again. All other cliffhangers shall look so small and gentle in comparison from here on out XD

(Actually…there is one more planned waaaaay down the line that might just top it, but we've got a long way to go for that one ;D)

Fun Fact #576: Dean definitely tried to picture Rachel's thirty-two eyes as being entirely contained on her two faces when, in fact, her eyes are all over her body and wings. XD Poor Dean. Thirty-two eyes on just two faces would be a creepy sight.

Spider angels. On eye steroids.

Fun Fact #577: Although I have seen several artistic renditions of angels with eyes all over their body before, it was a Supernatural Fanfic (of which I have not been able to find again, unfortunately) that really got me to embrace it here. In that one Cas had multiple eyes, many on his wings, and the author put in one line, one incredible line, about how Dean always got annoyed when Cas wasn't looking at him when he talked, but what the human didn't understand was that Cas was always looking at him, just not always with the two eyes Dean could see. I looooooooved that line and appreciated how the author fully embraced angels as being 'other.' So that was the inspiration for all the angel eyes in TRSF :) If I ever find that story again, I'll add it as a note.

Up Next: Dean is not happy to be stuck opening more Paradise doors ('Please don't be more gay porn, please don't be more gay porn'), Castiel is fighting for his life, tackling that douchebag Uriel straight outta Paradise and back into Heaven, and getting rescued by his own charge (not necessarily in that order), while Gordon's setting up shop (and by that, I mean grenades. He's setting up grenades).

Chapter 93: Season 2: Chapter 60

Chapter Notes

A/Ns: Sorry for the delay from my usual Sunday posting time. Truth is, I've been off work for a while to recover from burnout/ stress/depression, and I go back for the first time tomorrow. I thought I was doing okay until I woke up as a giant, seething, writhing ball of anxiety and anger, stomach somewhere in my lungs, lungs competing in a speed race with my heart. Fun times! I probably should have realized something was gonna happen when I didn't get this chapter edited at all this weekend or doany of the stuff I have to do before returning to work tomorrow.

Reviews: Uh, on that note, if you all could be extra kind and giving today (if you're able to spare it) I would really appreciate it. I haven't gotten back to any of you yet, but I'll pencil in another chapter on the to-do list, and I will get to it. Lately every time I open up my laptop to reply to reviews, the Muse is like, 'Free time? Let's WRITE.' Not the end of the world, certainly, but it does mean I'm very behind on answering any of you (but well ahead of my chapter stockpile, which is GREAT considering a return to work is gonna seriously limit my free time)

P.S. On the subject of reviews, we're only 25 reviews away from out back-to-back chapter reward over on ff dot net. So if you all want to overwhelm me with reviews, you'll get something out of it, too! :D

Poking: Thanks for those that nudged me today. Always feel free to do it, guys, I never mind. On occasion it's a memory lapse (like over Christmas), but more often than not a missed or late update usually means something's up in my world, and I will never take you guys reaching out as a negative thing (unless you're just being rude or demanding about not getting an update :P But none of you have been that way at all) I love that you like this story enough to actually seek it out (it really improves my headspace and always will) and those of you that reach out to make sure I'm okay are incredibly appreciated.

Alright, enough A/Ns, let get this story rolling!

Chapter Warnings: Gordon's prepping preparations, Dean's opening doors, and Cas is very much surprised about many things. Oh, and Uriel's a pussy ;)

Actual Chapter Warnings: Cas and Dean have a heart-to-heart guilt fest that is totally ruined when Cas asks how just how exactly Dean got to Heaven.

See the end of the chapter for more notes

-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-

The Road So Far (This Time Around)

Season 2: Chapter 60

-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-

Gordon crossed the length of the back door incredibly carefully, stretching the second trip wire tight across the entryway, only an inch and a half above the old, rotting floorboards. He twisted in his crouched position, very slowly securing the end of the wire to the second grenade he'd positioned about six feet further into the room than the first.

Sam was a good enough hunter to spot the first trip wire, Gordon figured. He wasn't one to underestimate his enemy, after all. Also, if that demon had been telling the truth, than the kid might be as psychic as his brother, and Gordon needed to prepare for that possibility.

But no one ever expected the second, and that's how he'd get him.

The hunter withdrew from the setup slowly, double checking the concealment and security of his trap from a safe position several feet away. Satisfied, Gordon returned to the main room of the house, what had probably once been a living room. He picked up his rifle from a dangerously leaning dining room table, the thing rocking with the weight change. Grabbing the most stable chair he'd managed to find in the house, Gordon dragged it over to the wall beside the kitchen entrance. That wall, dilapidated as it was, would serve as both cover from Sam Winchester when he entered through the back door and protection from the grenade, should any debris make it so far. Gordon settled into the rickety thing, a Winchester M70 rifle in lap (a fitting – almost poetic – choice of guns to take out the last of the Winchester hunting line, Gordon figured), and started idly cleaning it with a cloth.

He checked the time on Dean's phone, still covered in the Winchester's dried blood. Sam had shot a quick 'On my way.' back about thirty minutes ago now. Which meant he'd be scoping the building any time now. He'd spot Gordon waiting with his rifle, eyes on the front door, and decide to try his luck with the back entrance.

All Gordon Walker had to do was wait.

-o-o-o-

"This is the approximate location of where I last sensed Uriel," Rachel announced when they were about a quarter of the way down their most recent hallway. The G's, apparently.

Dean couldn't believe people – modern people, given the dates on the doors – were still naming their kids Garfield. You'da thought that shit would have stopped after the fat cat cartoon. Definitely after the Bill Murry movie.

"It is likely Castiel is hidden in one of these Paradises. We will split up to search and meet in the middle."

Rachel took wing before the hunter got any say in the matter. She vanished in the blink of an eye according to Dean's 'limited' human perception, reappearing about fifty doors down. Within seconds, she disappeared again, this time into one of the paradises. Dean gave an irritated grunt – angels – and turned towards the first door on his left, mumbling about flabbiness. He reached out, fingers curling hesitantly around the silver knob.

"Don't be gay porn, don't be gay porn," Dean muttered under his breath, mental fingers crossed as well before he twisted the knob and pushed the door in.

Well, there weren't moans, panting, or anything wet sounding in the room, so that was a good first step. Hesitantly, the hunter stuck his head in just past the door edge, glancing around at the Paradise. It was nice, actually. A warm and inviting and totally, utterly normal living room free of orgies of any sort. A family was seated the dining room table in the next room for what looked like Thanksgiving dinner. No, Christmas; there was a tree in the corner across from the door Dean was hiding behind. Much better than Humphrey's happiest (read: humpiest) memory, that's for sure.

But empty of an angel. Dean scanned the room: the neatly organized coffee table with a set of treys and a decorative box on the bottom shelf, the L-shaped couch with perfectly positioned pillows and a throw tossed over the back, the bookshelves that lined the wall with a half desk in between, the tree with unwrapped presents tucked beneath in neat piles, one for each member of that family currently sitting at the dining table.

No angel, no signs of a struggle, nothing suspicious in the slightest,

Dean hesitated, hand still wrapped around the knob, body partially hidden behind the safety of the door. He didn't know why, but he had the distinct urge to search the room. Almost like the room was drawing him in, though the hunter was pretty sure that was just his conscience trying to get him out of searching more (potentially mentally traumatizing) rooms. That, or maybe human memories were designed to pull you in or something.

(Nope, no, nope, not that. That definitely wasn't a thing. Dean hadn't felt anything resembling pulling on that last door he'd opened. Abso-fucking-lutely not. He'd gone sprinting as far from that room as physically possible as quickly as possible. There was no pull.)

But maybe Uriel had hid Cas's body or something. Alive, Dean added hastily. Definitely alive, just hidden. In case someone came looking for the angel. It was worth checking, right?

Feeling like an intruder (which was total bullshit because how many houses and lives had he broken into with complete confidence (and the person who owned this one was dead)), the hunter slipped into the room quietly. He was careful not to shut the door, worried he might not find it again (it sounded like a silly thing, but Dean knew these memories didn't always function like you expected them to. Sometimes you closed a door only to re-open it to a completely different room. He didn't have time for some Labyrinth level crap right now). So he grabbed an umbrella stand – the closest thing to him – and shoved it between the door and the frame with his foot. Then he started poking around carefully, just to make sure there wasn't an angel hiding behind a piece of furniture or locked in a back room.

If Dean was trying to hide Cas from everyone else, he wouldn't just leave her tied up on the couch to be found by the first person to open a door.

(Him tied up? Damnit, he'd just gotten a handle on the friggin' pronouns and Rachel had to go and fuck that up for him too.)

Of course, Dean wasn't Uriel (translation: he wasn't a dick), so he didn't expect to actually find anything when he rounded the edge of the couch. He definitely didn't expect to have his legs taken out from under him by a blur of tan and black flying out from behind the piece of furniture. It collided into his lower half with the force of a damn bulldozer.

Dean went down hard and that ball of tan went with him.

Hunter instinct and years of fighting for his life kicked in immediately. Dean rolled his assailant until he'd pinned the guy beneath him. He didn't have a weapon up here in Heaven, but Dean had been a hunter a long time, now; his body could be the weapon, need be. He pressed his forearm down onto the throat of his attacker, his other hand fisting in black hair. Messy, black hair and blue…. Blue eyes. The bluest blue that stared up at him with such shock, so wide and almost innocent but never quite innocent enough, that Dean froze, just staring into them. He knew those eyes. Knew that blue that he still dreamed about some nights. Those were Jimmy Novak's eyes, set into Jimmy Novak's face, on a Jimmy Novak body, complete with blue tie, black suit, and tan trench coat. Just like Jimmy Novak.

The man from the future could only stare, shocked brainless, at the face of his best friend still pinned beneath him.

"D'n!"

His bound, gagged best friend, who he was currently straddling, hair fisted in his hand, and arm pressing down dangerously hard on his neck.

"Holy shit. Cas!" Dean pulled back as the world suddenly sped up, his brain kicked into overdrive to make up for its pathetic delay, and the world decided to make sense again. He scrambled off the angel, who was restrained at the wrists, torso, legs, and ankles, all wrapped in at least five coils of glowing rope. There was a fold of fabric secure around his mouth and neck, effectively muting him.

Dean hesitated for a second, hands hovering over his friend's body, searching for injuries he didn't even know if he'd be able to see here.

Damn Rachel for getting into his head with that shit.

Oh, right. Rachel.

"Rachel!" Dean hollered, stretching his neck to get his head above the side-sectional, which Cas had tackled them behind. "He's in here!"

The hunter started tugging at the glowing ropes around Cas's wrists, not waiting for the other angel. He didn't even know if Rachel would hear him from a good fifty feet down the hall. She probably wouldn't if she was in one of the Paradises. But he didn't have time to worry about that now.

"Rayful?"

Dean cursed, realizing the ropes around Cas might be a priority, but the gag was limiting. He reached for what looked like normal fabric and frowned when he couldn't find a knot anywhere. Dean started with the back of Cas's head, becoming increasingly confused as he moved his hand along the cloth and couldn't find any sort of tie or bind of any kind.

What the hell?

"Full!" Cas tried to say, but it was utterly muffled by the fabric. He tossed his head, pulling out of Dean's hands. When the hunter tried to grab the fabric again, Cas tossed his head once more, and Dean frowned. "Full!"

"Damnit, Cas, I can't understand you. That's why I'm trying to take the damn thing off in the first place," Dean growled, latching onto the gag once more. This time, Cas pulled his head back quickly and Dean froze as the fabric stretched. Like it was putty.

"What…the…"

Dean didn't waste time asking any more questions. Pull. Cas was telling him to pull. Blue eyes met his and the hunter nodded. He grabbed either side of the gag and stretched the thing – which had definitely been tight across Cas's lips – up and over the angel's head.

Cas coughed as it came free, licking his lips and taking deep breaths through his mouth. Dean looked at the fabric in his hands, which had somehow defied physics seconds ago but was now back to being just fabric. When the whole thing started to shimmer very suspiciously, Dean dropped it like a hot potato. It dissolved into nothing more than light, which fizzled down and out against the carpeted ground, like friggin' fairy dust.

"Okay, what the hell!"

"Grace," Cas supplied, trying to sit up and failing given how constrictive the bindings here. He was tied up like rope had been on sale. "Uriel bound me with his grace. Whatever you are seeing it as, it isn't."

"Yeah. Rachel warned me about that," Dean muttered, rubbing his hands on his jeans like he could wipe off the reminder of touching Uriel's grace. The dude definitely seemed like the type you could catch something from.

"Rachel," Cas repeated again. Now that he could speak, the confusion and incredulity were clear. They were pretty damn clear in those big, blue eyes, too, but Dean didn't have time to be making eye contact. He was busy trying to find a knot in a knotless coil of rope around the angel's wrists.

"Yeah, Rachel. I had to call one of your buddies to come get you. Rachel's the one that answered." Dean's tone was chiding and Cas was momentarily distracted from the fact that Dean was here, in Heaven – that Rachel had gone to Earth, collected Dean, and brought him here – by the fact that Dean was chastising him for being unreachable.

Which, given the panic that had been in the back-to-back prayers the man had sent him endlessly for many days, at least, Castiel couldn't really find fault in that.

"I'm sorry," were the first words out of his mouth, rather than the far more pressing matters they really should be discussing.

Dean's fingers faltered on the rope, stilling as he stared at his friend's bound hands. He finally looked up, green meeting blue, and swallowed roughly. All that fear he'd been feeling, all that panic he'd been desperately pushing to the side this past week and a half, came gurgling up. He'd been right to be afraid. Cas had been in danger, he was friggin' tied up and hidden away for god-knows-what Uriel had planned.

But right now he was alive. Okay. And right there, in front of Dean and going home with him.

The hunter wrapped his arms around Cas before he had time to talk himself out of it, pulling the angel into a crushing hug.

"What did I tell you about talking to strange angels, man?" he muttered into his friend's neck, a fresh wave of emotion over-coming him at the familiar – and missed – texture of Jimmy Novak's trench coat.

Castiel, who seemed to miss the bitterly sarcastic edge to what was supposed to be a joke but had missed by about a mile, lowered his forehead against Dean's shoulder, unable to reciprocate in any other form while bound. "Uriel's betrayal was…unexpected."

The guy's tone was crushing and Dean closed his eyes, beating back that second round of emotion. He remembered the way Cas had looked at him lying in that hospital, while he was wired up to more tubes and drugs than he'd ever been before. That angel had been stunned, having to acknowledge his brother's betrayal. Stunned and hurting.

Which sounded right about on track with the angel in his arms now.

"I'm sorry, too, Cas," Dean tightened his hold for a second, taking a deep breath before he pulled away from the angel. Lucky for him, this Cas didn't know the appropriate length of man hugs, so he wouldn't have anything to say about this one going on for far too long. And no one else was around to see it, so as far as Dean was concerned, they could all just fuck off.

Deep blue eyes were still locked on him, leaning back against the couch since Cas couldn't keep himself upright without Dean's assistance. There was a serious uncertainty in those eyes telling the hunter he didn't understand why Dean was the one apologizing.

"I should have warned you," he clarified, throat all sorts of clogged with self-loathing and frustration. "I should have told you about Uriel, remembered that he was a threat. I should have given you a list of angels you can't trust."

"Would Malachi have been on that list?" Cas's bitter growl was low, his gaze ducking away in frustration of his own. The angel had had plenty of time, tied up and expecting death, to be disgusted by his own poor judgement.

"The anarchist guy?" Dean countered with a raised brow and clear skepticism in his voice, which immediately drew the angel's attention back. Cas honestly hadn't expected him to know Malachi's name. "Yeah, Cas, he was on the list. What, the anarchist part didn't give it away?"

Cas looked away, this time in definite shame and self-loathing. As Dean went back to pulling at the rope around his wrists, the angel muttered, both defensively and bitterly, "Uriel trusted him."

Resisting the urge to sigh, Dean closed his eyes for a moment and reminded himself that this wasn't the Cas he knew. This wasn't his Cas, even if he (she?) looked like him. Not yet, anyway. This place was still this Cas's home. Those angels were his family and he wanted to believe in them. Knowing everything Dean and Sam had conquered because they were family, the hunter couldn't really be angry at his friend. Angry this had happened, sure, but not because Cas wanted to believe in his brothers.

"I should have given you names," Dean muttered again, countering Cas's guilt with guilt of his own. Well, anger, in this case, but it was backed by guilt and they both knew it.

"It likely wouldn't have mattered." The angel's voice sounded resigned. Dean found his gaze darting up again, but Cas was still staring at his bound wrists. "Given your lack of surprise at Uriel's betrayal…. Time is asserting itself to make sure the same things happen that should happen. It is likely that even if you had warned me, a confrontation with Uriel was inevitable."

Dean made an annoyed noise in the back of his throat (a growl, it was called a growl, only Dean didn't want to admit he was growling at the angel he was currently rescuing. Well. Trying to rescue). The weird rope wrapped around the angel was not stretching and pulling like the gag no matter how much the hunter tugged. He shook Cas's wrists with it until the angel met his eyes. "Hey, don't start talking about inevitably and destiny or any of that shit, alright? Cuz I don't believe in that crap and neither should you."

His angel just stared at him and Dean smirked.

"We're re-writing the book, remember?" Then he went back to pulling at the damn glowing rope. There was just no give on these. Didn't Cas say they were made of the same stuff, damnit? "How the hell do I get these off you, Cas?"

"They are made of grace," the angel repeated (what Dean already knew, the hunter muttered unhelpfully). This time though his tone sounded a lot more matter-of-fact about it and Dean got a bad feeling. "Only another angel can undo it."

"Bullshit. I got the gag off, didn't I?"

Cas huffed and Dean was happy to hear a little bit more of that holier-than-thou angel he knew and loved. He didn't like seeing the more subdued version of his friend, talking about events they couldn't escape no matter what they did. It rang with the bitter taste of a deadbeat dad and an entire liquor store consumed in one go.

"That is not the same thing," Cas argued, still huffy. All the better for it, Dean thought. "The gag was…the equivalent of a balled up cloth shoved in my mouth. All you had to do was pull it out."

Dean glared pretty damn deadpanned at his unhelpful (and ungrateful) angel. He held up Cas's wrists by a single finger hooked under the rope binding them together. "So how do I pull this one out?"

Blue eyes glared right back at him for being purposefully difficult. Which, hey, Dean didn't think was fair. He was not the one being difficult, here. "You can't. Grace is…intent, Dean. It is not untied, it is…'canceled out' with a different intention. Only another angel can do that."

"Yeah, well, we'll just see about that," Dean bit out between clenched teeth. He decided if he couldn't slide the rope over Cas's hands like he'd been trying, maybe he could break it. It wasn't really rope after all, right? The human wrapped his hands around two sections and started to pull in opposite directions.

"Dean, stop, it is physically imposs-"

The rope snapped in half almost immediately, enough so that Dean ended up on his ass from a serious misjudgment of force and balance. Cas's wrists came apart as the rope dissolved into lights and fairy dust once more.

Dean sat back up in a flurry, eyes wide and jaw hanging open. It morphed into a grin in no time, and he scrambled back to his knees, shoving a finger at Cas, who was staring wide-eyed at his wrists. "Ha!"

The last of Uriel's grace dissolved, leaving the angel sitting, stunned, in four more coils of the glowing restraints. But his arms were free, which shouldn't be possible. Blue eyes focused past his freed limbs to lock on his human charge and, apparently, his rescuer. "How?"

"Uriel's a pussy."

Castiel did not know what a pussy was, but given Dean's wide grin and the context, he was fairly confident the human was calling his brother weak. "I assure you he is not."

Uriel was one of the strongest angels in Castiel's Flight. The only reason he could best the larger angel in a fight was due purely to Castiel's speed and skill with a blade.

"What does it matter?" Dean shrugged, already reaching out for the next set of bindings. But Castiel stopped him. His now-freed limb shot out to spread, palm outward and flat, across Dean's chest. The hunter froze, breath catching, as he waited (prayed) for that flare of something inside him to respond. He waited for the usual front flips and back flips and that warmth he'd desperately been missing for a week and a half now.

Nothing happened.

Dean clenched his fists to hide the fact that his whole damn arms trembled with loss. Cas didn't seem to notice. The angel, bound as he was, could not currently access his grace, which meant he could not sense Dean as he usually would. He could only go off of what he could see in the human soul before him.

"Perhaps…" The angel shook his head, withdrawing his hand. Dean tried and failed not to expect the flagging complaint from his chest on the withdrawal. He was severely disappointed when he didn't get it, and brutally shoved that feeling down as damn deep as it could go. "Perhaps the sliver of grace is enough to break Uriel's binds. But I am very surprised."

And concerned. It was bad enough that a fraction of his grace had entangled with Dean's soul enough to live symbiotically in his human body. But Dean did not have a body right now, yet there was Castiel's grace, still curled within the Hell-Scar that marred Dean's soul. The edges of that sliver blended in with the brilliance of the soul enough so that Castiel had to look just to see it at all.

The attachment his future self's grace seemed to have taken with the Righteous Man's soul was…disconcerting. For both for them.

It did explain, at least in one possibility, how Dean was able to break Uriel's bindings. With the presence of grace within Dean's soul, the human might register as another angel, at least to Uriel's detached grace. An angel's grace was not sentient in such a way that it would be able to determine Dean as an imposter when confronted with enough of Castiel's essence entangled within him. It would also explain Dean's presence in a human Paradise that was not his own or his soulmate's (Sam, in this case.)

Disconcerting indeed, Castiel thought.

Dean seemed to agree. When Cas returned his focus to his rescuer, he realized the hunter was staring at him with more intensity than he'd displayed so far. His hand had closed the distance between them, grabbing at Castiel's freed limb with a desperately tight grip. Cas frowned at the distressed human. Perhaps he was finally realizing the dangers that sliver of grace presented.

"You mean…" Dean couldn't breathe right. He shouldn't even have to breathe here, but he definitely didn't seem to be doing it right. "He's still in there? Chest Cas is still alive?"

Castiel's look immediately shifted into something like confusion and uncertainty. Like he wasn't sure which to address first: the question or the name given to his slivered counterpart. "Yes. Nothing can kill an angel but another angel. What would make you think he was gone?"

The hunter practically deflated. In surprise, elation, joy, relief, and straight up annoyance because, "Are you kidding me?" Cas blinked at the exclamation, and Dean gestured wildly to himself. "You friggin' drained me like a battery, Cas! I got a black hole sitting behind my sternum! Of course I thought you'd absorbed him all or…something."

The angel, realizing his misstep that had led Dean to believe his… friend was gone (even if that friend posed serious risks to the human's soul and humanity), attempted to be more sympathetic. "I'm sorry, Dean. It is true that I took as much as I could; it was paramount to do so to defeat Azazel at the time. I know it was of great discomfort to you, but I did not realize you would think I had…taken my counterpart….um, chest…Cas from you."

"Dude, stop talking."

Cas followed the request, which was good because Dean couldn't take much more embarrassing chatter and heartfelt apologies.
From either party, since he was pretty much just as guilty. The feels in this place must be contagious (it was Heaven, he supposed). Dean dropped his eyes and hands back to the next set of ropes. They came apart as easily as he had the first ones.

"I'm not mad. I'm glad he's still in there." Thrilled, even, not that he'd ever admit it, because feels. Dean hesitated, manly inner manliness telling him to shut up and mouth trucking right on ahead. "And that you're okay, too."

Contagious and unstoppable apparently. Good grief. It was like forced confessions of a dead, time traveling hunter up in here.

Cas watched him as he pulled apart the next set of restraints like the angel knew there was something else Dean wasn't saying. The hunter didn't know if it was about the hole in his chest or the fact he was relieved to still have an angel soul all up in his. So Dean didn't ask and, thank fuck, Cas didn't push.

"I am more concerned how a sliver of grace that never should have been there in the first place is apparently so wrapped up in your soul it accompanied you to Heaven." The wide eyes, blank face of a Cas who hadn't figured out facial expression yet was almost comically. Dean snorted but opted not to comment. Would probably just get himself in trouble.

Cas allowed Dean to pull him upright. With just his thighs, knees, and ankles still wrapped up, the angel was able to hold himself in a sitting position without assistance while Dean finished undoing the last of the restraints. In the meanwhile, the hunter was trying his damnedest to ignore the current topic of conversation.

"Dean, the amount of influence it seems to have over your spiritual manifestation is dangerous. It's possible-"

"Hey, it's saving your skin right now, so just drop it," Dean growled defensively. Whelp, so much for ignoring the topic. Yeah, Dean had never been so great at keeping quiet or knowing when to shut up. He ripped apart the glowing grace rope from around Cas's thighs with a bit more viciousness than strictly needed, even for a douchenozzel like Uriel.

"I don't have skin," was the angel's response in exchange for 'dropping' it.

Dean froze, hands going for the rope around Cas's knees. Nope. Nope, nope, nope, he still wasn't going there. Still didn't want to know. Still just thinking about Cas looking like a human woman. Er, man. Whatever.

Luckily, Cas was not paying close enough attention to notice Dean's pause. "How did you get here, Dean? You appear to be just a human soul, but with my grace bound, I can't properly see you. Where is your body, and why would Rachel bring you here? That was an incredibly reckless decision."

"Wasn't Rachel's call." Dean unwound the fizzling light rope from Cas's knees, perfectly avoiding the angel's gaze with the task he didn't actually need to do considering the rope would dissolve itself completely. But if he was busy, maybe Cas would ignore what he was about to say. "I went and got myself killed."

He felt more than saw Cas go rigidly still. So much for that hope and dream.

"You…what?"

Dean shrugged, still refusing to look up even though he wasn't moving on to the other rope yet, either. It didn't help that Cas had drawn his legs into his chest in a defensive attempt to force this human to have this conversation. "Woke up here, figured I'd come looking for you. It's no big deal."

"You…" Castiel was starting to understand how Dean got angry when he was concerned. Cas was feeling very angry himself right now at the human's stupidity and, worse, indifference to said stupidity. "Are you insane?"

Green eyes snapped up to his with those words, brow furled angrily. "Me? Who the hell went up to Heaven with no back up, injured, and no ears on!"

Cas tried to hold that gaze, righteous in his own justified anger, but he could not. He was quickly learning that he was defenseless against those eyes when they were filled with such hurt and concern.

"I prayed for weeks, Cas." Okay, that was a slight exaggeration. It had only been a week and a half, but Dean didn't think he'd gone a whole ten minutes without praying that entire damn time. That, if nothing else (and there was so much else), made it feel like weeks.

"I…time moves differently here," Castiel said quietly, a pathetic defense and he knew it. "It has only been a matter of days. And I- I did not expect Uriel to…"

In front of him, the hunter deflated, anger fleeing in the face of Cas's guilt and regret. Dean's shoulders sagged and he finally looked away too, just as guilt-ridden for entirely different reasons. He really needed to learn to reign in that temper of his. Not that that was likely to happen anytime soon. "I know, Cas. Look, let's just get out of here before Uriel comes looking for you, alright?"

"Yes," Cas agreed with a nod, straightening his legs back out so that Dean could reach the binds wrapped around his ankles. "That would be best. Depending on how much attention he is paying to his grace and my own, Uriel may already be aware his restraints have dissolved."

Those hands froze on his ankles once again. When he met his charge's eyes, Dean was back to glaring. "Are you kidding me right now? Lead with that next time, Cas!"

The hunter frantically grabbed at the ropes, urgency now in every line of his body.

"It is very unlikely that he will be watching that closely-"

The door to the Paradise around them – the one Dean had propped open with the metal umbrella stand – burst open hard enough to bang into the wall and bounce back. Uriel stopped its movement with a meaty fist, expression furious as he took in the disturbed human memory of an empty living room and a family dining in the next room.

Behind the side sectional, Dean and Cas were frozen. The two of them currently hidden by the length of couch, he was pretty sure, but that wasn't gonna last long. All Uriel had to do was move about four feet to the left and they were gonna be in serious trouble.

His hands still wrapped around the last of the glowing rope, Dean clenched his teeth. Green eyes met Cas's shocked blue. Keeping his voice really low, Dean hissed out, "You were saying?"

Castiel's breath quickened as the hunter tore apart the last of the restraints binding his being. Grace flowed back into his wings with the sudden freedom, into each of his limbs and all of his being. Without hesitation, Castiel shot forward, wrapping himself around Dean in the kind of grip reserved for raising a soul from Perdition.

The angel burst out from behind the couch, human soul in his arms, and barreled past Uriel hard enough to send the angel flying back into the hallway with a thunderous crash.

Chapter End Notes

A/Ns: Omchuck, I don't think I have any notes. I can't tell if that's the anxiety or I just straight up doing have anything to say for once.

(...it's gotta be the anxiety. I don't know how NOT to talk.)

Up Next: I suppose I could do one of these. Hmmm, let's see. Dean and Cas are fleeing Heaven, Uriel is hot on their heels, Rachel is hot on his, and one of them isn't gonna make it. The gate's gonna take a beating, so is some poor field in Nebraska (or...somewhere). Cas is definitely still injured, Uriel's done giving him second chances, Rachel's in a completely different world of hurt, Dean's pulling his best Captain Kirk, and Sam's setting off grenades.

And, oh yeah, next chapter would be a most excellent time to get back-to-back posts. Because if all that ^ sounds like a lot, it absolutely is and it's gonna end abruptly, leaving you all like "WHERE'S THE NEXT ONE, DAMNIT" (I'm just guessing. I could be wrong ;)) So bring it on, ff dot netters! Get us over that milestone :D

A/Ns: There it is. There's the talking. See, half an hour focusing on this story, getting a chapter up and I already feel better. You guys are like my heroin or something (does heroin make you feel better? Ecstasy, maybe? You guys are my ecstasy)

(...Nope, nope, that sounds wrong. Let's stick with heroin.)

Till next time!

Cheers,
Silence

ADDITIONAL A/N, 12/21/2020 - Sam and Dean as soulmates: This is the problem with forgetting what you're going to say in your A/Ns. You forget to add stuff about important things, like calling Sam and Dean soulmates facepalm. Okay, so here's my reasoning on this (after several reviewers have been like "Hold up, wait a second!! Explain yourself!")

First, I'm sure hoping the last 600,000 words have displayed little to no interest in Wincest on my part. Even with the slowest of slow burns (which I am now known for), you'd still have picked up plenty of such a vibe. I've never been good at keeping undertones out of my writing XD

Second, I very strongly believe that soulmates can be platonic. Friends, siblings, cousins, and so forth. As someone who identifies as ACE and possibly Aro (still figuring that bit out), relationships that aren't romantic or sexual in nature are incredibly important to me and I often lament the fact that western society spares so little focus on those bonds.

Third, and most importantly, I really threw this into the story here and now because it was an itty bitty (potential) plothole in the show and I love filling in holes :P In the episode where Sam and Dean go to Heaven and follow the road to find Joshua, it did not make sense that Dean could leave his Heaven and find Sam's. Especially as they later point out that navigating paradises is hard and Ash's hacking of heaven's system is quite an impressive feat (a feat I very much loved!). They also specify that every soul has their own heaven, with a few exceptions of shared paradises, like in the case of soulmates. My head canon therefore accepted that Dean and Sam share a paradise, which is how Dean was able to cross into Sam's memories (and it makes sense that even when sharing a paradise, two people could have their own memories from time to time, reliving a cherished experience where the other wasn't present). Therefore, Sam and Dean must be soulmates. Which, honestly, with everything the show has showed us about their unending loyalty, love, and co-dependency on one another, really isn't all that surprising.

So, in conclusion [cuz this is obviously an essay], this story will remain Wincest free, as it is not a pairing I'm particularly fond of. However, it is a pairing I am particularly fond of making fun of, poking with a stick, handing that stick off to every other character on the show, etc. Some of my favorite spn moments definitely come from other characters mistaking the boys as a couple or Crowley endlessly making fun of the two for their codependence. I love those bits. So, while there will be no Wincest in this story, there will be plenty of characters poking fun at it now and then and I won't be shying away from the close (platonic) relationship they have and the fact that the show itself (sort of?) made them soulmates.

Cheers (again),
Silence

Chapter 94: Season 2: Chapter 61

Chapter Notes

A/Ns: Whelp, this season is officially twice as long as I thought it would be. Oi Vey. And, and, and we're not close to done with it. head thud

Milestone! Whelp, we did it! We have crossed that 2000th review on ff dot net. Thank you everyone who took the time to help, both this chapter and every chapter before it. YOU all keep this story alive. I'm very serious about that.

I wanted to get this chapter up this morning (Saturday) and the next tomorrow morning. Alas, along with returning to work and having significantly less free time, I did not realize I would have significantly less energy as well. I got no writing or editing done this week at all, leaving two chapters to be edited over the weekend. Le sigh.

The next chapter will be up tomorrow (Sunday) night, and that is still good, regardless of the timing being later than I would have originally liked.

Chapter Reference – Cas demoted: When Balthazar was killed and Cas returned to Heaven to await punishment, Zachariah demoted him and put Uriel in charge of their flight.
See Chapter32: Season 1 Interlude I for a refresher. Fun fact: you might remember this happened in the original timeline, too, but because of Cas's shifting priorities (aka: caring too much about his human charges :P)

Chapter Warnings: Rachel is chasing Uriel, Uriel is chasing Castiel, Castiel is gripping Dean Winchester tight, and Dean is screaming like a little girl because he's mother effing flying and that is not okay. Oh, yeah, and other things happen too, like craters and brush fires, and explosions going off, and shoes smoking. Ya know. A normal Tuesday. (Pretty sure it's Thursday...)

See the end of the chapter for more notes

-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-

The Road So Far (This Time Around)

-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-

Rachel was on her nineteenth door to yet another Human Paradise empty of her commanding officer when she heard the crash. Her first immediate thought was that Zachariah's men had found Dean Winchester. The second (far less credible) thought was that Dean Winchester had found Castiel. Because it was Castiel's energy she felt spike, along with the briefest flash of her commanding officer as he barreled down the hallway, Uriel in heated pursuit.

"Uriel!" Rachel yelled, both in alarm and abhorrence. She had not felt the second angel arrive in the Paradises, but she also had no longer been keeping an eye on his grace signature. Rachel took off after her two superior officers, realizing with a flash of terror that the energy coming off of Uriel now was volatile. Her fear of him harming Castiel had just become very real.

She had no time to wonder what had become of Dean Winchester in all of that, or check the paradise Castiel had come bursting out of. Having witnessed his commitment to Castiel first hand, she had no doubt the human was somehow still with the other angel.

-o-o-o-

They shot out from behind the couch with the kind of speed and force that Dean knew was gonna hurt like hell when they hit the ground. Honestly, the hunter's brain was still trying to catch up with Cas wrapping around him like a human octopus (angelic octopus?) and then launching himself (and therefore Dean) straight off the ground and over the back of the couch like they were liquid speed itself. All his limited human brain got out of any of that was that it was going to hurt like a son of a bitch when they hit the ground.

Only they never did.

They hit something, for sure, but it gave like flesh, grunting as they barreled past it and into the white, white, white of the hallway. Which they kept barreling down. That was about the point where Dean realized they were flying. Actually flying. Sure, he'd traveled Angel Air with Cas on more than one occasion, but this time, this time he could feel it. He could feel the air warping around them, his jacket flapping in the turbulence. He even got the distinct impression of wings on Cas, the high-frequency ruffle of feathers in wind, the great spans beating back air and gravity with each powerful flap. He couldn't see them – couldn't turn his head from where he was cradled into Cas's body (not cradled, that's friggin' girly), but he could still tell, somehow, that the wings were there. Like a presence, more than a reality. Something more for his human brain to deal with. Awesome.

When Dean managed to open his eyes against the buffeting winds, protected only somewhat by Cas's body wrapped around him like a trenchcoated cephalopod, he could barely make anything out as it blurred past. He caught a flash of something that looked like a gate before they were barreling right through it, Vin Diesel style. Dean braced for the impact, but Castiel took the brunt of it, with those impressions of wings suddenly wrapped around them like a downy cocoon. A downy cocoon battering ram. That was…pretty damn cool, actually.

Was Cas always this cool in his true form?

Then Dean could see stars and dark sky and space and clouds and mountains and rivers and oceans and the whole of the Earth so so so very far below. It- It was incredible. Incredible and beautiful and… coming up really fucking fast.

That was about the moment Dean realized – truly realized – that he was flying (falling). It happened to be the same moment, down to the microsecond, that Dean also remembered he didn't like flying (because it absolutely included the possibility (inevitability) of fucking falling!). Both realizations simultaneously led to the next moment, where Dean started screaming like a little girl.

When they finally did hit the ground it was, point of fact, hard as hell. The impact was jarring, so much so that Dean felt his brain rattle in his skull, and he was just a soul with no physical body (no matter what that soul was trying to tell a brain that didn't actually exist so that it could rattle or interpret that rattle through its limited human existence. Fucking Rachel. Fucking angels. Dean would show them. Just as soon as he could figure out which direction was up and then go that way). It was disorienting as hell, body or no, and anything but comfortable. Even a glowing ball of light in the shape of Dean Winchester protested against playing pinball where he was the ball. But as Dean did manage to figure out which way was up and get his feet back under him in order to go that general direction, he couldn't feel any damage. A quick assessment revealed no new bumps or bruises. Had he been good old flesh and bones, he definitely wouldn't have gotten up from that.

(Dean's limited human perception was also totally comfortable with the idea that he'd hallucinated the last three and a half minutes. And was currently still hallucinating, considering the crater around them.)

Cas was on his hands and knees beside the hunter, probably having taken a lot more of the impact than Dean. Despite the fact that he looked pretty normal and alright in Jimmy Novak's vessel (not a vessel, Dean reminded himself, just an interpretation of human eyes), Dean was pretty sure the angel wasn't entirely healed up from his bout with Azazel's trap. For one, he was panting. For another, he hadn't made it back to his feet yet.

Dean looked around them, at the ten foot crater they'd created, which he and Cas sat in the bottom off. From what he could see over the ridge of upturned earth and through the cloud of dust still settling, they were in a field of some sort. Looked like the Midwest, though that covered a lot of possible territory. It was too dark to make out much more than the fifteen or so feet around them, though the brush fires along the edge of the crater were helping.

(They'd fucking fallen (not flown. Fallen.) from Heaven hard enough to create a crater and brush fires. Jesus, how were they even alive? Oh, right. He wasn't, for starters.)

Then Cas was grabbing him and they were flying again, though not nearly as nicely (not that the first time could be called nice). It was more like being tossed, really, as the two of them flew out of the crater, hitting the ground a half dozen feet away and rolling the rest of that dozen. Something came screaming out of the sky above them and slammed into the space they'd occupied only seconds ago. Someone had apparently decided to show up their crater with an even bigger crater. Dean curled in on himself, feebly covering his head with his hands as dirt and clods of long grass rained down around them, a couple on fire. Luckily, none that fell around him and Cas. Dean could hear the angel stumble to his feet in the dust-darkened space around him.

"Cas?" Dean coughed in the dust, and how was that even fair? He wasn't supposed to have lungs right now!

"Uriel," the angel responded to his unasked question and Dean scrambled to his feet, too. The two friends back away from the rim of the crater, edging out of the settling dust cloud. Castiel kept his hand out, forcing Dean to stay behind him, but the hunter made sure the two moved in tandem, his hand fisted in the back of Cas's coat as a reminder that the angel better be backing away right alongside him. They got another ten feet back before Castiel stopped, his sword dropping into his hand from the sleeve of his coat. Dean tensed, one hand still clenching the angel's jacket, the other desperate to wrap around a weapon of his own.

"Stay behind me."

"Like hell," Dean growled in return, but then Uriel was stepping out of the crater – looking like the exact same douchebag Dean had known in his timeline – before Castiel had a chance to remind the human which one of them was more vulnerable.

(Cas. Cas was more vulnerable and Dean had a friggin' fifteen-point lecture complete with Power Point on just why that was.)

"You would choose this- this human over me, Castiel?" Uriel roared, dropping his own blade into his hand. Those dark eyes slid from his brother to the man standing just behind him, possessively close, and Uriel sneered to see him clinging to Castiel like an infant. He knew it must be the Righteous Man. "Winchester."

The hunter had the audacity to smirk. "Chuckles."

"Dean," Castiel murmured, so low that the human almost missed it. But he didn't miss the warning in it. Don't push your luck. Yeah, yeah, he got that, but he'd never been particularly good at listening, now had he? Before Dean could teach his friend that lesson through practical experience, Castiel raised his voice, calling to the dickwad, "You are the one who chose Lucifer over your brothers, Uriel."

"Lucifer is our brother! He was the best of us and we abandoned him for the humans. For them." Uriel spat the word like a bad taste in his mouth, leveling his sword at Dean. Castiel purposefully put himself between the blade and his charge, no matter the fifteen feet that separated them. Such a distance was nothing for an angel and, unlike Dean, Castiel was under no illusion of who Uriel's real target here was.

He couldn't let the other angel reach the Righteous Man's soul.

His brother charged with a rage-filled cry and Castiel shoved Dean as far from him as he safely could with one push. He met Uriel's blade with his own, the clang of celestial metal loud in the otherwise quiet night. Castiel's weaker leg gave way under the ferocious attack and he fell to one knee, using both arms to brace against his brother's strength.

Uriel was stronger than him, but Castiel had his speed, unrestrained by the weight of a vessel or the weakness of cracked and healing grace. He pushed off the ground, throwing his strength into Uriel in a feint before darting quickly to the side. Predictably, Uriel countered the false strike with the full force of his might, tripping forward when he was met with no resistance, Castiel already spinning past him. Uriel stumbled to the ground and Castiel turned, blade up and ready for another attack.

The smaller angel suddenly staggered out of nowhere, his vision spinning. His grace flagged as it distributed power unevenly across his injured mass, causing nothing short of disorientation. His vision and strength both dipped in power while his wings buzzed with a surge of energy, over-correcting for the imbalance.

Okay. So, he was still not fully healed. Yes. He would need to remember that-

Uriel charged again, slamming into Castiel and sending both of staggering back towards the crater. Castiel turned into his brother's thrust, managing to evade another blow as Uriel's weight glanced off his side and the smaller angel side-stepped his mass. He kicked at the back of Uriel's weight-bearing leg, sending him to the dirt once more. But a hand lashed out, wrapping around Castiel's arm and pulling him harshly into the upturned earth as well. The dirt hardly had time to give beneath Castiel's body before the smaller angel was scrambling away, rolling several times until he could safely climb back to his feet. He knew Uriel would try to pin him if given the chance.

"Don't make me do this, Castiel." Uriel climbed to his feet far slower, the earth clinging to his grace until he brushed it free. He raised his blade, pointing it at Castiel once more. "I beg you, brother. Do not make me kill you."

"I am not making you do anything." Castiel straightened, his own grace – still pale from his yet-healed injuries – swirled angrily. "You are doing this all on your own, Uriel. You chose it."

His brother's fury – what was really denial he could not afford to embrace, Castiel knew – turned his grace a brilliant, bloody red. It was a color the smaller angel only now realized he saw entirely too often on his- on this angel he had once considered a friend. Castiel raised his sword, realizing the inevitable end to this fight, should he survive to achieve it.

Uriel charged, and Castiel blocked once more.

-o-o-o-

Rachel flew for the gate, in part utterly disbelieving that Castiel had broken through it. Of course he had. At this point, Rachel's understanding of what her fellow angel and friend would and wouldn't do was whittled down to 'was a human named Dean Winchester involved?' Still, it was looking more and more like that human had been right: Uriel had attacked, hidden away, and was now in pursuit of Castiel. So Rachel would follow. She was loyal to her commanding officer, and that officer was Castiel, regardless of what Zachariah had decreed as punishment for Balthazar's death.

She was within striking distance of the gate when four armed angels launched themselves in front of her, barring the way with spears that identified them as part of Heaven's Guard. Rachel pulled up sharply, wings countering her incredible momentum with harsh, violent flapping as she came to a painfully abrupt halt inches from them.

"Let me through!" she demanded, standing tall.

"The gate has been forced open," one of the guards replied, deep voice like unmovable stone in the large expanse that stood before the gate. "Heaven is now on lockdown. None may leave."

"My commanding officer is in danger," Rachel bit out, pointing at the beautiful, ornate entrance to Heaven, currently dented almost in half by what she could only assume was Castiel's mass bursting through it. "Our second in command has turned traitor. You must let me through!"

"None may pass," the same guard said again.

Rachel opened her mouth to tell him just what she thought of his professional opinion on the matter when the angel to his left stepped forward.

"You have knowledge of what has occurred here?" His tone was not like earth and rock, but something in the way he regarded her, like he was testing her, made Rachel instantly wary. She straightened under the angel's gaze, glancing at the other three guards.

"Yes. I was present when Uriel-"

"Zachariah will want to speak with you, then." He nodded to the two on either end of their line barricade, and Rachel suddenly found herself flanked by her brothers. "You will report to him."

"I need to help Castiel," she insisted, growing frustrated with these angels' inability to understand what she was making very obvious.

"You will report to Zachariah."

The two angels on either side of her latched onto her limbs, hard enough that Rachel was unable to pull away. Something unpleasant twisted in her grace, a trepidation and worry she was neither familiar with nor comfortable addressing. But her brothers would hear nothing of her protests, however logical she insisted (and knew) they were. The two on either side of Rachel escorted her back the way she'd come, heading for the inner ring where Zachariah's office was located.

-o-o-o-

Sam kept his spine pressed to the back of the old house, glancing down at the doorknob of the back entrance he stood beside. He'd already managed to pick the deadbolt, quietly as possible. Though, in the silence of an abandoned house…. Sam was worried it hadn't been quiet enough. He'd already given the knob itself a preliminary twist. It had some give, so it wasn't locked or rigged with a tripwire, a trick hunters often used with a loaded shotgun on the other end for the more corporeal monsters they tackled. John had spent countless hours teaching his boys how to feel the tension of a rigged door. But just because this one wasn't rigged didn't mean there wasn't worse waiting for him beyond the door. Sam was going to be very careful about this. This wasn't a monster he was hunting, it was a hunter. A dangerous hunter, according to his brother.

It was Gordon Walker sitting in the living room of this broken down house, with a gun trained on the front door and Dean's phone very obviously sitting on a table a half dozen feet away. Gordon Walker who had set a fake message, obviously a trap, and expected Sam to walk right into it. Gordon Walker who knew where his brother was and who had a lot of explaining to do.

If Sam didn't kill him before he could talk.

The younger Winchester hadn't spotted his brother through any of the windows as he'd made his way around the house when he'd first arrived. But that didn't mean Dean wasn't in there, the hunter told himself. His brother had told him before what Gordon Walker was capable of; he'd tried to kill Sam in another timeline, he'd used Dean as bait when he failed, and laid a trap for Sam to come calling. Dean hadn't gone into details, but Sam didn't imagine Gordon was creative or unpredictable enough to alter the timeline. Sam was betting this was exactly the same trap.

Which meant Dean would be in that house. He had to be in there, somewhere out of sight. If he wasn't, Sam was going to beat his location out of Gordon.

Slowly, back still pressed to the wall, Sam reached out and gave the knob a slow, full twist. The door swung inward an inch or so, the creak of old hinges minimal, which Sam was grateful for. Sneaking up on a hunter was already going to be a challenge without added obstacles.

Speaking of obstacles. Sam bent down, door still only cracked, and stared at the trip wire two feet away. It gleamed silver in the very dim light. Honestly, if he hadn't been expecting it – not only because this was a hunter he was dealing with and an obvious trap, but literally because Ava had warned him it would be there – Sam probably wouldn't have seen it. It was far enough in front of the door that he should be able to push it open enough to get fully through with some clearance before he had to deal with the wire. Which, according to Ava, was attached to a live grenade.

It was a tight fit for his gargantuan frame, but Sam was able to squeeze between the door and its frame, side stepping into the kitchen without tripping the wire. The large gap made sense, really. There'd be little point in having the door itself be the thing to trip the wire, at least not until it was fully open. Anything earlier than that and you would just be giving your target a natural shield of inch-thick wood when the explosion was triggered.

Sam knelt down, backside all but pressed against the interior wall now, as he traced the wire to – sure enough – a grenade taped securely to the side of the kitchen counter. Quietly, and with a glance up towards the silent living room, Sam pulled out his knife and put it to the wire, close to the pin. He didn't cut it, though, as another thought occurred to him.

A grenade going off was a good distraction. The best he could ask for, actually.

Sam checked the doorway to the living room again, but there still wasn't movement. Gordon either didn't realize he was in the house or was waiting for him to trip the wire. Well, Sam wouldn't want to disappoint him.

Slowly, the hunter shuffled to the other end of the trap, where the wire was wrapped around a screw that had been driven into the side of the kitchen counter. With great care, Sam snipped the wire with his knife, as close to the screw as he could without risking wetting the whole thing off. He let out a breath, wire in hand and eye on the pin of the grenade, which never moved.

Sam dropped the wire to the ground, where it coiled, loose and harmless. Then he grabbed the back door, still kneeling and keeping an eye on the living room. Shuffling himself back into the corner and crouching into as small a ball as he could make himself, Sam pulled the door back towards him. It formed a little triangle of space between the counter, door, and wall. Now, with a shield in place between him and the grenade – a low enough yield from what Sam had spotted that it shouldn't penetrate the door – Sam reached out, picked up the loose wire, and purposefully tugged it towards himself.

The sound of the pin clattering to the floor was almost the only sound in the silence, and then it was immediately overtaken by a concussive explosion. Sam winced at the debris that hit the door, the door itself banging pressing into him, but the wood held up. Smoke and dust filled the kitchen, along with the acrid smell of burning metal and incinerated chemicals. Sam covered his mouth with his sleeve to keep from coughing. Quickly but still as quietly as possible, he swung the door outward (which was a little harder than he predicted, given one of the hinges was no longer fully intact) and stood.

The kitchen was a war zone, but that didn't matter. Sam could barely see through the dust and haze, but he thought he saw movement in the direction of the living room. Not enough to be Gordon entering the kitchen; he'd wait until the smoke settled before checking for Sam's corpse. The younger Winchester didn't plan to let him find it. The hunter pulled his gun from his backside, holding off on cocking it in case the click so close to his opponent gave away that he was still alive. He raised the weapon in front of him, thumb poised on the hammer, and took one careful step forward, minding the debris. The younger Winchester instantly froze, eyes wide, as his ankle met a thin, taut resistance he hadn't been expecting.

Sam looked down at the second trip wire in time to hear the pin it was connected to hit the floor.

Crap.

-o-o-o-

Dean scrambled back to his feet, thrown a good twenty feet from the fight as the angels battled on. He groaned, his chest pounding furiously from his son-of-a-bitch best friend shoving him out of the way (with angelic strength, he might add). The landing he'd taken after a twenty-foot soar hadn't done anything nice for him, either.

Had he mentioned lately, son of a bitch?

"Cas!" he screamed as he started back towards the fight at a full sprint. He had no weapon, no defense, but Dean didn't give a shit. That was a fight he belonged in, a fight Cas needed him in. One the angel was very clearly loosing.

Uriel delivered a vicious kick to Cas's midsection. The angel had managed to block his latest barrage of attacks, but it had left his midsection wide open to a lower attack. Cas tumbled over the edge of the crater and disappeared beneath the rim.

"Damnit," Dean swore, but he didn't stop to think about what exactly he was gonna do. Instead, he straight up tackled the bulky beast of a man that was Uriel.

The angel grunted in surprise, having not expected the attack from behind (or the audacity of a measly human soul to try taking on an angel), and the two hit the ground together. Uriel managed to turn as they fell and Dean landed heavily atop the other angel, already raining down punches. Blood splattered from a dark cheek and busted lip, but Dean didn't stop to wonder how he was getting blood out of an angel that wasn't apparently wearing the vessel he swore he could see.

"Enough!" Uriel roared, grabbing a fistful of Dean's shirt in his meaty hand, halting the hunter's next swing.

"Oh crap," Dean had time to breath out before he was soaring like a bird (ha, Big Bird, maybe) for the second time that night. He landed hard, groaning into the loose soil beneath him. A heavy hand fisted the back of his jacket and Dean was hauled back to his feet before he had time to blink the dust out of his eyes.

"You think you can take on me?" A fist crashed into Dean's face and goddamn it was a good thing he didn't have an actual jaw, because he was pretty sure it just broke. "You, the mud monkey?"

"Grk-" Dean took in a staggering, abruptly cut-off breath as Uriel wrapped that ridiculously large hand around his throat and lifted the human clear off the ground. Dean kicked out with his legs, struggling to find purchase with just the tips of his toes. The entire weight of his body (not body? Was his soul seriously a hundred eighty pounds too?) was resting on his neck, currently being crushed beneath McMeaty's paw.

Uriel stowed his blade. He would not need it for this pathetic man.

"You are vermin. You are a plague upon this earth." He shook the pathetic excuse for a lifeform and watched as Dean Winchester's body jiggled in response. Meat and bones wrapped in a bag of flesh. Disgusting. How their Father could call them his favorite, Uriel would never understand. "I'm going to drag you to the nearest crossroads and you're going to sell your soul to the first demon filth that comes calling."

"Doesn't…sound very…Righteous to m-me," Dean managed to spit out past Uriel's firm grip on his windpipe.

Dark lips split into a wide, dangerous smile. "Then we'll fetch your abomination of a brother and kill him first. Wipe the scar of his existence from this planet. Then we'll see how righteous you feel."

The hunter clenched his teeth, hand fisting across the muscular forearm holding him captive. He even drew blood – could feel it welling up beneath his nails – but Uriel's grip didn't lessen. No one threatened Sammy. "You touch my brother and I'll kill y-grk!"

His captive's hand tightened dangerously, cutting him off with a clear warning of just what this angel thought of his feeble threats. The hunter could feel his face turning dangerously red. His hands scrabbled for purchase anywhere: across Uriel's arms, stabbing at his neck and chest, even pushing at his stupidly thick waist.

Could he even be strangled to death when he didn't have a friggin' body?!

"Pathetic." Uriel shoved Dean's hands away with his other arm and the human made a grab for his wrist, latching onto the sleeve of his suit. The angel batted off like a horse would a fly. "You're species has grown even weaker than the last time I held one of you by the throat and squeezed the life out of you."

Despite the way Uriel's grip tightened suggestively, Dean managed a grim smile. He was busy thanking John Winchester for years of leaving him on his own to fend for Sammy. It had taught Dean to develop certain…five-fingered talents he'd never forgotten (or stopped using, really).

"I…grt…yrr…ss- ss-"

Uriel brought him closer, a sneer on his upper lip and Dean didn't both to hide his red-faced, bulging grin as he was pulled within breathing space of the douchebag (also, ew). But holy shit. It was actually working; the angel was playing right into his role, damn near perfectly in fact. A role he obviously didn't know he was supposed to be playing, because the movie Dean was thinking of didn't even exist yet. Maybe Hollywood wasn't so fake, after all. Suck it, Bill O'Reilly.

Ha, that was kinda funny, actually. Or maybe it was just oxygen deprivation.

"What was that, mud monkey?" Uriel barred his teeth, and Dean pulled a face at the wave of hot air and nasty breath he had to endure (okay, stupid brain on this one. Bet if he was seeing all grace and light and wavelengths of celestial intent, he wouldn't have to smell it) "If the fleshbag has something to say, it better speak up-"

"Uriel!"

Dean hit the ground with a painful jolt and a gigantic gasp of air as Uriel was ripped clear away from him by a flash of black and tan. Castiel tackled the angel into the dirt and grass, the two grappling together. Uriel's meaty hand wrapped around the smaller angel's wrist, all that kept his brother's blade from piercing his chest as Cas came out on top.

"Cas!" Dean started forward, rubbing at his throat and choking on the word as it battered it's way past a raw and damaged windpipe.

"Damn you, Castiel," Uriel hissed, throwing the injured angel off of him. It wasn't difficult. His brother was clearly weakening and Uriel knew Castiel could not remain on his feet much longer without further healing. Healing that the larger angel was still willing to offer. For certain concessions, of course. Uriel climbed to his feet once more as his brother did the same, albeit slower and with an obvious stumble. Still, the smaller angel flicked his sword, the blade held out at his side once more.

"You are a fool, brother." Uriel straightened, chest swelling with the bulk of his large mass. "This can end only one way, and you know it."

He stretched out his own hand, flicking his wrist to summon his blade from the ether. Castiel stared at him with hard, blue eyes. Uriel blinked, turning his head to look down at his empty hand.

"What-"

Castiel charged and Uriel, still shocked, was forced to block the attack with his bare hands. He still had great strength over his brother, injured as he was. He caught Castiel's sword hand in his own, his other forearm raised to block the rest of the angel's momentum. Even without his blade, this fight was his to win.

He had simply yet to decide if it would end with his brother's death. A decision that was Castiel's to make.

There was movement at his back and a moment of time – a single blink in the span that was the universe - for Uriel to garner further frustration at the pathetic human who dared interfere, before pain suddenly erupted throughout his chest. With a gasp born of pure shock more than agony, Uriel lowered his eyes to stare at the tip of an angel blade – his blade – sticking clear through his grace.

"I said…" Dean rose from behind the angel as Uriel fell to his knees with a heavy thud. Castiel's wide – so wide – blue eyes shifted from his brother's stunned face to the hunter's. Dean twisted the blade deeper, Uriel groaning, as he leaned his weight into the angel. "I got your sword."

-o-o-o-

Gordon waited for the second explosion. He didn't move, didn't surrender his protected position, didn't even breathe until the next blast ripped through the kitchen. When it went, it took a portion of the wall with it, and Gordon turned his head away from the concussive force.

He'd known Sam Winchester was too good to be tripped up by just the first.

The second grenade had been a higher yield and located much closer to the kitchen doorway than the first. A plume of dust erupted into the living room, blasted through the kitchen door by that second explosion. Gordon waited as a couple pieces of wood and smaller debris clattered against the walls and floor. A brass cabinet knob, slightly singed along the edges, rolled in through the doorway, doing lazy little circles on the ground before coming to a stop next to Gordon's boot.

Now he could make sure his target had been properly taken out. He gripped his rifle in hand and stood from his rickety chair. Should Sam Winchester be unfortunate enough to still be alive after that, Gordon would make it quick and put the man out of his misery.

The hunter entered the kitchen slowly, gun ready for anything. This wasn't any normal monster. This was another hunter. A damn good hunter, according to his Roadhouse connections. Gordon wasn't taking any chances.

There was a shoe in the middle of the kitchen, close to where the second trip wire had been. It was large – six-and-a-half-feet-tall large, and male – and hadn't been there before, Gordon was sure of it. Also, it was smoking.

"Hm," Gordon hummed, lowering his gun.

It was the wrong thing to do.

The hammer of a handgun locking into place clicked off just behind his ear, and Gordon froze as a ring of metal, solid and deadly, was pressed to the back of his skull. Damn. His connections hadn't been wrong.

"Where's my brother, Gordon?"

Chapter End Notes

A/Ns: :D

So, turns out I wrote the 'up next' of last chapter ("Dean and Cas are fleeing Heaven, Uriel is hot on their heels, Rachel is hot on his, and one of them isn't gonna make it.") and totally meant 'one of them's not gonna make it out of Heaven'. Then reviews start coming in telling me I better not kill Rachel, it better be Uriel that dies, and I was like….'ohhhhhhh….I see what I did there…yeah, that's not what I meant at all! No one dies- oh, wait…' only to realize, haha, that still holds up, one of them doesn't make it out of Heaven, and one of them doesn't make it at all! XD Go me and my very big awesome brain (snort).

Yet Another Star Trek Reference: Lol, this one wasn't intentional or planned (actually…none of them have been… Huh…I may need to work on diversifying my references… daaaamnit). I had Uriel choking Dean and realized Dean could totally steal his blade off of him in the meanwhile (I knew Dean needed to get the blade, but originally Cas knocked it free and Dean scooped it up). Then as I was writing it, I was like "huh, this feels familiar, why does this feel familiar- oh." That is literally a scene from Star Trek 2009. So…yeah, I rolled with it. I'm betting Dean woulda liked that movie and seen it often enough to quote it (like all movies). Besides, it would have made his total fanboy-self insanely happy to successfully re-enact a badass scene from a movie he likes.

Up Next: Next chapter will be up tomorrow! Awesome job, FF dot netters. Thank you all so so so so much for 2000 reviews! [blows big, dramatic, overrated-Hollywood-star-on-the-red-carpet kisses]

Cheers,

Silence

Chapter 95: Season 2: Chapter 62

Chapter Notes

A/Ns: Welcome to part two of our back-to-back chapters! You guys earned it :D

Chapter Reference – Dean and Chest!Cas Heart To Heart: After making a tentative deal with Crowley to share information to help avert the Apocalypse, Dean slept and dreamt of Cas. They had a real chat about how he sent Dean back in time, what it cost him, and why he was just a shadow – a sliver – in Dean's chest, inconsistent in his help and ability to respond to Dean's requests. For a refresher, see Chapter 51: Season 2, Chapter 18

Chapter Warnings: Uriel may be out of this fight, but Gordon sure isn't. He's got a couple tricks up his sleeves, including a certain photo he took of a dead hunter. Cas and Dean are trying to undo that damage, but they might not make it in time if Cas keeps passing out and Dean's gotta choose between his body and Cas's, uh...wavelength of celestial intent. Yeah, sure. That.

Actual Chapter Warnings: There is a brief description of the kind of damage that comes with being a victim of a sniper rifle. Heads up to anyone who's not a big fan of depictions of gore, particularly of a main character. (Don't worry, Cas is gonna fix it all up in a jiffy. If he doesn't pass out, first.)

See the end of the chapter for more notes

-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-

The Road So Far (This Time Around)

Season 2: Chapter 62

-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-

Uriel stared at the tip of his own blade, protruding through his mass in what he knew was a death blow. Grace was igniting around the edges of the celestial metal, flickering and sparking in miniaturized, bright bursts. The angel groaned, blood bubbling at the corner of his mouth. "H-how?"

Castiel's eyes fell to his as Uriel's grip on his wrist faltered, freeing the smaller angel's sword. Uriel's gaze, his grace, spitting and churning in shock and pain, locked onto the blue that his brother always seemed to be. Such a sad shade of blue, Uriel thought. His arm fell from Castiel's and instead reached forward to curl around the back of the angel's neck. His brother tensed, blade ready to defend, but his movement faltered as Uriel's grace merely curled against his own. Not an attack but a seeking of solace in its final moments.

Castiel lowered his sword, staring at his brother as Uriel's grace began to surge, the last thing they both knew it would ever do.

"For-Forgive me, brother," the larger angel whispered, but Castiel did not know what specifically his brother asked for. He knew Uriel did not regret his loyalties; Castiel could see that in his eyes. Perhaps, the angel reasoned, it was his brother's actions in following those loyalties for which he wished forgiveness. He knew that, even now, even after everything, Uriel still cared for him as a brother. A twisted care, perhaps. Castiel could see that now. But bringing him harm had hurt Uriel as well, and for that the larger angel was sorry. Castiel could see that, too.

"Close your eyes, Dean," Cas whispered as Uriel's grace began to churn and stutter in rapid succession.

The hunter perceived that death-surge as pure light, glowing from the angel's eyes, overflowing beneath the skin until it reached his nose and mouth. It spilled out with growing intensity until that blue-white brilliance encompassed the rest of his face. Dean staggered back, leaving Uriel's sword still buried between thick shoulders.

The angel threw his head back with a scream of pure light. Uriel went up before Dean could fully comply with Castiel's soft demand; the hunter caught a glimpse of wings among the blinding brilliance. Wings that stretched a story high, flecked with a thousand colors, some Dean couldn't even name. It was almost beautiful. Would have been, if it wasn't also a douchebag and the death of a brother Castiel had cared about.

The hunter slammed his eyes shut and turned away. A weight hit the ground a moment later and, when Dean dared look back in the darkness, (expecting to blink spots out of his vision but finding it perfectly clear) there was no body. Only the burnt shadow of an explosion across the dirt and a pair of wings etched out from the center of the blast, stretching a dozen feet in either direction. In the middle of them lay an angel blade, soaked to the hilt in red blood.

Beside it, Cas knelt in the scorched earth, one hand on his knee, the other flat against the burnt and blackened ground. His blue eyes were wide and grim.

"I forgive you, brother."

-o-o-o-

"Drop the gun."

Gordon hummed in response to Sam's demand, something like amusement playing at his lips as he started to turn his head. But Sammy's weight leaned into the weapon pressed flush to his skull and the hunter stopped, the warning clear.

"You know," he said casually, almost conversationally, "you shouldn't take your shoes off around here. Might get Tetanus."

"Put it down, now-"

Gordon didn't let him finish. He did drop the rifle, but he also spun around, one hand striking the kid's forearm, pushing the gun to the side before it could fire, the other coming from below to force the barrel of the gun up, twisting it out of the Winchester's grip. An old army trick his pop had taught him, way back in the day.

Sam's expression was completely taken off guard as the weapon clattered to the ground and Gordon used his momentum to continue forward, tackling the man who had a good half foot on him.

The thing with a man like Sam Winchester – a man who thought he was good, who tried to be good, who wanted to be good even though he wasn't – was that he didn't use those six and a half feet and some two hundred pounds to his advantage. Sammy was the kind of man who hunched his shoulders to look smaller, who curved his back and dipped his head to be less looming.

Body like that, Gordon would have let everyone around know who was in charge. Sam Winchester had no practice at putting his full weight into anything.

Gordon delivered a swift uppercut to the kid's jaw, following with a one-two punch to his lip and forehead. Not what he'd been aiming for, but the kid had turned into the punch, slanting Gordon's knuckles right off the sweet spots and saving himself from two far more devastating blows.

He might not be good at using that intimidating frame, but he sure knew how to take a punch. Gordon wondered if Sammy's daddy had also been a mean drunk, beating up on his kids like Gordon's had. With the reputation John Winchester had, he wouldn't have been all that surprised to hear it.

The kid got a good swing in, twisting Gordon's head to the side and sending him staggering back a couple feet. He had a lot of muscle on him and good weight behind the punch. But Sam went down hard when Walker lifted one booted foot and slammed it into the kid's stomach. The younger Winchester bounced off the kitchen cabinets, taking one clear off its hinges, and hit the floor on his stomach, groaning and trying to shake off the hits.

Gordon raised the back of his hand to his mouth, wiping at the blood pooling on his lip. He spat the remainder out on the floor before starting towards Sam. Eyes locked on his prey, he drew his hunting knife from his belt, intending to finish this. It was bloodier than a gun, sure, but Gordon wasn't squeamish.

Sam picked his head up from the floor, one hand curled under his chest. There was the kind of glare on his face that immediately drew Gordon up short. A promise of violence a man like Gordon had seen before, on other hunters and other things before they tore into their prey and ripped away lives. The younger Winchester curled his upper lip in a sneer, pulling his arm out from under him, hand wrapped tight around something silver.

His gun. The kid's gun. Sam had hit the ground right on top of his gun.

With wide eyes and a surprised intake of breath, Gordon turned one-eighty. He dove out of the kitchen, throwing himself into the living room as the other hunter fired three shots off.

-o-o-o-

Dean was still staring at the nuclear shadow burnt into the ground when he saw Cas start to list to the left. The hunter was by the angel's side, dropping to his knees, in time to catch his friend before he hit the ground.

"Cas!" The angel was not quite dead wait in his arms, but he wasn't much better than it. "Shit, I thought you said that douchebag was going to heal you."

Cas struggled to get back to his knees without the human's assistance, but only half managed it. The angel found much of his weight still leaning against Dean, much to his chagrin. "His betrayal came before the healing was complete."

"Yeah, that figures." Dean maneuvered one of Cas's arms up and over his shoulders, latching onto the floppy wrist with his other hand. "You gonna be okay?"

It was almost a redundant question, at this point. Dean knew his friend wasn't bullet proof, but Cas was damn near close. And persistent as hell.

"I will manage," the angel answered predictably, though Dean could hear the exhaustion in his voice.

Before he could get them back on their feet, though, Castiel reached over with his free hand, latching onto Dean's shirt. The hunter paused, understanding instinctually that Cas was asking him to wait. He met those intense, captivating blue eyes, and waited. There was a lot in that silence exchange, some that Dean most definitely got and more that he didn't. Then the angel lowered his gaze back to the last of his brother. A permanent scar across the earth and that bloodied angel blade.

Proof of what he'd done.

(What Dean had done, not Cas. The human would defend that decision until he was blue in the face, right along with Cas's lack of blame in any of it.)

Realizing that blade was a resource they absolutely couldn't afford to waste, Dean bent at the waist to pick it up. Cas watched him with those wide eyes that were so easily mistaken for naïve. Dean had to fight back the surge of insecurity and self-consciousness at the intensity of that gaze, which did not diminish as he straightened back up and wrapped his arm, sword in hand, around Cas's waist once more.

Maybe taking the sword of a murdered angel was a serious faux-pas in angelic culture? Not that the Cas Dean knew had ever complained before. Of course, that Cas had been through two celestial wars before they really got to that point. There'd been as many discarded angel blades lying around as there had been angels still trying to kill them.

"How did you do that?" Cas finally asked, voice filled with astonishment, confusion, and exhaustion, but not so much anger.

"Sleight of hand," Dean answered with a weak smile, hauling the angel up to his feet. How the hell were they gonna get out of here and back to the Impala – back to Sam – when Dean didn't even know where they were and their usual ride could barely stand upright? "I picked his pocket, Cas."

The angel continued to stare. As that feeling of self-consciousness kept right on increasing, Dean shrugged awkwardly. "I saw it in a movie once."

Castiel recognized the defensive tone, the way that this particular human spoke when he was deflecting. But that was not what the angel was concerned about. His gaze dropped to Uriel's blade, tucked into his side by Dean's supportive hand around his waist.

"That is an angel blade," he clarified, though he knew from the absorption of some of that grace in Dean's chest that the hunter was familiar with the weapon. Perhaps not enough to understand Castiel's astonishment, or concern, though. "It is a manifestation of grace, tied to the specific angel who summoned it. You should not even be able to hold it in this form, let alone have removed it from Uriel's person."

No human soul should have been capable of wielding an angelic blade. The fact that Dean had been able to 'pick his pocket' without Uriel even realizing his blade had been removed from the ether and taken off of him…

"Yeah, well, you know," Dean's shoulders lifted up again in a shrug, Cas's arm going with them as they started hobbling towards what Dean thought was a road in the distance. It was an edge of the field, at least, though whether or not there was pavement at that edge was something to be determined in a minute. "It's like what you said, in Heaven when I broke Uriel's weak-ass grace-rope. It's the- that sliver- it's Chest Cas. Or something."

When those ridiculously wide blue eyes just kept right on staring, Dean started getting more than just defensive.

"You're the one that said it," he grumble darkly, but Cas was already shaking his head.

"If that is true, it's very alarming."

Dean glared at his best friend, who had a blank look on his face. That one that old Cas (pre-Apocalypse Cas) used to get. The one of numb shock. It was the face he'd worn when he'd come back from their 1973 weekend, 'surprised' to be alive.

"Yeah, well, it's saved your skin twice now, so just-"

"Drop it. Yes, I know," Cas finished for him, nodding his head tiredly. He gave Dean the side-eye, but didn't push any further. "For now, we have more important concerns."

Dean knew that tone right along with that face. That was the tone that Sam had, and Ellen and Bobby and Jody, too, when they were taking his forced attempt at a subject change with grace and a grain of salt. It was the tone that said, we're not done talking about this. In fact, almost everyone Dean had ever interacted with for more than a day in his life seemed to possess that tone.

It was like they all thought avoiding conversation was a habit of his, or something.

"Yeah, sure," Dean agreed, knowing he might have to revisit this discussion later but still happy to be done talking about it right now. He didn't know why he got defensive anytime anyone brought up Chest Cas like he was a bad thing. Okay, he absolutely knew why; that was the last of his best friend and he'd be damned before anyone took that sliver of angel away from him. But that was serious chick-flick territory and Dean didn't venture into that territory unless he was dragged kicking and screaming. So, for now, he'd just stick with the defensiveness.

(The world could suck it up and deal for all he cared.)

In the meantime, Cas had a point. They had other problems. Plenty of them, in fact. Dean hefted the angel a little tighter to his side, taking on a little more of his weight as he looked around, still eyeing the edge of the field and possible road. The middle of absolute friggin' nowhere.

"We gotta get out of here."

They needed to get back to civilization, back to Dean's body, back to Sam who was most definitely in danger. Whoever it was who'd taken him out had some serious skill. Dean hadn't even seen them coming. And if they were targeting both Winchesters, then Sam was gonna need all the heads-up Dean could get him.

If they weren't already too late, of course. In which case, Sam would need the backup.

(His little brother had better not be dead already, damnit. They'd just gotten free from Heaven. There was no way they were going back for a second rescue mission.)

(Unless, of course, Sam was dead. Which was why he better friggin' not be.)

"Yes. We were not discrete in our exit from Heaven." Cas sounded repentant about that and Dean wanted to roll his eyes. Like they'd had the luxury of stealth or forethought while they'd been running for their lives. "Now an angel is dead. Heaven will be coming for me."

The hunter pulled up, realizing what his friend was saying.

'I'm hunted, Dean. I rebelled and I did it, all of it, for you.'

Dean stared at Cas, halfway through a swallow that was now very much stuck in the rough, raw lump in his throat. He stared at his friend, who was caught between despondency and resolve, and something in Dean's chest twinged for him. He'd never been good at sympathizing with Cas's loss of home and family, because Dean always figured he'd gotten a better home, a better family, in exchange. But he'd also forgotten what that loss looked like, up close, on Cas's face.

The reminder of it kinda sucked ass. Dean looked away, adjusting his grip and getting them moving again. "Rachel will back you up. She'll explain what happened, Cas."

Cas shook his head, the weight of it hanging in exhaustion. He still only barely understood his third in command's role in all of this, but he knew what it would lead to. Re-education by Zachariah's hand or reprogramming by Naomi's. Neither of which he would ever wish on his friend and kin. Knowing Rachel as he did, she had likely been attempting to fulfill what she believed to be her duty.

"If she does, Zachariah will only hold her responsible for my transgressions. No… It would be best if she were not involved any further." Cas hesitated for a moment and Dean unconsciously tightened his grip on the angel's wrist, eyes still on that possible road. "I believe my time as a 'spy' in Heaven has ended. My ship has 'sunk', as you said."

It took Dean a moment to recall the memory. Partially because he was distracted by the angel – weak, struggling to stay upright on his own – still using his dwindling energy to make damn air quotes. Dean was gonna have to have a serious talk with Angela about what kind of shit she kept putting in his head. But the memory of Sam trying to convince Cas that returning to Heaven was a ship that had sailed (and Dean grumpily snarking that it was just about sunk in his opinion), did eventually come to him. The hunter winced.

He wanted it to be true, he couldn't deny that, but Dean knew Heaven was still this Cas's home. To hear the angel give up on it…. Well, it was apparently a reminder he didn't get to ignore.

He'd seen Cas abandon his home once before. He'd seen the angel chose Dean over Heaven, and struggle with the pain that choice brought him. The weight of it on his shoulders, carried alone, because Dean was no good at sharing weight, be it his or anyone else's.

And he knew where it had led, too. To an angel, drunk on one hell of a bender, telling Dean to all but fuck off because he and his brother broke the world, and Cas had lost everything for nothing.

Dean wanted things to be different this time. He was trying. Damnit, he was giving it everything he had, but that still might not be enough, and he knew it. Dean knew, from experience now (plenty of it) that he couldn't promise any of those changes. He couldn't promise Cas they wouldn't break the world anew, again, maybe even worse this time.

'Of everything that has happened or will happen…meeting you and Sam is not one that I, or any version of me, will ever regret.'

Green eyes slipped closed at the memory. The voice of an angel in his head and in his chest, sitting on a picnic table with him at a kid's birthday party, their knees knocking, sharing a beer and a talk so long overdue.

'Not for all of Heaven would I take back what rebelling brought me, Dean.'

Family. Cas had said it brought him family. All that pain, the loss and anger and despair, had given him what he'd always wanted in the end. A family that loved him. Dean had to trust – he had to – that Chest Cas wasn't wrong. Wouldn't be wrong. That the Cas in his arms wouldn't live to regret this any more than the past version of himself.

"I'm sorry, Cas," the hunter said quietly. Even though he wasn't sorry to get his angel away from that toxic place filled with winged dicks, he was sorry for what it cost his friend. What it still might.

"It was inevitable," was the angel's hollow reply, and Dean didn't like the monotone drag of it one bit. Or his friend being back to that inevitable destiny crap. But, he supposed, Cas was allowed his time to grieve and Dean had to get better about giving that to him.

"How bad are you hurt?" Dean asked, deciding to change the topic for now. They needed to get out of there and Cas was their fastest option, if that option was even available. "Can you get us out of here?"

They needed to get back to his body. If they could do that, then Cas could rest and Dean would take care of the rest. Figure out which son of a bitch pulled one over on him and where Sam was. Though, at this point, the hunter was seriously worried Cas might not have it in him to bring him back to life, which he'd sort of been counting on since this little misadventure began.

"Yes," Cas replied, but his weak voice wasn't installing much confidence in the human. He remembered more than once when Cas announced he was perfectly fine when he absolutely was not. "Where is your body?"

Deciding the angel was – hopefully – being honest about his capabilities, Dean rattled off directions the best he could. An approximate location, a gas station on the southwestern edge of Lafayette, Indiana, and before he could go into any further detail – like asking Cas if he even had it in him to bring Dean back – they were whisking away on Angel Air.

-o-o-o-

As he hit the ground in the living room, bullets from Sam Winchester's gun flying right by his ear and head, Gordon rolled. It took three turns to the side, across debris-strewn ground, but the hunter didn't stop until he was out of Sam's line of fire. He scrambled to his butt once he was clear, shuffling backwards in a rapid crabwalk until his back hit the wall between him and the younger Winchester. Once there, he kept carefully pressed to the wall, legs coiled into his torso, ready to spring back up. His fingers itched to wrap around a weapon longer-range than his knife.

His rifle was still in the kitchen. With Sam. He wondered if the kid would try to take him out through the wall. There wasn't much left to this old house, but Winchester's handgun wasn't the type of caliber to make it through the dual layers of wood (probably). His rifle, on the other hand…

Gordon eyed the table six feet away, two handguns sitting on top, just waiting. Waiting, of course, in perfect line of sight of the kitchen. The hunter leaned his head back against the wall with a breath of laughter, loud enough for Sam to surely hear him. He doubted the kid had it in him to use that rifle. With a chuckle, Gordon decided to roll the dice on that bet. Letting his head loll to the side, he eyed the doorway into the kitchen, smoke and dust still lingering in the air. "Not bad, Sammy."

"It's Sam," the Winchester barked back from the kitchen, moving away from the doorway cautiously, kicking the rifle back against the far wall and well out of reach. He stuck to his trusted .45 handgun, raised in both hands, just waiting for a target to shoot.

As he moved cautiously – quietly – towards the other end of the room, putting as much distance between himself and Gordon as possible, Sam marked potential exits. (Back door, window over the sink, window on the far wall, partially blocked by junk leaning against it from the outside.) He triple checked for any other traps Gordon might have rigged. As he got to the end of the galley kitchen, Sam realized the far end of the wall between the living room and kitchen, the wall Gordon was obviously pressed to the other side of, had been partially taken down. Probably by some teens and a sledgehammer during a drunken night, given the discord of the deconstruction. By the grace of those drunken kids, though, there was a four foot gap beside the exterior wall, leaving a clear path to the living room. To Gordon.

Sam checked back towards the doorway, but he couldn't see the hunter from his current spot. He thought he might know where Gordon was against the wall, given a lack of light coming through sections of the deteriorating wall, but he wasn't sure. Maybe he could sneak up on him through the gap, get into the living room without the other hunter seeing it coming. As long as Gordon didn't manage to round the corner into the kitchen and target him first, assuming he had a backup weapon on hand (he was a hunter. He had a backup, the only question was what kind?). The younger Winchester kept himself pressed to the exterior wall beside the hole, gun up, keeping his eyes trained between the far doorway and the man-made gap.

"Where the hell is my brother, Gordon?" he called out, hoping to get a read on Gordon's location as long as he could keep him talking. And a location on his brother, damn it.

"Dean?" Gordon let out another low chuckle that set Sam's teeth on edge. "Oh, Dean's dead."

Sam, who had been stepping over what was left of the wall – a low-lying foot or so of boards, broken studs, and plaster – froze. He almost put his foot down on the other side, but pulled back at the last second, both feet firmly in the kitchen. Sam found his gun down by his side before he realized he'd lowered it.

Then the anger hit. And with it, the buzzing just beneath his skin.

"You're lying," he spat out instead through clenched teeth. His fingers curled into fists, ever tightening, until his joints ached, his fingernails cut through skin, and his knuckles turned white. The hand wrapped around his gun started shaking.

Gordon was lying. He was.

"I'm not," came the honest reply. Too damn honest.

Then something was sliding across the ground. Sam could hear it. The hunter tensed, eyes immediately going to the hole in the wall he stood next too, expecting a grenade to roll right into view. Only it wasn't the sound of something rolling, but sliding. A phone, bumping along the uneven ground, skidded into view, stopping a few feet short of Sam but well within grabbing distance.

(So much for the element of surprise. Sam should have known. No hunter chose a location for a meet without knowing every inch of it. Like a four-foot hole into the kitchen.)

It wasn't Dean's phone, so it must be Gordon's. It was on, screen lit with a picture Sam couldn't make out from the distance or angle. But he wasn't stupid enough to stick his head out right where Gordon could shoot it.

"Go on," Gordon drawled, a chuckle in his tone that had Sam clenching his free fist. "I won't shoot. Scout's honor. All I've got on me's a knife, Sammy."

Sam's face twisted in indecision, in frustration. But his brother was worth the risk. Dean would always be worth the risk and the younger Winchester had to know.

He stepped through the gap in the wall, gun up and immediately trained on Gordon, who was watching him with those dark, intense eyes of his. The hunter was crouched in a squat over by the kitchen entrance, knees up and ready to spring, but hands raised out by his sides. There was nothing but a knife in one of them, just like he'd said.

Gordon kept that arm – his far arm – purposefully loose and lower, no indication that he planned to throw that blade.

Sam lowered himself to one knee beside the phone, gun and eyes never leaving the other hunter. He grabbed the phone off the ground and stood immediately, weapon gripped so tightly that it was only seconds away from shaking. He thought about asking Gordon why he shouldn't just shoot him now. But he knew the answer, both the one he'd get and the one he knew for himself. So he crossed back into the kitchen, out of sight once more, and looked down at the phone.

He should have shot him. He should have shot the son of a bitch.

It was Dean. The photo on Gordon's phone was of his brother, lying on the ground in a pool of blood, the aftermath of a rifle round obscuring half his face in blood and damage.

Oh god.

Sam lowered the phone, looking away, then back, then away again. His eyes shot to the rifle, a dozen feet away and capable of getting through that wall, easy. He thought of taking Gordon's head right off his shoulders. Then Sam could take a fucking picture of that. The hunter shook his head, teeth clenched so tight his jaw shook in pain. His eyes dropped to his hands, to his own body as it shook, at his fist wrapped around a gun that openly trembled in rage.

That buzz was growing. Like bees in his ears, he almost couldn't hear anything else. The younger Winchester (could he be the younger if there was no longer an older?) slammed his eyes shut as it became overwhelming. Kill. It wanted to kill. It wanted to tear and rip and revenge. It wanted blood.

His eyes shot open and Sam was lucky Gordon was on the other side of the room. Not only because there was no question the younger hunter would tear him to shreds if he so much as caught a glimpse of him right now, but also because, unbeknownst to Sam, his eyes had gone pitch black.

-o-o-o-

When they landed, they landed hard, but Dean hadn't been expecting much better. He managed to keep on his feet, just barely. Unfortunately, Cas staggering to the side took them both down to their knees.

"Shit, Cas," Dean muttered, no heat in the words and far more concern. They were at the gas station Dean last remembered, kneeling on the dirty, oil stained pavement between the pumps. The roof above them was dark, lights still off.

At least it was still night. They hadn't been gone that long.

Dean craned his neck to the left and right, back going rigid when he found what he was looking for. His body, twenty feet away, lying cold and lifeless on the ground a half dozen feet from his untouched Baby. Thank god for that, at least. There was a lot of blood, but it looked like the Impala had escaped most of it. Not that Dean could really tell from so far away. The blood splattering his dead, grey skin, pooling on the ground, thick and congealed, was so dark it looked black anyway. Dean shivered, tightening his grip on Cas's waist without realizing he was doing it. The angel was breathing heavy, leaning against him, and Dean swore again.

"Are you even gonna be able to bring me back?"

"Yes," the angel replied, voice firm even if the volume was weak the word a bit breathless. Then, after a beat, he conceded, "I will try."

Yeah, that sounded more like it. Not that Castiel, Angel of the Lord, knew how to do anything half-assed. Dean knew too well that his friend was more likely to get himself killed trying than to stand on the sidelines when there was work to be done.

"It's not gonna kill you, right? Cuz I'm not cool with that, just so you know." Dean tightened his hand around the angel's wrist, readjusted his grip around Cas's waist, and hauled them both back to their feet. The angel next to him tried and failed to hide a groan. "And don't tell me you'll be 'greatly weakened' when what you mean is, 'yes, Dean, this will damn near kill me.'"

The lack of immediate response was telling, and Dean resisted the urge to roll his eyes for about the tenth time that night. Ya know, he didn't usually hate being right, but when it came to the angel currently in his arms, he almost always did end up hating it. The price of knowing someone too well, he supposed.

"It will greatly weaken me," Cas insisted, resisting the air quotes and managing a very reserved amount of sarcasm, something he was still learning how to apply in the first place. "But I do not believe it will kill me. I am not as damaged as I was in Rivergrove."

Dean arced a very skeptical eyebrow as he started them, one step at a time, towards his corpse. "You sure about that? Cuz you sure as hell look just as bad."

The angel was leaning heavily on the hunter as he shuffled one foot at a time alongside him. Dean supposed the guy's color was better than it had been after that trap, after he'd- she'd exorcised the shit out of Azazel. But Dean also knew from his chat with Rachel that he wasn't actually seeing a human body right now. How he was supporting Cas, his hand very clearly fisted in the angel's stupid trench coat when he wasn't even wearing one – wasn't even physical, apparently – the hunter didn't have a clue.

Too much for his limited human brain, apparently.

Well, fuck that, Dean thought, hauling the angel ever closer to his body. The hunter glanced around surreptitiously as they got out from under the roof of the gas station. Whoever had iced him had done it with a high powered rifle. That much was clear from the damage his skull had taken (and 'damage' was not a descriptive enough word. God damn, was that a mess. A mess Dean had not needed permanently implanted in his psyche, thank you very much). Rifle meant sniper, though, and if it had been Dean doing the shooting, he'd have taken the shot from the gas station roof. The guy (or girl. Dean was totally an equal opportunity victim of murder) was likely long gone, but there was no reason to be stupidly oblivious twice in one night.

The length of the roof was dark and empty against the starry sky. Not that Dean had really been expecting anything else.

The older Winchester bit back a dozen curses he wanted to let loose as they moved into the open space and his corpse just beyond that. Dean was friggin' annoyed with himself for making such an amateur mistake. 2006 Dean might not have been able to spot a sniper or been prepared for someone trying to take him out, but 2016 Dean sure as hell had a lot more experience with that shit. He shouldn't have let his guard down so damn much.

"Who did this to you?" Cas asked, voice quiet and grave as they got to his body. Dean helped the angel down to his knees, Cas immediately reaching out to press a hand to Dean's forehead. Well, the corpse's forehead. Dead Dean's forehead. Whatever.

"Don't know. But whoever they are, they're gonna be dead once I catch up to 'em." The hunter shook his head and looked away, not really needing the image of his own corpse stuck in his head, or Cas kneeling beside it, either. The bullet had clearly entered above his right ear and taken a baseball sized chunk of his head with it, but the angel didn't seem to care that he was getting covered in half-coagulated blood and what was most definitely brains. Dean was trying really, really hard not to think about it.

Looking away was totally helping. A hundred percent. Abso-fucking-lutely.

He scanned the roof again, but came up empty. Given that congealing blood and the color of his skin (likely the temperature too, though only Cas could confirm that and Dean wasn't asking), he'd been dead for a couple hours. No sniper was going to hang out waiting for a dead body to wake up. Well, no normal sniper, anyway. Dean itched to get up on that roof, to look for clues as to who the hell had the balls to take Dean Winchester out and not do it to his face.

Something was poking at the back of his brain, the very beginnings of his Timey Senses tingling, but Dean couldn't pinpoint the cause yet. It was pissing him off, almost as much as being murdered.

He turned back to the kneeling angel and Dead Dean. Cas's hunched posture and the barest tremble in his fingertips gave the hunter immediate pause. As did the fact he wasn't already re-alive. The angel wasn't usually one to waste time. Like, at all.

"You sure you got this in you, Cas?"

"Yes," the angel confirmed, sounding more confident this time. Cas shifted, blue eyes looking up to meet Dean's. The graveness in those watery pools was achingly familiar to the hunter. "But it will weaken me. The demonic trap caused damage to my core. Uriel began the healing process, but the fight has undone some of that. The cracks are…mended, but still-"

"Tender," Dean completed almost instinctually. Like a freshly closed wound. Pulling at it still hurt like hell.

"Yes. And it is…incredibly draining. Continuing to heal them on my own is taking up a lot of my grace." That explained the dark circles under Jimmy Novak's eyes and the breathlessness of his words. Like the guy had just run a marathon, stopped for a break to bring a dude back from the dead, then went on to run another. "I am more tired than I am in pain."

Dean crouched down beside him, eyeing his own body as Cas withdrew the hand from his forehead. The angel had dragged his fingers over the hunter's eyes, closing them. What a…human thing to do, Dean thought absently, and wondered where Castiel had learned that. He turned away from the trails of blood, two near identical ones, left on his eyelids from Cas's fingers and looked at the angel, instead.

"You'll recover, though. Right?"

"With rest, yes." Castiel met his gaze, the seriousness in his expression was as much a warning as his next words. "This may be all I am able to do for a time, Dean."

"Got it," the hunter answered firmly, with as much confidence as he could muster. What was he always telling Sam? He was a friggin' competent hunter, he didn't need an angel to do everything for him. Just…literally save his life, first. "You get me back in my body and I'll take care of the rest, alright?"

Cas nodded and turned back to the body beneath them.

"Um, here," Dean said suddenly, voice both uncertain and rushed. Cas looked back over at him, only to drop his eyes to the angelic blade at the end of Dean's extended arm. "You should take this."

Because Dean was pretty sure he wouldn't wake up with it magically in his hand once he got back in his body. (And he didn't want to think about where it would be if it didn't go along with him when he woke up. He knew Cas pulled his blade from the 'ether', whatever the hell that was, and Dean really wasn't comfortable with the idea of a magic floating sword hanging out next to his soul somewhere in 'magic space'. If that's even what would happen. Dean was pretty sure upon re-entry, he'd just drop the dumb thing and it would sit, invisible, in a gas station parking lot for the rest of all eternity. Wouldn't that be a waste.)

Cas stared at the weapon, his face unreadable. Dean had to tell himself – twice – to give his friend the minute he clearly needed, before Cas silently reached out and took the blade from Dean. He stowed it in the sleeve of his coat and turned back to the corpse below them. Cas reached out again, pressing two fingers to the cold, dead skin of his charge. Dean sucked in a breath of air, eyes closing against his will as he expected to feel…something. Maybe a pull back into his body, or just a surge of energy or…something.

He kind of expected to jerk upward and find himself in a freshly healed body sitting in a pool of his own blood.

Instead, he heard a thud and his eyes shot back open.

Cas was unconscious, sprawled on his side beside Dean's corpse, which was…no longer a corpse. His first fear that Cas had totally miscalculated what he had left and had passed out before bringing Dean back was completely negated by the breathing, fleshy, pink-cheeked, glowing body beside it. The hunter blinked at it, temporarily stalled in his usual, instinctual need to check on Cas by the glowy-ness. The not-corpse was emitting a faint, golden light and, as Dean realized he could almost feel it, the hunter took a much slower, measured breath in.

It was like a faint pull. No, not even a pull, an enticement.

Come to me.

Oh, Dean wanted to. He even shuffled towards that goal, unconsciously reaching out for his body, before he remembered his unconscious best friend passed the hell out beside his not-corpse.

"Shit, Cas." The hunter turned away from the glowing body, disturbed by how difficult that was to do, and instead knelt beside the collapsed angel. He reached out, shaking the guy's shoulder, but Cas didn't so much as move, let alone wake. "Cas, come on, buddy!"

Dean glanced at his body again. Okay. He could totally handle this. Just…uh…climb inside, wake up, get Cas in the car, and figure out who had killed him, was probably after Sam right now, and oh, yeah, Sam's location. No problem. He totally had all that. Totally.

The hunter stood back up, ready to do just that, when he faltered for a second time. Dean glanced back at Cas's body, then his own, eyes growing wide with pained realization.

Oh shit. Shit!

Cas wasn't in a vessel right now, no matter what it looked like to Dean's limited human perception (still a sore point, clearly). The angel was pure grace beyond that trench coat and tie. Celestial wavelengths of intent or some shit like that. Point was, the angel wasn't actually an unconscious body lying on the ground. Whatever he actually was, it was something Dean wouldn't be able to see once he was back in his body, let alone pick up and carry to the car.

"Son of a bitch," Dean cursed, glancing between the glowing, soulless body beckoning him like a sweet, sweet siren, and the pile of limp, unmoving angel on the ground. They didn't have time for this, damnit. He needed to get to Sam, to warn him something was coming. But it wasn't like he could leave Cas behind, either. "You couldn't have passed out after I got back in my body, Cas?"

The lone hunter looked around the gas station, wondering what the hell he was going to do now.

Chapter End Notes

A/Ns: It's not…entirely a cliffhanger? It's like…a crumbling edge of a cliff, and you're standing a couple feet back but there's also a wall at your back (don't ask) and you've got nowhere to go and that crumbling cliff is coming your way!

…Yeah, sure, that analogy totally checks out. Let's go with that.

Reviews: I am slowly trying to get through at least some of your awesome, spectacular reviews! I've started over on ff dot net, but I'll move to AO3 by end of week hopefully! Thanks again for all your awesomeness, guys!

Up Next: Cas needs to lay off the fries, Dean needs to work out more, Sam's doing scary shit, Gordon's realizing he's in deep shit (serves him frickin' right), and Angela Garrett wakes up at Bobby's with a tube down her throat and distinct lack of angel in the driver's seat.

Chapter 96: Season 2: Chapter 63

Chapter Notes

A/Ns: You know what happens when I don't have time to edit a chapter until Saturday, and then I waste half of that Saturday procrastinating? I'm too damned tired to be funny in the A/Ns. ._. This is no bueno.

Chapter Reference – The Start of This Hunt: Since it has been like six weeks since this arc began, this is a reminder that this whole hunt started with a case Bobby caught wind of: a possible werewolf in Lafayette. The boys checked it out, only to find it was a bust. Just a random guy stabbed in a parking lot, possibly with the silver blade, after some very random animal attacks that coincided to make it look like a werewolf. Also, Dean drove further out of town then he meant to because there'd been a car on his tail (which he thought was Sam) that eventually turned off when he started trying to lose him. See Chapter 89 and 90 for a refresher.

Chapter Reference – Dean's time as a Ghost: After the Season 1 finale when the Impala was t-boned off the road, Dean was in a coma and dying. He spent time as a ghost in the hospital, running around with Cas (who was really Tessa). He (she) gave him lessons in being a ghost, which pretty much boiled down to "stop trying to attack it, you idiot." As per canon, when Dean woke up, he remembered none of this. For a refresher course, see Chapter 35: Season 2, Chapter 2.

Original Timeline Reference – Cole, the ghost Kid (4.15 Death Takes a Holiday): The Winchesters meet a kid named Cole, who died and never had his soul picked up by Reapers. In order to talk with the kid, the brothers get the help of Pamela Barnes to project their souls on the astral plane and spend some time as ghosts with Cole, who teaches them how to interact with the world and move things without touching them.

Chapter Reference – Gordon: Quick reminder that the boys ran into Gordon in this story the same way they ran into him in the original timeline; they caught a vampire case and found Gordon tailing them. Dean insisted they leave him to it, but slipped up by saying a line Gordon said to him the first time around. Dean was unaware of it, but it set alarm bells off for Gordon, who asked around and learned Dean was psychic. See Chapter 60: Season 2, Chapter 27 for a refresher!

Original Timeline Reference – Gordon Learning about Sam (2.10 Hunted): In the show, it was not 100% clear whether Gordon learned about Sam as a psychic from his Roadhouse connections or from the demon he exorcised in Louisiana who started babbling about the upcoming war, psychics on Hell's side, and Sam Winchester as one of them. I like to think it was the demon, and his Roadhouse connections managed to confirm it. I'll be playing something similar here.

Fun fact #210: I have googled the transcript for 2.10 Hunted so many times that both Google and my internet browser suggest it as the first thing anytime I type "s" into the search bar or URL field ._.

Fun Fact #211: I have got to be on some pretty interesting government lists out there for my Google Search Results by now. Assault rifles, sniper rifles, hunting knives, hand guns, ammo, grenades, how to build grenades, how does a grenade explode, what does a grenade smell like when it explodes, various building blue prints, how are walls built, how thick are walls, can grenades explode through walls, how about handguns versus rifle rounds when it comes to piercing walls, and every possible way you can drive into Sioux Falls from every direction that exists on Earth. Oh yeah. My government must know I'm a Supernatural Writer or they think I'm planning a terrorist plot in South Dakota.

Chapter Warnings: Dean and Cas are falling through the Impala, then falling into the Impala (don't get your hopes up, Destiel Fans. We're still so deep in that river in Egypt). Dead Dean is a Forghorn-blowing, glowing corpse of impatience (I swear it'll make more sense below), Sam is pissed, then laughing, then pissed, and Gordon is really lucky he's not dead yet. Oh, and the author's pulling a parody on one of the most beloved lines of the show. It's reeeeal subtle, so keep an eye out for it and try not to laugh (the subtle bit was pure sarcasm)

See the end of the chapter for more notes

-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-

The Road So Far (This Time Around)

Season 2: Chapter 63

-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-

"Good god, Cas. You gotta lay off the fries, buddy."

Dean groaned as he pulled the angel up, his own body half into Baby's backseat, attempting to haul his passed out friend up and into the back of the black muscle car. It was proving way more difficult than he'd figured. First off, it hadn't occurred to Dean that he had to first figure out how to open Baby's back door as nothing more than a soul. He'd hauled Cas all the way over there, gone to prop the guy up against the rear tire well, only to have him go right through and take Dean down to the ground with him.

The hunter was never speaking of this to anyone ever.

First thing he'd done after landing on top of Cas, his vision going through the most screwed up tilt-a-whirl of his life as he passed through his car, was to straighten right back up and out of the side panel and look around to make sure no one had seen that. Step two was to scramble off the angel he was straddling so he could grab Cas's feet and haul the guy back out from under the car.

Dude, being dead sucked. Being dead and stuck with an unconscious angel sucked more.

Luckily, a soul and a ghost seemed to be about the same damn thing, and he knew how to be a ghost. Well, sort of. It had been a while since he'd played Swayze with a pretty cool ghost named Cole after Reapers had stopped picking souls up from his hometown. But Dean remembered the couple of lessons the kid had tried to teach him and Sam.

Weirdly enough, when his hand went right through the door handle on his first attempt, Dean could have sworn he heard Cas's voice in his head, telling him to stop trying to punch it. Presence, not force. Or… something like that. The hunter just shook his head, unable to place the memory, and tried again.

And again. And again. But eventually, his palm did wrapped around solid metal, and he yanked Baby's door open as fast as possible before his soul or his car changed either of their minds.

The second factor in why-the-hell-is-this-so-much-harder-than-it-should-be was that, apparently, Cas had not been leaning half his weight on Dean when the hunter hauled him all around that field and then the gas station. More like a tenth of it, given the guy now felt like three hundred pounds of dead weight. Then again, Dean was apparently hauling around a wave of celestial intent the size of the Chrysler building and not the skinny tax twerp it currently looked like, so maybe that explained it.

That, or Jimmy Novak was way more jacked than Dean suspected under that rumpled shirt and askew tie.

…Not that he was thinking about that. At all. What the hell.

(Fucking Andy, man!)

"Jesus," Dean huffed out as he got half of the angel to stay, chest-down, on the back seat. He was pretty much just eternally thankful Cas hadn't dropped right through the car again. He so did not understand supernatural physics and he really, really didn't want to, either.

The hunter slumped onto the ground for a breather, leaning his head back against Baby's cool metal, thankful all over again for the single, solitary comfort of his Lady. When he could convince himself to move again, he'd have to go around to the other side and keep pulling the angel through that way. He felt like a friggin' child trying to haul their unconscious drunk of a parent into bed.

Not that Dean had any experience with that, or anything.

(That same child also had experience hauling two hundred and thirty pounds of a grown ass adult into the backseat of the Impala because John Winchester had taken a hit to the head, leaving Dean to finish the hunt and drive his dad back to the motel that night. So, yeah, this was all depressingly familiar when he thought about it. Which he wasn't.)

A shudder rippled through the hunter and Dean didn't bother biting back the groan that came with it. It wasn't like anyone was around the closed up gas station to hear (and even if there was, he was a friggin' spirit right now, so they wouldn't hear it anyway). The hunter pried open tired eyes, glaring at that glowing body two dozen feet away. Two dozen feet that were, apparently, two dozen too many.

That pull that Dean had felt – that gentle beckoning that had been wafting off his not-corpse ever since Cas brought it back to life – had grown incessant the further away he'd gotten from his body. What had once been a sweet siren's call was now a fucking fog horn in his ear, and every step he took further away from it had been twice as hard as the one before.

Maybe that was why Cas felt like he weighed a couple hundred pounds more than he should. Dean certainly felt like he was dragging a dead body behind him in addition to the one he was hauling in front (not dead, just unconscious. Unconscious, injured, and permanently suffering from the worst case of bad timing on the planet!)

Another shudder encased him, followed by another groan that was getting dangerous close to a whine.

"Hold your horses, I'm coming," Dean grumbled at his still-glowing body (and he had not kept half an eye on it the entire time out of fear that whatever Cas had done had a time limit and that thing might stop glowing any minute now, ending his chances of ever waking back up. He totally hadn't fear that at all.) Dean rallied his energy for another round of his new favorite game: Getting Your Unconscious Friend Into the Backseat, complete with the new, limited edition Elephant-Heavy-Angel-Friend expansion pack!

Yay him.

(Games were for twelve year old nerds without girlfriends, damnit.)

Way back in the day, Dean had always thought getting Cas utterly smashed (like well and truly blackout drunk) would have been a sight to see. A happy Cas, that was. He'd seen the unhappy version the day Cas decided to crash a liquor store without Dean for company. But the human had been certain he could get his friend to happy drunk if given the opportunity and right timing. Not that those things had ever lined up. And once Cas lost most of his powers, the idea hadn't seemed like a good one anymore. Happy Cas hadn't really seemed an option after that, which was depressing as hell now that Dean was thinking about it.

Not that it mattered, considering the hunter was now making a new promise to himself. A commitment to never, ever, take this Cas out drinking. Not if he was the one who'd have to haul his inhumanly-heavy ass to the car.

(And he imagined flying under the influence was probably a no-no. Guy would likely go headfirst into a mountain halfway across the planet.)

Dean gave three good shoves to Cas's butt, totally ignoring where he was putting his hands as he did so (and damnit, Andy. This would not be awkward if the damn kid – and Heaven – hadn't been filling his head with all sorts of details on male anatomy absolutely no one had ever asked for in the history of ever). It was a weak, last ditch attempt to get the guy further into the car without having to go to the other side to pull him through. That was going to be another seven feet more, at least, between him and the source of that incessant fog horn still screaming in his ear.

Those seven feet sounded terrible.

But eventually Dean had to call it; he ended up moving around the car to the passenger side. Every step felt like he was sinking in sludge and dragging half a bog with him. He was practically shaking by the time he made it, shudders running through him almost non-stop. Friggin' glowing body and its friggin' pushiness. (Dean did not poke his head above the roof of Baby's car to make sure the thing was still glowing. He didn't. He was just…making sure the gas station was still empty. Safe. Whatever, shaddup.)

Just like that shorter, weaker, but just as handsome version of Dean had done for his dad decades ago, the hunter grabbed a hold of Cas's wrists, planted his feet, and pulled. It took ages and a lot more effort and groaning than Dean would ever admit to later, but eventually he got Cas far enough into the car that he'd be able to close both doors (after a little creative leg-folding on the other end).

Dean slammed the passenger side shut and hurried back around to the other side, in part because he told himself he was in a hurry, but mostly because seven feet closer to his stupid body was seven feet less sludge and shudders and misery and 'Jesus fucking Christ, will you give me one damn minute, I'm coming!' The hunter eyed Cas's body, slumped face-down and motionless on the back seat. He took a minute to tuck the guy's legs in, sort of curled up beneath him and to the side, so that he'd be able to close the door when he woke back up in his body.

The older Winchester glanced over his shoulder at the thing, still glowing away, still fog-horning away.

"Okay, Cas…you better friggin' be here when I wake up."

And not, like, fall through the seat to the ground for Dean to later run over and then leave behind as invisible roadkill. Yeah. That was totally a thought he needed rattling around in his anxiety-riddled not-brain.

Awesome.

With that, Dean took a step back, away from the car and the unconscious angel. Cas didn't sink through the seat. Didn't move. Didn't wake up. The hunter swore internally, not knowing what he'd been expecting from his friend, who'd warned him this all might happen.

(Well, that wasn't true. Cas had said reanimating his body might be the last thing he was capable of doing, but Dean hadn't thought that meant literally. He really needed to teach this Cas how to be more friggin' specific. Particularly when he was seconds away from passing the fuck out.)

With an irritated noise in the back of his throat, Dean forced himself to turn away from that unconscious body he was pretty sure he wouldn't be able to see once he was alive, and stomped over to his impatient not-corpse. Every step was like rainbows and butterflies and unicorn poop. It irritated the hunter to no end how damn good it felt in comparison to going the other direction.

"Friggin' impatient, demanding body," Dean growled lowly as he came to stand over his not-dead body. "Friggin' angels passing out on me. Friggin' mother effers killing me in the first place!"

The soul glanced around the gas station, eyes stopping once more on the roof. If he'd been planning on sniping someone, that's where he'd have done it from. So, step one: get his body back. Step two: get up on that roof.

The hunter couldn't quite help it. He cast one more quick look at Cas's half-curled, half-slumped form in the backseat of his Lady, and huffed. Step three: get back to the Impala and start driving, hopefully with an unconscious angel still in the backseat.

"Here goes nothing," he muttered under his breath before lifting his foot and nudging his own torso. He had no idea how to make this work other than climb in, which seemed to be the nonstop mantra coming off his not-corpse in waves.

Luckily, Mr. Insistent-Fucking-Fog-Horn knew plenty for the both of them. Like something out of Jumanji, Dean's foot straight up dissolved and swirled right into his body, sucking up the rest of him with it.

-o-o-o-

Sam stared at the gun in his hand and thought about shooting Gordon in the face with it.

That wasn't what the buzzing in his head – once in the back of his skull but now filling his entire cranium – wanted to do, though. Sam knew what it wanted. What Azazel wanted. Bloodshed. They wanted him to bathe in Gordon Walker's blood. To soak in it until Sam was painted red with his vengeance.

The picture alone should have sickened him. The fact that it didn't… well, that was enough to sicken Sam Winchester, to pull him away from the roaring of bees in his ears and the hot pulsing of angry, bubbling blood in his veins.

Sam kept black eyes locked on that gun and started counting off every memory he had of his brother calling him 'the boy with the demon blood.' Not as an accusation – Sam knew it hadn't been that, not from Dean – but still, he counted them. Racked his brain for every story Dean had told him about his future brother who'd taken the wrong path. Who'd witlessly let his anger and his need to prove himself burn the whole world to the ground.

When Sam got to nine, he opened his fist, letting the gun balance in his palm. Both still shook, but they shook less. The buzz was still there, but he could hear past it. Could feel past it.

"It was a quick death." Gordon's voice was grating as Sam fought for enough control just to let it in. Smugness dripped in every word. Worse, the man actually thought he was being sincere.

Sam wished Dean had told him it would come to this. He no longer thought these events lined up with the world his brother came from (obviously, as Dean had lived in that timeline and Sam was pretty sure Gordon Walker killing him would have made the short version, regardless), but this. This monster wearing the clothes of a hunter. Sam would have let his brother kill Gordon that first night they'd met, with Sammy pinning the man to a wall and Dean holding a knife to his throat.

How did Dean pull away? Knowing he was letting this- this… monster go free? Sam would surely have killed him had he been in Dean's shoes.

The buzzing rose again. A crescendo of violence, begging for a finale. A horrendous, intoxicating itch just under his skin that Sam knew how to scratch. Knew how good it would feel. His fingers shook to make use of it. To- to kill the man who'd killed his brother.

"Why." Sam didn't know how he managed to speak when his jaw was clenched so tight his entire face hurt from the tension of it. But he managed it.

Did it even matter why?

It really didn't, but Sam needed to know. He needed to make some sort of sense out of this, even when he knew there was nothing – nothing – that would ever make it better. No amount of explanation could excuse it, could make this right in the younger Winchester's mind.

Sam kept his eyes on his gun, still trembling in his open palm, and reminded himself that it would matter to Dean.

"You and your brother…" Gordon trailed off, and Sam heard his head thunk lightly against the wall between them. Once again, Sam eyes drifted to that rifle sitting a dozen feet away. "You're not like us, are you Sammy? You're not…human. Not where it counts."

His fist closed around that gun involuntarily and Sam had to shut his eyes to block it out. Gordon's voice. The buzzing. The need for blood so bad he could taste it in his mouth.

"Your brother was psychic."

Clear, brown eyes flashed open suddenly, a brilliant brain flaring to life and drowning out the emotion. The buzz was gone, buried beneath a new roaring, a cry against logic and law and common fucking decency.

That's what this was all about?

"He's still human," Sam countered, spitting the word out. This…this was ridiculous! The absurdity might have been hilarious, if it had been any other situation. If Dean wasn't dead, because Gordon had…. What? Had a problem with psychics?

Sam knew there were racist hunters out there. Hunters who weren't comfortable using the services of psychics and clairvoyants. Humans that were seen as other. The younger Winchester had never fit into that world like his family did, a world that operated in pure black and whites. No grey. Humans good, everything else bad. That had never made sense to Sam and it never would.

But this? Black and white was neither here nor there, right now. Dean being psychic – which he wasn't (and wasn't that the real kicker)– was not an excuse to kill him. It wasn't an excuse to kill anyone. That was murder, plain and simple.

Sam heard fabric scuff against dilapidated wood and realized Gordon was shrugging. "He was dangerous, Sammy."

"It's Sam."

"A hunter should know better than to use an ability like that so openly. He was in my head, practically flaunted the fact." In the darkness of the living room, moonlight and a distant street light barely piercing through the motes of dust still hanging in the air, Gordon shook his head. "A hunter would know better. A psychic should know better. Your brother didn't."

"So this is personal?" Sam seethed from his side of the wall and for a time he forgot about the gun shaking in his fist, about his focus on it instead of what lay just beneath the skin. "A psychic caught some surface thought off you and your response is to murder them?"

"I'm not a killer, Sammy," Gordon scoffed and Sam wanted to punch him. "I'm a hunter and this isn't personal. Your brother was fair game."

-o-o-o-

Dean shot up with the gasp of a damn drowning man and that was familiar. That was what he'd been expecting, so despite the fact it hurt like a bitch and his lungs burned and his ribs had several complaints they'd like to register with the manager, it was mother effing beautiful. The hunter immediately groaned, curling up his shoulders and tilting his neck to either side to crack out the aches and pains and cramps. Damnit, waking up from the dead was never pleasant. Why couldn't, just once, it be a pleasant thing, with daisies or something.

No time for that, though.

The older Winchester scrambled to his feet, ignoring the protests of a body that had been lying in the beginnings of rigor mortis and congealed blood. Fun times. Dean ignored the cold, sticky wetness clinging to the back of his neck and head, and instead turned around to stare at the gas station roof. The hunter took a determined step forward – his intent to get up there as solid and pressing as stone – when he paused. Green eyes darted back to the Impala.

The rear driver's side door was open but the seat was empty. Dean's fingers curled into loosely-clenched fists and he told himself that didn't mean anything. Cas was still there.

"You better be," he muttered, before setting his sights on that roof once more.

-o-o-o-

".223 caliber. Subsonic rounds." Dean stood up from his crouch on the edge of the building, dropping the bullet casing back to the gravel-topped roof. He'd seen this before. This exact damn setup. He remembered tackling the hunter who dared try and take out his brother just like this.

Gordon fucking Walker.

God damn it! He should have known. He should have known. Dean should have iced that hunter's ass the moment he walked back into their lives. Nothing good could ever come from letting that murdering psycho live.

"Son of a bitch," Dean swore viciously, turning and jogging back across the roof to the maintenance ladder he'd found on the far side. As he did, he hastily patted down his jacket and jeans, searching for his phone. He had to warn Sammy. He had no idea why Gordon decided to take him out first (or at all) this time. Hell, they hadn't even left him tied up in his own piss and blood for three days this go around! What the hell did Gordon have to be angry about now? But Dean knew one thing for sure. Time wanted to stay the same, and that meant Gordon Walker was going after Sam.

"Son of a bitch!" Dean screamed this time when his search came up empty. No phone. Gordon must have taken it. The hunter stopped on the edge of the building, one hand in a white-knuckled, angry grip around the pole of the ladder leading down. He tilted his head back, tension in his neck causing veins and tendons to bulge, eyes scrunched closed, as he resisted the urge to scream it a third time.

Of course Gordon had taken his phone. He'd laid a trap for Sam last time by making Dean call him up and deliver an address to meet him at. But the older Winchester had been able to tip him off with a code word. Now, with Dean dead in this version of events, Gordon would still probably use that same trap by sending a text instead, only Sam wouldn't have a clue he was walking into a trap.

'Son of a bitch, son of a bitch, sonofabitch!'

Dean was gonna kill him. He was gonna find him, then he was gonna kill him.

The hunter practically slid down the ladder rather than waste time scrambling down, and jumped off the top of the dumpster. He was bolting across the asphalt before he'd even hit it. Dean rounded the building and headed straight for the Impala. He didn't have time to hope Cas was still in the backseat, just slammed that door shut and ripped the driver's side open.

Baby was rumbling and peeling out of the gas station before his door was fully closed again.

"You better be okay, Sammy, or I'm gonna kill you myself," the hunter grumbled beneath his breath. Even as he said it, he couldn't help but check the rear view mirror, thinking the same damn thing about the invisible angel in his backseat.

-o-o-o-

The air around Sam started to vibrate in time with the bees in his ears and the pulse in his veins. The hunter didn't hear it through the buzz, but the wood around him began to groan and creak, the house physically shifting away from the promise of violence and destruction. In the living room, Gordon stilled, sharp hearing picking up on the noise but unable to identify its source. The hunter quickly rose to his feet, still keeping his back against the wall for the minimal protection it offered. The unknown now had him on edge. More on edge than their current standoff.

"What are you up to in there, Sammy?"

The kitchen groaned again and this time Gordon swore he felt the wall beneath him shudder. The hunter pushed off the wood, turning around to stare at the wall. Something between shock and trepidation started eating at his gut and chest as the wall shuddered and the wood started to warp, almost in slow motion, bulging out towards him.

This….this was…

"It's Sam," the other hunter roared from the kitchen and the house physically shook with the declaration. Enough so that Gordon took several steps away from the wall joining his room to the one the psychic – the powerful psychic – was currently in. "And you're insane."

Gordon watched the planks of wood tremble beneath bits of plaster, sending dust and debris to the floor below. His dark eyes were wide as they slowly tracked across the wall towards that gap into the kitchen, where he knew Sam was. He had not been expecting this. That demon down in Louisiana had mentioned Sam Winchester was a psychic, had mentioned he was going to be a soldier in an upcoming war, fighting on the side of Hell. But that demon hadn't said anything about how strong he was. None of Gordon's Roadhouse connections had mentioned anything close to this level of power, for either of the Winchesters. This level of evil.

Gordon felt even better now knowing he'd put Dean down, and was more certain than ever that he needed to do the same to Sam. He needed to end it quickly, though, before the younger Winchester focused any of that power his way.

It might be too late for that, the hunter reasoned. He wasn't some reckless yahoo – he knew when he was in over his head. There was a sinking weight in his belly that always told Gordon when he was in trouble. But he was smart, too. He knew when to listen to it and when to put his head to work. His two handguns, sitting on the table only a dozen and a half feet away, were currently useless to him. That table was in direct line of sight of the gap in the kitchen wall. He'd be a turkey on a shooting range if he went for them. He still had his knife, at least, and Gordon was a damn good throw.

Against a psychic who could bend walls, though? Who knew.

Sam Winchester had been reasonable enough at the start of this – not even going for a kill shot when he definitely had the opening and the capability – before Gordon taunted him with his brother's death. Maybe he could distract the younger Winchester – snap him out of it or back him down – enough to get a shot in before the psychic turned truly deadly rather than just angry.

"I'm not unreasonable," he said, raising his voice above the creak and groan of the old house straining under the power of an upset psychic. "I understand the use of psychics, Sam. I do. But your brother crossed a line. He sided with demons over his own kind."

Inside the kitchen, Sam's eyes blinked, going once more from pure black to a confused, agitated, and impatient brown. The walls stopped fluctuating in an attempt to get away from the angry Winchester, but the power did not diminish completely. The tension left in the house, focused in the kitchen, was practically a presence unto itself. The buzzing in Sam's head barely diminished at all, the young hunter going from angry to irritable but also perplexed.

"What are you talking about?"

"He wasn't one of us anymore, Sam. He wasn't a hunter." Gordon edged closer to the wall now that it had ceased its trembling, though he still got a distinct impression of danger wafting from the other side of it. Gordon pressed his hand against the wall, surprised to find the wood warmer than he thought it should be in an abandoned house in winter. That unfortunate sinking feeling in his gut got worse. No time to address it now; stick to the plan. "He was no better than the things we hunt."

"That's not true!" came the hissed reply, and Gordon pulled his hand off the wall when he felt it flux beneath his fingers. Wrong avenue, then.

"I saw it myself." The hunter took slow steps towards the doorway, eyes locked on the gap the entire time. He didn't think Sam was in a right enough state of mind to step through there, to attack him like a man rather than a psychic, but he'd been wrong before. "Your brother was with a woman when I took him down. A woman who disappeared in the blink of an eye, once their meet was done."

Gordon hadn't been expecting that, either. He'd pulled away from the scope, staring down at the solo Winchester, now alone in an empty gas station parking lot. And he'd known. He'd known killing Dean was the right choice. A hunter who associated with demons, did deals with demons, didn't start exorcising the thing right on the spot…well, that wasn't a hunter. That was fair game.

Laughter – cold, harsh, and bitter – erupted from the kitchen, stopping Gordon right on the threshold of the two rooms. He paused, glancing warily towards the other end of the room, towards where he knew Sam stood just on the other side of the flimsy wall. Laughter wasn't exactly what he'd been expecting, but as that feeling in his gut only got heavier, Gordon came to the realization that associating with demons was the norm for these two.

"You're a damn idiot, Gordon."

That, and the sudden rigid tension along his own spine, was the only warning Gordon got before Sam stepped into the living room, gun up and expression deadly. Gordon dove into the kitchen as a volley of shots rang out, some hitting the wall right where Gordon had been standing. He felt the stinging pain of a close call along the back of his arm and shoulder blade, but it was a flesh wound at best.

Gordon hit the floor of the kitchen, close enough to his abandoned rifle to grab it. The hunter knew he had no time. Knew all Sam had to do was step back through the gap in the wall and keep on firing. Gordon rolled onto his back, rifle up and cocked, as Sam reappeared in that hole.

The Winchester got a shot off – Walker grunting through the flare of pain in his thigh – but so did Gordon, and he was aiming for a place a hell of a lot more permanent. Sam was spun around by the force of the bullet entering his upper chest, and he disappeared back into the living room.

-o-o-o-

His fingers were turning white around the steering wheel, his knuckles long past that color. Dean glanced at the dashboard clock again, though the dial had hardly moved a full dash mark since the last time he'd looked at it.

Four hours. It had been almost four hours since he'd left the Impala to pray to an angel. Angels, plural. Some of that time had surely been taken up waiting on Balthazar and talking with Rachel, so it might have only been something like three hours since he died. But Dean couldn't be sure, and it was eating at him.

Three hours for Gordon to get to Sam. More than enough time for any hunter. Damnit!

Dean struck the steering wheel with the heel of his hand, ignoring the flare of pain. He wrapped his fingers back around Baby's leather and looked at the clock again.

Gordon would have had to get back into town, probably back to that old house he'd set up last time. Because, damnit, this had all gone down in Lafayette the first go around, hadn't it? Fuck, how come Dean hadn't remembered that when it would have been useful?! That entire encounter with Gordon was fuzzy at best, really. The important shit – like Gordon trying to ice Sam with a sniper rifle and later a grenade – wasn't helpful when it came to dates and locations, damnit (because of course it wasn't).

In all that, Dean didn't remember a bust of a hunt, though. He remembered…. Shit, what case had they been working when Gordon tried to take them out? There'd been a guy…some dude stabbed in a…

a parking lot.

God damn it. This had gone down exactly the same as last time, Hadn't it? And he hadn't even noticed. Thanks for friggin' nothing, Timey Senses. God damn crap on a god damn cracker! What was the point of being from the future if it never helped?

Dean struck the steering wheel a couple more times, mentally apologizing to his Baby.

"Alright. Alright, damnit, focus." Dean ran a hand roughly across his skull, then checked the clock again, which really wasn't helping.

If he was Gordon, he'd have given himself an hour, at least, to get back to that crap house before messaging Sam. Maybe more, even, in order to set up the trap. Although, unfortunately, Dean also remembered Gordon laying the trip wires for his brother after forcing him to make the call to Sam, baiting that trap.

Fuck. Dean glanced at the clock again. He needed to get to a phone to warn Sam. A phone or a laptop to trace the kid's GPS and get a location. Dean didn't remember the damn address for that friggin' house, other than bumfuck nowhere. He needed a phone, goddammit.

So, of course, as par the course, there hadn't been a single lit building along the road he was on since he'd left the gas station. Because he'd been forced to drive to the mother effing outskirts because of the car tailing him. Which had been Gordon, as was now very obvious. Dean's grip on the steering wheel tightened. He was gonna kill that son of a bitch.

Soon as he got his hands on a friggin' phone.

As he passed yet another darkened building, the sides of the roads starting to populate with more of them and give him at least some hope, Dean scrunched his face up. There was a ringing in his ears which he hadn't noticed until now. It was the high pitch kind of ring – so high it was almost quiet –that happened from time to time (and more so with age). Some snot-nosed kid had once told him years ago, back when he actually went to school, that your ears ringing like that meant you were losing your hearing; one more frequency you could no longer pick up. Dean had no idea if that was true but ever since, he'd felt that sort of ringing like a personal attack. The hunter tried to pop his ears and shake his head to clear it, but the noise only got louder.

Then the radio suddenly turned on and Dean's gaze snapped to the volume dial as static filled the car.

"What the-"

His first, automatic concern as a hunter – ghosts or demons – didn't make much sense in a moving car going about seventy on surface streets. The static in the radio got so loud Dean could hear the speakers crackling with strain. Dean reached over, uselessly spinning the volume knob, trying futility to turn the whole radio off when that didn't work. Then the ringing increased, to the point where the human was hunching his shoulders instinctively, face scrunched up almost in pain, and Dean realized just what the hell that sound was.

It had been years since he'd heard it.

"Cas?" The hunter glanced over his shoulder at the empty back seat, green eyes scanning the leather-covered cushions for any sign of the angel. The ringing was still getting louder. "Cas!"

Dean swore as he was forced to pull over onto the side of the road, the noise threatening to take over his brain and crash the damn car. Jesus. Breaks squealed and smoked as the Impala came to as an abrupt a stop as physically possible. Dean hissed as the volume rose ever still and he clapped his hands over his ears, already knowing it was useless. An angel's true voice went straight to the brain, hands be damned.

Green eyes widened at the sight of the windshield glass, vibrating under the sustained pitch.

"Cas!"

The angel must be waking up, confused, probably pretty damn dazed, and likely in pain. Or possibly dying. Shit. Cas had said he wasn't that bad off, but Cas was also horrible at under exaggerating that sorta thing! Dean had never really heard an angel die, not with their true voice, at least. Most of the time they were in vessels when they went. He'd definitely never heard an un-vesseled angel bite the dust. Now Dean was kinda imaging it would sound exactly like this, actually.

God, let that not be what was happening right now.

Dean slammed his eyes shut, hands pressing almost painfully against his ears as the noise became a physical pain. All six glass panes in the Impala were humming dangerously.

"Damnit, Cas, if you blow out my windows I am gonna be so pissed at you!"

The ringing didn't stop, but it was like it skipped a beat on a record player. The sound picked up again, even louder, then faltered a second time. This time, it stayed a low background hum and Dean risked opening his eyes at the significant volume drop. The radio shut itself off, then suddenly the sound was swallowed up by a silence so complete it left Dean's ears still ringing from it. The hunter lowered his hands, shoulders still hunched up and starting to cramp.

Shit, that had worked?

Dean turned halfway around in his seat, eyes darting across the still empty back seat. "Cas? You with me?"

There was a low hum: a vibration running through the car and a short burst of static through the radio. It had the after ring of high frequency noise, but it was way more manageable than the shit show performance they'd just gone through.

"Crap," the older Winchester breathed out, shoulders finally sagging. "Are you okay?"

The static buzzed again, speakers crackling and Baby's frame humming with it. It was a long enough hum this time to be completely confusing as an answer. Dean frowned, racking his brain for a way to communicate with an un-vesseled, invisible, injured angel. Fun times, as always, in the Winchester household (carhold? They didn't actually have a house…)

"Okay, uh…one buzz for no, two for yes, yeah? You okay?"

He got two short bursts of static in response and the hunter let out a sigh of relief. Alright, some good news for once. Dean gripped the top of the front seat, still eyeing a completely empty rear seat that he was also talking to, and tired not to feel as strange about that as he did.

"Alright, look…I know that you probably feel like shit right now and you're in no condition to do anything, but Sam is in serious danger. Gordon Walker is the hunter who took me out and Sam is next on his list."

The low-key vibration started up again, building with something Dean could very much tell was anger. Whoa. He was totally able to read an angel through friggin' static and ringing. That was kinda cool and also totally unimportant at the moment.

"We gotta find a phone so we can track Sammy's location. The bastard took mine. Bobby's is the closest I can think of. Any chance you can-"

Two rapid-fire vibrations shot off through the car before Dean could even finish talking, and then there was nothing but total silence. Not even the fuzz of the radio existed anymore. It was the kind of silence that was so complete, Dean knew instantly he was alone in the car on the side of the road in the middle of Indiana. He hadn't actually realized how full the Impala felt with Cas's presence until the angel was no longer there.

Huh. If he'd known that earlier he could have spent the last six and a half minutes in a hell of a lot less stress. Still tons of stress, of course, because Sam was in danger, Dean had no way of contacting him, and also because he was a friggin' Winchester, so stress was a goddamn lifestyle. But at least he wouldn't have also been worrying his best friend was dead in the backseat or not even in the damn car to begin with.

"Cas?"

Nothing but silence replied and Dean slowly turned back around in the front seat. Okay…well, shit. He couldn't leave until Cas got back; the angel wouldn't know where to find him or have any way of getting a hold of him to ask. Not to mention, Dean didn't actually have a useful destination except the motel, which wasn't useful in the slightest because Sam being there was a long shot at best. Nothing but a waste of time and gas that made Dean feel slightly better about not doing a damn thing to protect his brother at the moment.

Like sitting, useless, on the side of the road.

The hunter wrapped his hands back around the steering wheel, itching for action and cursing the fact that he was sidelined until Cas returned, even if the angel was their best shot at getting a phone and a location on the missing Winchester. Dean stared out the windshield at the stretch of dark road in front of him and tried not to break Baby's wheel in half.

"I'll just…uh…wait here, then." The Impala's leather creaked under his totally useless fingers. "Awesome."

-o-o-o-

Angela sat upright in a hospital bed on the second floor of Bobby Singer's house with a gasp that ripped at her lungs but went absolutely nowhere due to something blocking her throat. Not just blocking, shoved down. All the way down. Oh god, she couldn't breathe!

Tears leaked from her eyes as uncoordinated, weak hands scrambled for purchase on the ventilation tube. Pure adrenaline, fueled by fear and terror, allowed Angela to pull the entire length of ribbed plastic up and out of her esophagus. A horrible, horrible experience she never wanted to live through again. Usually Cas took care of all these things, but the angel was definitely not in the driver seat. Angela was in complete, terrifying control. She could feel him in there, still in her head and deep down in her chest, like a little blaring sun, but he was in pain.

A lot of pain.

Angela didn't really know much about what was going on, but it was clear something was really, really wrong. Getting herself upright was almost impossible. All she could manage with muscles that had spent far too long horizontal and unused – cramping, weak, useless– was to list to the side like a broken doll. The ventilation tube hit the floor with a clatter as her hand found purchase along the side table, which was about all she could manage.

Okay. Clearly getting out of this bed on her own wasn't an option. Angela took several deep breaths, trying to calm the panic raging inside. Cas was hurting. The usual steadfast voice in her head was nothing but a frantic murmur that relayed information. Dean was stuck in the middle of nowhere with no direction to go, Sam was in danger, and she needed to get a phone as soon as possible.

Which was calm and steady angel speak for right this damn instant.

Gripping the table beside the bed with a shaking hand, the other trying to peel back the thing sheet and heavier blanket draped over her, Angela sucked in a deep breath. Blue eyes locked on the open door leading to the hallway beyond and, she hoped, someone who could help her. As loud as she could, through a dry, disused, and ventilator-abused throat, Angela yelled for that help. It took her three tries before her voice carried enough to make it downstairs.

"Bobby!"

Chapter End Notes

A/Ns: I apparently put all the author notes at the start of this chapter, leaving me nothing much to say here...I'm sure I'm forgetting things...Oh! Hey! We passed 600,000 words two chapters ago! I'm using AO3's counter because it doesn't count my author notes in (70,000 plus words in author notes...that's an entire novel to itself...yup, I can believe that. Totally sounds 'bout right ._.) But back to that 600,000 word thing. Holy crap! :D

Review Replies: Still...so...far...behind...Still working on it, too. Just hang tight if you haven't heard from me. You will, eventually. I promise [insert silent but oh-so-dramatic weeping, open-mouthed babbling here] Just know that all of your comments, from the quick and simple to the novel-length and complex, have been so so so appreciated and loved.

Up Next: Sam's been shot, Dean gets a surprise guest in his backseat but she comes bearing gifts (and a conversation Dean wants no part of), Gordon's back to chatting like he didn't almost just kill Sam or all-the-way kill Sam's brother, and Ellen Harvelle gets a late-night phone call.

Chapter 97: Season 2: Chapter 64

Chapter Notes

A/Ns: Guuuuuuuys. I'm having a slight crisis. Do you all remember when I fell down the stairs and sprained my hand last year? Whelp, I also broke my phone that day (in HALF. With my BUTT.) And do you know what was on that phone? Every idea for this story that I had while not within arm's reach of paper or computer for three years. So far, I've made do without those notes because most of them were broad thoughts I remember or written down elsewhere in more detail. However, I just hit a part of the story I've had planned out for months. Like, down-to-the-dialogue planned out. Guess where those plans are? That's right. On my butt-broken phone.

Now I'm sitting here like…Okay, you…you're a good writer, Silence. You can write this dream sequence without your notes. It doesn't matter that it's literally the dream sequence half your audience requested after you told them chest!Cas and present!Cas could talk to one another. It's- it's fine. It's totally fine. You- you don't need those notes. You got this.

In short: I so do (maybe) not got this. I have gone to a tech store and haven't yet decided if I'm going to give them money on the promise of 'we'll try but we might no be able to get you anything'. Right now I'm trying to convince myself that I got this. Anyway, if I announce a switch to two-week posting schedule several weeks from now, this mini-crisis will be why. (But I won't do that until after this arc and the last of cliffhanger row, so no stressing.)

Last time on TRSF… Gordon told Sam he'd seen Dean dealing with a demon, and that was why he needed to be taken out. Sam had laughed coldly, told Gordon he was an idiot, and then stepped into the room, shooting at him. Gordon took one in the thigh but got a return shot on Sam, somewhere in his chest. The hit spun Sam around and he fell back into the livingroom.

Chapter Warnings: We've got a whirlwind of a chapter ahead of us. Sam's having all the things thrown at him (bullets, knives, punches, bodies), Gordon's clearing some things up that no one asked for (rabid, drugged up raccoons), Dean's still stuck waiting but this time it's on a certain mulleted genius (who needs to get a new clock), and Angela shows up with relationship advice (no time like the present crisis!) Oh, and it's another cliffhanger, but for once it's on a positive note! ;)

-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-

The Road So Far (This Time Around)

Season 2: Chapter 64

-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-

Dean was dead. His brother was dead.

Sam didn't want to believe it, but the truth was, outside of Dean's promise of a future that required both of them alive, Sam had no real reason to think Gordon was lying. The proof was on the phone he held in his hand, his brother's sightless eyes staring up at him from a grainy photograph. Dean was dead, Gordon had killed him, and now, standing a room away from the murdering bastard, Sam was going to murder the hunter that had taken his brother from him.

Dust was still settling in the air from shaking walls and distressed wood. Sam's eyes were dark in the dimly lit kitchen, so indiscernible from the pure black they'd been only minutes before.

"I saw it myself," Gordon said from the other room. "He was with a woman. A woman who disappeared in the blink of an eye."

Sam thumbed the menu button on the phone again, re-awakening the dimmed screen before it could go dark and the phone permanently lock. He stared at the picture as it lit fully once more. His brother's bloody face and dead eyes. Dean said he was going to call an angel, but he'd used male pronouns (for what that was worth).

Had his brother lied to him? Could he have gone to summon a demon instead? Is that why he'd left Sammy behind, chickened out of their deal with a half-assed note and snuck away in the middle of the night?

No. It didn't make any sense. Not only had the two of them been making some progress on the trusting-one-another and not-lying fronts (to the point where Sam felt fairly confident his brother hadn't lied about this), but summoning a demon to help them get Cas back didn't make sense. What could a demon do? Summoning an angel, however, did. And that's what Dean wanted: Cas back, safe. Sam had no doubt about that. Angels took whatever gender their vessel happened to be, so it wasn't like the fact that it was a woman who met with Dean meant much. And angels disappeared in the blink of an eye just like demons.

Dean had found something willing to help: an angel. And Gordon had killed him because he was so damn sure Dean, a psychic, an 'other', must be evil because he wasn't purely human.

The close-minded, racist, thoughtless bastard.

Sam laughed aloud, the sound bitter and cold. Gordon killed his brother over meeting with an angel. The 'good guys', or what should have been considered a good guy to anyone not up to speed with the coming Apocalypse. But Gordon Walker was one of those types of hunters. A black and white, human and other, son of a bitch hunter.

Who had just killed Dean Winchester, the Righteous Man, for meeting with an angel.

The young hunter's overwhelming, uncontrollable anger was taking second place. He was still filled with rage, but it was a hard thing. Cold and sharp. Gordon's words were helping to ground him of all things. Sam looked down at the gun in his hand. The grip was hot – unnaturally hot – from his terrifying tight hold and he released his fist with a breath. The gun sat, steady, in his open palm.

If he was going to kill Gordon – which Sam told himself he wouldn't – he was going to do it with a gun. Not with Azazel's power. Not with demon blood. That was what the Yellow Eyed Demon wanted. To build up those powers, to deplete his supply, to leave him in withdrawal and desperate for more. To be a slave to what Azazel could (and happily would) give him.

No. Sam wouldn't give that bastard the satisfaction. He wouldn't give Gordon what he wanted, either. He would not prove the son of a bitch right about psychics or Winchesters.

And maybe, just maybe, Dean would come back. Sam was less than comfortable with the concept of returning from the dead, but his brother had told him of enough instances of it happening that Sam had the distinct feeling it could. It might. Maybe it would. When Cas came back, maybe the angel could bring his brother back.

Sam just had to be patient and have faith.

Dean wouldn't want him to kill Gordon. Oh, the older Winchester would probably kill the man himself happily, but he wouldn't want his little brother doing it. Especially not with that buzz beneath his skin. No, if Sam was going to do this, if he was going to take care of Gordon, it would be his way. The younger Winchester way.

He pressed the menu button on Gordon Walker's phone again, this time closing the photo gallery application and pulling up the device's settings, gun tight in his other hand and ready to fire one last time.

-o-o-o-

Sam sat up in the living room with a grunt and gritted teeth, that same gun still in hand now three bullets lighter, and free hand pressed to his bleeding chest. Shit. That hadn't been part of the plan. He knew he'd probably take a bullet, he'd factored that much into his gamble, but the hit had been way too close. And on his dominant side too.

The younger Winchester left his gun in his lap, eyes on the kitchen doorway in case Gordon got any quick ideas, and reached up to the right breast pocket of his flannel. He winced, biting down to keep from making any noise as he removed his phone and the folded note from Dean, bits of plastic and paper left behind in bruised and bleeding skin. Sam stared at the device, which had taken the brunt of Gordon's shot, thank God.

Of course, a .308 bullet from a hunting rifle at close range meant that thing had kept right on going.

Sam was damn lucky. Without that phone, he'd be as dead as his brother. The bullet had been slowed by the thick plastic, enough so that its trajectory skewed. It kept going, right into Sam, but through his side – in and out between his ribs, maybe clipping one on the way – rather than his lungs or the more movement-deterring collarbone or shoulder blade.

Still hurt like hell, though. His chest was on fire and lifting his arm to aim was going to hurt more still. Enough to compromise his shot, maybe. Sam slipped the now-useless phone into the pocket on his left side instead, bloody note tucked right along with it. Left-handed, he picked his gun back up, splitting his gaze between the hole in the wall to his right and the kitchen entrance to his left. But Gordon hadn't followed him through and Sam didn't think he would.

He knew his shot had landed as well, somewhere in the hunter's leg. He could hear Gordon huffing on the other side of the wall. So Sam took the time to climb to his feet – quietly and carefully – so he could reposition himself more securely in the larger room. He was low on ammo; he knew his count and only had a single bullet left. With his right arm tucked tight to his chest, Sam reconned the room with a quick scan. There were two handguns sitting on the table and the young hunter moved over to them, keeping an eye as his line of sight into the kitchen changed. But he couldn't see Gordon, so he grabbed one of the guns and checked its clip.

He didn't like using someone else's guns – much preferred the weapons he was familiar with and trusted – but desperate times called for desperate measures. It hurt like hell, but Sam managed to tuck his own gun into his waistline along his back, the first of Gordon's tucked to the side, and cocked the second. The hammer hadn't finished sliding into place when its owner let out a low, rolling chuckle from the kitchen.

"Got me in the leg, Sammy," Gordon said, the grin obvious in his words as well as the pain. Sam knew a thing or two about the latter, but there wasn't shit about this that was remotely funny to him. "Don't suppose you want to call it a draw?"

As if Sam couldn't tell from the tone alone that Gordon Walker was anything but ready to walk away from this. Hunters didn't walk away and Sam was getting the feeling this particular hunter didn't even know the meaning of the word.

Or other words. Honor, decency, family. Sanity. Just to name a few.

"Sure," Sam answered, voice cold. He might be keeping that buzzing back by a dam made of pure will and moral resilience, but that didn't make him any less angry. Any less murderous, even while promising himself he wouldn't murder anyone that night. Sam eyed both entrances to the kitchen, fingers curling again and again around the grip of Gordon's gun. "Just throw that rifle out here, first."

He got another chuckle for that one and Sam ground his teeth against the sound.

"Yeah…don't think that's gonna work out for me, Sammy."

Sam closed his eyes, jaw clenched so tight it hurt, and told himself he would not kill Gordon Walker just for calling him Sammy. He would not kill Gordon Walker for a stupid nickname. He said it again and again, like writing lines on a school chalkboard in after-school detention until it stuck. Not that he was actually old enough to have suffered that form of punishment, but cartoons used it often enough still.

"What guarantee do I have that you won't just shoot me first chance you get?" In the kitchen, Gordon leaned his head back against the cabinet, a dark smile playing on his lips. "And after I killed your brother. Yeah. Somehow I don't see us walking out of here hand-in-hand, Sammy. Singing 'Kumbaya.'"

This was all entirely a game to the man, the younger Winchester knew. Gordon had no intention of laying down arms, so all of this? Nothing but fun for the sick bastard. Sam shouldn't answer him. Sam should be the better man, the stronger man.

Except he'd never been all that good at being good. There was demon blood in his veins as proof enough of that.

"I can guarantee that you're wrong about me. And my brother." Sam eyes locked on the gun in his hand and he repeated his mantra. I will not kill Gordon Walker. The itch beneath his skin grew like a flurry of bees, but Sam did his best to ignore it. He would not kill Gordon Walker. Not with those powers, not with the man's own gun. He wouldn't. "And I'm going to prove it to you."

Those deep brown eyes locked on the kitchen, dangerous and absolutely deadly despite any mantra in his head. He had a plan, Sam reminded himself, the first steps of which were already in action. Now he just had to stick to it.

-o-o-o-

Dean was just beginning to worry when Cas finally came back. It had been eight minutes. Eight. Cas was usually gone and back in under one. The hunter managed not to jump when the angel – back in Angela Garrett's trench-coated body – popped into existence in the backseat. The sudden breathing, moving presence of another living being coming out of nowhere was always somewhat of a surprise, no matter how used to the phenomena you got. A cell phone – Bobby's, he would put good money on – popped up in his peripheral vision and Dean grabbed it without even looking, already putting the car back into drive and peeling out.

"Thanks, Cas," the hunter muttered, flipping the device open and dialing Sam. He pressed the phone to his ear, eyes catching Cas's in the rear view mirror. Dean had to split his attention between the road and those blue eyes as his gut flared, instincts immediately set on red alert.

Something was different.

Cas was breathing raggedly, like a human who'd run a marathon. And her face was a myriad of emotion – exhaustion, fear, pain, confusion, terror – so much so that she looked…human. Incredibly human. And not at all like the angel he knew.

"Hi, Dean," Cas said and the hunter realized immediately that was not his angel in the backseat. Even before she offered a weak, trembling smile. "Nice to officially meet you."

The Impala screeched to a halt in the middle of the road as Dean did a double take, then spun around to stare at the woman in the back of his car. "Angela!?"

"In the flesh," the woman joked, or at least attempted to. She winced, a hand curled around her torso. Everything about her posture screamed uncomfortable. "Sorry. Terrible joke."

Still pressed to his ear, Bobby's phone abruptly switched directly from a dialing tone to Sam's voicemail. The automated messaging system was audible in the quiet car and Dean distractedly ended the call, snapping the flip phone shut. His brother's phone hadn't even rung. Just straight to voicemail. Shit, that was so not good. If Sam's phone wasn't on, Dean couldn't even use the phone company to track it, which had been his Plan B if Sammy didn't pick up.

Shit!

"Are you…" Dean physically shook his head, trying to rattle his brain back into gear. He glanced at the road over his shoulder, then Bobby's phone, then the angel – not angel? – in his backseat. Crap, he so did not have time for this right now. "Are you hurt? Is Cas okay? What-"

"He's okay," Angela interrupted, realizing the man in front of her was about as frantic as he was confused. Given the bits and pieces Castiel had managed to relay, Angela could understand why. "Just hurting and needs to…uh…rest. Guess I'm in the driver's seat till then."

Dean looked down at the phone again, fingers white around the plastic casing. Damnit…Sam's phone was dead, which meant getting a GPS lock on it was out. And now it looked like their immediate ride to that location he didn't have a chance of getting anymore was also out.

Shit. Shit!

"Cas says…he can get us to Sam if he has a location." Angela said, like she'd read his mind. Doubtful, given Cas's condition. At least Angela seemed okay. Well, -ish. The woman's breathing was labored but at least it was steady. Even. Probably not gonna give out anytime soon, which Dean hadn't even realized was a concern until the damn thought popped into his head. "Might have to leave B-baby behind, though."

Okay… Okay, okay, okay. Dean slammed his eyes shut, forcing his brain to focus on one thing at a time. If Cas was offering transport, than he was going to be fine. Hurting, yes, out of the game for the foreseeable future, (coughing up blood for three days, maybe), but fine. Angela was probably freaking the hell out about all this and Dean was sure she'd need some serious trauma therapy by the end of it, but she seemed to be holding her own as well. Which meant Sam was the one he needed to focus on. Find Sam.

How?

Dean flipped the phone back open and started searching through Bobby's contacts, knowing Ellen Harvelle wouldn't be far down the list.

-o-o-o-

Ellen made it to the phone – an old landline hanging off one of the support pillars behind the bar – by the second ring. It was late, 'bout a half-hour passed closing time, and she'd been just about ready to call it a night. But the only people who called that number this late were hunters who needed help.

"Yeah, who is this and what do you need?"

"Ellen."

The bar owner straightened, back going rigid at Dean Winchester's voice. He sounded like shit. She gripped the phone with her other hand, eyes darting back and forth as her mind raced with possible scenarios. "Dean. Honey, what's wrong?"

"Get Ash. I need him to run a trace on Gordon Walker's number."

"Whoa, Dean…" Ellen was speechless. Far as she knew, Dean Winchester was a good kid, and a damn fine hunter. Which meant he should know better than to ask that. "Look, I'm happy to help however I can and I'm no fan of Gordon's, but we don't do that to fellow hunters, Dean. You know that-"

"He tried to take me out, Ellen!" Dean snapped down the line and Ellen froze, widening in disbelief. "Now he's after Sam, and I gotta get there first."

"He what?" The barkeep turned around, phone pressed hard enough to her ear to hurt. Gordon Walker was bad news – always had been – but Ellen never thought he'd go that far. She hadn't even known the boys knew him. What the hell could have possibly possessed Gordon to go after two of their own?

"Ellen, if he kills my brother, I swear to god-"

She spun towards the pool tables, searching the darkened back of the bar for a passed out figure atop one of them. "Ash! Get your ass over here now!"

-o-o-o-

Four and a half minutes. That's how long Ash said he'd need to hack Gordon's phone company and turn the GPS in his device on.

"That creep?" Ash scoffed when Dean asked if he could trace Gordon Walker's location through his phone. "Hell's yes, my man, I can do that for ya. There's something seriously off about that dude. Oh, by the way, I had some major breakthroughs with your father's research, amigo. You're not gonna believe this-"

"Yeah, later, Ash," Dean all but snapped, lucky he hadn't broken Bobby's phone in two with the death grip he had on it.

"'Course, my friend, of course."

Ellen took the phone back by that point, realizing the Winchester was as likely to turn his murderous sights on Ash if he couldn't turn them on Gordon. And Ash wasn't the best with social cues or hints.

"We'll call you back as soon as we have something, hun."

That had been one whole minute ago, according to Baby's dash clock. A whole minute of aimless driving, quite literally spinning his wheels. Dean was heading towards the motel for lack of anywhere better to go, but it irked him. His fingers were wrapped so tightly around the steering wheel his joints ached. With nothing more he could actually do and hating feeling so damn useless, Dean kept glancing in the rear view mirror at his back passenger, who wasn't looking so hot.

"You okay?"

"Oh, you know. Peachy." Angela's eyebrows waggled and Dean huffed, shaking his head. She was pale and winced on occasion with some unseen, internal distress, but Dean didn't push. It was clear the woman wasn't interested in chatting about it. Instead, she inched forward on the seat, taking her time to avoid falling over completely. Her muscles weren't in complete atrophy, but it turned out that, without Cas's usual healing of her body, she was pretty much at newborn-faun status over here. It sucked big time. The pins and needles alone.

"So…I gotta ask." Angela curled weak fingers along the top of the front seat. The leather was cool beneath her trembling touch and she took a moment just to appreciate the feel of something again. "Because, honestly, I didn't think I'd ever get to talk to you face to face."

Green irises eyed her in the mirror, one eyebrow raised in question. Angela slapped on her best smile. The one that always had Mark insinuating cat-related, canary-eating analogies.

"You gonna tap that, or what?"

The Impala definitely swerved for a second and Angela was completely torn between holding on for dear life and bursting out laughing. Since she was kind of too weak for either, what came out was a pathetic conglomeration of both.

Dean spun his head to look at her, then corrected the car, then tried to turn again, thought better of it, gripped the steering wheel, and glanced between the road and rear view mirror a number of times at a truly epilepsy-inducing speed. Angela was rather enjoying the performance.

"What? What?"

Righting herself took more strength than she really had, and the muscles in Angela's arms twitched and spasmed with the effort, but she did manage to remain upright. She shrugged in response to Dean's bafflement, in part to flex and stretch those attention-starved muscles. It was a terrible idea, resulting in one hell of a heinous neck cramp on her left sie. She worked through it with a grimace, distracting herself with Dean's adorable cluelessness. "I know, I know: not really the right time. But, like I said, I probably won't get another chance and I've been dying to ask you since, like, day three."

Silence reigned in the car, then Angela let out a little huff of air that was too close to a laugh for Dean to ever be comfortable with it. She smiled to herself. "'Dying'. Heh."

"I- what...what are you talking about?"

The Dragon Lady in his rear view mirror shrugged again. "You and Cas."

"Me and Cas…what?"

Piercing blue eyes narrowed under a furrowed brow and Dean got the distinct impression that Angela Garrett would have made a fantastical mom. She had the look down pat. Dragon Lady Mom. Beats out Mama Bear every damn time (roasts mama bear on a spit, more like).

"You know."

"No," Dean argued, shaking his head with one big, exaggerated sweep. "No, I most definitely do not know."

Despite the fact that Sam was in danger, Dean was stuck driving to a motel he knew was empty, Gordon Walker had successfully murdered him, and there was an injured angel riding shotgun inside a mother effing Dragon Lady Chatty Kathy in his backseat, it was the look Angela pinned him with that sparked the most fear in Dean yet. Which was utterly ridiculous. So ridiculous Dean wanted to pull over, call it quits, and tell whoever had concocted this god damn charade: congrats, they won, they could just kill him now.

"You're being stupid on purpose and, despite what Sam says, it's doesn't really suit you."

"Okay, you know what-"

"Is it the guy thing? Cuz…I mean, right now he's not really a 'guy'," the woman said with exaggerated air quotes, and oh yeah, that's definitely where Cas had learned them from. "Pretty sure he's never actually a guy, but, you know. Details." Angela flapped her hand dismissively like being a genderless Angel of the friggin' Lord was unimportant and instead gestured to herself. "Right now he's a pretty hot chick. Not that I'm bragging. Okay, I'm bragging a little bit. I know I'm a catch. So what's the holdup? It's obvious you're interested."

Between the flapping of her hand, the pinched fingers to demonstrate just how much she wasn't bragging, and the rapid-fire speech, Dean's head was spinning. And most of that was still just from the damn topic.

"I'm not having this conversation with you." Dean faced the front stoically, keeping his eyes determinedly on the road, not matter how difficult a task that actually was. It lasted all of about fourteen seconds. "And really? Now? You're bringing this up now? That's your go-to?"

Angela shrugged again, this time more cautiously. She had her right foot in the grave and about six of the eight inches of her left alongside it. There were no regrets to be had here. Dean, on the other hand, seemed to be having plenty. Like opening up a line of conversation at all with the Dragon Lady in his backseat. There was another beat of defensive, frustrated silence in which knowing blue eyes just stared patiently (evil, not patient. Evil.) and Dean avoided meeting them at all costs. He was not having this conversation.

"I am not interested, damnit. What is it with everyone and me and Cas, huh?"

Okay, apparently he was.

Green eyes flashed to his passenger completely against his will and Angela, who was quite smug with the very short time she'd had to wait for him to break down, seemed genuinely surprised by the question. Her shoulders went up and down in a little, innocent shrug yet again. (Nothing about this woman was innocent, Dean thought. Nothing.)

"It's the way you look at him. Her. I mean me. Us?"

Once more – despite the ridiculous stress in the car, the tension of a situation that could likely end in his brother's death and had ended in his death, along with this mother effing conversation – Dean was oddly relieved to know he wasn't the only one struggling with the pronouns.

"I don't look at him- her- you-" Damnit, he hadn't even meant to do it that time- "in any way."

"Oh, yes you do!" Angela laughed, then immediately stopped laughing when she realized Dean wasn't. He was serious. Oh dear lord, he was serious. Big, blue eyes stared at him in shock. "Wait, you really don't know?"

Oh shit. She hadn't meant to- Okay…well, this conversation just got awkward.

"Um…oh…well, you really should know, because if you don't meant to be doing it-"

"Doing what?" the hunter barked from the front seat even as he pulled off the main highway back into town. They were only about two minutes from the motel. And where the hell was Ash with a location and the blessed end to this conversation?!

"Let me ask you something first," Angela said, her tone much quieter now and (if Dean was one to even consider something so feely where this woman was concerned) more respectful. "You and the Cas from the other time- your time. Did you…ever…?"

Her eyebrows were suggestive enough that Dean's forehead smoothed out and he got that really scary look usually reserved for ghosts and vamps and Gordon Fucking Walker.

"No!"

"Okay, but was it the guy thing?"

He was gonna kill the woman in his backseat. It wouldn't even be murder, because he was a hunter and she was the god damn devil.

"It was the Cas thing!" he yelled, way above indoor voice level. Dean could feel his entire face growing red. From embarrassment, sure, but more so from anger and barely contained murder rage. Of course, he probably couldn't murder Angela without hurting Cas at this point, or at least making the guy go find another vessel…. Dean went rigid as that thought – more of a dalliance than anything serious – made him realize something entirely else. Something that definitely made his face go red with embarrassment. "Can he hear this?"

Shit. This conversation was ridiculous. So much so that Dean was contemplating eating his own gun just to get out of it. But he also didn't need his best friend hearing it. Not only for the pure mortification factor, but more so because Dean had never been good at policing his words when he was angry or, even worse, emotional. He didn't need Cas hearing something that might sound…wrong out of context. Hurtful.

Angela paused, turning her head to the side and eyes darting back and forth as she obviously talked with someone Dean couldn't hear. She righted her head soon enough, shaking it instead, waves of dark hair tossing back and forth and being so stupidly distracting that Dean was able to cling right back onto the anger over the embarrassment.

"He isn't answering, so I don't think so."

Yeah…alright, this timeline's Cas wasn't comfortable enough with deceit yet (never, Dean corrected harshly) to be faking. The human wrung his hands along the steering wheel, his breathing speeding up for completely and utterly ridiculous reasons. Even so, some of the tension eased out of his shoulders, which had been stiff and climbing up, up, up around his ears the longer this conversation went on.

"Look…" Dean cut himself off, shaking his head again. He couldn't believe he was having this conversation. "Cas is my best friend, alright? I love him, I do. But it's a brother thing. Sister, in this case."

Green eyes darted to the mirror, but couldn't hold Angela's gaze for long.

In the back, Angela bit her lip to keep back the automatic laugh. She was starting to know the man in front of her pretty well, from lots of observation and internal chatter with her angel. Laughing at him when he was attempting to open up – however poorly he was succeeding at doing that – would only shut him down faster.

Plus (and she really was shocked by this) Dean honestly didn't seem to know.

"The way you look at me, at Cas, is definitely not sisterly."

Oh, but the way the tips of his ears turned red, so much so that she could tell even in the dark car, was adorable. Those shoulders inched back up towards covering those ears and it made Angela want to laugh even more because, yeah, what a horn dog. He'd been so laughably bad for those first couple days.

Angela stifled her amusement and kept her tone far more serious – far more gentle, too – as she continued, "It's not the way a guy looks a girl because he's got the hots for her, either, you know."

Dean glanced her way almost hesitantly, but once again couldn't hold her gaze. She didn't insist he try, instead looking at the back of his head and hoping it might help him, at the very least, listen to her words. "You look at me like Mark does. You look at me like you know me, Dean. Like…everything about me, and expect…just, everything from me, too. It's…"

Angela blew out a breath, eyebrows going up in that expectant way all girls seemed to have.

"It's intense. And terrifying. If I were not a happily taken woman and also about one step shy of being completely dead-" In the front seat, Dean made a choking noise and Angela had to bite her lip again- "I'd have fallen for that look by day two."

The woman allowed a genuine smile – soft and sweet and maybe even a little sad, like she could be when she wanted – and knew Dean was watching her in the mirror. She chanced a glance up and the hunter held her gaze this time for as long as he could while driving.

"I'm not saying you don't know how you feel, Dean. You know that way better than me. If you say you don't like Cas that way, then okay. You don't." Angela shrugged, eyes going from the mirror to the black asphalt and yellow lines stretching out into the night. "But maybe you should know what Cas sees when you look at him. What everyone else sees, too, cuz that look is not subtle."

In the front, Dean swallowed past the giant-est damn frog on the friggin' planet stuck in his throat and cursed Ash's name with every cuss word he knew. Four minutes his ass. "I don't mean to look at him…like…that…okay?"

He was looking at the mirror again before he could stop himself, but Dragon Lady didn't look particularly judgmental. Dean didn't want to be having this conversation, damnit, but even he could admit it helped that she was…just trying to help, he supposed. She wasn't teasing him anymore, not since she'd realized…shit. Did he really put off some kind of gay-for-an-angel vibe that badly? Sure, there'd been the couple of assholes over the years who liked to comment on it (Crowley and Balthazar, for starters) but Dean had always thought they were just…you know. Assholes.

Baby's leather creaked beneath his tightening grip. He didn't mean to. He didn't. Better yet, he wasn't. It wasn't like that between him and Cas. But if that 'look' really was a thing he did…if the way he looked at Cas really was, somehow…uh…misleading certain people (assholes and Dragon Ladies), then….

Shit. Shit. How long had that been going on for? And how the hell did he not do it going forward? He supposed he could just not look at Cas ever again. Bigger sacrifices had been made in the name of manliness.

Dean shook his head and tried to focus. They had so many other world-ending crises to deal with, here, goddamnit.

"We've been through a lot together, alright? Cas knows me better than anyone else. Maybe even better than Sam. But that doesn't mean we're…in…that I- and this Cas-"

Angela raised a sardonic eyebrow in the rear view mirror as Dean went on stuttering and stumbling. The corner of her lips twitched up and it looked like the nice, helpful, and (dare-he-say) friend sitting in his backseat had been gobbled back up by the Dragon Lady.

"Don't hurt yourself."

"Shut up." There wasn't even heat in it and for that Dean cursed himself. Then Ash again just because he fucking could.

It was right at that moment that Bobby's phone started ringing and thank Christ. Dean grabbed it off the seat like a friggin' lifeline and answered just a little too desperately. Luckily, Ellen didn't think twice about the squeak in his voice. Pure worry for Sam, she probably thought, and Dean was more than happy to let her keep right on thinking that.

"You got something for me?"

It was Ash, yelling in the background on what was clearly a speakerphone call, who answered. "5637 Monroe Street!"

"Thanks." Dean was about to hang up and flip the car back around for the highway when Ellen's voice stopped him. He still put on his blinker and spun the car, but he kept the line open.

"Bring him home, Dean."

If that frog was back in his throat, choking him up for entirely different reasons, well…Dean blinked through it, telling the damn amphibian to fuck off. "Yeah. Sure thing, Ellen."

He snapped Bobby's phone shut and met Angela's eyes in the rear view mirror. "You ready to go?"

Angela nodded even as she closed her eyes. "I'll wake Cas up."

-o-o-o-

Gordon kept his rifle trained on the entrance to the kitchen. It was hard not to keep glancing to his left, to the hole in the wall that led to the same room on the other side. But if he split his focus like that, he was going to wind up dead. Sam was a good shot; he only needed a fraction of a second to fire first.

Question was, why hadn't he?

He knew Sam's count; the kid should have one more bullet in the chamber. Not to mention Gordon's two hand guns he'd left in that room. Given the amount of time Sam had been quiet while Gordon had tied a makeshift tourniquet around his thigh, the other hunter had surely reconned the space and found both weapons.

So what was he waiting for?

Gordon supposed he could ask himself the same question. He had the firepower to shoot clean through the wall separating him and Sammy. But he didn't have the kid's location on the other side of that wall, and unlike the Heckler and Koch SL8 that he'd killed Dean with, this rifle wasn't semi-automatic. He could definitely lay down some cover fire and hope to kill the kid with luck, but Gordon had always preferred to make his kills more…personal.

Which was why he was waiting on Sammy to give him an opening.

Maybe the baby Winchester needed a little extra incentive, was all. 'Course, the last time he'd done that, the kid had made the whole house shake. Still…Gordon had never exactly prided himself on been the overly-cautious type.

"You know…given all the things I'd heard about Dean Winchester being this…amazing hunter, just like his old man…" Gordon settled back against the far cabinets, knees up, rifle poised, yet the picture of relaxed. "He didn't really live up to the hype."

Last time Sammy had done…whatever it was he'd done to the walls, Gordon could have pinpointed his location down to an inch. The way the surface had bent wasn't unlike an explosion in extreme slow motion. The focal point had been obvious. Gordon tightened his grip on the rifle, eyeing the length of wood that would tell the same story a second time. He just had to get Sammy to use those powers.

"My brother was a good hunter," Sam barked back, and Gordon grinned at the anger in his voice. And the past tense.

"Yeah, maybe he was. But he had a leg up on the rest of us, didn't he? He was a psychic."

In the living room, Sam clenched his teeth, eyes sliding shut against every instinct. Gordon threw the word out like it ought to have saved Dean, when he was the one who killed him with a cowardly sniper shot in the dark. It made Sam's blood boil.

"You know, I almost thought setting up that bogus hunt to get you two here wouldn't work? If Dean was psychic and all that, I thought…for sure he'll figure it out right outta the gate. But he didn't have a clue."

On the other side of the wall, Sam straightened, back rigid from the new information. What? The case they'd come here on… A man stabbed with a silver tipped blade and a lot of coincidences to make it look like he was a werewolf.

"The guy in the parking lot…. That was you?" Sam asked, voice hollow with a second death, more blood, on this hunter's hands. But how could Gordon have set up the animal attacks? Sam remembered – vividly, thank you very much – being chased by a damn rabid raccoon.

"Yeah. I came to this town looking for someone else. One of you psychics," Gordon drawled with a dark, humorless chuckle. "Kid by the name of Scott Carey. Could fry a person from the inside out with just a touch. Imagine that."

Sam's breath caught at the name. The young hunter found himself rigid in the other room. Frozen. Oh, his gun was still trained and ready to fire, but his brain was a couple hundred miles away, with Andy Gallagher.

"He was 'bout your age, actually, Sammy." Gordon was still talking, but Sam wasn't listening. "'Course, he was already gone by the time I got here. His old man was real torn up about it, thought the boy skipped town. Depression, or some shit like that. But if you ask me? Someone got to him before I could."

Scott Carey was from Lafayette? Sam closed his eyes again, something he knew he shouldn't do, but God. Suddenly, the younger Winchester was a million times more grateful that they hadn't brought Andy with them on this case.

"How do you even know any of that?" Sam asked through clenched teeth, brown eyes flashing back open angrily.

"Same way I know about you, Sammy."

The younger hunter clenched his fist around the grip of his borrowed gun and reminded himself he wasn't going to kill this man just for calling Sammy. At this point, he might kill him for plenty of other reasons, but it wouldn't be just that one. Slowly, Sam started moving towards the hole on the far end of the wall. He was pretty sure Gordon was closer to the kitchen entrance.

"I was doing this exorcism down in Louisiana. Teenage girl, seemed routine, some low-level demon." Gordon remembered the way the thing had hissed and seethed and burned. The human shell it was wearing had once been pretty. Bright future, Gordon was sure. But by then she was nothing but a used up demon condom. Death was 'bout the only thing he could offer her. "Between all the jabbering and the head-spinning, the damn thing muttered something. About a coming war."

In the living room, Sam stopped in his silent shuffling, eyes locked on that door into the kitchen. Gordon knew about the Apocalypse? That…might actually explain why he'd taken out Dean and tried to take out Sam. But everything he'd spewed so far…it didn't make any damn sense. Why not just say that? Why not just say he'd killed Dean to stop the damn Apocalypse?

(Not that it would make Sam any less willing to kill him, of course, but at least then Dean's death wouldn't be because of a damn lie and Gordon's racist paranoia.)

"I don't think it meant to," Gordon continued and Sam quietly resumed his movements towards the far wall, telling himself to stay focused. "It just kind of…slipped out. But it was too late. Piqued my interest. And you know…you can really make a demon talk, you got the right tools."

Sam had to draw in a calming breath, then about six more just to keep his voice steady. I will not kill Gordon Walker. I will not kill Gordon Walker.

"What happened to the girl?"

"Hm?"

"The girl," Sam repeated through gritted teeth, loathing every falsely nonchalant bone in that asshole's body. "The one the demon was possessing."

"Oh…she didn't make it."

Sam let that breath right back out. I will not kill Gordon Walker… quickly. I will kill him slowly, and painfully, and-

"Anyway. This demon tells me there are soldiers to fight in this coming war. Even said I knew one." From the kitchen, Gordon laughed again and Sam took the opportunity to press his back against the wall separating them, confident Gordon couldn't pinpoint his location over the sound of his own voice. "I figured Dean's name was the one it would drop, but no. It was yours. Our very own, Samuel Winchester."

Yeah, that sounded about right from Dean's recount of events. His brother hadn't gone into detail about Gordon's vendetta against Sam, but what he was hearing now made more sense than the hunter going after Dean. Sam could see this chain of events going down in the timeline Dean came from. Dean's lie about being psychic in this one seemed to be the root of Gordon's changed behavior.

"With a little more…incentive, I got a couple other names, too. Still nothing 'bout Dean, but…I did my research. So I figured when the one the demon named here didn't pan out…" Gordon shrugged against the cabinets, finger tapping a repetitive rhythm against the rifle's trigger. "I knew it wouldn't take much to get you two here. Set up what looked like a hunt, place the right calls. See, I got friends at the Roadhouse, too, Sammy. Turns out, it's not too hard to get a hold of Bobby Singer."

The younger Winchester's entire left side of his face ached from the tension in his jaw, but he held it all in. There was still dust in the air from his last temper tantrum; he couldn't afford another. Reminded of that, Sam reached up, clamping his hand around that damn injection site in his trapezius. The buzz was strongest there and, he was pretty sure, entirely psychosomatic. He just had to get his brain – and his temper – to remember that.

"You killed someone just to get us here?" Sam said instead, forcing the change in topic, original goal back in mind. At least, as firmly as he could make it stick past the buzzing and rage. He just needed to stall long enough to incapacitate Gordon and get out. Before he did something he'd regret later.

Inside the kitchen, his adversary audibly scoffed. "A low-life drug dealer. Not worth the air he breathed."

Well, that was just wonderful. Sam flexed his fingers around the gun, closing his eyes. Gordon wasn't just 'Human and Other', he was flat out playing God. Another person – good or bad, which wasn't their right to judge – dead and gone. Sam was so damn tired of being the reason people kept dying.

"You son of a bitch. You-"

Bullets ripped through the wall between him and the kitchen, way too damn close for Gordon not having a lock on his location. Sam had to hit the floor to avoid getting ventilated. The rifle Gordon had wasn't automatic, Sam knew that from sighting it in the kitchen, but that didn't mean the other hunter couldn't fire off a round as fast as the gun could reload and his finger could pull the trigger.

"Shit," Sam muttered, scrambling in an army crawl further down the length of wall. He'd taken one to the arm in that barrage. Luckily, it was only a flesh wound, cut through fabric and enough layers of skin to bleed pretty decently, but that was about it.

"That's my mama you're talking about," Gordon called from the kitchen before he came charging through the gap in the wall, which Sam had unfortunately army crawled right towards to get away from the hail of bullets coming through the wood. Gordon's plan, no doubt.

Sam managed to clamber to his feet in time to block the butt of the rifle coming right at his jaw, but he had to drop his gun to do it. The block saved his face and probably one hell of a headache, but it cost him a brutal hit to his collarbone instead as the rifle landed at the junction of neck and shoulder. Sam cried out, hitting the ground hard, pain flaring up his neck.

At least his collarbone was still intact, the muscles taking the brunt of the hit.

The younger hunter rolled to the side, just in time to miss Gordon's rifle again as it slammed into the floorboards hard enough to crack the old wood. Desperate and only slightly disoriented, Sam swept his leg out, kicking at the base of that gun. His food landed solidly, knocking the rifle out of Gordon's grip and taking it to the floor. Another frantic kick knocked it out of reach.

Unfortunately, Gordon was a decent hunter, and any hunter worth their salt was quick to adapt. He drew his knife from his hip, the Buck 119 Cocobola a good six inches of promised death as Sam got one knee under him. The younger Winchester grunted with the force of Gordon's tackle, tumbling over backwards. Dust scattered back into the air with their landing, long arms and Sasquatch strength the only thing keeping Gordon's knife from sinking into his chest.

With gritted teeth and a straining grip on Gordon's wrists, Sam brought his knee up as much as he could between the man half-straddling his side, and slammed the side of his foot into Gordon's bleeding thigh, right below the tourniquet. The hunter cried out involuntarily, strength temporarily failing him as he doubled over the intense flare of pain up and down his thigh. Sam rolled out from under the knife, throwing Gordon to the side as much as he could with the move, and scrambled back to his feet a half dozen feet away.

"Damnit," Gordon hissed, kneeling on his good leg, one hand clamped down on the bad thigh, the other still holding the knife. He got back to his feet, keeping most of his weight off of his bleeding leg. He grinned at the other hunter, who so far hadn't gone for that gun he knew was tucked in his waistline. "Low blow. What's wrong, Sam? Don't got it in you to shoot me?"

A real hunter – a real man – wouldn't have hesitated.

Dark brown eyes, so dark they almost seemed all pupil, no iris, regarded Gordon coldly. With a grin, the hunter tossed his knife from hand to hand, an open invitation for Sam to come and take it from him if he was too good for a gun.

"What are you waiting for, Sammy?"

"I told you," the younger Winchester panted angrily, breaths coming in big, deep huffs. "It's Sam."

Gordon didn't wait for the hunter to finish. He threw the knife while Sam was busy correcting him. The Winchester's eyes widened, body turning to the side instinctually to avoid the hit. But Gordon had lied (well, sort of) when he told Sammy all he had on him was a knife. He actually had two knives. The hunter drew a smaller blade – a thing, delicate thing built into his belt-buckle – even as he flung the first. Gordon immediately followed the first attack with a second he knew the Winchester wouldn't have the time or speed to dodge.

"No!" Sam yelled out on pure instinct, flinging his hand out, body still turned, shoulder dropped and no other way to defend himself. The first blade flew past him, so close Gordon wouldn't be surprise if he managed to snip a button off the Winchester's jacket. But the second was a golden hit, straight for the chest.

It never made it. Gordon stared, eyes intense and murderous, at the blade as it hovered in midair, inches from its target. Sam's hand was still raised, just beyond the tip of the blade, fingers spread wide and trembling with strain. Gordon's eyes left the knife, tracking to the hunter's pain-crinkled features and the trail of blood, dark and thick, pouring from Sam Winchester's nose.

"I knew it," Gordon sneered.

The knife clattered to the ground and Sam joined it a second later. He managed to catch himself on all fours, but the young hunter's breath came in labored heaves. His head was pounding so fiercely he couldn't hear past the buzzing in his ears.

Shit. He should have known he didn't have the supply to do that, no matter what that itch beneath his skin thought. All he'd gotten this time was an injection and some spilled blood. He wasn't at his peak, like he'd been after that first jar. If only he'd had more. He needed more.

Realizing what he was thinking – how annoyed he was at his own weakness and the lack of demon blood in his system – Sam's stomach clenched in disgust and fear. He shook his head with a jolt, and, with it, tried to shake free those thoughts. Thoughts that he needed it. That he wanted it. If only he had it, he could do this. Could do anything.

That was exactly what Azazel wanted, damnit. Sam's skin crawled with that buzz, weak and feeble, and his head pounded dangerously, in a way it hadn't since last year. Since he'd passed out in a bathroom and woken up in a hospital. Damnit, if Dean wasn't dead – or he somehow came back – the older Winchester was going to be so pissed at him.

"You're not human, Sam."

The younger Winchester lifted his head to glare at the other hunter standing a half dozen feet away. Gordon was looking at him like something in need of extermination. The sad part was, Sam couldn't even really blame him for that. He didn't agree with it – screw that and screw this bastard – but he knew what he looked like. Blood pouring down his face, pushing himself hard enough to cause internal damage. And unlike Gordon Walker, he knew the source of that power.

Damnit, he was better that this. He had to be.

Sam grabbed the knife with a clumsy hand. He was just getting his legs back under him, Gordon apparently waiting (the man seemed to have a weird, macho desire to fight him hand-to-hand like a hopped up idiot), when a vibration and a ping broke the tense silence and labored breaths.

Both hunters looked over to a phone – Gordon's phone – laying on the ground just a couple feet away. It must have fallen out of Sam's pocket when he'd dove to the floor or when Gordon had tackled him. The screen was lit with an alert and from his kneeling position on the ground, Sam was able to read it.

Someone had just activated the GPS on Gordon's cell phone.

Huh.

A grin, exhausted and silly with relief, lit Sam's face as he realized what that meant.

There was only one person in the world who'd go to any length to find him, wherever he was. Sam's phone was shot, Gordon had taken Dean's, which meant there was only one place his older brother could possibly turn to in order to do that. Gordon Walker's phone. If that photo the murdering hunter had shown him was authentic – which Sam was pretty sure it was and Dean really had been dead – than there was only one way his big brother could be back. And she came with a pair of wings.

The younger Winchester started to laugh.

"What the hell's so funny?" Gordon asked, both angry and wary. He couldn't read the message on his phone from where he was standing, but he couldn't imagine what would cause that reaction. Especially in Sam's current state.

"Nothing," the younger hunter replied, grin still wide and white teeth shining in contrast to the dark blood staining his upper lip. He lifted his hand, wiping the edge of his jacket sleeve across his face. "Just your face in about…thirty seconds, I'm guessing."

It didn't even take that long.

Gordon charged, a basic wariness of the unknown driving him into action (was it possible Sam Winchester had a trick up his sleeve after all?). Sam blocked his first punch, not even using the knife clenched in his hand. Gordon didn't have a chance to land a second hit or Sam to block it before there was a displacement of air, a sound like wingbeats, and then two more bodies joined the fray.

-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-

A/N's: Uggggghghghghghgh guys. Sam and Gordon could not have cooperated with me less this chapter. Like pulling teeth getting those boys to face off against one another. At first they wouldn't talk, then they wouldn't shut up, and all I needed them to do was friggin' fight. Good God Gertrude! (Part of it was that, in all my note taking and planning for this arc, which was particularly detailed and heavy, I boiled this scene down to, and I quote, "then they fight" ._. Planning-Me kinda dropped the ball on this one.)

Drugged-Up Raccoons*: I had to cut it from the story due to flow, but there was originally a part where Sam realized Gordon used the drug dealer's stash to drug the wildlife and make them go crazy enough to attack humans. Which would have given us this golden line:*

"New plan: Sam was going to not-murder Gordon Walker slowly, then hand him over to his brother when Dean came back (because he was coming back), and together they were going to hand his ass over to PETA."

XD

Destiel: You all may have noticed from Angela's choice of conversation, that we are finally starting to pick up pace in the Destiel category (in case Andy and gay Heaven orgies weren't hint enough). Lolz, not that this can be described as anything speedy in the slightest (wouldn't want to let Jane down), but we are officially in the 'hints/hinting' stage. From here on out, I'll begin picking out things from the canon timeline that could go either way on Destiel, like the way Dean looks at Cas, and start pushing them towards the realization/revelation of a potential relationship while attempting not to break character or canon (meaning, Dean just generally freaking out with no idea why this keeps happening, and Cas oblivious that anything is actually happening at all).

For those of you who are not Destiel Fans but have made it this far, I sure hope you can continue on this journey with the rest of us. If nothing else, I do try to keep such moments amusing as possible (poor Dean :D) and never the main point of the story. I like romance as a natural part of stories, but never the plot or driving factor of where the story goes (if I did, I think these two would have gotten together already, GOOD GRIEF).

Reviews: I've been so busy lately that I'm slacking on review responses something major. Not just individual responses, but acknowledging big ideas that keep popping up in reviews! I meant to do it last chapter, so I wanna take a minute to do that now :) Feel free to skip if you're not into behind the scenes stuff.

*Also, on that note, you guys have AMAZING IDEAS. More than once I got tripped up, thinking 'gosh, maybe that idea is better than the route I chose…* XD There were several late-night, emergency meetings with the Muse.*

This also pushed the 'end notes' over the character limit on A03, so we're just posting at the end of the chapter instead :)

Dean Serving as a Vessel to Cas: Several people thought that Dean would offer himself as a vessel to Cas back at the gas station when the angel was unconscious. That is an awesome idea, but obviously not the route I went with, and here are two reasons why: One, Cas has been in danger several times on the show before where one of the boys offering to be a vessel might have helped, and neither have. I think this is two fold. One, it is ingrained in their brains that being vessel = bad! Two, I don't think it's something that occurs to them as an out. Let's be honest; neither Winchester is particularly good at actually remembering Cas is an angel. They treat him more like a super strong human (Which I think can be pretty tough on our angel, who's like…but I'm not human. Why do the boys only remember that when it's a bad thing? Poor Cas). The second reason, Numero B, is that Cas was unconscious so I don't think Dean saying yes would have made a difference. Pretty sure Cas has to be awake to possess a human. But, cool idea, guys!

How Did Sam Survive that Grenade?! I don't know, either! Hahah, probably not the answer you wanted but honestly, I borrowed from the show on this one. We don't get to see how Sam deals with either of the trip wires. Whether he found the second and triggered it on purpose, or whether he tripped it and managed to survive. Grenades have a four second delay on average, which actually makes them pretty crappy traps for a hunter trained by John Winchester :P Sam had plenty of time to dive as far away from that thing as possible, and the cricket-long legs to make that a pretty long distance :P Anyway, I liked keeping the vibe of the show, where sometimes the Winchesters pull miracles out of their asses and we don't get to know how XD Keeps them mysterious badasses.

Up Next: Uh, let's see. Dean has some choice words for Gordon, Cas is back for as long as he can stay not-passed out (and he's a little testy at being mistaken for a demon), Sam's a clever one who sticks to the timeline, and the boys wrap the night up with an Uber. (I'm just kidding. It's a taxi. Uber doesn't exist yet!)

Chapter 98: Season 2: Chapter 65

Chapter Notes

A/Ns: Sorry for the delay from the usual posting schedule. I didn't get any editing done this week and struggled with some major procrastination this weekend (work is draining and all I wanted to do was watch movies on the couch which is actually quite rare for me XD) On that note, this chapter only got one read through, so it maybe be heavy on the bloopers…

Previously on TRSF… Ava found Sam at his motel in Lafayette, Indiana to warm him that he was in danger. After listening to her vision about his death via trip-wire and grenade, Sam convinced her to head home to her fiancé. She left him her number and made him promise to call her after he found his brother. He gave her his hunting knife, telling her to keep it with her in case Azazel came for her. Then he went to meet Gordon. Meanwhile, Cas and Dean fled Heaven with Uriel and Rachel in tow. Rachel was stopped from passing through the gate and taken to Zachariah as a witness as to what happened.

(BTW, I've been using these "previously on…" as reminders of things that happened more than one chapter ago but in the same arc. I haven't been including what happened last chapter, so if you guys need a refresher I recommend just scanning quickly through the previous chapter. Otherwise these A/N notes are going to get soooo long. They're already long :P)

Chapter Reference – Cas's Demotion: Quick reminder that after Balthazar's (faked) death on earth, Cas was demoted to second in command of his Flight, with Uriel taking charge in his stead. See Chapter 32: Season 1 Interlude 1 for a refresher.

Chapter Reference – Tom: Last time we saw Tom the demon, he was talking with Azazel via blood cup (because Azazel had been exorcised by Cas in Rivergrove) about their next steps. Azazel filled him in on the whole plan finally and told him he needed to move up the schedule: grab the next round of kids. Tom promised he'd get it done by the end of the week. See Chapter 87: Season 2, Chapter 54 for a refresher.

IMPORTANT TIMELINE NOTE: That ^ happened __FIVE__ days ago in story-time. I know it's been at least ten weeks real time

[insert sweat drop here and standard rant about verbosity here] but that week hasn't wrapped up yet in the story (a lot has been happening in these chapters :P)

Chapter Warnings: Dean and Cas show up to handle Gordon who doesn't need handling because Sam already had it handled on his own (isn't verb conjugation fun?!) and we wrap this arc up with a taxi ride, a meeting with the boss, handcuffs and an evidence bag, and a diamond ring.

See the end of the chapter for more notes

-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-

The Road So Far (This Time Around)

Season 2: Chapter 65

-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-

When Dean and Angela landed (was it Dean and Cas at that point? Hard to say what with all the switching and the jumping), it wasn't graceful. They didn't disappear from the car – after Dean pulled Baby safely over to the side of the road, of course – and then reappear instantly in another location like usual. There was a definite delay Dean could almost feel, like when you blink and your eyes stay closed longer than you think they will. When the two of them did finally show back up on the other end of the trip – which turned out to be the exact same decrepit, falling apart, piece of shit house Dean remembered – the world (which had previously been up, down, left, and right) decided to rotate about forty-five degrees forward.

Dean tried to counter-balance the sudden change in orientation, only to find himself diving head first into something tall and hard, but also soft, and squishy in places. It grunted a familiar grunt as they hit the ground together. Whatever it was he'd taken to the floor, it had girly hair that Dean had to spit out of his mouth after several failed attempts.

Beside him, Cas landed about as well. Sure, the angel might not have miscalculated her positioning quite as spectacularly as the fallible human she'd carried, but the flight had taken a hell of a lot of energy out of an already very limited supply. Her feet touched down, Dean keeled forward and Cas, hand still curled around his right shoulder, went with him at the same time as her legs gave out from beneath. She both tumbled forward and crumpled to the ground, colliding with – and taking down – another body that had the misfortune of being in front of her when they landed.

Dean tried to extricate himself from the pile of gangly limbs, body parts, and floor. He was both disoriented and trying to figure out who the hell he'd used as a landing pad (friend, foe, an unaccounted for third party, or possibly a complete and utter stranger because Cas had shortchanged her power supply and flown them into some other abandoned house?). He hadn't quite managed it (his head was still spinning from the landing and trying to decide which way was 'up') when two large, familiar hands wrapped around his upper arms.

"Dean?!"

Beside them, Castiel found herself rolled and straddled, with the forearm of a human male pressed to her throat. The force of his arm tilted her chin up and head back against the hard floor of the house she had flown them to. The man above her – a hunter – was not one she recognized. He had dark skin, fierce eyes, and blood running down the side of his face from a cut just above his temple. Castiel assumed this to be Gordon Walker, the hunter who was after Sam. She immediately disliked him.

Sam, who'd realized what was happening only seconds after it happened, stared at his brother with wide, disbelieving eyes. Even though he'd thought- well, he'd been pretty sure- about that ping on Gordon's phone…. It was still hard to take in. His brother was alive and had landed, literally, right in his lap. He gripped Dean's arms as very not-dead brother finally managed to right himself. The older Winchester stared right back. It was clear it took the man a moment to focus on Sammy's face, before his gaze hardened into something dark and dangerous.

He reached up, grabbing either side of his younger brother's head, tilting him this way and that. Sam, exhausted and just damn happy Dean was alive, let his mother-hen brother check him over. That look only got darker as he took in the scatter of cuts and bruises, the still-wet blood on his upper lip and nostrils. When he turned to confront Gordon and found the hunter on top of his angel, that rage boiled over into something scary.

"Gordon, you son of a bitch!"

Castiel barely batted an eye as the man above her was tackled clean off by her charge. Dean collided with the other hunter, landing a solid punch to his face as he took him to the floor.

“Really, man?” Dean screamed as he clobbered Gordon in the face.

“Dean!” Sam scrambled to his feet but didn’t try to get between the two rolling, scrapping men.

"You sniped me? Me?!"

Instead, the younger Winchester offered a hand down to Castiel, the angel still laid out on the floor. She took it with a grimace and Sam pulled to her feet, both of them grunting with the effort.

“You okay?” Sam mumbled lowly to the angel, eyes locked on his brother as Cas found her balance beside him. He knew there was no real reason to worry. Gordon was unarmed and with the odds now three-to-one, it was only a matter of time before Gordon was forced to give up the fight. Still, Sam kept his eyes on his brother. Because only a handful of minutes ago he’d thought he’d lost him, possibly forever, and he didn’t feel like a repeat experience.

“Couldn’t even do it to my face, huh? You had to shoot me from fucking behind?”

"I have been better,” the angel answered honestly, eyes also on the fight. Dean, having taken a fair few hits himself, landed another shot to Gordon’s jaw and the hunter’s head cracked back against the floor. The older Winchester didn’t stop there, though. He delivered punch after punch, splitting the other man’s cheek, the bridge of his nose, and blackening his eye. Sam took a step forward to intervene, but Castiel halted him with a raised arm, directed at the pair.

“Enough.”

Dean didn’t back off right away, but he wasn’t given the option twice. Gordon flew out of his grasp, sliding along the wooden floor all five and a half feet to the nearest wall, where he was up-righted and pinned. Dean, still kneeling on the floor, looked furiously over his shoulder at his angel, hand held out and power emanating from every inch of her Warrior-of-God stance. The ‘deal with it’ glare she leveled his way was so reminiscent of Cas in Jimmy’s vessel that the anger all but drained out of Dean. Instead, he found himself rolling his eyes as he climbed to his feet.

“I don’t believe it,” Gordon said, face weirdly blank as he spit out a gob of blood. His eyes were wide, even with the left one starting to swell shut. He stared at the dead man standing right in front of him. "Dean Winchester. In the flesh. Thought I killed you."

Didn't just think, actually. Gordon knew he'd killed him.

"Yeah, no shit," Dean snapped right back, looking about half a second from resuming his beat down on the man now stuck against the wall. Sam grabbed him by the bicep, to keep him in check if nothing else.

"Dean, no," he muttered low, too low for the other hunter to overhear them. Dean looked over and up at his brother like the younger Winchester was crazy. "Leave it. He's taken care of."

"Leave it? No, Sammy, I left it once before and look what happened!" Dean gestured to Sam's face, his dust and debris covered clothes, the blood spreading from wound somewhere in his chest (which couldn't be too bad, since the kid was still breathing), and his missing shoes. Missing. Shoes. His baby brother was friggin' sock-footed in a war zone, and that didn't even begin to cover multitude of reasons Dean was going to murder Gordon Walker. He was so busy putting together a list that he didn't even notice the little niggle of Déjà vu caused by his brother's words. "I'm killing this son of a bitch. Screw the damn timeline."

"Dean-" Sam's voice was full of warning, but the older Winchester was already pulling out of his grip. "We need to leave."

"You call me a son of a bitch?" Gordon bit out at the same time, licking at the blood crusted in the corner of his mouth. He spat out another glob of red to the side, eyes never leaving the older Winchester. "You looked in a mirror lately, Dean? What kind of hunter works with demons, huh? Makes deals with demons."

Those dark brown eyes shifted to the woman standing beside the pair of hunters, hand still held out and ethereal blue gaze dangerous. The only way Dean Winchester could have come back from the dead. Gordon knew he was a dead man – knew the Winchesters' pet demon could take him out easy, like snapping a toothpick – but he wasn't going down without a fight. Hell, if he could he'd find a way to warn every damn hunter out there about these two. Traitors to their own kind.

"I am no demon," the woman growled, voice like stone. She straightened, those eyes suddenly lighting up with an icy white glow. Lightning flashed inside the house, making Gordon jump in surprise, pinned to the wall as he was. The flash of light lit the three figures in front of him, and the vamp hunter stared with wide, disbelieving eyes as their shadows stretched, long and distorted, against the walls of the building. The demon's shadow grew, splitting with a pair of wings stretching out, long and feathered. The walls seemed to bend out and loom inward with an intense power – a presence – that hadn't been there before.

That…wasn't possible. They didn't exist.

Gordon licked his lips as the light faded and those shadowy wings disappeared. The woman remained, cold marble and frosty eyes. The pinned hunter eyed her warily, eyes flickering to the Winchesters on either side of her.

This was a trick. It had to be.

Dean allowed himself a second to smirk at Gordon's reaction. That was an angel standing in front of him – Dean's angel – pinning him to the wall and scolding him like a child. Served the jackass right. Gordon was on the wrong damn side of this war.

Then he turned his attention back to his brother, poking the gargantuan man in the shoulder. The unwounded shoulder, because Dean sure as hell noticed the mother effing bullet wound in the other one. Gordon was lucky he wasn't a god damn smear on the wall right now. "We don't need to go anywhere. What we need to do is kill this son of a bitch before he comes after you again. And apparently me too!"

At this, the hunter spun again, anger reignited. Sam reached out and grabbed his arm again, but Dean wasn't going anywhere. Apparently he just needed to get some yelling off his chest. "Really, Gordon? Me?! Stick to the damn timeline, asshole!"

"Dean!" This time Sam shook his arm enough to get his brother to turn to him. "We have to go. I already called the cops!"

Sudden silence reigned in the small house, Dean blinking up at his younger brother, Gordon going rigid with realization of just why Sam Winchester had been stalling rather than attacking, and Castiel…well, she was often the silent type, so no change there. The angel merely glanced over her shoulder at the brothers, waiting for direction. She had already warned Dean this would likely be a one-way trip. While not completely depleted – and more than a match for one human hunter who wasn't even armed – a flight with two passengers in tow right now would be…unwise.

Just then, the sound of sirens that Castiel had been able to hear for the past thirty seven seconds (unaware it was something she should be informing her charges of) became an audible thing to the three humans in the house with her.

"Oh…" Dean blinked again, head turning towards the front of the house and those sirens. Well, shit. They couldn't kill Gordon now. But…Dean broke into a grin, realizing what that twinge of déjà vu in his stomach was about now. He hit the Samsquatch on his good arm, causing the younger Winchester to finally release his brother and wince all in one go. "That's the same move you pulled last time, Sammy. Alright, let's get the hell out of here."

Sam expected Cas to turn and zap them out of there. So he was surprised when Dean crossed the room to pick the younger Winchester's gun off the ground instead and Cas walked up to Gordon. She reached into partially intact wall beside him, bending and breaking loose a half exposed pipe in order to wrap it around the pinned hunter like it was made of rubber, essentially trapping him to the wall. Gordon glared at her the entire time but Cas was hardly intimidated, stepping back to check her work before turning to the brothers.

"We walking out of here?" Dean asked almost offhandedly as he tucked Sammy's gun into his waistline (he didn't want to see the Samsquatch attempt that with his injuries). Dean already knew the answer, of course. Cas had pretty much warned him this time (with greater specifics than 'I will be weakened.' Yup, sitting in the Impala on the side of the road, Cas had grabbed his shoulder and this time said, 'I will be weakened. Perhaps too much to fly us out again.' Whoot, score one for specificity and baby steps). He glanced over at the angel, who nodded.

"Yes. I am very nearly out of…mojo?" The head tilt to finish off the question was a cherry on top of the sundae that was their angel, back with them, alive and (mostly) well. Dean grinned, not even caring that they were hoofing it. At least Cas was there with them.

Sam, startled by the answer, gave the angel a longer look than he'd been able to spare her yet. He realized she looked as exhausted as he felt. She didn't appear much better than the last time he'd seen her, actually, back in Rivergrove and then Bobby's house, hurting from a demon trap and frantic to return to Heaven before it was too late. Sam swallowed, hoping his promises to his brother that she would be alright – that Uriel would have healed her – hadn't been completely empty after all.

“You okay?” he asked the angel again quietly, even as the three headed into the kitchen. The sirens were getting louder and the backdoor would be a lot less risky for escape than the front at this point.

“That is a long story,” Castiel answered with a sad smile up at him as he gestured for her to enter the kitchen first. “But I will be.”

Sam understood perfectly, his own trembling fingers – an onset of what was surely to be another withdrawal – hidden in loosely clenched fists.

“Don’t you leave me here!” Gordon yelled from the living room, his voice clear in the kitchen as the three headed for the back door Sam had first entered through less than an hour ago. It was hanging on only one hinge after both grenade explosions, but they weren’t exactly worried about closing it behind them. “You better kill me now, Dean! You leave me here, and I will come after you and your brother!”

Sam glanced at the older Winchester, worried he would have to pull him out of the house himself. His brother just charged on ahead, though, out the back door and into the woods surrounding the abandoned house. His jaw was clenched, a vein in his temple pulsing, but he kept moving, and Sam and Cas followed. They left Gordon to holler and rage fruitlessly after them.

Less than a minute from the door and into the woods, cop cars came screeching into view, blocking the road and drive, surrounding the front of the house. Police flooded the house, guns out. The Winchesters didn’t stay to see the end result. Gordon would have unregistered weapons on him, recently fired, just like last time. Even with the changes – Gordon trapped inside the house by a metal pipe bent like a Twizzler – the cops would still put him away for the weapons alone.

Time oughta be a happy ‘bout that, for friggin’ once.

In the meantime, they had two injured parties, a recently revived third, and it was fucking cold out. Despite the shitty circumstances, Dean was still grinning as the three disappeared deeper into the woods and away from the flashing blue and red lights.

-o-o-o-

Sam made it about five hundred feet before he started to noticeably drag. Which was about four hundred feet farther than he should have pushed himself. He tripped on a tree root and went down to one knee, jarring the still bleeding hole in his shoulder among various other aches and pains.

"Come on, Sammy," Dean muttered, immediately bending down to curl an arm around his brother and pull him back up. He'd been sticking close to him as they hurried through the trees, having gotten a good look at those wounds and knowing Sam was running on adrenaline alone. "Couple more minutes to the road."

And then another thirty, at least, to where he had left the Impala. But Dean wasn't gonna mention that part. Baby steps. Step one: get far enough away from the house, through the woods where there was cover, to emerge back out onto the road where cops wouldn't see them or be looking in the first place. Step two was get back to Baby. Dean hadn't actually figured step two out yet. So he was just gonna focus on step one.

An arm came out of nowhere in front of both Winchesters, two fingers pressing to Sam's forehead before Dean could stop them. Sam's knees almost gave out as the familiar warmth and cleansing of Castiel's healing power washed over him. It didn't reach everything – the wound in his shoulder remained, even though the pain lessened and the bleeding stopped – but the bone-deep ache, the cranky buzzing that had moved from his skin to the back of his head, and the terrifying, telling shake of an oncoming withdrawal was gone.

Sam almost collapsed a second time, this one from sheer relief. He'd known what pushing those powers had meant; he had known what it would cost him. Even if accessing them had been pure survival instinct, the hunter had known where it would lead. What would inevitably come next. Sam hadn't been sure he'd survive it a second time. Worse, he hadn't been sure he wanted to.

"Damnit, Cas," Dean growled, causing Sam to open his eyes in time to see the angel collapse in front of him.

The younger Winchester shot back to his feet, immediately grabbing at Cas before she could hit the ground. Between him and his brother, who'd obviously known this was coming and already had half a grip on the angel, they were able to keep her upright. Sam's shoulder was still busted – enough so that the two of them ended up exchanging sides so Sam could support Cas with his good arm – but he felt better.

Less exhausted and on-the-brink than he had a moment ago.

"Okay, now he's out of mojo," the woman between them muttered, voice several octaves higher and riding labored breaths.

Sam almost dropped her, realizing the person he was holding was entirely different than the angel he'd reached out to catch. "Angela!?"

The very human woman smiled up at him. It was a weak grin, but a grin all the same. "Hi, Sam. Nice to meet you. Damn, you're even taller when I'm in control. How does that make sense?"

The younger Winchester, lost for words at the end of a really long, emotional, bewildering night, looked up at his brother, then back down at Angela again. Dean didn't seem surprised by this development at all. Sam had so many questions and no bandwidth left to ask them.

"Dragon Lady, Sam. Sam, Dragon Lady." Dean nodded his head between the two of them with a look to Sam that said, 'Later.' Angela snorted at the introductions and the younger Winchester actually jumped at the noise. The physical change of presence in the woman he was half supporting was astonishing. And also a conversation – and consideration – for another time. Dean was right about that; Sam wasn't sure he had the emotional reserve left to have that discussion anyway.

The three of them were alive and moderately safe (if not various degrees of beat up and exhausted) and that was enough for now. Honestly, the last Sam had seen or thought of Angela, he hadn't even known if the woman's soul was still attached to her body. The younger Winchester settled for simply being glad the woman was alive at all.

"Over here," Dean spoke lowly, pulling them back in the direction of the road. They'd probably gone far enough from the house for the street to be safe from cops. It wasn't like they were gonna get much further with a half-injured hunter, a recently un-deceased human, and a crippled angel between them. Dean would chance the road at this point.

They came out of the woods onto winding, black asphalt stretching out on either side of them. There were still flashing lights in the distance back towards the house beyond a bend in the road and what they could see. The trunks of the trees along the curve were bathed in blinking red and blue, turning the bark a flashy purple.

Dean looked at his brother, then Cas and Angela, then down the road in the direction of his Baby, which was some three, maybe four miles away. Angela looked like she had about a five minute walk in her before one of them would be carrying her completely, and Sam had been shot.

Damnit.

The older Winchester caught his brother's eye, Sam having not missed the current lack of a step two to this plan. "So…Uber a thing yet?"

-o-o-o-

Uber was not a thing, yet, considering the look Sam gave him. Dean made a mental note to invest whenever it did turn up.

A taxi driver showed up about twenty minutes later at the random-ass location they managed to give the company when they called on Bobby's phone. It was the address of the first house they'd found after venturing down the side of the road for another ten minutes. The two brothers had carried Angela between them until she'd tripped and almost taken Sam down with her, causing his sluggishly bleeding shoulder to become an enthusiastically bleeding shoulder. At which point Dean was forced to pick her up, bridal style, and tell her to shut the hell up when she called him 'her hero' with batted eyelashes that coulda taken out a bystander.

The driver gave the rag tag group one hell of a weird look when he picked them up, but at least he picked them up.

-o-o-o-

As the Winchesters drove out of Lafayette, Angela slept in the back seat. They'd gotten to Baby via the Taxi, then back to the motel as fast as Dean could drive. There, he field-dressed Sam's shoulder wound – the speed version – while Angela started packing for them. She only managed a couple minutes before ultimately ending up on the edge of one of the beds trying not to fall asleep on her feet or pass out (Dean told her from personal experience that the first would be better than the second, so don't push it). Despite her best efforts, she failed and Dean ended up carrying the unconscious woman out to the car once he'd finished patching up Sam and finishing the packing, all as quickly as possible.

Weirdly enough, Angela Anne Garrett weighed exactly as much as Dean expected of a woman her size and build. So what had made Cas so damn heavy back at that gas station? Had it been Cas in the driver's seat? Or Cas without a vessel? Maybe Dead-Dean's glowing foghorn of impatience or the hunter's underappreciation of how much muscle even an illusion of Jimmy Novak must have? Oh well. A mystery for another day (aka: never. Because they had so much more important shit to worry about than how much an angel friggin' weighed and Dean was blaming his recent death experience for the weirdness of his thoughts lately).

Dean didn't trust Gordon not to know where they'd been staying in town and tell the cops once they got him talking. The fact that they hadn't pulled into the motel parking lot to police cars and flashing lights probably meant the hunter had kept his mouth shut, but Dean didn't trust it either way. The Winchesters (and angel) wouldn't run far. Dean may be in the best shape of the three of them, but he had just come back from the dead. So they'd make it to the next town over, at least.

They were about fifteen minutes outside of Lafayette, heading West when Dean noticed Sam staring at a piece of paper he was holding, practically in his lap. It looked like the note Dean had left back in the motel, and Dean's gut tightened for a minute, thinking his brother might bring that up (of all the crap that had happened tonight, Dean had almost forgotten about it). But Sam was staring at the back of the sheet, a bullet hole smack dab in the middle of it, with a ring of drying, brown blood soaking up half of the white space.

Dean raised an eyebrow at it. "What's with the blood note? You're not gonna go Memento on me, are you?"

Sam glanced over at his brother, having been off in his own thoughts as he stared at what was left of Ava Wilson's phone number. Back when he'd first approached the house, Sam had tucked the note into his breast pocket, along with his phone. Right where Gordon had nailed him with that rifle shot. The phone had been toast and so was the note, it turned out. Taking Ava's number with it.

"Nothing," Sam sighed, folding the piece of paper back up and tossing it onto the dash in front of him.

"Doesn't look like nothing," Dean noted, carefully keeping his voice level rather than the accusation it most definitely was. Sam's pouty-McPouting face was the troubled edition, and Dean knew that even if Sam verbally dismissed it, whatever was bugging him would keep at it for days to come.

“Did you ever get my voicemail?”

Dean pulled his head back at the tone – something caught between little-brother-pissyness and actually wanting or needing to know – then glanced at Sam. He kinda remembered getting a voicemail – remembered it was the last thing he could remember, at least – but Dean hadn’t thought about it in the last oh-so-many-hours he’d been dead-then-not-dead.

“You mean before Gordon Fucking Walker shot me in the head and took my phone?” The words, still angry, left his mouth before he thought about their consequences. Dean winced when he noticed Sam visibly stiffened beside him. Shit. He hadn’t actually told his brother he’d bit the dust in so many words. And this wasn’t the Sam that viewed death as a more-than-likely temporary thing.

He cleared his throat awkwardly. “Uh…sorry, Sammy.”

His brother was quiet for a long, long, minute before he sucked in a breath, his whole chest moving with it. “You were really dead?”

Sam glanced at Dean, who mirrored the solemn look with a frown of his own. The older Winchester had been expecting…he didn’t know. More surprise? Especially from his never-been-dead-and-not-used-to-popping-back-up-like-a-daisy little brother.

Sometimes Dean missed the Sam he’d had in 2016, the one who knew what they’d been through together, had fought and died, so many times, right alongside him. But most of the time Dean caught that innocent light still in his kid brother’s eyes – the light he’d watched die during an Apocalypse – and swore he wouldn’t let it go out this time. Wouldn’t let that other Sam come into existence, even if it hurt like hell to think it. To know he’d permanently lost that brother.

Sam shrugged his good shoulder, both quiet and morose, in a way that upset Dean way more than the conversation. “Gordon showed me a picture.”

“He- What?! That- That son of a bitch!” Dean swore viciously, wringing his fingers around Baby’s wheel and kind of wishing it was Gordon’s throat instead. They shoulda killed him and risked a city-wide manhunt, damnit. It woulda been worth it. “He took a fucking photo?”

Sam nodded, ignoring the way his stomach twisted and churned at the mental image, forever engrained in his brain.

“God damn, mother fucking-” Dean took in a deep breath, reminding himself that bastard was gonna spend the next year in jail. The older Winchester could probably arrange for someone to take him out before Gordon managed to escape, or whatever the fuck had happened last time to bring him back into their lives. Which he would have to figure out before it happened again. Goddamnit. One thing at a time. Dean blew that same breath out, chancing a glance at his unnaturally quiet brother. “I’m sorry, Sam.”

“Cas bring you back?” Sam glanced over his shoulder at the back seat. He was taking this all incredibly well, Dean thought, maybe with a little bit of worry. As Angela was sitting directly behind him, all Sam could see was the woman’s legs, curled up on the back seat, so he turned frontward again.

“Yeah. Woke up in the attic and figured…why waste it. Might as well try to find Cas.” Dean bobbed his head back and forth, not talking fast but not giving Sam time to really interject, either. Between the exhaustion, the blood loss, and what was probably an emotional roller coaster from Hell, Sam shouldn’t be taking this so calmly. Dean didn’t like it, but he was actually more worried about what would come out of his brother’s mouth when the quiet ended. “Fucking Uriel had him-her tied up. I busted her out and she took care of the rest.”

Dean sent his brother a grin mostly out of instinct, the post-high of a crazy escape, a battle fought and won. Flying out of Heaven, crashing right through the gate, had been pretty damn badass. Not to mention the way they’d tag-teamed and taken down Uriel. Dean’s smile faded, though, at the memory of Cas kneeling in front of his brother, eyes so damn mournful, as he told Dean to look away.

The hunter cleared his throat, more somber now. “Uriel’s dead.”

Sam was startled to hear it. He glanced again to the backseat, less of a full turn this time, but both Angela and Cas remained unconscious. The younger Winchester slowly turned back around, worrying at the inside of his cheek. Uriel had been Cas’s brother, a trusted friend, even if that trust was misplaced. And Cas had been adamant about returning to Heaven to protect her family. Even a traitor’s death – and probably more so his betrayal – would weigh on the compassionate angel. “How did she…?”

‘Take it?’ was Sam’s intended question, but it wasn’t the one Dean heard. At least, not the only one he heard. He understood what Sam was asking, but he knew his brother was also asking it assuming Castiel had been forced to kill her brother again this time around.

"She's not the one who did it," Dean replied a little stiffly. "I did."

His brother's eyes practically bulged out of his head and it would have been funny if the subject matter was anything else. Eh, it was still a little funny.

"How?"

Dean shrugged but couldn't completely hide the grin tugging at his lips. Yeah, he knew Cas mourned Uriel's death, but Dean sure as hell didn't. He was glad that asshole was out of the way and happy to be the one to do it rather than make Cas carry that weight. Plus…come on; it was a total badass move (besides, Dean had never been one to shy away from owning that before, why start now?). "Stole his angel blade off him. Sure as hell taught him not to underestimate the 'mud monkeys.'"

"Huh." Sam turned his gaze back to the windshield and road beyond. That…. He made a mental note to talk to Cas whenever she woke up, make sure she was okay. Losing a brother, even if you weren't the one to do it, was still, well… Sam glanced at Dean from the corner of his eye again, drinking in the sight of the older Winchester just breathing, just being alive.

He fisted his hands in his lap, one curled over the other, to hide the fact they were trembling once more. Cas had healed him – apparently well before she should have, given her now unconscious state and the fact that he'd gotten to have eight and a half minutes of conversation with Angela Garrett – so it wasn't withdrawal. It wasn't, Sam told himself fiercely. And even if it was, it wouldn't be like last time. He'd taken in so much less blood this time. So it wouldn't be like last time. It wouldn't.

"Ava," Dean suddenly breathed out, somewhat out of nowhere. There was a shock of revelation carried on the single word. In the lapse of silence, the older Winchester had turned his thoughts back to Sam's original question, about the voicemail. It took a minute, but he remembered. Sam had called him because Ava Wilson showed up at the motel room.

Beside him, Sam straightened, gaze snapping to him, partly in surprise but mostly due to confirmation. "So you do know her. This happened last time?"

"I mean, not this." Dean motioned at the three of them, fleeing Lafayette with a gunshot victim, a recovering corpse, and an unconscious angelic vessel in the backseat. "But yeah, Gordon came after you and there was some chick with you at the time. I…I think her name was Ava."

The older Winchester shrugged at not having more to say, somewhat self-conscious of it. He didn't really remember much about Ava; he'd never even met the lady, just spotted her through a hotel window at the time and then spent months searching the country for her with Sam. It wasn't easy remembering what had gone down eleven years ago, especially with someone who'd existed mostly as hearsay for him.

Sam snatched the folded note back off the dashboard, bloodied and bullet-holed, and held it up. "She left me her number."

"You dog." Dean' waggled his eyebrows at his brother, an automatic response he really couldn't help.

Sam's immediate response was a rolling of his eyes, then the verbal equivalent: "It's not like that, Dean. She has a fiancé."

"Yeah, so?"

Whoa. The déjà vu hit like a bag of bricks to the gut, so much so that Dean almost lurched physically forward. Shit. That couldn't be good. It was never good.

"I promised I'd call her when I found you and didn't die." Sam stared down at the ruined handwriting as his brother huffed a laugh. It was off, with Dean rubbing at his chest like there was something stuck there, but Sam didn't catch it. Between the bullet hole and the blood, Ava's number was completely illegible. It wasn't the end of the world – could have been so much worse, really (the same bullet that destroyed the note could have killed him) – but Sam couldn't shake the regret. He'd made Ava a promise. More than that, she was one of Azazel's children. He wanted – needed – to check in on her, too.

"I'm sure she'll get over it," Dean offered, trying for comfort but failing in his usual Dean-way. He was busy rubbing at his chest and wondering what the hell they were walking right into, yet again. "Especially if she's ready for a ball and chain. Probably get over being stood up in a day or two. Less, even, since it's you we're talking about."

Sam rolled his eyes again, folding the paper back up and tucking it into the front pocket of his jeans. He couldn't bring himself to get rid of it yet. Something about throwing it away just didn't sit well with him. Like he was throwing her away. "Do you know anything about her? What happens to her?"

"I never met her, but she was one of Azazel's kids. A psychic – had visions, like you." Dean lowered his arm from his chest, tapping a finger against the steering wheel instead. Some of it was coming back, but slow and sluggish, like digging through sludge. "She…uh… she was at the battle royale, I think."

Not that he really knew the details. The truth was, he'd been so much more concerned with Sam at the time, first with finding him and then…after. Memories hadn't really stuck so much those first few days, at least until the shock of what had happened, what he'd done to make it happen, what he'd sold to make it happen, had started to wear off, replaced with dread and denial.

Wait, there was something else. He remembered looking for her. They'd spent weeks looking for the missing woman after…after they'd found a blood-covered apartment and no Ava.

"She live in Peoria?" Dean suddenly asked, eyes locked on a road sign as it flew past. Peoria was the second destination listed and his Timey Senses clenched, curled up in his gut tighter than an anaconda mating ball. His stomach gave an additional lurch of nausea at the image ('Thanks for that, brain.').

Beside him, Sam frowned, going back through the conversation he'd had with the frenetic woman. She'd mentioned being a secretary, having a fiancé…and the newspaper clipping she'd shown him, it had been from the Peoria Journal Star. She'd said it, too. 'Just a secretary from Peoria.'

"Yeah," the younger Winchester answered slowly, worry starting to draw his brow down sharply between his eyes. He looked at his brother again, gaze turning serious. "Dean, what happens?"

Dean pressed down on the gas, Baby surging forward with a rev of her powerful engine. "We gotta get to her apartment. Start looking for an address."

-o-o-o-

"So, Rachel."

Zachariah sat in front of her, across the large expanse of a white, ethereal, over-compensating desk. Not that Rachel would ever say as much. Didn't stop her from thinking it, though. (Didn't stop any angel who had to deal with Zachariah from thinking it).

"I understand from the Gate Guards that your second in command has turned traitor?"

"Yes. Uriel-"

"And you'd be willing to file a report to that extent?"

Rachel hesitated at the bland color spread across Zachariah's grace. It swirled sluggishly, twitching at the corners now and then, like an agitated eddy playing at being calm. It was…disconcerting, and Rachel neither liked nor trusted it. She had only reported directly to Zachariah three times since her placement in Castiel's unit, but she could, with a fair bit of confidence, claim that as her takeaway of this angel. She neither liked nor trusted him.

"Yes…" Rachel replied slowly, feeling like she was walking into a trap she couldn't see. Castiel sometimes did that to them, in their combat drills. It kept Rachel's instincts sharp, though she was concerned why those instincts might be flaring up now, in a superior's office, in the safety of Heaven's inner walls.

"Great." Zachariah rolled up the parchment in front of him, the contents of which Rachel didn't even know. She had assumed the Dominion would be asking for a verbal report. He could hardly know what had occurred between Uriel and Castiel already, and the Gate Guard's knew nothing other than her commanding officer fleeing Heaven with a human soul, Uriel in pursuit.

"Sir-"

"So, the traitor Castiel will be brought up on charges, should he ever return to Heaven. And we will, of course, mourn the loss of Uriel."

Rachel blinked. All thirty-six eyes, simultaneously. And then again. She…must have misheard?

"I'm sorry, sir, I don't…Uriel is dead?"

"Yes, tragic I know," Zachariah said, the features of his human faces forming something of a pout. He was probably going for sympathetic, but Rachel had never found him anything close to that. "He will be missed. Rest assured, we'll hunt down his murderer. You can go now."

"His…murderer?" Rachel tossed her head, sharp edges of her grace stubby and jolting. She visibly shook herself, those angles and corners beginning to vibrate in unease that was quick on its way to frustration. "Sir, there's been a misunderstanding. Castiel-"

"Has murdered one of the Host," Zachariah interrupted, bland face no longer so. In fact, his expression had grown stony, his grace hardening into sharp ridges, and Rachel immediately took note. Combat training had her prepared for attack, at any moment, and her superior officer was giving off all sorts of warning signs. Not that Zachariah was a physical fighter, but Rachel knew that violence came in many forms. "Or do you disagree that Castiel and Uriel – and only Castiel and Uriel – left Heaven?"

"Yes, they did-"

"And Uriel is dead, while Castiel has not returned."

"That doesn't mean-"

"And," Zachariah raised his voice, presence growing larger with the swelling of his grace, "is it not a fact that only an angel can kill another angel?"

Rachel quieted, realization of what was happening – what Zachariah was making sure was happening – settling in her colors like lead.

"Now, then." The Dominion settled behind his desk once more, bland smile slapped back in place on all four faces. "It was very commendable what you did, chasing after the traitor to try and save one of our own. As both your commander and second in command have been removed from rank by various circumstances-"

(Those circumstances being death and framed-for-murder.)

"-I am placing you in charge of your unit. Congratulations, Rachel." Zachariah stood in a sweeping gesture and Rachel mirrored the change in position out of instinct and a millennia of training.

"Sir, Castiel-"

"Was acting alone, as far as we can tell," the Dominion once more finished for her, something that was growing more than just frustrating. He eyed her and the face that resembled a lion twitched with a barely restrained snarl of its jowls. Rachel found herself staring at that face. "Unless, of course, you know otherwise? Anyone found helping a traitor will be held accountable for his crimes, you understand."

Rachel snapped her primary eyes back to Zachariah's center face. It was quite difficult to move through the sudden stiffness in her grace – her essence both frozen and rigid – but she managed a nod. "I understand, sir."

"Great!" Zachariah clapped his two forelimbs together, grace churning an ugly yellow-pink where it met and swirled together like a child's finger painting. "Well, you better get back to your unit. Congratulations, again, on the promotion. I'm sure you're very proud!"

She left his office with an escort, completely unsure for the first time in her long life. Rachel knew what she had just agreed to, knew the logic behind agreeing to it, but felt utterly wronged by the action. Should she not have stood up for Castiel? For herself? Rather, she had walked away without protesting their innocence, without condemning Uriel, who was the guilty party to these events.

Rachel hardly noticed her escort depart at the entrance to the Heavenly Offices. She walked on autopilot, slowly and without notice, back to the barracks where her unit was housed. The walk was not a long one and, in this case, not nearly long enough for her troubled thoughts and churning grace.

"Rachel!" The angel looked up at Samadriel's voice, only to find him hurrying towards her from the barracks. He must have been waiting for her return. "Is everything okay? What's going on? They're saying that Castiel is a traitor? That he killed Uriel?"

Seeing Samadriel's concern, his clear confusion and the way his grace surged and retreated with hope and then fear, Rachel's grace hardened with resolve. She may have walked away from Zachariah's office without a fight, but she would not walk away from her unit. She had a duty to do and Rachel would not allow that responsibility to be defined by an angel who had never dirtied his hands in battle or led a command.

Or who so carelessly dismissed his subordinates.

"Gather the Flight," she ordered, and Samandriel straightened to attention at the order. "There is something we must discuss."

-o-o-o-

Zachariah watched the new Flight Commander leave his office under escort, all four faces eying Rachel's retreating form with wariness and distaste. He turned to one of his men, standing beside his desk.

"Watch her. Watch the entire unit."

The angel nodded at the order, turning swiftly to carry it out. Zachariah eyed the door to his office again, tapping one manifested finger against the surface of his desk. He didn't trust any of those good-doers in Castiel's unit. It was far too likely that, as their leader and mentor, he had gotten to all of them. One bad apple poisoning the batch.

Zachariah let out a breath that turned into a hum. He turned to one of the other angel's in his office, at his disposal. "Find Naomi. Tell her I want to speak with her immediately."

-o-o-o-

Gordon Walker sat in the interrogation room – not his first – and eyed the one-way mirror with the kind of stoic distaste that had always made cops uncomfortable. It's why Gordon avoided them, even on cases. Never worked well with the local LEO's. Never cared to.

The door to the room opened, one such cop – probably a detective, given the pressed shirt and shiny shoes – walking over to the table. Like every LEO ever, the guy slapped a folder and an evidence bag onto the table between them, then settled down in the chair across from Gordon like a fat cat in his tiny little kingdom.

"You know," the detective began, grabbing the evidence bag almost lazily, opening the seal and pulling out Gordon's phone. "You really should lock your mobile device."

The hunter immediately frowned. He did keep his phone locked. With a relatively secure six-digit access pin.

The detective tapped something on the phone, turning it around to face him and Gordon blinked at the home menu. No pin. Phone just open, with everything on it – like photos – admissible in a court of law. Brown eyes slid closed with realization, a smirk playing at the corner of his lips.

“Nice move, Sammy,” Gordon muttered, realizing the hunter had disabled the locking system on his phone, knowing the cops were on their way and would be able to use anything they found on the device as evidence against him.

Damn. He’d have to remember not to hand over his phone to anyone again in the future, particularly an adversary as smart and devious as Sam Winchester.

“Hey!” A hand slapped down on the table in front of them and Gordon snapped his eyes back open, locking them on the man in front of him. “You think this is funny?”

The detective thumbed through his phone, opening the photo gallery and turning it back around to show Dean Winchester’s deceased face. Gordon stared at it for a long moment. At the green eyes, frozen open and lifeless. At the blood and brains spattered across skin and pavement.

Dean Winchester had been dead. Until he wasn’t.

“So, you like taking pictures of corpses, Mr. Walker?” The man watched him, eyes dangerous, but nowhere near as dangerous as the things Gordon hunted. Or the hunter himself. The detective swiped to the next photo. “Who are they, huh?”

The picture was a woman, head no longer attached to her body but conveniently propped up beside her corpse. Like a proper photoshoot. Gordon had found it hilarious at the time.

She was vamp, the last he’d had taken out before turning his sights on the Winchesters. He liked getting them out of their nest this way. Usually started with the women. They were easier to lure away, with promises of a good meal or a good night, never realizing that Gordon’s definition of both was just as bloody and deadly as theirs. After the kill, he’d take a photo and bait the rest of the nest. Vamps may be monsters, but most of them had cell phones. Hell, Gordon had seen nests with sixty-two inch TVs, cable, and PlayStations, for Christ’s sake.

One little text with a picture of one of their kind dead, head rolling, and the whole rest of the nest came calling for revenge. Not that they ever got it.

“You like killing girls?” The detective’s voice was taunting, pushing, and Gordon’s eyes flickered back up to meet his. The cop swiped to the next photo, the woman in that one as equally decapitated as the first. Gordon should have deleted them, but he'd never thought to worry about cops, of all people, getting a hold of them. "It make you feel like a man?"

"You shouldn't call women 'girls'. Not in a professional setting," he taunted right back, keeping his tone even except for the slightest taint of condescension. The detective growled low in his throat and Gordon just smiled.

"So you, what? Got a decapitation kink?"

"Maybe I just like taking pictures." Gordon shrugged, not a care in the world. This was all utterly unimportant – beneath him – and he'd get out soon enough. "You know what else I like? My Miranda Rights. I'll take a lawyer now."

He watched as the man across from him clenched his jaw, veins and muscles bulging in the square line of his face.

"Fine." The detective stood, throwing the phone back into the evidence bag and scooping it and the folder off the table. "But we'll be running those faces and when we get matches you're going down for murder on top of the weapons charge. So I suggest you tell that lawyer you want to make a deal."

Gordon watched the man – just a man, while Gordon was so much more, took out so much more, ever damn day – leave, door slamming shut behind him. The hunter settled back in his chair, content to wait. He wasn't in a great spot now, but he'd been in worse before. He'd get out of this one, too.

Once he did, he was going after the Winchesters. And next time, he'd bring a lot heavier artillery than a rifle.

-o-o-o-

Ava Wilson's apartment was a mess. They didn't make it in time to save her, not that Dean knew if they could have to begin with. The Winchesters got to Peoria in the early hours of the morning, early enough that it was still very much dark out, and yet still entirely too late. The fiancé was dead in a puddle of blood and sheets, Ava was nowhere to be seen. The déjà vu was so strong Dean felt physically sick.

Sam crouched down past the foot of the bed, next to another pool of red over by the window. The purse he'd seen Ava sling over her shoulder only hours ago was sitting, abandoned, in the middle of all that blood. The contents were spilling out of the tipped over bag and Sam reached out, picking up a knife sheath he recognized all too well. The weapon itself was nowhere to be seen, just like the woman he'd given it to.

He set the useless leather guard back down, careful not to disturb the crime scene. A glint of something reflective drew Sam's attention to another object among the blood, and the young hunter leaned further forward to reach for it. Sam picked the metallic object out of the congealing mess, silver and diamond glinting in the beam of his flashlight.

An engagement ring.

"Ava," the younger Winchester breathed out, the sound full of grief for a woman he'd barely known yet felt entirely responsible for.

Chapter End Notes

A/Ns: And that wraps up the Heaven Arc!! Which I couldn't label out loud earlier cuz you all didn't know Dean was going to Heaven XD There's so many characters and sub-plots going on now that just wrapping up that arc took half the chapter -_-

Gordon, Extra Creepy Edition: I loved the way Gordon was portrayed in the show – he was a real son of a bitch and super creepy – and as I started writing him I just…I don't know, ended up pushing that. I started writing his motivational narration and was like…holy shit, this guy is coming out creeeepy AF. And then with the whole taking a picture of Dean, I thought…you know what…Gordon always gave off this kinda-sick-and-evil vibe to me. I could see him taunting vampires with the death of their nest-mates, and keeping the photos as trophies of sorts. Because he's human, and he's better than them just because of that. Turns out, I like writing the creepy ones (Azazel probably should have tipped me off to that one…XD)

(Writing Zachariah is kind of my favorite too. He's such a dick.)

Other Character Check-Ins: To everyone asking for updates on other characters (Crowley, Azazel, Lilith and Persephone are the top requests (and holy crap, you guys are asking for more of the OC. I…I'm stunned and very honored), I do hear you, your requests are noted! I appreciate not only your interest in what's happening elsewhere in this story but also the nudges for me to remember everyone/everything too, haha! XD

Those characters are all coming up. Feel free to keep nudging, it helps keep me on track and lets me know where audience awareness and likes/wants are. I ask only for patience in the meantime; any character that doesn't have to do with the current arc won't get screen time because screen time is so darn tight just covering what we need to cover! (By that I mean it's taken 8 chapters of roughly 6,000 words each just to cover one night dealing with a single badguy. All other villains are just gonna have to wait XD) Soon as we get to the end of this arc (which usually means downtime in the plot; we've just had three back-to-back arcs with very limited downtime lately, which is rare btw), I'll work those characters we haven't heard from in a while back in.

Up Next: With this arc wrapped up, we're headed back to Cold Oak to rescue Ava. But Cas needs some time to self-heal since Plan Trust-Uriel-To-Do-It didn't go so well, and the boys desperately need sleep and a break they can't afford to take. So first we're headed for Bobby's. Luckily, the boys aren't alone; they have Roadhouse connections too, maybe a couple that would be willing to head towards Cold Oak for them.

Chapter 99: Season 2: Chapter 66

Chapter Notes

A/Ns: This chapter is a little late because I've been majorly struggling with motivation lately. Not so much with the story (there's absolutely no worry about abandonment here), but life in general. Burn out is returning now that I'm back at work; I have so little time and, worse, so little energy when I do have time. The good news is that my contract is up at the end of March and I am taking more time off to recover! The bad news is that until the end of March, my output levels are going to drop significantly, and I want you all to have ample heads up that that is coming.

Chapter Reference – Jo's Apartment Hunt: The boys (Andy included) showed up to a hunt after Jo called them, but after she was kidnapped by the ghost, Ellen showed up for the world's most awkward family road trip back to the Roadhouse. See Chapter 66 and 67:Season 2, Chapters 33 and 34 for a refresher.

Quality Warning: This chapter got a slightly better edit than last chapter (and oh boi, I re-read that one and gaaaah the errors in are just…. I could tell which sentences I added post-edit because there were full-on missing words every time. Every damn one. Good god Gertrude) but it's likely there's still some things I missed.

(Btw, I'm very slow to get back and edit chapters, but feel free to point errors out. I take no offense to it and if you leave it in a review/comment for that chapter, it makes finding/fixing it suuuper fast later on :D)

(One of the things that was on that butt-broken phone were dozens and dozens of screengrabs of the story as I read through it on my phone and highlighted all the errors to fix. Sigh)

Chapter Warnings: Lots of chatter and a break from all that damn action for once ;D

See the end of the chapter for more notes

-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-

The Road So Far (This Time Around)

-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-

"We have to go back, Dean. We have to go back to Cold Oak."

Those were the first words out of Sam's mouth as they climbed back into the car outside of Ava Wilson's apartment on the southeast side of Peoria. Dean didn't disagree, but his stony silence in the face of Sam's adamancy wasn't exactly the rapid agreement the younger Winchester had been expecting (or going for).

"She could be in trouble."

Oh, she was definitely in trouble, the older hunter thought, hands wrapped tight around the wheel as he pulled away from a crime scene they most definitely did not want to get caught leaving. They'd call it in (anonymously, of course) as soon as they were out of the city.

"If Azazel's grabbed more kids, we have to get to Cold Oak," Sam insisted again, practically vibrating with pent up adrenaline and anger. He was so damn sick of Yellow Eyes ruining lives, so tired of not being able to stop it. Of feeling responsible. Well, this time, they would stop it. This time, no one else would die or bleed in that damn mining town.

"Azazel's gone, man." Dean didn't meant to snap, but he was tired. And not the type of tired that sleep would fix. He knew this type of tired and, damnit, they were supposed to have years before they reached that point. Years! "It's been a week and a half, Sam. Ten days since zombie land! Since Andy went missing, and we almost lost Cas, and you got friggin' dosed with demon blood again. A fucking week and a half, alright? Azazel's locked up tight in Hell, not out kidnapping friggin' kids, okay?"

Sam was quiet. Too quiet. "Ava's missing and her fiancé was torn to pieces."

Dean closed his eyes against the reminder. Damnit, he knew that. He wasn't trying to say…. What was he trying to say? The evidence was clear as day; either Azazel was topside again (and their sacrifices – Cas's sacrifice – in Rivergrove had meant crap) or he had other demons doing his dirty work. Dean knew from experience both were a possibility.

It just wasn't…fucking fair. That they never got a break, even when they fought tooth and nail for the few wins they did get.

"I get it, alright?" Dean sighed, reminding himself that he wasn't mad at his brother. This wasn't Sam's fault any more than it was his. "But neither of us have had more than a couple hours of sleep in the last two days, alright? It's been crisis after crisis, and we can't keep going like this. We need a break or we're gonna slip up, Sammy. The kinda slip up we can't afford."

Plus, his Timey Sense was sitting thick and heavy in his stomach, not unlike dread, and Dean didn't know why. Which had him wary and on edge, hesitant to act because who the hell knew what the right call was when his gut got this way. Something about the timing was off, he knew that much. Ava had been missing for months before the battle royale last time. He was pretty sure Sam had mentioned her name after everything…worked itself out (at which time, Dean had only been registering about a quarter of the things going on around him, too busy staring at his not-dead brother and drinking in the sight because he only had a year left to do that).

Ava couldn't have been at Cold Oak the whole time, right? Which meant she might not even be there now. And if she had, then she'd survived that month last time. There wasn't much reason to think that would change, right?

"We're eight hours from Bobby's," Dean countered when his brother fell silent. It was an understanding silence, even if it was still angry. Anger at the unfairness, at the lack of control. Dean got it. Oh, did he get it. "It's on the way to Cold Oak, anyway. We get there, we crash for five, six hours, and then we hit the road again."

Beside him, Sam stared at his lap, jaw clenched tight and fingers curled into fists. Dean wasn't wrong. He knew his brother wasn't wrong, but it still wasn't right. If there was one thing that could piece Sam's anger – poke through his own helplessness and frustration – every time, though, it was his big brother sounding so defeated.

Sam saw Dean's gaze dart to the rear view mirror, checking on the angel still passed out in their backseat. That was worrying Dean too. Angela (or Cas?) had slept right through their two-hour mad drive to Peoria and the fifteen minutes they'd been in the apartment, in and out of the car without trying to be quiet. She'd never woken. Never even twitched. Dean had no idea if that was what the knots in his stomach were on about, but it certainly wasn't helping.

"Besides, Cas isn't in any condition to go anywhere," the older Winchester muttered, turning his eyes back to the road even as Sam glanced over his shoulder at the sleeping angel too.

"What happened to her?" The question was quiet, soft in the way that people tried to be when they were considerate and sensitive. Dean hated it.

"I don't know," he replied tersely, keeping his eyes locked forward and not checking on the angel, repeatedly. Not like looking at her was gonna change anything. "I've never seen a trap like the one in Rivergrove, man. Cas said it…damaged his- uh, her core, or something."

Sam's mouth twitched towards a frown and he had to keep himself from glancing at the backseat again as well. "She'll be okay, though. Right?"

His brother shrugged, a defensive gesture Sam was used to seeing when Dean was angry about his lack of knowledge or control over a situation. The younger Winchester could relate all too easily. "She said she was healing. That those cracks were mended, just tender. And keeping 'em healed was exhausting."

Which explained why they had a sleeping angel in their backseat.

"She just needs rest," he added needlessly, for his own reassurance as much as his brother's.

Sam sighed, flexing his fingers and trying to release the tension that clung to his system like a parasite. He knew, probably more than his brother did, that Dean wasn't just talking about Cas. He really wasn't wrong; Sam was exhausted himself, in a way that worried him a lot more than one night without sleep should. They did need a break. They just couldn't really afford one.

"Okay," he agreed, still quietly, but he nodded with more resolve than his voice could convey. He glanced over at his brother. "We'll head to Bobby's. Cas will probably heal faster in a bed than in the car, anyway."

Hooked up the machines that would keep Angela Garrett alive and comatose-ed (totally a word) so that Cas didn't have to.

Out of the corner of his eye, Sam watched the tension inch out of his brother bit by bit. Dean had been worried he'd fight him on it. That Sam would put Ava at a higher priority than Castiel. The younger Winchester should have known better. There was something between his brother and Cas, and it always put Dean so on edge when he had to defend it. Probably because he didn't like acknowledging it was there. Like Cas might mean more to him than she did to anyone else and that wasn't okay.

Sam sighed internally. Not just because he had to tread his brother's emotionally stunted land mines. Sure, he was annoyed as he always was to jump through hoops to keep Dean from shutting down on him, but it also hit the younger Winchester hard – hard enough to knock that anger out from under him – to see his brother so worried. Worried for Cas, worried his worry would make him weak, worried that Sam would blame him for that worry.

Classic Dean Winchester, insisting he face the world alone and then refusing to admit it was a lonely road.

"Dean…" Sam hesitated, realizing he didn't really know how to put any of what he needed to say – what his brother needed to hear – into words without Dean automatically shutting down because of it. "I know this…all of it…. Dude, it sucks."

Dean, expecting Samantha to give him a cross between a lecture and a heartfelt plea to embrace his inner uterus, let out a bark of laughter. It was bitter and huffy, but such a Winchester form of agreement that Sam quirked a smile at it, too.

"None of this is fair or easy," Sam continued, trying to voice his own frustration and fears and love, and not really having the right words to do it. He wasn't even sure the right words existed. "But you're not alone, alright? We're in this together."

Dean glanced sidelong at his brother.

Crap. They were having a moment, weren't they?

Damnit, they were. Sam snuck it up on him with a fake-out – even wrangled a laugh out of him, that bastard – then went and turned it into a moment. Dean knew it because his stupid, traitorous eyes started stinging and the back of his throat felt tight (and a friggin' highschool playwright was whispering about the power of brotherly love and B.M. scenes.)

(Not. Helping.)

Only Sam could do this to him. Take their mutual anger and turn it into…something else. Something manly, of course, not anything gooey or warm at all. Something that smelled like the color brown, damnit, and not rainbows and unicorns. (Dean was not using the 'L' word. Fuck that. This was not a chick flick, there was no melodrama here, boy or otherwise. This was an action packed, guns-blazing, obscenity flying, mother 'effing shitshow, was what it was. No chick flick moments, no brotherly love. At all. Nope.)

(Damnit, he was too goddamn tired for this.)

In the midst of all his not-thinking-about-it and not-answering-because-feelings-eew, Dean frowned. Something between his brother's words and his inner manliness chasing that playwright away with a baseball bat, Dean's thoughts hit a little speedbump that turned him in an entirely different direction.

They weren't alone, were they? Dean was from ten years in the freaking future. He should know that, better than the Dean from 2006 ever had.

"Call Ellen," he said suddenly, causing his brother to look over at him with raised, questioning eyebrows. "You're right, we're not alone. Screw Gordon; we have Roadhouse connections, too. Maybe Ellen can find someone – a coupla hunters – to send ahead of us. Check out Cold Oak. We'll meet 'em there tomorrow."

Because the Winchesters really did need a break, but Dean also understood Sam's edginess and worry. Ava didn't deserve whatever was coming her way. If there was any way they could spare her it, they'd do it.

Sam, deciding to let Dean have his narrow escape from the 'moment' (because he had a good point and Sam really was worried about Ava), and instead held up his phone. He hadn't wanted to leave it behind for the cops to find, useless as it was to the Winchesters now. He showed it pointedly to Dean, the bullet hole that went straight through the device, having split it almost in half. The damage was clear even in the dark light of early morning.

"Shit," Dean swore, glancing between it and the road. No wonder Sam's phone had gone straight to voicemail. "That the one you took in the chest?"

He'd picked a couple pieces of plastic out of the wound when he'd speed-bandaged the thing, but it hadn't occurred to him to ask.

Honestly, Dean had other things on his mind at the time and Sammy was alive, so the cause of the damage hadn't been as much of a priority as patching it up quickly so he could keep it that way.

Dean dug out Bobby's phone from his jeans, tossing it over to his brother and decidedly not thinking about the hell-of-a close call that shot must have been. Didn't matter, Sam was alive. The younger Winchester flipped the device open, going through the contact list before locating the Roadhouse's landline.

"Boys?" Ellen's voice was clearly worried, loud in the silent car as Sam held the phone between them, already switched to speaker. "Tell me you're alright."

Dean winced. Right. The last Ellen had heard from them, he was demanding Ash hack Gordon's phone for a GPS location because he'd tried to take Dean out (had taken Dean out, but Ellen didn't need to know that) and Sam was definitely next. Now it was barely five o'clock in the morning – only a handful of hours later – and the barkeep had answered on the first ring.

Crap.

"We're okay," the younger Winchester spoke up immediately.

At the same time Dean said, "Sorry, Ellen."

There was a relieved – and definitely irritated, mama bear – sigh on the other end of the line (that made Dean's heart ache only a little. Just a little). That woman absolutely had her hand on her hip right now (and dark circles under her eyes too, no doubt). Dean winced again.

"Tell me what happened."

"Short version? Gordon Walker's an asshole." Despite the look he got from his brother, Dean didn't regret saying it. Shit was the truth.

"We're fine, Ellen," Sam cut in, still sending Dean a patented bitchface (#9, the short version of which was basically, 'Shut up, Dean'). "Gordon…uh…" The Samsquatch trailed off, that look morphing into something more cautionary. Questioning. "He found out about us. That we're…psychics."

Dean suddenly pulled his head back, face all sorts of affronted. He split his attention between his brother and the road, and mouthed,

"That's why he iced me?! Son of a bitch. That goddamn, no good-"

"He said he got found us through someone at the Roadhouse," Sam continued over the near-silent tirade his brother was on. Dean beat on Baby's wheel when just mouthing the words weren't enough of a release.

Ellen let out a haggard sigh, frustration and regret tilting her head back, phone pressed more to her neck than to her ear as she took a moment. "I'm sorry, boys."

"Not your fault," Dean spoke up, still looking hella pissed, but not holding it against the barkeep. It surprised Sam, who was used to a similar volatility, only with a lot less control over who it got unleashed on. "You don't control those people."

She shouldn't have been surprised that those were the next words she was going to say, lips open and forming the first syllable and everything. Right. Psychics. Ellen huffed, readjusting the phone against her ear. She still felt like crap about it, but Dean was right. She oughta listen to him.

"Where's Gordon now?" Ellen asked, unsure which answer she was hoping for. A dead hunter often brought out the worst in other hunters. A dead hunter by another hunter's hand was going to be a real problem. But Ellen was no fan of Gordon Walker and certainly wouldn't be mourning his loss.

"Jail."

Ellen's eyebrows climbed towards her hair. "Jail?"

"Yeah," Dean continued and the smirk on his face was audible through the line. "Sammy's idea. Son of a bitch's going away for a couple years, at least, on all those unregistered weapons."

"Not to mention the live grenades," Sam added with a snort, something between bitter and amused. Ellen, however, was too busy curling a fist over her heart, which had skipped a painful, terrified beat. She took it back, she was more than okay with Gordon Walker turning up dead.

"Grenades?"

The two boys quieted awkwardly at the concern – and definite anger (of the mama ear variety) – in the woman's voice. Dean glanced at

Sam, unsure what to say, and the younger Winchester looked like he was cycling through his default perfect-son-with-puppy-dog-eyes responses that he kept on him like an encyclopedia of sympathy and understanding.

"Like I said," Dean decided to spare Ellen the chick-flick moment she couldn't have possibly have meant to walk into, "Gordon's an asshole."

The look Sam sent him was totally worth it, because it had gone from the judgmental range of bitchfaces to the rarer, understanding end of the scale.

"But you boys are alright?"

Dean cleared his throat on instinct, now cycling through his own array of responses to that question. 'Sure?' 'Not really.' 'Sam's been shot and we got a sleeping angel in the backseat.' 'Well, I was dead, but hey, I got better!'

"Yeah, Ellen. We're okay," was Sam's far more tactful reply. "But we do need something from you."

"Anything."

"Can you find a couple of hunters – ones you trust – to check out a mining town in Black Hills, South Dakota?" Sam tried to switch from the call to a web app, hoping to bring up a map, but Bobby's phone was too old. It didn't even have an internet application. Well, Sam thought, going for optimism, no matter how weak, at least they had a phone. "I'll send you the coordinates in a text. The town's called Cold Oak."

"Okay, sure, I can get someone on that," Ellen said automatically. It was clear she was writing it down from the sound of a pad of paper crinkling and her slightly distracted tone. There was a telling pause in the middle, in which Dean could practically hear her brain grinding away. He could picture her straighten up, ignoring that pen and paper she'd been scribbling on, to grab the phone from where she'd pinched it between her shoulder and ear. "Wait, isn't that the haunted town near Mt. Rushmore? The one the townsfolk all abandoned a century ago?"

The brothers exchanged glanced.

"Yeah, that's the one," Sam answered, trying to keep his voice totally normal. Like this was just your average, ordinary, hunter-buddy request.

Ellen wasn't buying it for a second. The judgmental silence was utterly telling. "Okay, why there?"

Dean licked his lips nervously. This was the part of this conversation he'd rather not have but knew he couldn't avoid. They were getting to the point of toeing a dangerous line with Ellen: how much they were willing to tell her versus how much she was going to figure out on her own. Or, at the very least, she'd know they weren't telling the whole truth. Ellen had called them out on that pretty damn quickly the first time around (and with a pretty sharp tongue, Dean remembered).

The older Winchester leaned slightly towards the phone in his brother's hand, choosing his words carefully (something he was not historically good at). "The yellow eyed demon is kidnapping kids- uh…psychics. Like Sam." And like him, according to the lie they'd told Ellen, though he couldn't really say that out loud, could he? Because Azazel wasn't going to nab him, and when he didn't, would Ellen have questions Dean couldn't afford to answer? The hunter shook his head. Problem for another day, among all the others. They had enough on their plate right now. "We think he's taking 'em to this town."

"What for?" Ellen definitely had that way-too-smart-for-her-own-good frown firmly in place now. Dean could see it, even several hundred miles and a phone call away. 'I just run a saloon' his ass, Dean 'd have to remember to take a sip of something the next time Ellen declared she wasn't a hunter, so he could spit it out at whoever was nearest. Hopefully not Ellen, though. Dean liked to live, uncastrated.

"We, uh," Sam shot his brother an only slightly panicking look, "we don't really know."

The non-verbal frown increased, and Dean winced in the front seat at the heavy silence. They should have thought up a lie before they called her. "Well, how do you know he's taking them there, then?"

Damnit, Ellen. The older Winchester tightened his hand around the steering wheel. They really needed her to just trust them on this.

"Because he already tried to take Andy," Dean bit out. Beside him, Sam went still, no doubt remembering the same thing Dean was. A lot of blood, a mangled neck, and their friend shivering and shaking in their arms.

Now Ava could end up the exact same way.

"That kid that was with you on Jo's hunt?" When the Winchesters didn't answer right away, staring at the phone and the road in equal parts, Ellen sighed. She'd gone a little overboard on the mama bear shtick that trip – not that anyone could blame her, mind you – but she hadn't made the best impression on the boys or the kid they'd had tagging along with them. Her explode-rather-than-stay-silent daughter had been suspiciously tight-lipped about that boy. Now at least she knew why. "Didn't realize he was a psychic."

That might also be because she'd sat in Jo's car on the edge of the cemetery while they finished excavating H.H. Holmes, refusing to speak until they were done and on their way safely back to the Roadhouse. Long past that, actually. By then, it was screaming more than talking and the topic of conversation (yelling match) most definitely wasn't the scrawny kid following the Winchesters like a lost puppy.

"He's like me, Ellen," Sam spoke up, voice quiet and tinged with all sorts of emotions. Ellen could only place the guilt, but she also noted it was the fourth time she could think of that one of the Winchesters isolated Sam as something other than Dean. Like Dean wasn't the same sort of psychic, or something. She knew they were lying to her, she just didn't know what about at this point. "Azazel targeted him a week ago, and now he's gone after another one. A girl. Ava. She doesn't deserve what he has planned for her."

For any of them.

Ellen was quiet for a good stretch. "And she's there? At Cold Oak?"

Dean looked over at Sam. She shouldn't be. Ava should be home in bed, with her fiancé and her normal life. Because Cas had kicked Azazel's ass back to Hell. They'd changed the timeline, damnit, and wasn't Time supposed to throw a hissy fit when they did that? Where was their hissy fit? This was exactly what had happened last time. Azazel should still be stuck in Hell. Even if he managed a ticket on the express train out, Dean knew it wasn't that easy to escape Hell. Only the Crossroads Demons got free passes; everyone else had to find holes to slip through, which weren't big or easy to find. Or, of course, they could flood a Hell Gate once they got it open. And Dean was sure as shit keeping an eye on the one in Fossil Butte. Bobby'd had someone checking those railroad lines once a month since Dean slipped up and had to tell the older hunter everything that was coming.

So Azazel should still be in Hell, and Ava should be back at home, in bed. But she wasn't. Which meant Azazel was topside or he had other demons doing his dirty work, with orders in place well before Cas had kicked his ass to the curb.

Damnit.

"We don't know," Dean hedged, though it was technically the truth. "But it's where he took Andy, so it's the best lead we got."

Ellen blew out a breath of air, but Dean could tell they'd talked her into it, hopefully without any more pushing for details. "Alright. I'll make a couple calls. Asa Fox was working a case in Montana. Jo was with 'em, last I heard. They may still be in the area."

The speed at which Dean stiffened into a rigid statue would have been impressive if it wasn't so damn warranted.

"Ellen, no-" Sam started at the same time his brother gruffly said, "Nevermind, we'll go ourselves, it's fine."

"Now wait just a damn minute," the woman snapped, silencing both Winchesters. "I don't like it either, but they're the closest. I'll make other calls, but if you boys are asking for someone to go in your place then I'm willing to bet you got a damn good reason. You want someone there tonight, they're likely it."

Baby's steering wheel creaked under Dean's white knuckled grip, and Sam sat in quite guilt beside him. The fact that Jo wasn't at the Roadhouse – that she was out hunting – was as much on them as it was on Jo. They'd all but told her to – certainly encouraged her to – the last time they'd seen her.

"Now, why can't you boys go yourselves?" Ellen's voice shifted from don't-mess-with-me to something dangerously bordering on concern. Dean didn't like it. Definitely didn't feel like they deserved it.

"We're fine," he insisted for the second time that night. "Forget it, Ellen, we'll go to Cold Oak-"

"We've had a rough week," Sam cut in, voice betraying how tired they both were. Dean shot him a glare, but Sam just ignored him. It was Dean who'd said they needed the break, Dean who'd pushed for it. And the older Winchester hadn't been wrong. They couldn't afford to make mistakes, not with the stakes – an Apocalypse and the end of the world – so high.

Besides. Ellen deserved the truth. At least some version of it.

"We're running on an adrenaline streak and no sleep," Sam continued, staring at the phone and hoping honesty was an apology enough for Jo. Speaking of Jo. Sam's eyes dropped from the phone. He hadn't realized she'd left home. She hadn't called them in months. "I'm sorry, Ellen. We're probably the last people you want to hear from right now."

The barkeep let out another sigh, haggard and weary this time. "Much as I'd like to blame you boys for it, I can't. She's good. Hell if I want to admit it, but she is. My baby girl's a damn good hunter and she was always going to be, whether I liked it or not. Too much like her daddy." Neither of the Winchester boys dared speak, and the woman sniffed sharply down the line, composing herself. "And Asa's one of the best. He's keeping her safe."

Dean glanced over at his brother almost hesitantly, both of them in a completely different mood than they had been a moment ago. Funny how easy it had been to send a couple hunters they didn't know ahead of them into the fray. Hell of a lot harder when it was Jo. Dean was mentally beating back images of that girl walking into another abandoned town. Beating those bloody images back with a god damn crowbar.

Why the hell was Ellen agreeing to this?

(For the same reason's she had walked hand in hand into that same damn town – that same damned fate – with her daughter all those years ago.)

"You tell them recon only, alright?" Dean turned his gaze back to the road, fiercely ignoring the knot in his gut as he all but agreed to putting Jo in danger. Damnit. A couple of psychics they didn't know weren't worth Jo's life. But he knew Sam's tone, knew he was the one who actually cared about rescuing Ava Wilson, and he was the one making this call. Dean didn't like it, but he would, at the least, respect it, because he hadn't been wrong; they were running on fumes. "They see anyone in that town, they call us. These psychics are powerful, Ellen. If there's even one of 'em in that town, they don't go in, you got that? We'll be there by midnight."

"Alright." Ellen didn't exactly like his tone, especially considering she was sending her daughter into whatever the hell mess this was (a Winchester mess was exactly what it was), but she could at least appreciate Dean's worry for Jo. "Look, they'll be at least a couple hours themselves, Dean. Why don't you boys take that break, get some sleep. It sounds like you need it. You can meet them there tomorrow morning."

When nothing but silence persisted in the car, Ellen rolling her eyes became practically audible.

"You're no good to my daughter dead in a ditch cuz you fell asleep at the wheel."

Dean clenched his jaw hard enough to start a headache behind his temples, the lines of his body tense. But, once again, everyone in the car seemed to have a valid, frustrating-as-hell point. This would be a hell of a lot easier if Ellen would just be pissed at them for getting Jo involved in yet another suicide mission.

He could tell by the set of the barkeep's tone that that wasn't gonna happen anytime soon. He'd lost this argument before he'd even realized there was one to be won. "Yeah…Yeah, alright, fine."

Didn't mean he had to go along with it, though. They'd be there at midnight, regardless of what Ellen thought they needed or what Asa Fox could handle or what he said he'd do. This was Jo they were talking about.

"Anything else they should know about?"

"Yeah, there's an Acheri demon in the woods surrounding the town," Sam piped up, hand fidgeting in his lap. His brain was miles away, trying not to touch Andy's mangled neck as the kid sobbed into his shoulder. "Tell them to bring red ribbons or handkerchiefs."

"Will do."

"…Ellen…" Dean hedged again, ready to tell her once more, not Jo. Anyone but Jo. But Ellen cut him off.

"It'll be fine, Dean," she said, voice as firm as a worried mother's possibly could be. "Recon only, like you said. They'll find your girl."

"Thanks, Ellen," Sam said quietly beside him, since Dean's throat wasn't really working anymore, maybe from anger, worry, or actually having someone give a damn about him. Probably all three. "Oh, and call us on Bobby's cell. Both of ours are, uh, out of commission."

There was a huff down the line, like Ellen knew what that meant (she didn't, but she could probably imagine. The sorts of stories hunters came back with. 'My phone went down in a swamp fighting a voodoo witch.' 'Mine ate it on a werewolf. Literally. The werewolf ate it.' 'Bucky lost his to a chupacabra. Had to gut the damn thing just to get it back. 'Course, by then it didn't work worth a damn!').

"I'll call you back when I hear from them." Then she was gone, the line clicking dead, and Sam lowered Bobby's phone. Dean's hands were still white on the wheel.

"We take turns driving to Bobby's," he said abruptly, eyes so fierce on the dark asphalt ahead that Sam wouldn't have been surprised to see it catch on fire. "Two hour shifts, other one sleeps. We get Cas set up, get an hour or two in a bed, and head back out."

It wasn't much – it probably wouldn't be enough – but it didn't matter. If Jo was heading to Cold Oak ahead of them, then Dean was going to shrink down that time as much as he possibly could. They had to get Cas to Bobby's, that wasn't a choice, and the Salvage Yard was on the way anyway. They could each catch a couple hours restless sleep on the drive there, another hour at Bobby's if they could spare it, and from that they'd be able to drive another seven, splitting that with naps too.

It wasn't great and they definitely wouldn't be in the best shape when they got there, but it sure as hell was better than letting Jo fight their battles for them with no clue what she could be walking into.

-o-o-o-

Bobby's phone started ringing about twenty minutes later, and Sam frowned at the unsaved number coming up on the screen. He glanced at Dean, wondering if they should answer Bobby's cell with an unknown contact calling. His brother just shrugged unhelpfully and so Sam flipped the phone open, pressing it to his ear.

"Hello?"

"Nice of you idjits to let me know yer alive," Bobby's dry voice came through, causing Sam to flinch. "You know, after yer angel lady came-to choking on medical equipment in the middle of the night, screaming bloody murder for a phone."

The unknown number must have been one of Bobby's landlines. Of course he wouldn't have those programed into his own cell.

"Uh…Sorry, Bobby," Sam answered, voice truly contrite as he lowered the phone, switching it to speaker. He saw Dean stiffen, his shoulders climbing towards his ears like a child who knew he'd just gotten caught being bad and was in for a whooping. "We've been a little, uh…things have been kinda hectic."

"I'll bet," came that same dry tone. Oh yeah, both Winchesters knew they were in big trouble. "So hectic you only had time to call Ellen Harvelle 'stead of the guy yer angel woke up at two in the morning again, with another disappearing act. No, I had to hear it from Ellen that Gordon Walker was after you. Oh, and that, thank yer lucky stars, you boys were alright."

The bitter sarcasm was like acid, each word dripping on their skin and burning clear through to the tender flesh beneath. Dean winced again, eyeing the phone like it might explode on them. "Sorry, Bobby. We should have called."

"Yeah, you should have." There was a tone shift somewhere in the silence, and finally the gruff old hunter sighed. "You gonna tell me what went down?"

"We can tell you when we get there." Dean's grip on the steering wheel loosened for the first time in about an hour. His fingers ached but he ignored it. The pain felt earned and deserved.

"Yer coming back?" The way Bobby said it, the words might have been 'About damn time,' even though they'd only just left the Salvage Yard two days ago.

"Not for long," Sam answered, sounding apologetic. "We met another psychic, Ava Wilson. She's gone missing. We think Azazel might have taken her back to Cold Oak."

The silence on the other end of the line was telling and both Winchesters realized, belatedly, that Andy was probably listening in. Shit. Well, nothing for it now.

"We gotta drop Cas off. She's hurting. Needs time to heal up." Dean moved right along, refusing to let anyone on that call linger on that damn, cursed town. "We need some sleep, too. Much as we can afford."

"Alright," Bobby responded after another pause and a sigh. "Your beds are made up. The kid's been camping in one of 'em, but I got extra sheets."

"Don't worry about it," Sam answered at the same time Dean said, "I can sleep on the couch."

They could hear Bobby snort, which probably meant Andy was making a similar, if not silent version, of the same offer. "Right, well, you boys just get here."

"Will do, Bobby," Dean answered, pushing through that little bit of choked-up emotion he always got at their gruff-as-hell, surrogate father expressing care and concern. Well, in Bobby-fashion, of course, but still. Dean could hear it in the man's tired voice. They probably hadn't gotten much more than Ellen tonight. "Get some sleep. We'll be there in a couple hours."

Sam flipped the phone closed once Bobby hung up, setting it on the seat beside them. The two brothers exchanged relieved glances. That could have gone much, much worse. The majority of their hides remained un-flayed and still attached to their bodies. Miracle of miracles. That was getting off downright easy in a Winchester-Singer world. Now they just had to hope Bobby wasn't saving the verbal lashing for when they showed up in person.

Chapter End Notes

A/Ns: Not the most exciting chapter, but I think after the last nine weeks we've earned ourselves a break, no?

Up Next: The Winchester-Singer-Gallagher-Garrett household gets a chapter of chatter and rest, more of the first than the second because, let's be honest, sleeping is pretty boring to write/read about. Unless you're Dean and sleeping means you dream of two different versions of your angelic best friend seeking conference with one another. In which case, sleeping is just another form of chatter ;D

Updating Schedule: I have a friend visiting next weekend, so I may not have time to get a chapter edited and posted. However, he's a writing buddy so, who knows, we may spend plenty of time writing. I will do my best!

I do want to give as much heads up as possible on the schedule going forward. After the next chapter (our 100th chapter, guys!) I will be switching to a two-week posting schedule. In addition, there may be the odd patch with a longer wait. My job wraps at the end of March, but so does my time in this city (and country it just so happens), and I will be busy dealing with packing up my life and planning the move. So until mid-April, my posting schedule is going to be a tad unpredictable. I'll keep you guys as updated as possible during chapter posts, and please remember to check my profile for information if I go missing an extra week. (I will also try to answer reviews and pokes to keep you updated that way too!)

Thank you for all your support! I'm so glad so many people are enjoying this story :)

Chapter 100: Season 2: Chapter 67

Chapter Notes

A/Ns: HAPPY 100th CHAPTER EVERYBODY! I am so sorry you had to wait three weeks for it. I tried to get it up last week, but between the first stage of packing and some personal stuff popping up, I simply didn't have the time. I will hopefully keep all delays down to just two weeks going forward, but it isn't something I can currently offer with any guarantee. Thank you all so, so much for your patience and understanding!

Previously on TRSF… Dean and Cas 'rescued' Sam from Gordon Walker though not before he took a nasty bullet to the chest. Cas was injured from a battle against Uriel and Angela Garrett had to take over for him, including one hell of an awkward conversation with Dean about 'feelings,' particularly those he might have towards Cas (which he doesn't. Definitely not. Nope, no way, screw that). The boys left Gordon to rot in police custody, only to realize that Ava Wilson was in trouble. Knowing Azazel likely took her to Cold Oak, the boys called Ellen Harvelle for back up. She passed the call on to Jo, who was hunting with Asa Fox not far from South Dakota. The boys planned to meet the pair at Cold Oak, but had to stop at Bobby's to drop Cas off so she could heal. After having been awake and running on adrenaline the entire night, the boys could honestly use a break of their own…

Chapter Reference – Andy's an immature brat (but we love him): Quick reminder that Andy decided to test his growing mental powers by sending images of gay porn to Dean. Since then, Dean seems to keep running into the topic (sometimes quite literally). See Chapter 85: Season 2, Chapter 52 for a refresher!

Chapter Reference – Dean and Cas had a spoonfest in a motel room while (not) watching Jaws: Quick reminder that Cas asked to confer with the grace in Dean's chest, and ended up doing so in a motel room, on a bed with Dean, hand buried under his shirt (skin-on-skin contact is so much better for transference, apparently) while Sam was out on a jog and Dean definitely wasn't paying any attention to the movie on in the background. See Chapter 57: Season 2, Chapter 24 for a refresher!

Chapter Reference – Faith (this time around): Quick reminder that this story's version of Season 1 episode 12: Faith, happened with Sam as the one dying (from a brain aneurism when he pushed his powers too hard) and Dean taking him to see Reverend Roy Le Grange with his leashed reaper performing 'miracles'. See Chapter 17: Season 1, Chapter 16 for a refresher!

Chapter Warnings: Sam needs some stitching, Angela needs some machinery, Cas needs another healing trance, and Dean needs to get his head out of the gutter – or wherever the hell it's gotten off to lately (which is all Andy's fault, he's definitely decided).

See the end of the chapter for more notes

-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-

The Road So Far (This Time Around)

Season 2: Chapter 67

-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-

Lucky for the Winchesters, another couple hours of sleep for Bobby meant that before they arrived, the gruff old hunter had time to cool off from being totally forgotten by his boys. He was significantly less grumpy by the time they pulled up outside the house. Not that they didn't get the deadpan glare that promised pain if they ever left him hanging without knowing what happened to them for that long again.

It probably also helped that Dean was carrying Angela – bridal style, with Cas nowhere in sight – up the steps when Bobby opened the front door for them. Then there was Sam, with a bandaged shoulder he was definitely favoring and bags about a mile deep beneath his eyes. That sure didn't hurt their chances of sympathy over a lecture (which Bobby had surely prepared, extra sleep or not). The gruff hunter just stepped to the side, door held open, giving his boys a side-long look that was as worried as it was scolding.

"I'm going to take her upstairs," Dean said without much more explanation than that. Angela was starting to stir in his arms. They hadn't bothered waking her up when they'd parked the Impala in the dusty yard. The last three times they'd tried at various gas stations and food stops had been unsuccessful, to the point where the Winchesters stopped trying.

As Dean headed for the stairs, he tossed over his shoulder, "Sam's been shot, one to the chest, left side. Needs proper patching up."

"Gee, thanks, Dean," his brother muttered under his breath as he stood next to Bobby, knowing he'd just been made the sacrificial goat, thrown under the bus so Dean could get out of an in-person lecture. He'd be too busy 'helping Angela-slash-Cas'. How altruistic of him.

"I'll get the med kit," Bobby grumbled out the side of his mouth as the older Winchester started up the stairs. That was definitely concern in his voice and a bit more of a sympathetic eye for Sam. Dean's back, meanwhile, got a narrowed-eyed promise of a lecture at a later date. It helped mollify Sam at least a little and he followed his surrogate father figure into the kitchen without protest.

"Andy!" Bobby hollered as they passed through the den.

Oh, good, Sam thought. Andy's alive. They hadn't killed each other yet. That was good. It had definitely been up for question until that moment, considering the mute psychic was nowhere to be seen.

The yell was somewhat needless, it turned out. The kid popped up behind Sam like a ghost coming out of nowhere. Sam jumped, then hissed and made a ginger grab at his injured shoulder. Andy had the decency to look regretful about it.

'Sorry,' he mouthed. Bobby gave him a pointed look from behind Sam. The kid glared back, then rolled his eyes and raised his hands, repeating the apology in ASL: a circle rubbed over his sternum with a straight-thumbed fist.

Sam raised his good arm, fingers spread wide and straight, and tapped the point of his thumb against his chest a couple of times. Pretty much the ASL equivalent of 'It's fine", at least according to the internet. Andy blinked at the unexpected non-verbal reply, then beamed at the younger Winchester. Sam, for the sake of manly men being manly (which he rarely cared about, but childhood lessons were awfully hard to shake), beamed back, then had to ignore the slight blush to his cheeks when he turned to Bobby, who was staring at the pair of them with nothing short of affection (and perhaps a touch of pride).

"Get the whiskey," Bobby ordered, breaking the moment once he had Andy's attention. The kid nodded an affirmative, one hand raised in a thumbs up, before he headed for the liquor cabinet in the den. Sam followed Bobby into the kitchen, not looking forward to yet another hunter's rendition of home health care. Dean's had been plenty for one day.

Just once, he'd like to show up at a hospital and get real painkillers.

(Only, no, not really. The last time he'd gotten that wish, he'd been dying from pushing too hard and Dean had gone and thought about trading his life for another's via a pastor's wife and a hooked reaper. So, yeah, no, he'd take Patched Up By a Hunter 101 any day.)

Sam settled into the kitchen table, Bobby grabbing a med kit from one of the cabinets (lesson one in that book would be 'always keep a med kit in every room', and had he mentioned Bobby would probably be the author of it?), when Andy all but skipped back into the room. He held up a bottle for inspection.

"Not the good stuff, kid," Bobby grumped immediately, apparently still somewhat crabby despite his nap and cool down time.

"You have good stuff?" Sam parroted with a raised eyebrow. From the way Andy turned the label back towards himself with a very similar raised brow, he was obviously thinking the same thing.

Bobby glared at both of them and told Andy to try again, this time in very pointed Sign.

-o-o-o-

Dean made it halfway up the stairs with Angela before the woman woke up enough to wrap languid, teasing arms around his neck. She opened that devil mouth of hers to say something Dean knew he'd immediately regret hearing, so the hunter put a stop to that right then and there.

"Shaddup."

She just batted those eyelashes all ladylike, blue eyes playing way too innocent. "I didn't say anything, Dean."

"Uh-huh. Let's keep it that way."

The woman in his arms chuckled as they reached the top of the stairs. Dean headed for the room full of her medical equipment, trying not to wonder how Angela felt about being hooked back up to it without a say. Essentially forced into a coma. They hadn't even asked her – hadn't had the chance to, really – and now that Dean was thinking about it, he was kinda too scared to.

"Sorry if what we talked about in the car messed things up," Angela said out of nowhere, voice soft. She was smiling up at him and for once it wasn't a smirk. Dean definitely didn't trust it.

"Thought I told you to stop talking." Which wasn't technically true. He'd told her to shut up before she could start. She just hadn't listened, clearly. Dean nudged the door open with his toe then stopped at the threshold with a loud, frustrated sigh. "Sorry. I'm not trying to be a dick."

Angela laughed in his arms, tightening her hold around his neck un-sarcastically (for once). "I'm not taking it personally. It's been a rough couple days, huh?"

"Yeah, you can say that again," Dean muttered, mostly under his breath as he crossed the room towards the bed.

The machines were set up and ready to go, ventilation tube clean and resting on the bedside table. Bobby's doing, no doubt. Dean avoided looking at it, not caring to think about the woman in his arms pulling it up and out of her throat all on her own after waking up in the driver's seat. Instead he focused on setting her down onto the mattress with as little jostling as possible. Not that Angela Garrett was fragile, or anything. He sure seemed to be learning that the hard way. Not that he usually thought of women as fragile. Hell, none of the women who were fixtures in his life could ever be described as fragile. Just… ugh, he didn't know. He was being stupid and he knew it. He blamed Rachel for getting in his head. Or maybe Andy. Or hell, Cas at this point, for picking a stupidly gorgeous vessel who also seemed to have a decent sense of humor and a ridiculously down-to-earth grip on her current situation, all of which was confusing the fuck out of Dean. Yeah, that. All of that. Definitely Cas's fault.

Angela unhooked her arms from around his neck to settle her full weight on the bed. Dean cleared his throat, avoiding looking at those blue eyes, too. "Uh, look…thanks for being so, uh…cool about this, you know?"

It wasn't every day you found someone who'd lost everything and yet agreed to serve as an angel's vessel. And kept serving, to the point where she'd shown up on Cas's behalf to what turned out to be nothing short of a damn shootout. With grenades.

"You're welcome," Angela answered, that smile still suspiciously un-smirk-like, all open and warm. She scooted herself up the bed so that she was mostly sitting upright against the pillows. "It's been an… adventure, of sorts." She paused to laugh weakly, like it was her own little joke. "Don't get me wrong; it absolutely sucks sometimes and there are days I wish I hadn't said yes. But…it seems worth it, somehow."

Dean didn't know what to say to that, so he didn't say anything. He'd never served as a vessel and, frankly, never wanted to. Ever. He couldn't relate, and he definitely couldn't understand the kind of faith that allowed Angela Garrett to be a passenger in her own body, unto the end of the world (or worse).

The silence stretched, awkward and unfitting in the small room, until a warm, soft-skinned touch to his arm startled the hunter into meeting Angela's eyes.

"I didn't mean to make you uncomfortable. But what you and Cas have, whatever that may be – and I'm not pressuring you, Dean –" she chuckled once again at his expression and, despite Dean wanting to scoff (and change the subject, and run from the room screaming, and maybe never have to talk with this woman ever again), he also mostly believed her. He couldn't really look away from those stupidly honest blue pools, much as he wanted to. In the end, Dean just rolled his eyes to avoid doing either fully. "– it feels special. And important. I don't think I could just stand by if it meant Cas not being a part of all… this."

Dean let out something between a grumble and a sigh, grabbing the chair beside the hospital bed and pulling it underneath him. Because apparently they were doing this. He didn't really want to have this chat – or any other with Dragon Lady after their last one – but Angela was giving a lot up to be with them. Peace and literal Paradise; a never ending eternity with her loved ones. He supposed, while she was passing all that up to help them, he could at least keep the woman company while she was in the driver's seat, since she seemed to want to talk.

"We need him," Dean said bluntly, going for direct over the emotional declaration his words otherwise could have been. Unfortunately for him, they still stupidly tried to be the latter, given the way his throat closed up before he was even done talking. "He is important. To us, to this. Sam and I can't do it without him."

"Then it's worth it." The words were without hesitation, but Angela's smile weakened despite them. Her gaze dropped to her hands pooled in her lap. "It's not like I said yes out of pure selfless grace, you know." She laughed lowly, pure self-deprecation in every huff, and Dean felt something dangerously close to pity for this woman sitting in there, talking to a man she barely knew, in a house she was a stranger to, in a state she'd probably never seen. All because they'd needed her. The woman tried valiantly to rally her smile, but it was sadder the second time around. "I was scared. I didn't want to die."

Dean dropped his eyes, too. It's not like he'd forgotten that Angela was slated to that fate, but it hadn't been on the forefront of his mind lately. Not with all the other people he knew with deaths that seemed a lot more…well, certain, he supposed. It was kinda hard to remember her destiny had been set too when she was alive, awake and chatting him up like they were old friends.

He didn't ask about her use of past tense, though he hadn't missed it. He thought about asking, about whether she was ready now or if she even realized it, but decided not to. They weren't old friends and Dean had to remind himself that he barely knew this woman. The person he knew was only borrowing her face.

"It's not all bad," was what came out of his mouth. He offered that blue, blue gaze a grim smile. "Death's a pretty sweet deal, actually."

At least if you were headed upward, which he was pretty damn sure a lady like Angela would be.

She laughed, thinking he was talking from (very recent) personal experience. "Yeah? What's it like? Castiel was pretty sparse on the details."

"Angels and reapers tend to be like that." Dean leaned back into the chair, telling himself he could do this. Just a normal (okay, fine, abnormal) conversation with a (sort of, maybe?) friend who just needed some reassurance about her impending mortality. He could do that. Sure. "Heaven's all good memories. On a loop, only you don't know they're memories. You get to relive all your greatest hits with your favorite people."

He was smiling by the end of it, even if there was a bitter twitch deep in the muscles around his mouth. Heaven wasn't real and never would be, in Dean's option. Not the memories, not the Holier-Than-Thou bullshit, not freakin' God. But Angela didn't need to know any of that. Probably wouldn't pick up on it, either. She was smiling, likely thinking of what some of those memories would be. Dean wondered who her favorite people were. He'd never thought to ask, since Cas had assured him they were all dead. That had been his requirement for her to serve as a vessel.

It was unsettling how much that thought now felt like the deathblow, rather than an attempt to save someone from Jimmy Novak's fate.

"Yeah, that doesn't sound too bad," Angela answered, voice oddly soft and calling Dean away from his increasingly dark thoughts. The hunter couldn't tell if he'd helped or made it worse. Which seemed all too par for the course, now didn't it. Then Angela was straightening up ever so slightly, like she'd heard something Dean hadn't caught. The woman suddenly laughed, a totally different sound, with a lot more genuine joy and mischief than their conversation called for. Dean raised an eyebrow and Angela smiled widely. "Cas is awake and a little behind on the conversation. He wants to know what damsels in distress and very tall towers have to do with female dragons."

At Dean's confused expression, Angela winked and said, "Because you're my hero, Dean. My Knight in shining armor. My valiant-"

"Okay, we get it," he barked, though he was pretty sure it came out as much of a plea as it did a demand. The glare he gave her almost immediately made the Dragon Lady laugh all over again. The hunter just snorted in response. There was no winning with this woman. Ever. "I'll be sure to give him the cliff notes on Rapunzel so he's all caught up."

He'd meant it as one hundred percent, acrid sarcasm, but given the way Angela's lips spread wider with pure, shameless devilry, Dean knew he'd stepped in it right away. "Aw, isn't that a sweet thought. You reading Cas a bedtime story."

The hunter internally cursed every bone in this woman's body while externally he blushed bright red and tried to hide it by ducking his head, mind on a completely different conversation held almost entirely via a rearview mirror.

Yeah. Totally didn't work. Damnit.

"Of course, Rapunzel didn't have a dragon, you know."

Had he said bones? He meant fiber. Every fiber of this woman's sarcastic, thinks-she's-so-damn-funny, evil, evil being.

"Sleeping Beauty, then, and it doesn't matter, cuz I'm pretty sure I told you to shut the hell up," Dean growled, well aware the angel behind those gorgeous blue eyes was listening now. Which only reminded him moreover of their last conversation and how he was apparently broadcasting some misleading signals all over the friggin' place. Time to backpedal like only Dean Winchester could. "You know I didn't mean it like that."

"Like what, Dean?" Those goddamn eyelashes were back to batting pure innocence.

"Jesus, you really are a Dragon Lady," he muttered, not really meaning to say it aloud.

Angela laughed again, a joyous enough sound (and so odd coming from someone who wore Cas's face (even if the reality was the other way around)) that even Dean could admit her stupid amusement was probably worth his misery and humiliation. Well, some of it. A little. Very little. And afterward she could go back to shutting the hell up.

She leaned towards him, winking. "I work hard at it."

For lack of anything better to do and feeling incredibly awkward for no damn reason, Dean stood from the chair, turning towards the various machines surrounding her bed. He made a grab for the heart monitor clip and clumsily attaching it to her finger. That led to him grabbing the wires for monitoring brain activity next, one of the five things he knew how to do out of the dozens necessary to hook a human body up to life support.

He probably should learn at some point, considering it was his best friend sitting on that bed in a woman who needed those machines due to demands laid out by Dean. He'd never been good with the tech sorta stuff, though. Give him a needle and thread and he'd stich you a friggin' Van Gogh across any battle wound, but a bunch of machines, wires, and tubes? He was helpless all over again.

"I'll, uh…" Dean definitely fumbled the words as hard as he fumbled the first monitor, placing it at her temple. He was blushing again and he didn't know why and her stupid, knowing smirk definitely wasn't helping. "Most of this will have to wait for Sam. Bobby's patching him up, then he'll be up to do the, uh, the rest."

Angela chuckled so softly it was mostly just air through her nose. She took the second electrode pad from him, peeling the cover off the back and sticking it to the other side of her scalp like she'd done it a thousand times before. Suddenly Dean wondered what her profession had been. He was wondering a lot of things about this woman he'd never really thought twice about. Something about that felt…bad. Pathetic, if not wrong all together.

"That's okay. Cas can do the rest," Angela answered as she passed him back the thin plastic covering that kept the sticky coating on the back fresh when it wasn't busy sticking to skin. "He wants to talk to you anyway."

"Uh…" Dean's hand froze, halfway to tossing the piece of plastic beside the heart monitor and now failing miserably. He had to catch the thing twice as it slid off the side of the machine. Goddamnit. Why the hell was he blushing worse now? That…that definitely wasn't right. He was blushing because of friggin' Angela Dragon Lady Garrett. Because she was the devil, but a hot one, and Cas- well, Cas had nothing to do with it!

Damnit, what was it with women – human or angelic – messing with his head lately? He had enough issues keeping shit straight up there on his own.

"It was nice talking with you, Dean," Angela said sweetly before her eyes flashed a brighter, lighter blue, and then it was Cas sitting stiffly, back ramrod straight, in the hospital bed, staring at him, and Dean had to figure out rapidly how to act completely and utterly normal. Because that's what he was. That's what this was.

Mother friggin' normal.

"Uh…"

Oh, yeah, this was going great. Why hadn't he volunteered Sam for Cas-slash-Angela duty and taking the Bobby lecture when he had the chance? Why hadn't he also just slit his throat when he'd had the chance, sitting in the car on the side of that stupid highway in Lafayette, while Angela Devil Lady Garrett went and blabbed her opinions all over him like chick flick word vomit?

"Hi, Cas."

Good, great, two words strung together. Progress. Way to go, Dean.

"Hello, Dean."

The hunter found himself caught in that wide, endless, unblinking blue stare, desperately thinking that he could not be the most interesting thing in the room. But Cas just kept on staring and Dean fidgeted, fumbling the next sensor between confused and jittery fingers. What the hell. No, really. What the hell? Interacting with Cas had always been at least a little awkward. Even once it had stopped being awkward at all, the fact that it was no longer awkward had seemed, well, awkward. But this…this was flippin' ridiculous. This was his friend, his angel, who he'd survived Heaven and Hell and friggin' Purogatory with, and Dean was standing there braindead and blushing like a schoolgirl in pigtails, damnit!

He needed to get his head back on straight. This was just a result of dying. And Andy messing with him. And Dragon Lady messing with him, and Rachel messing with him, and Heaven being, well, Heaven, and so on. Dean would get his head back on straight and all…this (whatever this was) would go the fuck away.

Then everything would be normal and good and right in the world.

Yup. That.

Realizing he was still holding the last EEG sensor, Dean suddenly thrust it out to the angel. Right. Medical equipment was interesting, Cas could go and stare at that.

"Here." The angel dropped her gaze to the electrode as Dean flopped it back and forth by the connection point. "Angela said you could…?"

Cas retrieved the small device from his hand and placed it low on her skull, just beneath her left ear. They then proceeded to play a near-silent, awkward-as-hell (at least for one of them) game of Pass-the-Medical-Device-So-Cas-Could-Hook-It-Up. Which Dean was not – he repeated: not – referring to as 'Playing Doctor' in his own head. No way, no how. This game (which was totally not playing doctor, damnit) included moments when Dean had to turn around as fast as he possibly could (almost tripping over the chair he'd been sitting in only a few minutes ago, catching himself on the armrests and then very deliberately picking it up and moving it several feet away like that had been his plan all along and he'd only added almost-tripping-and-killing-himself for the extra flair) when Cas starting doing things like pulling back the blankets and unbuttoning her slacks with no friggin' warning. Unfortunately for Dean, it wasn't until after he'd chosen (deliberately, mind you) to move that chair that he realized what he'd handed Cas was, in fact, a catheter.

Look, it wasn't his fault he hadn't been paying any attention, alright? There was a reason he didn't help out with this stuff, leaving it all to Sam. He was doing everything he could just to get his brain going again. God, he missed the days when Cas was a boy and also an angel with a vessel that didn't need things shoved places that Dean was absolutely not thinking about. He almost couldn't believe he was saying this, but Dean missed when things were normal.

"You…uh…you good?" Dean asked, back still to the bed and the potentially undressed-and-doing-things-Dean-wasn't-thinking-about angel.

"Yes," Cas answered and Dean (who wasn't entirely ready to trust that the angel understood and would, in fact, have pants back on when he looked) risked a glance over his shoulder. But Cas was back to ramrod-straight attention, blankets tucked into place around her, pants and unmentionables safely hidden beneath (on or otherwise), and was once more watching Dean with that unwavering gaze. "We should discuss the healing trance."

"Uh…right. Yeah." The hunter turned fully around, rubbing his hands across his thighs almost nervously, fidgeting for the pure lack of anything else to do in the quiet room. Then Cas's words registered, and he had entirely new things to be worrying about. "Wait, 'trance'? You said you just needed rest. A trance sounds kinda ominous, Cas."

"It is how angels recover from severe damage." Whether or not the human in the room found the phrasing any more or less reassuring, Cas didn't seem worried. Well, much. It was hard to tell with the stoic expression and rigid posture, but Dean was pretty sure Cas was too tired to be worried. Which, honestly, might be worse. "It is called a trance because we shut down any systems unnecessary to the healing, including what you perceive as consciousness."

"And angel radio, I'm guessing." Dean could figure out that much on his own. Last time Cas had ditched them for healing, she'd said she wouldn't have her ears on. If she'd been doing this 'trance' business up in heaven, then that was probably what a 'system shut down' meant. Angels were weird, man. "That's what Uriel was helping you with."

Supposed to be helping with, the dickwad. Fat lot a good it had done them.

"Yes. Another angel is usually present to assist in entering the trance and keeping the damaged grace from…" The angel trailed off, blinking once at Dean, as if unsure how to proceed. Dean knew that look. Which, shit, meant this version of Cas was starting to pick up on what did and didn't piss Dean off. And that meant whatever she had to say was gonna piss him off.

Goddamnit.

"Just spit it out," Dean sighed, bringing that chair back over to the bed and sinking into it damn near bonelessly. He was too tired for this himself.

Cas fidgeted with her hands, both of them twitching like she planned to move but purposefully didn't. "If an angel's core is damaged enough, it goes-"

"Supernova," Dean suddenly finished for her, blinking even as he said it. As he realized it. He'd seen that. He'd seen that happen a hundred times, the most recently only last frickin' night. "Wait, are you saying you could-"

"It is very unlikely," Cas hurriedly explained. If she thought there was more than even the slightest chance, she would have expended the extra energy to move Angela's medical equipment down to Bobby Singer's panic room, in order to contain the blast and Holy light that marked an angel's end. "Healing trances are often a last resort, to keep an angel from…'going up.'"

This time those hands did move, raising off the bed to curl into bunny ears. Dean ignored it with every fiber of his being. He'd wasted every damn word he'd had with Angela Garrett over the last twenty-four hours, not once addressing those damn air quotes. God damnit.

"But you're not close to that, right?" Focus on the problem at hand, curse out the Dragon Lady another day. Because they were talking about Cas's life here, even if the angel didn't seem worried about it (go figure that). For probably only the third time in their entwined existence, Dean was sitting stiffer than the angel in front of him as he repeated, "Right?"

"Right. I don't think it's a concern here." Her answer, not ask quick this time, carried enough steadfast confidence to put Dean back at ease. Well, mostly back at ease. Some ease. Not deaf-con level five readiness, at least. Maybe just a three for now. "In cases of severe damage, grace can…'overload' when balance isn't maintained throughout our entire being. Like…."

"The coolant system on a nuclear plant blowing out." Or a damaged bullet blocking the barrel. Yeah, Dean got the image. However grace seemed to work, it was required for all the 'systems' to function. Same as any machine, organic or not. The more systems bowing out, unable to get a supply of what was needed, the faster the bigger picture shut down. Cue meltdown or explosion or death, etcetera, etcetera.

"Yes…" This time, Cas's answers was far more unsure. She gave Dean the kind of look that said 'stop comparing me to your human things.' Dean ignored it. Cas was the one always using analogies and shit. Dean was just taking her lead. "A second angel lends their grace to maintain an even spread, or to supplement when the damaged angel does not have enough grace left. In this case, another angel may not be necessary."

"I don't know, Cas." Dean didn't look so confident. Cas hadn't even been able to walk on his- er, her own back at that gas station. Somehow, he doubted the guy- girl- woman- damnit, angel had enough grace to cover all those systems on her own. "You aren't doing so hot on your own, you know? Maybe we should call Rachel."

He was pretty confident the stoic angel would help. Her concern for Cas's wellbeing had seemed genuine, and she'd cared enough to help Dean find him in Heaven. Her. Goddamnit, this was annoying.

Cas shook her head. "Heaven will be locked down, now. There is nothing she can do to help."

The holes Castiel had previously made use of (and which he suspected Rachel found once Dean called her) would be more closely monitored now. Heaven's Guard would be closing up as many as they could find. Zachariah had been lazy after Castiel's first disobedience, only bothering with the two she had mentioned in her report. But now… now she was certain Rachel would have no way to come, even if Castiel did call her, which she would not. The less involved Rachel was in this, the safer she would be. The safer his entire Flight would be.

It pained Cas greatly to admit it. The future Dean came from was one where Heaven despised her. All her brothers, hunting her, hating her. She worried now that between Zachariah's influence and cunning cruelly – with no one to counter his machinations on Castiel's behalf – she was doomed to the very same future.

At least she was sticking to the timeline, Cas supposed bitterly. How difficult it could be, to swallow your own advice.

"It is possible to enter a trance unaided," the angel continued, moving away from her cynical thoughts and focusing on the current issue. She had several to pick from, as it was. "But I have never attempted it before. I will leave my…'ears' on so that I will hear your prayers."

That was one mistake she would never make again. It wouldn't matter if she was dying; her connection to the Ether – and therefore her charges – would remain. No matter what.

"I should be able to wake myself up if needed-"

"How long are we talking here, Cas?" Dean was staring at her with growing worry, which on his face looked like anger. Castiel was getting better at reading that.

"I do not know," she admitted regretfully. "The purpose of the trance in this case is to speed up the healing process. I will shut down any unnecessary systems, including supplying grace to Angela's body. But I have never done this without another angel supplementing grace. I…I would guess a week. Maybe more."

Dean stared. And stared. And it was definitely anger on his face, but it wasn't because of Cas. Damnit. The hunter closed his eyes, running close-to-shaking hands over his aching, tired eyeballs, digging his heals in until he saw spots. Damnit! He was sick of getting Cas back only to lose her again. Again and again. Like fate was purposefully keeping the damn angel from him.

He snorted, dropping his hands from his face. Right. Like the Universe gave that much of a shit about him – any of them – to begin with. The man from the future rallied himself, shaking off the bitter, asshole version of Dean friggin' Winchester that liked to surface now and then and dig a cynical hole straight back to Hell. The hunter reminded himself that Cas was here. Mostly safe, mostly okay, and would get better. That counted for something.

It had to.

"Alright," he muttered, opening his eyes to find worried blue regarding him solemnly. Dean cleared his throat, straightening up in the chair and also reminding himself this wasn't just about him. "Yeah, alright. Whatever you need. Just, focus on healing up."

And he would focus on patience and the positives. Right. A real good skill of his.

Dean ran a hand down his face, scrubbing at the five o'clock shadow that had taken root while he was busy being dead and running around heaven and also kicking Gordon Walker's ass. He needed a shave. A shower and a shave, and he wasn't gonna get either of 'em, because he had a million other places to be, friends to help, new baddies to get to first. "Is there, uh, is there anything I can do to help?"

He wasn't an angel and he definitely couldn't 'supplement' anything for the guy, but he wasn't useless. (He friggin' wasn't, damnit.)

That blue gaze dropped to his chest almost immediately, despite the flutter of hesitation beneath dark lashes. Dean almost sighed, realizing where this was going well before Cas opened her mouth. "Entering the trance is the most difficult part. It maybe help to…to have contact with another source of grace."

Right. He wasn't an angel, but he was kinda, sorta housing one.

Dean managed not to roll his eyes as he reached out and grabbed the angel's hand, pulling it flat to his chest. It was still embarrassing, but a lot less than that first damn time. And the second. Even if Sam had just as much likelihood of walking in on them here, too. Or god, Andy. Ugh. Dean almost didn't manage to hold back the groan at the mere thought.

Hell, he had to hold back a groan at the realization that he was getting used to this. These little grace-seeking confabs. Good grief, he might as well start braiding Cas's hair right here and now (not that he actually knew how to braid hair…).

Cas closed her eyes, lids sliding shut over pools of blue in a way that made Dean very, very uncomfortable. Like touching his chest was the most satisfying, wondrous thing in the damn world. Which Dean wasn't thinking about, because he'd done enough blushing today, thank you very much. Blushing wasn't even a thing he did. Which meant it would be just great if he stopped doing it any damn time now.

Like last time, only without the excuse of Jaws playing in the background to give him at least some excuse not to watch the angel, Dean found his eyes locked on Cas's face. He was tired and honestly needed about a week's worth of sleep himself, but he knew he wouldn't get it until Cas went under (or whatever). (And even then, who was he kidding? He and Sam were getting an hour, tops, before they'd be back on the road, heading towards Jo and their next, never-ending crisis.)

(Christ, he was tired.)

Cas's features were relaxed. Peaceful, even, and Dean found himself envious. Or maybe it was guilt. Either way, his thoughts were back on that dream, sitting on a picnic table at a kid's birthday party – a friend of Ben's – drinking a beer next to Cas. His Cas. Not that this Cas sitting in front of him wasn't also sort of his. Er. Well. No, nope, he definitely didn't feel comfortable addressing the very female looking angel as his.

Was that a double standard?

…Yeah, probably. Shit. But also to hell with it, because it didn't change how Dean felt, and how he felt was awkward. So moving on, back to the point.

He hadn't gotten one of those dreams since. Months, now, since he'd seen his Cas and Dean could admit, whether with bitterness, jealously, or just plain regret, that he missed his friend. It was damn frustrating to have the guy tangled up in his soul – to literally be housing him – and yet have him entirely unreachable.

Dean realized he was being watched and snapped back to the present. He found now-open eyes regarding him with one of the more intense stares Cas possessed.

"Uh…Everything…everything okay?" Damnit, he was blushing again. At least this time it was because he'd been caught staring while also frowning like a friggin' kid whose ice cream had tumbled off the cone to melt, spoiled, on the ground below.

(He needed to stop using analogies that painted him as a child. They were not helping.)

"Your thoughts are very loud."

Dean blinked. What the hell was he supposed to do with that? Then he realized what he'd been thinking and winced. With a rough swallow and more god damn blushing, he cleared his throat. "Uh, right. Sorry?"

Cas just stared at him before she dropped her hand from his chest. Dean moved to protest, hand following after Cas's before it seemed to realize what it was doing and fell awkwardly to the edge of the bed. Still. His protest wasn't because he could feel anything from the depleted sliver of grace inside him (the loss of that warm, fuzzy, happy flip-flopping would actually be worthy of protest, embarrassing as it was), but because Dean knew Cas needed this. Before he could figure out how to put that into words that weren't straight from a chick flick (and therefore unacceptable to say aloud), the angel levered herself up by the arms and scooted a foot over. Cas resettled on the far edge of the narrow hospital bed before resuming her intense stare, now with a hint of expectancy. Dean stared right back, utterly confused as to what it was she was expecting, until Cas patted the narrow, now-empty space next to her thigh. Not unlike what he'd done back in that motel room while Jaws played in the background.

"Uh…thanks, but…I'm good here, buddy." Dean tapped one of the arms of the chair like it was friggin' live preserver and he was happy hanging out in shark-infested waters so long as he had it.

Cas leveled a look his way that said she well knew he was a drowning man. "If you wish to speak with him as well, you will need to be asleep. It would be better if you did not fall to the floor or spend too long in a position you might regret when you wake."

That…that was a lot of words, but the gist of it, if Dean's ears were working any better than his brain, was that Cas wanted him in bed with her. Oh, and that he'd get to talk to Chest Cas.

Wait, what?

"Wait, what?" Dean shook his head to clear it, quite literally trying to knock the cobwebs loose. The angel in front of him rolled her eyes without either eyeball ever rotating, Dean was sure of it.

"When I commune with the grace in your chest, it is not a conversation as you would think of it, as I said before."

Despite Dean's adamancy that he was good in the chair, Cas did not move back over to the center of the bed, hand still resting in that empty spot beside her. There was a depression in the mattress where she'd been sitting. Dean wondered if it would still be warm from her body heat. Angels were always so weirdly cold, but Angela Garrett hadn't been. Dean wanted to reach out to that spot. Find out.

The hunter shook his head. Physically shook his head to dispel that messed up train of thought. What the hell? Something was seriously wrong with him.

"But it might be possible to induce a dream state in which you could speak with him, as I believe he has done before."

Stress. It had to be stress. Maybe he needed to take some time to himself; a cold shower or a little hand-action should knock this shit right out of him-

Cas's words registered – unexpectedly and suddenly – in his damn-near broken brain (and it was. It was so, so broken lately. He blamed Andy. Didn't matter that this wasn't gay porn right here. This was still somehow that damn kid's fault.) Despite his head being screwed on sideways, Dean was reaching out for Cas's wrist before the words were even done leaving those stupidly perfect lips. Before they even registered, really.

Maybe it was an aborted move to seeking out that body heat. Maybe it really was stress. Or maybe it was that he missed his friend. His friend who he'd spent a horrible, miserable, terrible, stressful week (one of the worst of his life, and that was saying something) thinking he'd lost forever. A friend he'd barely started to mourn, a friend Dean still couldn't see, couldn't be sure, because he was nothing more than a shadow and some mumbled words of reassurance from another who thought of that sliver as a power source and something that shouldn't be buried in Deans' chest.

Cas stared down at the hand wrapped around her arm, then to the hunter it belonged to, and Dean tried not to be self-conscious about this. He wanted to see the other Cas and this Cas was offering. Dean wasn't passing that up, no matter what this might look like or how he battled the red still plaguing his cheeks. Instead, he uncurled his grip from Cas's arm and held out his hand instead. When the angel still only stared, he wiggled his fingers as obnoxiously and obviously as possible, looking pointedly down at his open, offered palm.

"I'm good in the chair, so come on. Bring on the dream state, or whatever."

The angel still eyed him like she worried a bit for his sanity (which, fair), but placed her hand in his, palm up as well. Dean wasted no time pulling that baby straight to his chest. He was still annoying disappointed at the lack of flip-flopping reaction from behind his sternum, but he tried to ignore it. Reminded himself Cas was in there and, in a second, he'd have proof for himself.

Cas closed her eyes, peace once more stealing across her face, and Dean did the same. Well, he closed his eyes, at least, and waited. And waited.

Nothing happened.

He tried to give it a minute. He was usually pretty quick to fall asleep when he put some effort into it and, boy, Dean was putting the effort in. After a ten count when still nothing had changed, Dean cracked one eye back open, hoping maybe Cas had noticed it wasn't working, too, and would know what to try instead.

The sight of the bunker library around him was shocking enough for a double take. Both of Dean's eyes shot open, and he stood partially out of the chair beneath him, heart pounding. The lights were bright, the table gleamed, the walls were lined with shelves of books that smelled like home. The lamp centered on the stretch of table in front of him – the old 50's style desk type had had him grinning and shaking his head in disbelief for the first solid month after he and Sam had moved in – was half-blinding in contrast to Bobby Singer's dark guest bedroom. Dean hadn't bothered to turn on the lights, his arms full of Dragon Lady at the time. The chair beneath him was different, too. Old and sturdy, made of wood instead of cheap plastic. He slowly sank back into it, marveling at the achingly familiar texture of the wood beneath his fingers.

"Hello, Dean."

The hunter's head snapped to the side, where Cas – his Cas, in a Jimmy Novak lookalike body, with trench coat and a still-missing tie – stood beside his chair. Angela Garrett stood just behind Cas and to his right. Probably not Angela, given their current location and the fact that this was supposed to be an angel confab.

"Cas?"

"Yes," they both answered in unison, voices equally deep and raspy. Dean almost laughed. Then he thought about it and decided to hell with it. He laughed away, loud and full and happy. Not like either angel would understand why he was laughing or judge him for it. Probably, anyway.

"Man," he said, rising from the chair once more as he stared at his Cas. He couldn't help it; he was smiling like a kid on Christmas morning. Not that Dean actually knew what that was like. He assumed it felt something like this, though. The human took a step forward, intent to hug the missed angel. "Am I glad to see you-"

-o-o-o-

Bobby, halfway through stitching up Sam's damn-close gunshot wound, managed not to stab the kid right through with the curved needle as a heavy thud from above shook the walls around them. All three hunters angled their heads back immediately, eyes locked on the ceiling in the silence that followed. Well, Sam was pretty liquored up by that point, having downed more than a couple shots of pure rotgut to dull the pain as Bobby cleaned the bullet hole with nothing but the same liquid, so his reaction was about a half second slower than the other two.

"Wha?" As was his speech.

"What the hell are they doing up there?" Bobby groused, mostly to himself, as he turned his attention back to Sam's still aerated chest. Had he mentioned it had been damn close? He was gonna kill Walker himself, if he ever got his hands on the son of a bitch.

Andy, meanwhile, snorted. It wasn't much more than the chuffing of air, but Bobby had gotten damn familiar with it in the last week. It meant the kid was miming something behind the gruff hunter's back that he paid no attention to. It got Sam chuckling drunkenly, though.

Definitely something inappropriate, then. He'd gotten damn familiar with the kid's sense of humor, too.

Bobby just shook his head, pushing Sam's injured arm back down when he tried to sign something equally ridiculous back. He resumed stitching the younger Winchester up, grumbling about house guests and strays all the while.

-o-o-o-

Dean climbed off the floor where he'd ended up sprawled after startling awake mid-fall. He glared at Cas as he got back to his feet, kicking the useless, traitorous chair a few feet to the side. The angel was giving him the most blatant, 'I told you so' look that had ever existed on anyone's face ever.

"Shaddup," he growled as he approached the bed, then added, "Scoot over," unnecessarily, since Cas was still on the far side of the mattress.

Still, the obedient angel nudged herself over another half inch as Dean climbed onto the bed and settled beside her. The twin-sized bed really wasn't built for two people and they ended up far too close for Dean's taste, pressed together from shoulder to thigh, with Cas slanted towards him in something way, way too close to spooning (even if it really wasn't).

"Not a word," he muttered lowly as he tried to find a comfortable position that was also the least awkward as physically possible given their current arrangement. The short answer? There friggin' wasn't one.

Cas agreed (silently), though she killed any notion of not-awkward the minute she rolled even further onto her side, now absolutely spooning Dean, in order to reach across him and settle her hand on his chest. To add insult to injury, she slid that hand underneath his t-shirt to get free access to nothing but skin.

Damn that motel room. And Sam's irritating penchant for healthy things like exercise. And Jaws, and Cas's stupidly peaceful face every time she went for Dean's chest, and every other stupid thing that night that had led Dean to setting this precedence of skin-on-skin pectoral fondling as fucking fine.

What the hell had he been thinking?

The human fought off yet another ridiculous, absurd, not-friggin'-okay blush. He told himself his cheeks were red with furious, furious rage, before he closed his eyes and slipped back under.

Chapter End Notes

A/Ns: I couldn't help it. Not the world's most awkward cuddle session, cuz that was a given, but Dean refusing Cas's advice and falling off the bed because of his stubbornness XD

Quality: It has been weeks since I wrote this and I was definitely worried launching into the edit that it would be such a boring, unsatisfying 100th chapter after a three week wait, but I changed my mind by the end of it. It may not be the action-packed mess of the last several months, but I forgot about a lot of the comedy I put into it. It feels nice to get back to some laughs and awkwardness and just bantering interaction between our fav characters. I hope you guys feel the same!

Destiel: I am also hoping Dean's continued freak out and thoughts are still very much in character. It feels like it is to me, but we are getting to a challenging part in this story where I have to push Dean past what he ever was on the show, and I want to make sure I do that while keeping him every bit as believable as I've managed so far. Not unlike trying to get him and Sam to stop lying to each other (which canon has definitely defined as part of their relationship while I'm determined to move past it). So please keep me honest, guys! If you think I'm pushing a character too far I want to know so I can either adjust or, at the very least, be aware.

Pronouns: The Heaven Arc ruined me. I'm back to using 'he/his'

for all of Cas's stuff again head thud Apologies if there were any missed errors related to it.

(Muse: whispers you know what a solution for that would be?

Don't say it.

Muse: whispers Bringing Jimmy back.

Alright, look here, bitch. Vessel swapping was YOUR idea and now you just-!)

Ahem. Anyway. Moving on!

Up Next: So the dream was supposed to be in this chapter, but I'm verbose as fk and we all know this. So next chapter Dean gets his dream angel(s) on. Cas and Cas have a chat about the future, Dean muses on the two of them, and Cas and Dean share another quiet moment.

Delay? I will be perfectly honest (as always) with you guys. I do not know when the next chapter will be up. I honestly feel like crossing the one hundred chapter milestone would be deserving of two chapters but, the thing is...I don't have the next chapter for you :(It isn't fully written yet (eek!). Unfortunately, I haven't written anything in weeks. Part of that is the depression, part of it is how crazy RL is right now. But! While Real Life is only getting crazier, the depression is easing up (yaaay!) I still have to pack my entire life and deal with a lot of arrangements/ paperwork/so on and so forth that comes with moving countries, but I have been feeling so much better this week as I start to transition. So I don't know when I'll finish up the next chapter and post it, but I do have high hopes.

My guess is another two week wait (for which I am truly sorry for, but it is what it is, and so many of you have been so, so damn supportive of me taking care of myself :)) I will keep you guys updated (don't forget to check my profile page for status updates on this story) and I will hopefully see you all again sooner rather than later!

Cheers (and thank you so much for your patience and support),

Silence

Chapter 101: Season 2: Chapter 68

Chapter Notes

A/Ns: Sooooo, that was longer than a two week delay [insert sheepish whistling here]. Granted, between packing up my entire life, moving counties, and the pure surrealism that is our world right now…I would argue the delay is an understandable one (and, according to the many, many, MANY comments full of support, encouragement, and patience, many of you would agree :) Thank you so much for your patience, guys. I have safely relocated and am now in quarantine, so I should have plenty of time to write.

Speaking Of: Time for an Anecdote! I was definitely hoping to get this chapter up last weekend, but on our first day of full-freedom-nothing-to-do-but-stare-at-the-walls-or-write, I sat down at my computer and went, okay let's write! And the muse said…

Muse: Let's stare at the walls.

Me: ….I'm sorry, what?

Muse: They're such an interesting shade of blue.

Me: …..looks around Dad's office Blue? That's not blue. That's white, if white thought it was blue.

Muse: I wonder what caused that divot.

Me: What divot?

Muse: Right there. See?

-THREE HOURS LATER-

Me: Hey dad, tell me about that time a rival assassin broke into the house and tried to kill you.

My Dad: …?

Me: That divot, in the wall in your office. Clearly that's from a rogue bullet. You obviously tried to patch it up with spackle but you must have been in a hurry. Was it date night or something?

My Dad: ...the Quarantine is getting to you, isn't it? It's only day three, honey.

(Funny side note: there was an actual ongoing joke among my friends back in highschool that my dad was a hitman. We told him our theory once and the next time he came back from a business trip, the first words out of his mouth were "I missed." XD)

Quality Warning: So I obviously struggled to get this chapter out, and I feel it's evident in the writing. I'm usually a first-draft-writer only with an editing pass for grammar tacked on at the end. I very rarely do a second draft or polish pass. But that means when I struggle with that first pass, I have absolutely no clue (or experience) with how to recover from it or fix it. Other than starting over, haha (…which I tried with this one ._.) But, I really didn't want to delay it any longer and, to be honest, if take two didn't go all that much better I'm kind of doubting waiting around for my third re-write will be all that fruitful either.

Previously on TRSF… The boys have just returned to Bobby's from two days in Lafayette, Indiana where Gordon Walker set a trap for them. He took out Dean, who ended up in Heaven and decided to look for Cas in the process, and tried to take out Sam who wasn't so easy to kill. Dean found Cas, but not time to save him from Uriel's betrayal. Cas managed to best his brother in battle, but was still quite injured from Azazel's trap in Rivergrove and needed a healing trance to finish his recovery. Before entering the trance with the assistance of Chest!Cas, Castiel offered to bring Dean into his own head so he could speak with his sternum-riding friend.

Chapter Warnings: Cas and Cas have a chat while Dean desperately wants a beer and remembers why he doesn't like dreamland, because it gives him all the feels and makes him think about orphaned baby angel monsters. Wait, what?

-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-

The Road So Far (This Time Around)

Season 2: Chapter 68

-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-

The second attempt at hugging his friend was far more successful, and

Dean – with his chin tucked over Cas's shoulder where no one could see his ear-to-ear grin or hands pressed to his friend's shoulder blades – marveled at the familiar feeling (the rightness) of that infamous trenchcoat beneath his fingers.

"It's good to see you, man." Dean pulled away before it got awkward, giving Cas a hearty tap on the shoulder. "I'm glad you're here."

And he was. So, so glad that the little sliver – the shadow – of his friend that he'd been carrying secretly in his chest for more than a year now was still with him. The last little vestiges of another time, another home.

"I had nowhere else to be," Cas returned with a quirk of his lips. A simple smile, yeah, but it made Dean's chest all warm and fuzzy. Must be the grace, finally happy to be reunited.

The hunter, rather than respond to that with anything even resembled feelings, looked around at their surroundings, once more taking in the bunker he'd only gotten a brief glimpse of before. It looked just like it should, down to the last book lining the shelves of the Library. God, he missed this place. It even smelled right.

"So…uh…the bunker, huh?" Dean asked, going for teasing and hitting more around the sheepish mile marker. Even he couldn't quite cover up just how much he'd been homesick for it.

His Cas looked around (and wait now, 'his' Cas was…well that was… okay, it wasn't wrong but it also was…uh…it just wasn't… He couldn't go around calling the guy 'his' to differentiate between him and…er… the other Cas. But shit, what to call him? Or her. Chest Cas? Past Cas? …Boy Cas? Dean had a feeling if Sam was here with him, that one definitely wouldn't fly. Or Dragon Lady, for that matter, cuz that would make Present Cas 'girl Cas'. He could see the feminism rant coming from a mile away, and wasn't sure who'd be bitching louder, his brother or the actual woman.)

There was a distant but fond smile on (his) Cas's face (damnit, not his) that made Dean feel stupidly happy just seeing it. He tamped down on that right away, cuz, come on. There were limits to how much mush one could handle in a single dream (no matter how much he'd missed his friend or thought he was dead, drained away like a battery to save all their lives), and they'd passed Dean's limit sometime around the man hug.

"This is the place that feels most like home," Cas supplied. He smiled up at Dean, that shy little grin of his he always got when he was nervous to admit something (usually because, well, feelings and Dean were a volatile concoction to start mixing). "For both of us. We are in your head, after all."

Ah. Huh, Dean hadn't thought about that. He'd figured they were in… er…Cas's? Could you even go into an angel's head? Dean was so used to Cas showing up in his like it was a natural thing that he'd never stopped to think if the reverse wasn't an option. Apparently it wasn't, given that they were once again messing around in his noggin. Such was life when your best friend was an angel. (Angels? As in plural, now that he was staring at two of them in his head? Did he have two best friends now, or just the one split across two times? Damnit, time travel was so friggin' confusing.)

"I hope you will one day to get to see the bunker and call it home, too," (his) Cas said, now addressing his female counterpart (Lady Cas? Uh…yeah, nope, that wasn't gonna fly either) who merely nodded at the possibility. Clearly no emotional attachment there (but, then again, that Cas (Lady Cas ('no, Dean, pick another name, damnit)) hadn't really hit the 'oh, I do have emotions and I shouldn't shove them so down deep that even my toes can't wiggle around those guys (in part because I'm a wavelength of celestial intent and don't have toes (wow, this anecdote is really getting away from us, here (focus Dean!)))' stage of rebellion just yet.)

"I hope so as well," Lady Cas (Damnit. Now it was stuck in his head and gonna be a thing) replied exactly like she was supposed to, which might have pissed Dean off any other day (how often he found Cas frustrating when he- uh, she…no, wait… nevermind, just Cas frustrating when the angel was busy being so other rather than anything remotely human). But today he had his old best friend and his (tentatively new best?) friend and his bunker. All that was missing was Sammy and a cold beer.

One day, Dean was gonna show the bunker to his kid brother. Soon as that key showed up this end of Henry Winchester's trip through the time closet, he was taking Sammy to the Batcave, man. Just…Dean sighed as he did the math. Six more years. Just six more years and they could go home. Actual home, and not just a memory.

"Shall we begin the healing trance?" Lady Cas interrupted (who Dean would not think of as a fun sucker, here. He wouldn't. She just… contrasted starkly (or whatever Sam would call it. He knew words better) against his Cas (damnit, not his Cas, just Cas). Especially here, with the bunker and all its shared history as a backdrop). Dean supposed it wasn't really interrupting. Neither he nor the Cases were talking. And if they weren't talking but it was still an interruption, then that would make this a moment. Which it was absolutely not.

So Dean cleared his throat even as Cas smiled simply at his counterpart and agreed they should get started. The hunter rubbed his hands on the thighs of his jeans, weirdly fidgety and suddenly feeling out of place. Probably because he was once more stuck in dreamland without a clue as to what he was actually supposed to be doing. After the last time (and the times before that), it wasn't really his favorite scenario to reenact. "Uh, what can I do to help?"

"Nothing. I will assist Castiel in entering the trance." His Cas settled in one of the chairs beside the long library table, Lady Cas mirroring him. The two were practically bumping knees, and Dean stared at that. It was like…a family reunion somehow. That was weird. Man, dream thinking was weird. He remembered how messed up it had been in Dad's head, how difficult it had been not to blurt shit out, but man… hella inconvenient right now (who was he kidding? When was dreamland ever convenient?). "However, it may take some time."

Dean looked up from their touching knees to the matching pairs of ocean blue eyes locked on him. That…okay, that was disconcerting. Twin eyes, vessels that could have been siblings if it weren't for the clear race difference in Angela Garrett's (gorgeous, smooth, ruddy-red, sun-soaked, tropical wet drea-) skin tone.

"Uh…" the hunter cleared his throat, realizing he was staring. At both of them. It was weird having the two of them in the same place, side by side, and Dean couldn't even begin to reason why. Didn't want to. He was backing out of this while ahead of the grave he was digging himself with a shovel made from all the adjectives little Dean was supplying for Angela's skin. Yup. Backing right out; out of the conversation, out of trouble, right out the library door. "Right, yeah, I'll…er…I'll just…go grab a beer then."

Once Dean was in the hallway (managing to make it down the step and a half of stairs with only half tripping, minor flailing, and recovery like a pro) he spun on his heel, his back to the angels, and headed as far away from that conversation and those identical stares as possible. He could hear Lady Cas ask something as he retreated and absolutely refused to listen to what it was. Or to his Cas's deep, gravely chuckle that came in response.

"Right. Just gonna grab me a beer and stay out of trouble," Dean muttered as he picked up his pace to a light jog, just for a dozen feet or so to really clear out of hearing range. He practically growled his next words when he could still hear his stupid best friend's stupidly deep stupid chuckle. "In my own head. Awesome."

-o-o-o-

Cas watched Castiel; he studied the contours of Angela Garrett's face, the blue of her eyes, the strong hints of Indigenous descent in her skin and skeletal structure, likely one of the Polynesian islands. He could see why Dean was having problems looking past the human to the angel. The hunter always had had a weakness for beautiful women.

Castiel was watching Dean's retreating back, something between amusement and confusion (more like intrigue, Cas supposed) coloring her grace a myriad of pink, blue, and yellow.

"He's something, isn't he?" Cas asked, a wry lilt to his words that he knew this younger version of himself wouldn't quite understand yet. Suddenly he got why Dean – and so many other humans, really – had teased him so readily over the years. It was rather easy, wasn't it?

"He is the Righteous Man," Castiel answered, turning to the older angel with a question (incomprehension) in her eyes.

"Yes," Cas answered, that twist of his lips growing, although he could not deny there was likely a sentimentally there – a fondness – that was causing as much caution in his counterpart as was this line of questioning. "But he's more than that, too."

Castiel paused, contemplating his words and her own answer. Cas knew he was asking rather leading questions, but that was his goal, really. He felt somewhat like a teacher to this younger version of himself. How simpler – how less painful – her life would be if he could give her all the answers it had taken so many years (and so much anguish) to find out for himself.

But life didn't work that way, though, he knew. And he risked endangering the timeline if he pushed his younger self too hard.

"His soul…" Angela's blue eyes were distant, trailing after the hunter who had long since disappeared from visual range. Not that either angel needed human vision to check up on him in his own head.

"It's the brightest you've ever seen," Cas finished for her, because he'd once contemplated the same thing. Once said the same thing to a brother who hadn't understood. Who'd tried to tarnish that soul, hidden loyalties to the Devil, lied to and eventually turned on Cas as well. None of his other brothers had ever understood, either. Cas didn't think he was wrong, didn't think what he saw in Dean was a lie, but it certainly added to his many doubts about himself ('came off the line with a crack in your chassis') that he seemed to be the only angel in all of existence who could see it.

"It was the same for you?" Castiel asked. Her tone wasn't hesitant, but curious. This had to be quite the experience for her as well. He tried to imagine what he would have done, ten years and so many Apocalypses, crises, hunts, failures, and losses ago, had Dean Winchester showed up in front of him with a sliver of his grace and a doomed future.

She was handling it admirably, in his opinion. Not without her flaws, of course. Cas certainly knew they had enough of those. But in those early years – in her years now – he had done more good than bad. He had to hope Time would stay the same, at least in that regard.

"Yes. Even in Hell." Cas lifted his head, matching her gaze on that hallway Dean had disappeared down. He wasn't seeing the bunker, but fire and flame and hellspawn. A tower run by a master of torture and misery. A soul, with blade in hand and bent over another on the rack, shining still in that dark, bloody place. "The first time I saw Dean Winchester's soul, it was clear to me there was something different – something special – about him. Something worth saving."

"No matter the cost?" Castiel's question was quiet, so quiet Cas almost didn't hear it. But, then again, he really didn't need to. He knew the question, knew it by heart. Had asked it himself so many times, so many years ago. He still knew this angel (some days he still mourned the loss of her in himself). Knew all her fears and doubts.

"Yes." He turned to face Castiel. There wasn't much left to his grace, but Cas let it flow honestly. There was no point hiding from himself, after all. "You're going to find that there is a line between what you should do and what you're willing to do. I crossed that line more times than I should have. Many more. But… He and Sam are going to save the world. They're worth it. And after that…well, after that, you can decide for yourself what's worth the price."

Cas had made his choice. Standing on a driveway in Cicero, Indiana, on another plane of existence, watching his friend try for a normal life, with Heaven on the brink of a Civil War and the newly minted archangel already doubting himself…. He'd made the decision that Dean was worth any cost. And it had cost him. It had cost him everything.

He couldn't make that choice for his younger self, but he hoped… maybe she would choose differently. Maybe she wouldn't ever have to. Maybe, that way, Castiel would break the world less times in the name of an emotion it had taken too many years to identify and not even half that time to find futile. Cas hoped for her sake (for Dean's sake and the sake of the world several times over) that maybe this version of himself would not go so far. Wouldn't ever have the chance to, if Dean managed to change it all.

But that was many years and unknowns away. Cas was letting his personal regrets distract him from the task at hand. Right now they had an Apocalypse to derail, and this Castiel had to make all the same decisions if they were going to stop it.

"I worry that I…" Castiel broke off, turning away from her counterpart with a shame she couldn't yet put into words. He could, but he didn't. "What if I can't be what he needs me to be?"

What if I can't be you?

Cas wouldn't want her to be, if he was being honest. But he couldn't say that. This version of himself was not ready to hear it. The doubts she was experiencing were tentative, fragile things. Push them too far, add too much to them, and he knew she would collapse beneath them. He certainly had.

"You will be," he said instead, because that was something he had absolute faith in. That, and one more thing. "Even if you don't, even if you mess up, he'll still come for you, still take you back. That's what Dean does. That's what family does."

"That doesn't sound particularly healthy," Castiel said with an innocent frown, and Cas actually laughed.

"It's probably not." More than just probably. It was how he and the Winchesters had gone too far, pushed too hard, and broken the world a couple of times as a result. And they never seemed to learn their lesson. "But it'll get you through the Apocalypse." And that's what mattered. After that…the world would be Castiel's to figure out. Cas could only take her so far down that road.

At the slow churning of her grace, the way the swirls moved like sludge and struggled against the weight of her own emotions, Cas let his smile drop and put his hands on her knees. Her grace startled from the touch but her physical body did nothing more than look up at his.

"You are me, Castiel. And I'm you. We were told that angels do not change. We were created as we are, as we always have been, as we always will be." He paused, taking in a breath he didn't need but had learned to take many years ago as a human. "Do you believe that?"

"I don't know what to believe anymore." The answer was a miserable one (and an honest one) and Cas couldn't fault her for it. He smiled, a little of his own bittersweet sadness coloring his grace in blue eddies.

"Well…I believe that those doubts you're having? They're the first step. A sign that you can be what Dean needs." She looked up at him, meeting his human eyes almost tentatively. He knew what she was thinking. That she wasn't even completely sure she wanted that. Yes, she worried she wouldn't be what Dean needed, but she worried more that she wouldn't want to be what Dean needed. Cas had been there, too. "I believe you will be. And I'm you. So I'm probably right."

The humor went largely over her head, but he had known it would. Castiel stared at the older, broken version of herself, embracing emotion she could barely understand, and realized she could not see herself in this angel before her. But…she also could. She could see how they were the same and yet so different. And if what he said, if angels did not change, if she was born this way, born his way…

"Tell me about Naomi."

The words left her mouth before she could think them – or their consequences – fully through. The angel across from her stiffened, those veins iridescent white and light blue suddenly shifting into planes of dark grey and terrified indigo. Castiel almost apologized, but didn't. This was her future she was staring in the face. She needed to know.

(She deserved to know.)

Cas's shoulders sagged suddenly, the colors of his grace running together like a ruined watercolor.

"What did she take from us?" she asked again, the request as respectful as it could be of the burden it so clearly put upon her counterpart. (A burden she was growing fearful of, and that would not do. She could not be what Dean needed her to be if she was afraid.)

"Everything," Cas whispered, his grace turning pallid, dull and neutral. All the colors blurred together until nothing was discernible, nothing was left but a milky, agitated grey. "Too much."

She reached out instinctually – perhaps something leftover of what Angela Garrett would have done were she on the physical plane right now – and folded her hands around the larger set resting on her knees. Her brother, for lack of a more accurate word to define their unique relation, looked up to meet her gaze and grace with his own.

"Show me."

-o-o-o-

Dean decided to take a detour to the dormitory wing on his way to the kitchen (cuz this was his head and he could). This whole thing (being back in dreamland, all the stupid feels that came with it (and it was absolutely dreamland responsible for all that, thank you very much), two sides of the same damn angel staring at him with stupidly identical eyes, Cas most definitely making fun of him with that little amused smile) would have been eye-roll worthy if Dean hadn't asked to be here in the first place. Hell, it was still pretty eye-roll worthy. So Dean did that (and then did it again because, again, he was in his own head and he could) and opened the door to his room, sticking his head inside almost tentatively (which was ridiculous, cuz this was his head!). Just a peek, was what he told himself. Make sure it was still there (in his head…because…where else would it be?). But soon enough he was swinging the door all the way open and drinking in the familiar sight of his bed, his weapons on the wall, the photo of mom propped up on the nightstand. Home.

Damn, but did he miss this place.

He sat on the bed, listening to the familiar creak, and closed his eyes against the swell of homesickness. Dean could count on one hand the number of times he'd ever felt homesick, and three of the five of 'em were for his Baby. Green eyes (that were not glistening, damnit. Friggin' girly, chick-flick adjective right there) slid open, taking in his room bathed in warm, welcoming, artificial light. He just drank it in. Sat there for who-knew how long (Cas said it would take a while, and Dean knew the angels would come find him if he was needed) and drank it in.

Six years, and he'd be back. Just half a decade and an apocalypse later. Yeah, right.

The hunter climbed to his feet, ignoring how heavy he felt (stupid dreamworld, stupid dreamworld-enhanced feelings) and headed for the kitchen. He had a beer to get and some angel twins to return to.

The door to the kitchen (that golden twenty-three shining beneath the Aquarian star) was closed when he got there, but Dean didn't think much of it. Just grabbed the handle and pushed with every expectation that it would give. Only it didn't. Dean's shoulder thumped bodily into the very solid wood and the rest of him bounced right back off of it.

"What the-" the hunter frowned at the door, pressing one hand flat to its surface and the other jiggling the doorknob. The thing rattled but wouldn't turn: locked. "The hell?"

Dean frowned at it. He…hadn't even known the kitchen door in the bunker could be locked. He supposed there wasn't any reason to think otherwise; it was a door just like any of the others, and most of them locked. Still.

"That's weird…" He pulled his hand off the door, turned to leave, only to turn back with another frown as he stared at the kitchen entrance. His eyes dropped to the floor. The crack beneath the door was pretty damn small, but Dean was pretty sure the light was on in there. He dropped to the ground, but couldn't see through the micro-thin space for anything more than a couple inches. With a brow furled more in an annoyed pout than actual frustration, Dean climbed back to his feet. With a headshake, he turned back down the hallway. "Guess that's a no on the beer then."

Apparently his head was policing his alcohol intake as much as Sammy was these days (the kid had loosened up in the months since Dad's passing once Dean hadn't tried to drown himself into an early grave, but he still side-eyed the bottle anytime Dean went for something stronger than a beer).

Maybe he could ask Cas about it. Yeah, they were in his head, but Cas was sorta a resident there too, so maybe the angel would know what was up with Dean's subconscious beer-blocking him. The hunter made his way back towards the library, still in no rush and allowing himself more to stroll through the memories of his home (which, admittedly, would have been nicer with a frigign' beer in hand).

"Hey, Cas, did you know the kitchen-" Dean pulled up short, cutting his own words off as he rounded the corner back into the library only to catch sight of the two angels. They were…uh, close. Like, knee-bumping, hand-holding, forehead-pressing close. Dean cleared his throat, but neither angel seemed to hear him. Neither one opened their eyes or so much as twitched.

The whole thing seemed strangely intimate and, considering they were the same guy…. Aaaaawkward.

He cleared his throat again, to similar results.

Okay. Well… despite Dean's definitely-don't-know-what-to-do-with-this reaction, he didn't really want to intrude. He'd been friends with Cas for eight or so years now (nine, including this re-write of history. Did that count? Dean figured it should count), and there were still plenty of things about angels he didn't know shit about. Like communing with one, apparently.

That must be what this…uh…closeness was. Yup. He was going with that.

You'd have thought one of the angels would have maybe warned him it would look like the cover of the world's most cliché romance novel, though. Not that Dean knew what the cover of any romance novel looked like.

The hunter coughed awkwardly again, not for the angels this time but his own wandering thoughts. Frickin' dreamland, man. Still, neither Cas noticed so Dean decided to wait them out. He sort of tip-toed over to one of the arm chairs sporadically placed between the bookshelves lining the walls, and settled in. He was only a dozen feet away from the angels, but he figured the space was appropriate for not-intruding-on-ridiculously-tender-angel-moments. Not that either angel cared about space.

Or tender moments, he was pretty sure.

Well, maybe his Cas. Lady Cas ('nope, we're still not calling her that, Dean') was too new in her introduction into humanity to even know what a moment was. But his Cas probably did. They'd had enough close calls, enough almost-ends to be able to share a hug when they all survived or pass a quite word between one another about how damn wrecked they'd be if the other person hadn't pulled through. Those, Dean supposed, could be called 'tender.' You know, if your name was Samantha and you liked chick flicks and sleepovers and braiding each other's hair.

Cas had changed a lot in those eight years, though. A hell of a lot. Dean was reminded of it often; pretty much any time he interacted with Lady Cas these days ('Present Cas, This Time Cas, anything but Lady Cas, Dean. Angela and Sam are both gonna kick your ass, you idiot'). The hunter was lucky, so far that he hadn't really pissed the angel off, expecting her to be the friend he knew and instead getting a friend that was nearly a decade old to him. Back in his timeline when he'd first met Cas (the same version of Lady Cas he had now), Dean had hardly called the angel a friend. More like a stick in the mud with a stick up his-

Well, that had obviously changed over the years. And Lady Cas wasn't nearly as much of a dick as his Cas had been back then. Well… sometimes, she was. Okay, more often than he'd like, but still not nearly as much as his own timeline experience with his angel. Dean reluctantly had to admit that the Dragon Lady was probably helping out there.

(She would never, on pain of death or torture or another forty years in Hell, get him to say it aloud, though.)

Dean frowned, leaning back in his chair as he tried to think of when his Castiel had become Cas. And not in name; the hunter was pretty sure he'd started calling the guy 'Cas' almost from the get go (truth was…he hadn't been entirely sure he'd get 'Castiel' right and it had seemed easier to purposefully piss off a terrifying, supernatural badass that could snap him like a toothpick than to do it accidentally just because Dean's tongue couldn't handle anything more complicated than a single syllable when put on the spot) But Cas-the-Angel-whose-full-name-I-might-not-actually-be-able-to-get-out-without-mangling-it-something-awful-and-who-might-throw-me-back-in-Hell-if-I-do did eventually become Cas-my-best-friend, and looking back on it, Dean wasn't sure when.

It had been… the human frowned, a memory floating to the surface that he was less than happy to recall. That stupid room Zachariah had stuck him in right before everything well and truly went to shit (a Baroquian nightmare come to life). (Dean didn't actually know what the hell 'baroquian' was, but that's what Sam had called it later once Dean finished telling his brother all about his cameo on 'The Suite Life of Zach And Cas'.)

The hunter's honest-to-not-God-but-anyone-else first thought was that he couldn't have considered Cas a friend at that point. The asshat had spent the month leading up to that nightmare acting like more of a dick than he ever had before (ever since his pals had dragged him back up to Heaven for some bible boot camp), and Dean had been so fucking done with him.

But…maybe that was it. Dean got pissed at people he didn't like, sure. Murderous, even. Zachariah had more than deserved that angel blade to his gullet, and damn but did Dean hope he got to be the one to deliver it again this time around. But he'd never been even half as mad with Zach in that stupid, awful, fucked up room as he had when Cas was there, mouth sealed up in a thin line, following his Boss around like a whipped puppy, eyes telling Dean to give up already and fall in line behind him. Dean hadn't wanted to kill Cas then, not like he'd wanted to kill Zach. He'd wanted to slap the angel until he came to his senses and helped him.

Because Dean only ever got that mad at the people he cared about.

"Huh," he mumbled, green eyes flickering to the two angels, still sitting with their foreheads pressed together, eyes shut.

So he couldn't pinpoint the exact moment he'd started thinking of Cas as a friend (maybe that dream, on the dock at that mountain lake, when Cas had told him they needed to talk…had risked everything to tell him the end of the world was coming, even if he hadn't gotten it out then and wouldn't again for months because of what his asshat family had done to him up in Heaven?) but it had been a lot earlier than the hunter would have thought. And that room, when Cas had finally listened, had finally seen what Dean was trying to smack him over the head with, finally faced up to what his own people were doing (stopped being a coward) and saved Dean, got him to Sam (maybe not in time, but he'd died trying, damnit), that was probably the moment Dean had realized Cas was the closest thing to a best friend he'd ever had (and immediately lost, of course, because he was a Winchester, and they didn't get nice things (at the time, standing in Chuck's living room pulling teeth out of the man's hair, he'd thought, 'well, that would have been nice had it lasted. Figures.').

When Cas had come back…it was the first time Dean had ever seen a miracle he actually believed in. And not in the cheesy, chick-flick way (and anyone thinking it can piss off) but in the honest-to-God-we-need-a-miracle-or-we're-all-dead way that something (someone) had actually pulled through for them (though Dean still sort of refused to thank God for it).

He wondered when this Cas (Lady Cas (no, not 'Lady' Cas, damnit)) would reach the same point for him. Maybe she already had? He didn't think so (and felt guilty for thinking it). But they certainly seemed to be off to a better (Better? Maybe just different) start than he and his Cas had.

Dean was just starting to lament how much this entirely internal and quickly-down-spiraling conversation could really use a god damn beer when the two angels in the center of the room stirred. The hunter sat up as the Casses pulled apart. His angel looked…well, way too pale and about as depressed as Dean's train of thoughts had been getting (shit, was he somehow influencing this world with his thinking? It was his head, after all). Lady Cas was…

Shit. She was shaking.

"I can't go back," she whispered, almost too low for the hunter to hear. Dean started to get out of his seat, but Cas caught his eye and shook his head ever so slightly. Slowly, the hunter sank back into the armchair. "I won't."

Cas caught her hand again, just one this time, and wrapped calm, calloused fingers around softer, trembling ones. He knew she was talking about Heaven, and understood. Once he'd learned of Naomi, once he'd felt her touch first hand, sat in that chair and wished to God he would just die, he had never wanted to go back, either. He'd run away and hid, first in a hundred Biggerson's across the nation, then in Metatron's lies, and finally in the bunker itself with a laptop full of Netflix.

Eventually, he supposed, he'd hidden behind Lucifer, too. He'd never really stopped hiding, regardless that Naomi was dead.

"Perhaps it's for the best," he answered quietly. She likely shouldn't return to Heaven. Not with this timeline's series of events or even the better circumstances (the lies) of his own. Cas still wanted to believe, even now, with all that he had seen and done, that some of his brothers were worth saving. Almost wanted to tell this younger part of himself that she should try to save them (Rachel and Samandriel. Balthazar. Even Hannah, for all her betrayal had stung in the end, was still worth saving in the angel's eyes). None of them deserved the fate he'd brought down on their heads; banishment from Heaven, the loss of their wings, death for so many of them.

But that was not this Castiel's burden to bare. Nor her risk to take, should Zachariah or someone higher up, like Naomi, catch wind of her disobedience. Besides, if Cas could guide her on a better path than his own now, he could perhaps still save his brothers from the fate he'd sealed for them in his world. His last penance.

"You have work to do here." He released her hand, somewhat pleased to see the rippling of her grace steadied. It was more a dull agitation now rather than the full panic she'd been experiencing once he'd shared his memories of Naomi – of what she'd done to them – with her.

"There is more you did not show me," Castiel said rather abruptly, raising her gaze to his. Her blue eyes and the grace behind them held a challenge. There'd been large gaps in the scant, handful of memories he had shown her of the angel who could tamper – who had tampered – with her mind. Events, she sensed, that had less to do with Naomi, but were still in his past, which meant they were in her future. "You held back."

Of course he did, Cas couldn't help but think. Almost scoffed aloud at the notion. "You don't need to see it."

And she didn't. He could not imagine this version of himself, young and naïve, still believing in her Father and her brothers, learning of everything that had come to pass – everything Castiel had let come to pass, had made come to pass – and not run from it. From him, from Dean or Sam. From a fate she had every right to fear.

A fate that, if Cas had any influence in, would not be hers. At least not beyond an averted Apocalypse.

If anything, her grace grew grimmer. She knew the basic outline of what he was hiding – and why he was hiding it – and she thought he hid it to keep her on a course. But there was one thing she seemed quite stuck on, so sure of, that Cas disagreed with.

"I am not your future, Castiel," he spoke steadily, calmly, and tried to convey his honesty – his true sincerity and intent – behind the words. He would be so disappointed – so saddened and anguished – if she ended up like him. Instead, he turned his gaze to his charge, his best friend and arguably his favorite human in all of creation. Dean stiffened under those eyes (filled with so much damn emotion and intensity, he really wasn't ready to figure out the parts of this exchange he was clearly missing). "The Winchesters are. And you will make your own choices from here, not mine."

While Dean frowned at that (and how cute it was, the hunter so offended by Castiel's 'chick-flick' affection. The angel had long ago learned to find amusement in that rather than the sting of rejection or yet another human thing he'd gotten wrong), Cas turned back to his counterpart. She was watching Dean as well, but Cas could read the uncertainty in her eyes. There was no affection there. At least not yet. Maybe not ever, if they messed this up.

She looked away.

"There is nothing wrong with doubt," Cas reiterated, looking first at her and then down at his own hands. Hands that had wielded a blade – held so many lives in his hands – with both crippling doubt and terrible certainty. "There's nothing wrong with being afraid."

"They're not exactly traits of a Warrior of God."

This time Cas did snort at his younger self's words.

"No." They most certainly were not. It had taken him years (and a lot of tutelage under Sam and Dean and Bobby Singer) to realize that what angels embodied as traits of a devout warrior were mostly lies and ignorance. Humans, though, they were the ones who'd gotten it right, messy as it was. They were far closer to what angels should be. "They're traits of something more."

Dean, who was now at the point where he couldn't figure out if he was going to gag from the conversation or the uncomfortable warmth in his chest (watching Cas not only console his younger self but profess (ridiculously) that Dean and Sam were pretty much the answer to just about everything (had he mentioned it was ridiculous?)), cleared his throat loudly.

Cas eyed him all the more fondly for it, like he knew why Dean was interrupting, and the hunter decided he was in full rights to be annoyed by that. Damn warm and fuzzy angel.

"We should begin the healing trance," the older angel declared instead, finally pulling away from his younger counterpart to sit fully in his own chair. Dean thought he looked like a dad finishing up a pep talk with his son (er, daughter?). You know, the kind that mortified the kid but left the parent all proud they'd done their civic duty?

Of course, that led Dean to thinking about this Cas giving his younger self 'the talk', which had him snorting out loud. Which drew two sets of identical blue eyes to him.

"Uh…yeah, you should, uh…" Dean offered his most charming of the 'whoops, ignore me over here' smiles and wished, yet again, for that beer. "Go on, start the healing thing, or, whatever."

One angel eyed him with a cute little frown, the other an annoying amount of sympathy. Damnit, why had Dean even wanted in on this angel confab again?

Cas turned back to the other angel, a stupidly knowing and teasing smile on his face. Lucky for Dean, Lady Cas wouldn't likely understand why. She straightened in her chair (a silly thing to even say, considering Dean wouldn't have thought she could have sat straighter to begin with, but apparently she had been all but slouching in angelic body language) and placed her hands wide apart on either kneecap. Cas, meanwhile, reached forward with one hand and splayed it across her chest, right over her sternum and collar bones. The other formed his standard two-fingered touch to her forehead. The younger angel closed her eyes with a deep, fortifying breath.

And then…they just sat there.

Dean gave it a second, then another couple more, then glanced around like someone else might be there to comment on whether or not this was how it was supposed to go. The seconds stretched into a minute and Dean found himself wishing (again) that he at least had a beer or a drink or hell, even a lemonade, to pass the time.

Instead, he found his mind drifting back to his earlier thoughts, about Cas reminding him of a parent. He supposed that wasn't the most absurd thing to think, given the situation. Cas, as an older version of himself sitting in front of a younger, more naïve, and clearly more worried Castiel, was kind of like a parent. More a parent than a sibling, considering what Dean knew about angel siblings and how they really weren't anything like family at all. Given the way Cas had clearly been trying to comfort and guide his younger self, despite clear hardships he bore on his own shoulders and didn't want to pass along to her, Dean could see the parental side of this.

Cas would have made a pretty good dad, Dean mused, thinking on the guys awkward but sincere interactions with most humans he came across. Especially Claire. Dean had never really given it much thought, before. He'd thought about what kind of dad Sammy would make, unlikely as that had seemed after Jess died in his timeline and the two were split up in this one. For a while, though, Dean had thought 'maybe someone else will come along for him,' but it hadn't really happened. Sam had been too angry, to devoted to hunting (revenge) to let anyone in. There'd been a few who had tried, a few who Dean had even thought stood a chance. But ultimately, Sam had been too angry, too bullishly committed to his 'destiny' as a hunter (the 'destiny' that had gotten Jess killed – and if he didn't fulfill that destiny, what had her death even been for?) that he'd shot himself in the foot on the dating front. A couple of times over, actually. He'd started to come out of that eventually, years and years later. And Dean had thought, for a minute, maybe there'd been something there with Eileen, but he guessed Sam had never gotten the chance to go down that road. Amara and the end of the world had made sure of that.

Dean wondered for a moment where Eileen Leahy was right now, and if he should try to find her. Probably not, considering she'd spent most of her life in Ireland and he didn't actually know when she'd made it Stateside.

Not that any of that mattered to Dean's current train of thought (which he was going to say came out of an abundance of boredom and lack of beer?). He doubted Sammy was ever gonna be the 'settle down and have kids' type this go-around, either. He was pretty sure, despite him and Jess staying in contact this time around, that Sam already knew he could never go back to his Stanford life. Dean would get him there if it was what he wanted – he swore to every damn last deity out there that if Sam wanted back in that life, he'd figure out a way – but he was pretty sure his brother would turn him down a second time.

(It was too bad, Dean thought almost lazily, picking at a loose thread in his jeans rather than the beer label he didn't have. He would have made a damn awesome uncle. He'd made a shitty dad, but he'd have been a good uncle. And raising a kid in the bunker would have been something else. Chasing some little tyke through the halls, cooking him all sorts of culinary masterpieces in the kitchen (when his dad wasn't looking, because heaven forbid the kid eat something that wasn't rabbit food). Teaching him (or her, Dean was an equal opportunity uncle) to shoot their first gun in the armory. Sometimes Dean almost regretted that part missing from their lives. It had been hard after he'd let Ben go. Harder, still, once he'd learned he and Sam were Legacies. Something about the title, Legacy, just made you wonder what you'd leave behind when you finally bit that last bullet. Made you want someone around to pass that title to. Dean would have made an awesome uncle to a little Legacy with Sammy's puppy dog eyes and floppy hair.)

He'd thought before about how good a dad Bobby woulda made (had made, blood or no blood). Dean knew the man had lost his wife before the two of them could consider starting a family. Although he'd never asked Bobby if he'd wanted one. He knew his surrogate father had daddy issues of his own. And he knew from first hand experience there was nothing more terrifying than thinking you might turn into your old man. (Somehow, given how Bobby had raised him and Sam over the years, Dean still suspected the answer to that question was an obvious one, daddy issues or none.)

But he'd never thought about Cas's potential as a father. Probably because he was an angel, and if Dean had ever mentioned it aloud, he'd have gotten the Cas-version of a lecture on how angels didn't procreate (or some other droll reasoning on why there were no little Cases flying around in all their chubby baby fat and diapered glory). Then again, Cas had taken on somewhat of a parenting role in Claire's life, once it became obvious she very badly needed it. They'd had plenty of talks, Dean and Cas, about trying to guide a troubled kid through their teenage years. (Of course, once Claire had Jody and Dean had made sure Ben and Lisa were safe from him and all the dangers his life brought with it, then the two hunters had been supplementary parents at the best. One stuck with nothing but memories and regrets, the other fulfilling a responsibility born mostly from guilt). But Dean had never asked if Cas actually wanted to be a parent (or even liked it once he'd taken on the part). He'd been eager as hell to help with Claire, but Dean had never asked if that was because he thought he should or if he actually wanted to take on the role.

Watching the two sides of Cas now, having seen Cas walk his younger self through something that had clearly been traumatic (Dean didn't know why Lady Cas was suddenly adamant about never returning to Heaven, but given that Cas had shown her something, Dean could hazard a guess or two (and was, frankly, relieved. Even if that relief came with some guilt)), Dean's opinion on Cas as a father was shifting. He couldn't help but wonder (again, because he was apparently bored out of his mind and not nearly buzzed enough) if Cas had wanted to be a dad, especially after so long among humans.

He'd have made a good one, Dean decided. Maybe an awkward one (for sure. The hunter could just picture the poor guy with an infant. Football hold and eyes so wide they were nothing but rings of white set in his face). He snorted to himself at the image.

Not that Dean could exactly picture a situation in which a baby landed in the angel's lap. He wasn't actually thinking of Cas 'procreating', as the angel would most definitely call it (Dean woulda called it sowing some angel wings or doing a little cloud jumping. Making baby angels. Doing it like they do on the Divine Channel. …Alright, that last one needed a little work. Regardless: all semi-lude things that would have made the angel blush. Which Dean was only now realizing he would take rather perverse pleasure in. Why did he even know what Cas looked like when he blushed in the first place?) Although, at least in terms of ending up with a baby in the bunker that wasn't somehow his or Sam's direct result of being red-blooded, healthy young men (hey, Dean knew what could very well happen when bumping uglies), they did work in a field that had a lot of accidental death. He supposed weirder things had happened than an angel-turned-almost-human adopting a human orphaned by a monster.

"Dean."

The hunter startled, realizing he'd gotten lost in his thoughts – thoughts of Cas and kids, and wasn't that weird? – and focused back on the present, particularly the trenchcoat-wearing, black-haired, kid-less angel standing in front of him.

Shit, had he been thinking out loud again in his own head? (…Was that even a thing? It was his head, damnit.) Cuz those were weird thoughts and he so did not need Cas wondering why he was thinking about the guy adopting little monster babies.

Wait, what? No, that's not what he'd been thinking about-

"Dean," Cas repeated, this time with a fondness in his voice that seemed reserved only for when the hunter was being ridiculous.

"Uh, right. What's up?" Dean sat upright in his chair, glaring ever so much at the angel's overly amused expression. Damnit. The hunter's gaze slid behind him, where Angela – Lady Cas – was now asleep in the library chair, breathing away peacefully.

Damn, how long had he zoned out for?

"I thought you were getting a beer." Cas's eyebrows were pinched downward at his empty hands, glancing at one, then the other, and then raising a questioning eyebrow Dean's way.

"Yeah, uh…kitchen was locked." Dean climbed out of the chair, stretching and popping his back as he did so. But Cas was frowning at him.

"Locked?"

"Yeah. Must be my subconscious or something. Sammy's been kinda on me about drinking since dad died again. Can't blame the kid." Dean walked around Cas, not really noticing how the angel's frown only increased, blue eyes losing focus in a blank sort of way behind Dean's back. The hunter walked over to Angela's body, but didn't touch her. He didn't want to accidentally wake her up after all the work Cas must have done to get her into this healing trance thing (or whatever it was). "Should we get her to a bed or something?"

He turned when Cas didn't answer him right away, but the angel was staring off at something in the distance. Dean followed his gaze, but only saw the library.

"Cas?"

The angel shook his head slightly, eyes coming back to focus on the hunter. Then he held out his arm and Dean looked down to find an ice cold beer gripped in his hand. "This is a dream, Dean. You don't need the kitchen to get a beer."

"You couldn't have mentioned that earlier?" the hunter groused, but he smiled like it was Christmas and swiped the beer with childish joy. He popped the cap using the table, then leaned against the edge of it and took a refreshing, much needed sip. "So what were you two talking about?"

At his glance and slight nod in Lady Cas's direction, Cas glanced down at the sleeping angel as well. "She is having doubts."

"Oh." Dean frowned, then tried not to frown and failed miserably because he'd already been frowning to start with. He lowered the bottle. "About…me? Uh, us, I mean. Me and Sam?"

Real smooth recovery there, Winchester. Real smooth.

The look Cas pinned him with was fond, yet again, and Dean wondered why the hell he was blushing in response to it. "No. Doubts about Heaven. About herself, and what she can be."

"That's…good, isn't it?" Dean hazarded. Doubt is what had eventually led the angel standing in front of him to join Team Free Will. Doubt kinda had to happen for an angel to question orders. Dean needed this Cas to start having those doubts.

"Yes, it is. But it doesn't make it any easier. Or less terrifying."

The hunter winced, realizing he'd stepped right into that. Right, he'd always been pretty terrible at considering Cas's feelings around the whole Apocalypse mess (and, let's be honest, well beyond that, too). Cas was always one of his blindspots, one that Sam had eventually had to sit him down and talk to him about. Dean partially blamed the angel himself for it; how was the hunter supposed to factor in Cas's feelings when the early-days Castiel had insisted he hadn't had any? (And okay, that might have been an excuse for the first year, maybe two years of their friendship, but the other six? Yeah, Dean had just been an ass for the rest of it and he knew it).

"I'm sorry," he said before he could weasel his way out of saying it. It was surprisingly easy to talk yourself out of an apology, no matter how much you knew it needed to be said. Cas raised an eyebrow at him and Dean ducked his head, picking at the label on the beer bottle to avoid that piercing gaze. "I told you she wouldn't lose her home, wouldn't have to leave Heaven this time. That I'd change it, and I…"

Failed. Totally and completely failed. He hadn't even been able to keep that promise for a year, let alone the length of the Apocalypse stretched out in front of them. Seriously, some days Dean wondered why Cas had even bothered sending him back.

"It's not your fault." The angel crossed the distance between them, coming to lean against the edge of the table beside the hunter. He shrugged, which seemed incredibly passive given what Dean was apologizing for. "I don't think there is a version of these events where she could have sided with you and Sam and not leave Heaven because of it. It was never an option, Dean."

The hunter flinched and Cas didn't know if it was from the harsh honesty of his words or the cruelty of pointing out yet another thing Dean was helpless to change. It was, in fact, Dean getting pretty damn tired of making promises he apparently couldn't keep. To Sam, to Cas. To who knows who else.

"It was a choice, one she made willingly," Cas reminded him, trying to soften the blow. The angel leaned over enough to bump his shoulder to Dean's and the hunter smiled half-heartedly at the gesture, less sure about the words that came with it. "One I have no doubt she would make again."

"Yeah?" His immediate response was more bitter sarcasm than a serious question, but Cas answered it anyway.

"I would have."

It shouldn't have made him feel better. It really shouldn't, because Cas shouldn't be willing to throw himself on top of the grenade that was the Winchester lifestyle again and again and again, and Dean sure as hell shouldn't want him to. Should be able to tell him – her – them – not to. But, god help him, Dean did feel better hearing it.

"Perhaps, this time, do not betray that choice by giving up in the future and praying to Michael?" Cas offered, making Dean immediately grimace. There was a smirk on the angel's face to take away the potential cruelty of the words, so Dean tried not to let them dig little burs into his heart and tug. He mostly failed, because he was Dean Winchester; guilt was a friggin' building block to his very soul.

"I won't," he promised, expression solemn and, he hoped, enough to convey just how much he meant those words. He was going to keep making promises, damnit, and he'd find a way to keep them too. "I'll stay the course, no matter where it goes this time around."

Hopefully, that course wouldn't include selling his soul, a trip to Hell, or the need to ever become the Michael Sword because they weren't going to let the Apocalypse get started this time around. But, Time had sure proven herself a cold-hearted bitch, so Dean was now leaving all doors open at this point. At least, he was here in dreamland, where he could almost admit those possibilities (fears) aloud, with the only other person still alive who would understand them.

Cas smiled softly again, an expression that all but screamed, 'I believe in you' and was way, way too close to chick-flick territory for Dean's comfort. He cleared his throat.

"Uh, so…" he fumbled for a change of topic away from the warm and fuzzies (because there had been entirely too much of that going around so far). Dean realized realizing he still had a beer in his hand and used it as both a distraction and a way to stall until his brain decided to reconnect with his tongue. When he lowered the bottle again, he used it to gesture to the sleeping angel. "She gonna be okay?"

Cas glanced over his shoulder at the steadily breathing woman. "She has successfully entered the healing trance. So, she will be in time."

"She, uh…" Dean rubbed a hand through the stubble of his chin, so much shorter in the dreamworld than it had been only minutes ago in Bobby's guest bedroom. He really needed a shower and a shave in the real world. And a week's worth of sleep, but he figured that was asking too much. "She said it might be a couple of weeks?"

He tried not to sound hopeful (pleading, more like) that Cas would correct that time table to something significantly shorter. It's not that he thought his Cas might know better but…no, maybe that was exactly what he was thinking. Or, at least hoping. His Cas was older and more experienced…right?

"She's badly hurt, Dean," his friend answered, expression full of remorse and regret, but his voice had an edge of scolding.

Dean immediately backtracked, guilt flaring. "I didn't mean-"

"I know," Cas interrupted him with a look. That classic tilt of his head and piercing gaze, arms by his side and trenchcoat stiff like a statue. An awkward nerd angel tax accountant you really didn't want to get on the wrong side of. God, Dean hadn't realized how much he'd missed his friend, even the version of him that was busy giving him a lecture. "I'm not accusing you of anything."

The hunter huffed, looking down at his feet but staring at the bottle in his hand. When he looked back up, there was a smirk in the corner of his mouth full of self-deprecation. "Except maybe a lack of patience, huh?"

Cas smiled that rare smile. The one that had been Dean's first clue, so many years ago, that the angel did, in fact, understand sarcasm. "Maybe that. I know this isn't easy for you."

Dean followed Cas's gaze back to Angela and dropped his hand from his chin to pick at the label on his beer. He'd have it shredded to little bits on the library floor in no time, at this rate. "Yeah, not like I know a thing about this stuff."

The angel raised an eyebrow at him. The one that said he was missing something that was obvious to everyone else in the room (which, at this point, was only Cas. So that wasn't really fair, now was it?). "I meant it isn't easy because you care."

Dean's brain stuttered at his friend's correction. Then, as the words hit home, he found his face flushing from the discomfort of a genuine compliment. Damn. Almost forty and he was still no good at hearing one of those and believing it.

"We should leave her to rest," Castiel spoke softly, and Dean startled at the tone for reasons he could not explain.

"Should we, uh, get her to a bed or something?" They could put her in Cas's room. Dean honestly didn't know if a healing trance needed a bed (well, clearly not, but would it help?) or if they should even still be hanging out in his head. Of course, it had been Cas's – Lady Cas's – idea to bring him into this in the first place, so he couldn't imagine he was hurting things by still being there (again, it was his head, damnit).

"It isn't necessary, but it would be the human thing to do." There was something about the way Cas said it, the smile on his lips as he transferred his gaze from the sleeping angel to the human hunter, that had Dean setting down his beer and sliding his arms under Angela's body. Cas grabbed the bottle for him as Dean lifted her out of the chair. He took a sip as he headed towards the dormitory wing, Dean following with the younger angel secure in his arms (trying to ignore the weird way his chest ached happily at this whole thing.)

(Stupid chest. Stupid dreamland. Stupid Dragon Lady getting into his head (literally this time) and ending up, repeatedly, bridal style in his arms. He was fireman carrying this woman next time, damnit (no, he wasn't, cuz there wasn't going to be a next time, double damnit).)

-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-

A/Ns: Aaaand I had to cut it off there, because of course the dream ended up being two chapters. Just this first part of it is almost two chapters long ._. Because of course it is. Did I really think it would be anything else?! (don't answer that)

(ha...ha...ha...it's like we got back-to-back chapters as a reward for our 100th chapter after all, jut in the shape of one chapter! Yaaaaay head thud head thud head thud)

Second A/Ns: I don't know how I feel about this chapter in the end. It was a BEAST to write. A lot of chapters half write themselves, but this one did not lend me a hand AT ALL. It was one of those chapters that I felt I had a lot of different cool ideas but I never got as deep or on point with them as I wanted. So the writing feels…oddly shallow to me. I actually wrote the whole thing twice. The first time I could not keep Chest!Cas from being a morose, depressing mess. The second time I managed a much lighter tone for, oh, about half the chapter and then that morose bastard popped right back up. Oh, and Dean was ALL OVER THE PLACE. Sigh. Apparently this was not meant to be the light-hearted warm and fuzzy dream conversation, but a depressingly deep and angsty one instead (with warm and fuzzies forced into all the cracks because I'm a stubborn author who refuses to be shoved into a corner by my own characters, darnit!).

The Bunker Key: In the in-between of Henry taking the key in 1958 and showing up in 2013, the key didn't exist on Earth. So Dean's gotta wait until 2013 (and it's Dec 2006 right now). Time for fun facts 1) As you all know, the key is sitting in Bobby Singer's desk right this friggin' minute (because I'm a no good dirty rotten author) but Dean doesn't know that and 2) The British Men of Letters could get them into the bunker at any time because they have a key too (but the boys didn't find out about the BMOL until Season 12, so he doesn't know that's an option either!) and 3) I haven't actually figured out how the key works, because, like…they'd need more than one to keep coming and going from the Bunker as much as they do on the show (and it used to be a whole gaggle of members coming and going). So here's how I'm treating it: The bunker is on magical lock down until the key is used, then it's just normal warding and you can come and go as long as you aren't nixed by the warding (I imagine they added clauses into it for Cas and Jack and Crowley and Rowena at times). If it was just on normal warding level, I think Dean could figure out a way to break in. But since it's on the scary-key-only-no-other-way-in lockdown, Dean's screwed until the key shows up. (Also, I have only watched Season 8 once and my research on the bunker key has been spotty so far, so if I missed how this works in cannon, someone let me know!)

Fun Fact #665: The key will show (back) up before 2013, I swear! Things you gotta remember about your favorite no good dirty rotten author: I'm verbose as f and I definitely play the long game XD

(Okay, but, for real. The key's coming back, I promise. I'm gonna say "soon" and you all just have to remember that's a relative term in this 600,000 word beast, yeah?)

EileenLeahy: I really liked this character on the show and I was so annoyed when they killed her (yet another cool female character offed way before her time). I also really liked her and Sam as this cute thing that was just maybe getting started (and this, coming from me, who does not like romance. Eeew, romance!) I don't know if she'll come into this story to be honest, but I haven't forgotten about her either :D It would be especially cool for Sam now, since he's learning to sign for Andy. But I have other plans that will probably take this story away from Eileen's direction, so…unclear at the moment whether she'll make it in.

Dean as a Dad: I wanna make this super clear; I thought Dean did a pretty damn good job as a dad to Ben, in spite of going through the toughest year of his life. And I think if he hadn't chickened out and cut ties with them, he would have kept being a pretty good dad. So the narration here saying Dean was a shitty dad is all Dean's opinion of himself.

Cas as a Dad: Is a direct poke at Season 13. Since this is only covering 1-5, it is veeeery unlikely that Jack will ever get to make an appearance in this story. But I do try to poke at things now and then, especially when I can't actually include them due to timing or because Dean never lived through Season 13 in this version of events so he doesn't get to reminisce about Cas being a dad.

Reviews: I started getting back to people last night only to realize HOW MANY REVIEWS/COMMENTS we had last chapter. Holy Crap-a-mole. I...didn't even get halfway through one of the two sites, haha. I'll keep going tonight (once I get this posted) but I am so so so so happy and honored and ridiculously touched with your guys' outpouring of support, for both this story and my move. Thank you so much!

Up Next: Dean and Cas get to have a chat, one on one. Aaaand...that's...that's all I can tell you cuz it's not written yet head thud facepalm head thud

Chapter 102: Season 2: Chapter 69

Chapter Notes

A/Ns: So I had every intention of getting this chapter up last Sunday/Monday. It was written by mid-Saturday, and all I had to do was edit it. Whelp. Sunday came and went. Monday came and went. I couldn't even get myself to read the first three paragraphs. Dude. Guys. This lockdown business sucks. It is seriously messing with my brain. I have all the free time in the world and NO CREATIVITY.

[inhale deep breath]
AHHHHHHHHHHHHHHHHHHHHHHHHHHHHHHHHHHHHHH!

Quality Warning: ahem This chapter is not so different from the last chapter. I think it's a jumbled mess with some excellent ideas that are all tackled shallowly enough to make them less than excellent. Uuuuuuugh. Stupid lockdown. Stupid Brain!

Chapter Warnings: Cas and Dean have their quiet man-on-angel time (…that sounded dirtier than I meant it to…) only it's hardly quiet (…this is getting worse. I swear I didn't intentionally do this…), and by the end Dean's not entirely sure why he wanted man-on-angel time in the first place when all it amounts to are lectures about time, unsatisfying beers, and shocking revelations about Cas's status as a Star Wars Fan.

(….did I mention stupid brain? Stupid muse? Yeah? Okay then. Awesome sauce. You've been warned.)

-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-

The Road So Far (This Time Around)

Season 2: Chapter 69

-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-

Dean set Angela's body onto the bed in Cas's room. At least, Dean considered it the angel's room. Sure, that title had never specifically been stated. And, okay, maybe they had let the occasional other guest use the room while Cas wasn't around the bunker (it was the only other room they'd bothered to get a modern mattress for, after all), but it was still Cas's room and always would be. Which meant Dean had frowned pretty darn sharply at Cas when the angel hadn't bothered to call it such. He'd only asked if Dean wanted to put Lady Cas in 'the guest room.'

Not 'my room' or 'her room' (hell, Dean would have taken 'our' room, at that point).

Nope. The 'guest' room. Like Cas didn't have a room in his own friggin' house (which was even more ridiculous when you factored in that they weren't even in the bunker, they were in Dean's head, where Cas was now a friggin' roommate). So they were left both standing awkwardly in the room, Dean next to the bed staring grumpily at the sleeping angel who was in her bed in her room, damnit, wondering how exactly to tell her stubborn counterpart that (and make it stick), without hitting chick-flick territory right off the bat.

(The dude had spent how many hours in here binging Netflix, and he didn't think the room was his?!)

(And how long living in Dean Sternum Condo, only to apparently think the representation of the bunker (which he'd friggin' chosen, not Dean!) wasn't his home!? Now that just pissed Dean off.)

"How is Sam?"

Dean didn't know if Cas somehow knew he was trying to broach a subject he didn't know how to bring up (and only getting angrier and angrier as the silence stretched), or if the angel just had lucky timing. The hunter turned towards his friend to find the angel regarding him with a simple, unfettered expression, the beer bottle still in his hand. His tactic, purposeful or accidental, totally worked. Dean forgot what he was getting all worked up over.

"Yeah, he's…uh, he's good. Real good. Heh, he's so young." Dean couldn't help but smile. It had been a while since they'd had time to just talk (since Dean had dreamt of the angel at all, let alone just to chat about the little things, those small, seemingly inconsequential moments that made everything they were both going through actually worth it). Dean left the side of the bed to walk up to Cas, swiping his beer back and taking a sip of the never-ending beverage (okay, so dreamland had some benefits, he supposed). "So, so damn young. Sometimes I forget he's just a kid, actually."

More often than he cared to admit, really. Those were the times, after he realized the Sam he was looking at was, in fact, so much younger than the one he was used to (and not just in physical age, but all the shit they'd gone through mentally and emotionally, too), that Dean noticed – alarmingly so – how much he missed the brother he knew. The one who knew him, more so. It wasn't easy, having ten years on someone: ten years of stories, shared experiences, shared pain, only to have them remember none of it. Reflect none of it, in their actions or their words. Sometimes Dean got angry. Or frustrated. Sometimes he would sit in the Impala long after Sam had gone inside to their latest motel room home for the night, and Dean would bang his hand or his head against the steering wheel for lack of a better target to hit (and apologize profusely to his lovely lady, who was always there for him and hadn't changed a bit).

Because these days Sam wasn't always Sam. At least, not the Sam Dean expected him to be, the one he braced for. In any given scenario, be it hunting or talking or arguing or just about anything in their lives, Sam might choose to go left or choose to go right. And Dean guessed wrong more than just occasionally. Which was unheard of for Dean Winchester. But Dean, the man from the future stuck ten years in the past, would forget which brother he was trying to predict. He expected Sam to go left (knew he would go left, because the brother he knew would have gone friggin' left). So he'd brace for left, shield left, argue for left, and then the kid went right! Because ten-years-ago-Sam often went right. Ten years ago Sam didn't have the experience, the growth, to see that left was the better option, damnit.

And 'right', of course, in any given scenario, was the choice fueled anger. Youth, petulance, foolhardy-ness, stubborn jackassery, or guilt-ridden martyrdom. (In other words, 'right' was everything Dean had ever taught his kid brother, and 'left' was the path of choices Sam finally made on his own over the course of ten years. Only, those ten years hadn't happened yet.)

Most of the time, though…. Most of the time, what Dean saw when he looked at his brother was Sammy: his kid brother who hadn't broken the world yet. Who hadn't released Lucifer or jumped in the cage with him to save a world that didn't deserve Sam Winchester to begin with. A kid that would never break down from cage scars or spend a year as a soulless robot or…. Or ever live through his brother tricking him into saying yes to an angel just because Dean couldn't let him go.

He missed his Sam, but Dean was going to do everything in his power – everything – to make sure that version of his brother never existed this time around.

(There was probably something to grieve there. Something worth mourning the loss of. But Dean didn't have time for either. He never would, not if he was going to prevent it all from happening in the first place.)

The older Winchester sighed, speaking out loud almost unintentionally, "I want to save him, Cas."

"You will."

The angel's swift, ever-unwavering faith was almost too much for Dean (always too much for Dean). The hunter became immediately wary of the conversation they were about to get into that had absolutely not been his intention (it never was. When he finally did open up, he almost always regretted it because no matter how 'healthy' opening up was (according to his brother) it always ended the same way: with a conversation that just demanded more opening up, damnit). Already feeling the crawl beneath his skin that always came with these chats (definitely an evolutionary defense mechanism, warning him of the incoming 'feels'), Dean decided to run for it. Casually, of course (because he wasn't actually running away. That would be cowardly (and he was no coward (except yes, yes he absolutely was when it came time for emotional Show and Tell))). He set the beer down on the dresser, no longer having an appetite for it, and headed out of Cas's room, leaving the sleeping Lady Cas behind on the bed. The conscious angel followed him, partially closing the door behind him as he entered the hall.

Dean was heading towards the library, forced calm in every step (because, again, he wasn't running away from anything), and ignored the angel following behind until Cas's hand landed on his arm. Those blue eyes were as intense as always, despite Dean searching for something – anything – other than the steadfast support he saw there.

"You will, Dean."

The hunter didn't know which he wanted to do more: roll his eyes, huff in frustration, or shake the angel off. But he didn't do any of those things (and who knew why not. Not Dean, that's for sure). He just stood there, awkwardly in the middle of the hall, glaring down at his best friend.

"Without ending the world?" he bit back, because, really, that was the conversation they ought to be having if they were going to have one at all. The one where Cas told him how to keep that innocent light in his little brother's eyes without getting his (new best?) angelic friend killed or starting the Apocalypse doing it. Because he may have promised Sam – he'd promised him – that come the worst, come that dreaded day in Cold Oak where he held his dying brother in his arms, Dean wouldn't save him after the fact. But, most days…Dean didn't know if he could even keep that promise. He'd never managed to before, even if he had been trying in recent years.

"You're working on it," came the patient (and far-too-sympathetic-for-the-current-discussion) response. Cas was looking at him like he believed it, too. "Give yourself some credit, Dean."

The hunter dropped his gaze to the angel's hand, still curled around his forearm. Cas hadn't let go yet. Dean swallowed roughly, something tight and painful suddenly in his throat as the same arm throbbed in response, only a foot higher up where a hand-shaped scar used to be. Green eyes reluctantly met blue.

"Why'd you send me back, Cas?"

That hand pulled away – the loss of body heat leaving a stark absence in its wake that Dean wanted to shake off like droplets of water clinging to his skin – but Cas's ocean eyes stayed locked on his.

"For hope."

"Because you think I can change it." The derision in his voice set Cas's teeth on edge. Dean could tell by the way the angel clenched his jaw, and Dean found himself mirroring the movement.

"You can change it," Cas repeating what he'd already said in different words. "You already have."

"One person isn't enough!"

Even if that one person was Sam's whole world. Even if Jess made all the difference, he'd still lost her, whether or not she'd gotten to keep her life.

In front of him, Cas looked like he wanted to start tugging on his own hair. That, or hit the stubborn hunter in front of him. Dean jutted his chin out, practically asking the guy to do it. But the angel, for all that his face had eventually learned to show emotion, he still hadn't quite embraced the physicality of true expression.

"What makes you think it's been only one?"

Dean's brain sputtered for a minute, trying automatically to defend his point by thinking back through the events of the last year. Data gathering, Sam would have called it. Dean shook his head before he got further than a couple hunts because that wasn't the point, damnit. The numbers weren't the point. "It doesn't matter how many it has or hasn't been, it's still not enough!"

"Because you expect too much of yourself, Dean!" The angel's voice raised to match the volume and irritation of the human's.

"You wouldn't have sent me back if I couldn't do it, Cas!" Dean struck Cas in the shoulder with the heel of his palm. Not enough to hurt, hardly enough to even move the angel if he didn't want to be moved, but enough to escalate what was quickly becoming a yelling match.

"You are doing it!" Cas rolled his eyes in the same circle the conversation was going in.

Dean seemed to pick up on that too and threw his arms out, yelling, "Why are we yelling!?"

The abrupt question, shouted in nothing short of an outdoor voice at full volume and accompanied by agitated, waving arms, drew the angel up short. Cas looked temporarily affronted by it, before he ducked his head and huffed.

"You started it," he muttered grumpily, but there was no heat left in his words.

Dean pulled his head back to disagree (he had not-) only to realize Cas was…well, okay, he wasn't wrong. That didn't make him right, of course. But he wasn't entirely wrong. Dean glanced guiltily. Fine, so he'd mostly started it. The hunter had been itching for a fight, though he couldn't say why. Well, that wasn't completely true, either. Dean knew why; it had been the month from hell, between the damn Croats he'd never thought he'd have to fight off again, to Andy going missing and showing up half dead (surviving the kind of nightmare no one should ever live through), to Gordon Fucking Walker taking Dean out and trying to do the same to Sammy.

So he was a little worked up, alright? Which, apparently in dreamland, meant shouting in circles at his best friend. (Not that he'd cop to it, of course. He might be willing to own up to it in his head, but out loud, Cas definitely started this. Dean just finished it. Yeah, he was going with that.)

He crossed his arms over his chest and looked away. "Yeah, well, according to Sam, I do that."

(Okay, fine, maybe he'd cop to it a little. This was Cas, after all. And they were in his head.)

"Dean."

"Can we just drop it, Cas?"

"Dean." The angel – this angel, who so rarely pulled out the Warrior of God voice anymore – was definitely forcing the issue. Internally, the human allowed himself an irritated huff and decided if they were having this conversation, they definitely weren't having it in the friggin' hallway. But Cas grabbed his arm, fingers folding right over the same spot as before so he couldn't run away this time.

(Excuse you. He had not been runningaway. It was just…the library was a way better place for this sort of thing. Plus, there was an angel sleeping half a door away, alright?)

"Come on, man. We're gonna wake the other you up."

(It was a weak excuse and Dean knew it. At best, it would only stall the conversation, not stop it from happening in the first place. And Dean really wanted the latter. He didn't want to hear his best friend tell him he was doing everything he could. Because everything he could wasn't proving to be enough, and Dean didn't know what else to do, what else he could give.)

"You cannot wake an angel from a healing trance with raised voices." Oh good, the Warrior of God voice was now exasperated. That's what happened to the might and power of an angel when you subjected it to eight years of Dean Winchester. Unfortunately for Dean, that also meant this was the version of Cas knew all his tricks. Knew him well enough to know what he was trying to do and wouldn't let him get away with any of it. He didn't let Dean push any further, distract him with a pointless argument about what could wake an angel from a healing trance then. Nope, this angel just plowed right on into that conversation they were apparently having. "Dean, I wouldn't have sent you back if there wasn't hope. You are doing good."

"But?" Dean turned fully into him, dropping his arms in the same way he wanted to drop this topic, but Cas's grip on his skin remained. There hadn't been a 'but' to Cas's words, but Dean knew it existed all the same. It might be outside of what the angel was willing to put on his shoulders, but it was there (it was the weight of the world. A weight he and Sam had insisted, on numerous occasions, wasn't Dean's to bare, at least not alone. But they just didn't get it). "It's not enough."

Cas huffed again, fighting against the irritation that was dealing with the unmovable wall of Winchester Martyrdom that had ever existed in time and space. "It will be. It has to be, Dean. You need to trust in that. And stop overthinking it."

The hunter just snorted, a clear indication of what he thought about that. The angel pinned him with a cautionary look.

"Some things can't change, Dean. You wouldn't want them to."

He'd heard that before, and he was sick of it.

"Like my dad?"

Cas released his arm, and this time Dean felt like a jerk about it. Cuz that hadn't completely been fair. John's death this time around wasn't on Cas; it was on Dean. It would always be on Dean.

Those blue eyes dropped away regardless, looking a little into the past and a lot into the floorboards. Apparently Dean wasn't the only one harboring guilt about repeated events (and yeah, now he definitely felt like a jerk). "I don't know. Maybe."

The hunter fought to keep his arms at his side, itching to come up and cross over his chest once more, to brood and be angry and right (because he wasn't wrong, damnit, and he deserved to be angry, he was right to be angry, regardless of what the guilt was saying). "And Sammy? Drinking demon blood, dying at Cold Oak? Selling my soul and breaking the first damn seal! Are those things that can't be changed, too, huh?"

Dean pressed forward with his bitterness, for once being the one to invade the angel's personal space. It got Cas to look back up at him, at least. If he couldn't be defensive with his body language, than he'd be friggin offensive. Only the move didn't carry nearly as much weight as Dean had intended. With Cas so close and his eyes wavering with levels of misery and guilt equal to what Dean was feeling inside (had been feeling for months, no matter how far down he shoved that shit), it just felt stupidly intimate instead of intimidating (god friggin' damnit).

The angel shook his head, gaze never leaving his charge's. "I don't know, Dean. I hope not. I hope you can change them, but if you can't…"

"If I can't, then I'm going to Hell again and the world is screwed." Which wasn't true, because Dean had promised his brother he wouldn't do that. No matter what. (But also, yeah right. They were so friggin' screwed.) It didn't matter, though, because it felt good to be angry, so Dean was going to be angry. He backed away from the angel so he had room to run a frustrated hand over his scalp without elbowing his friend in the face doing it (he wasn't that angry. Yet.) "That's just great, Cas."

"Dean, Time is…a mess." The human snorted as Cas waved his hand around helplessly, at a loss for a better word. (Well…he wasn't wrong.) "In some places, at some times, and in some cases, there are what you could call anchor points."

"Anchor points?" Dean didn't have a clue what those were, but what the hell did Cas mean some times in some cases. What the hell, was Time some sort of fluid, shapeshifting bitch? It either was, or it wasn't, damnit. It was time, not a friggin rhyming riddle on a popsicle stick!

"Yes. Things that can't be…that are very difficult to change. Events that have such tremendous impact on other things, or were created by other such events, that they're too deeply rooted in the timeline to ever truly change. Not without pretty much destroying everything else." Cas shrugged kind of hopelessly and started walking. He passed Dean, headed for the library. Since that was where the hunter had wanted to go all along, he followed without resistance. "These events can be obvious – like the Apocalypse-"

"Thought we were trying to change that, Cas," Dean all but growled as took the couple of stairs up into the much larger, brighter lit Library.

"-or smaller, innocuous even. Things you wouldn't realize hold any significance in the timeline." Cas ignored his interruption (as he often did when Dean was being little more than petty or grouchy in an argument he wasn't winning or didn't want to hear in the first place), and settled into one of the chairs by the main table. He looked tired, enough so that Dean had to fight back a fresh wave of guilt (and worry) with fierce, manly fisticuffs. "What events are or aren't anchor points are hard to predict, because we do not view things that happen, or the order they happen, as Time does."

"That doesn't make any friggin' sense, man." Even as he said it, Dean set aside his utter and complete discomfort with dreamland (seriously, it gave him the willies. Too close to witchcraft and hoodoo only with all the feels of a rom-com) and imagined two beers in hand. When cold, condensation-slick glass filled his hand out of seemingly nowhere, he held one out to Cas. An apology for all the yelling, he supposed (a non-verbal apology, because let's be honest, all the participants here knew that wasn't gonna happen).

The angel took it with a weak smile, then had himself a sip as Dean partook of his own.

"It's complicated, Dean." Again the hunter snorted, nearly missing inhaling beer foam down the wrong pipe. Yeah, Cas could say that again. And again, and again, and again. "Time is like…the earth beneath an overgrown garden. Thousands up on thousands of intermingled root systems that anchor each other into the ground."

Dean frowned, realizing where Cas was going with this and his 'anchor points'. Which was unfortunate, because the hunter didn't really want to hear it, even if he might need to.

(Dean got the weirdest sensation, sitting there sipping at his beer, being lectured about how time worked through convoluted and mostly useless analogies, that he'd done this all before. It was annoying, regardless of how familiar he was with déjà vu by now.)

"In some cases, you can pull a single plant from the garden, roots and all, and nothing else is affected. Other times, it's quite obvious by the proximity of two plants that their roots will be entangled and it will be a battle to pull one out and not damage the other. But the most common plant in this garden is the one that seemingly has no relation to any other, but whose roots are tangled with a dozen plants beneath the dirt."

"What's your point, Cas?" Dean growled low, fingers tight around the cold bottle in his hand. Because it sounded like his angel was telling him this couldn't be done. That he couldn't change shit. Damnit, why did they always circle back to this? Cas himself had said he wouldn't have sent Dean back if there wasn't a chance. So why was he sitting there telling him there wasn't one at all?

"Most of the time, it's very difficult to look at a single event and predict how wide its impact is beneath the surface. What other events it entangles." The angel shrugged again, leaning forward to rest his elbows on his knees, back and shoulders hunched, picking idly at the paper label like only the Winchesters could have taught him to do. "My point, Dean, is that you're trying to tackle this like a hunt and it isn't. It's Time."

"What?" He pulled his head back, frown firmly in place, and tried to decide if he was insulted or just confused.

"Changing the timeline isn't going to be as simple as looking for clues, finding the points that line up in the lore, and then taking the fight to the monster." Cas set his beer onto the library table, barely drunk (and Dean was definitely insulted. Hunting wasn't simple, damnit. It was hard friggin' work.) "What you're trying to do – what Time itself is – is unpredictable. You're not going to know which plants to pull up, which events to change, alright? And I can't tell you, because I don't know either. Almost no on in the cosmos does."

"Except God." Dean suddenly bit out, angrily realizing exactly where he'd had this conversation before. (Goddamnit!)

"Yes, well, I believe you tried that already," Cas snorted right back. Dean rolled his eyes but, yet again, the angel wasn't wrong. "Time would know as well, but I doubt she'd be willing to help us considering we're actively fighting against her will."

Dean skipped right over the part where they were talking about time like an actual sentient identity (because, at this point, nothing would surprise Dean, but that didn't mean he wanted to deal with it. Sometimes, ignorance was friggin' bliss and no one could tell him otherwise). "I can't just stumble around blindly and expect to avert an Apocalypse! It doesn't work that way!"

He'd definitely had this conversation before, damnit!

"Yes, it does, Dean. Because you will be changing things. You already are." Cas stared up at him from his hunched position, still leaning on his knees. His eyes looked damn near pleading and his human charge found himself swallowing roughly past that look. "It's the only way. Stop looking for order, stop trying to control every event and outcome. Listen to your brother and pick your battles."

The hunter turned away, both to avoid those stupid eyes as well as his stupid, faithful friend who never seemed to give up on him or, in this case, his conviction that Dean could actually do this. Like Dean friggin' Winchester could do anything. Like he'd hung the god damn stars in the sky.

His thoughts flickered briefly to Angela's words, back in the Impala on the side of a Lafayette highway, and Dean was inexplicably stricken by the reminder. He ground his teeth and forcibly pushed the thought away. "Alright. Fine. What battle?"

When he turned back to the angel, Cas was giving him another exasperated look, like he knew Dean was just being purposefully obtuse because he didn't like what he was hearing and didn't want to hear (or think about it) any more. "Lilith, Dean. Your Castiel already told you as much."

"She's not my Castiel," Dean argued back immediately, but by the look his Cas gave him, the angel knew he was being petty at that point.

"Regardless of angel-human ownership here-" And oh, did Cas get a glare for that one- "Lilith is the key to averting the Apocalypse without upsetting the timeline too greatly. Every other event is too entangled in the others. Sams' death, your soul deal, breaking the first seal. They'll all create a thousand unpredictable ripples and you'll drown trying to fight them all. But if we kill Lilith first-"

"Then none of it matters. The final seal's gone, there's no point in getting the rest of the party set up when the main event is toast."

Cas huffed, whether in wry amusement or something along the lines of 'somebody please save me from the hopelessness of humans, why do I even bother?' was really anyone's guess (Dean was pretty sure he knew). "It's possible Hell could form a new final seal, but it would take centuries to do so."

The earth would be safe, at least for as long as it was the Winchester's job to protect it. Some poor sap a couple centuries down the line could deal with the fallout for their Apocalypse raincheck.

"So we gotta kill Lilith as soon as she's topside. Before the first seal breaks."

Which sounded strange coming out of his own mouth, giving that he would be the one to break it and given what it would take to break it. Dean shivered and ran a hand over his mouth to hide the tremble, further burying it down with a long swig of beer.

"Yes, and if you don't want to damage every other plant in the garden doing it, maybe don't make it look like you're tackling the giant Apocalypse Tree in the center."

Dean so did not appreciate circling back to that stupid analogy (what was it with everyone trying to explain time with analogies? It was time. It just…was, alright?!) but at least this Cas wasn't obsessed with friggin' air quotes while he did it.

"So…we pull up a bunch of smaller plants, then. Uh…wipe out some of the more minor shit that's going to feed- er, that's tangled in the… uh…Lilith plant."

Yeah, this sure as shit wasn't working for him.

The angel's exasperation definitely took on a fond look and Dean scowled if only to beat back the heat rising to his cheeks (no, no, no, he was not blushing. Dean Winchester did not blush. It was just more furious, furious rage, damnit).

"Take her out for a reason other than stopping the Apocalypse," Cas translated.

Dean's scowl turned genuine, tinged with incomprehension. The other Cas – Lady Cas – had said the same thing back at Bobby's house, when they'd first brought her up to speed. But they'd never gotten to the 'how' of that plan. The angel had merely said she'd work on it and, well…a lot had happened in the meantime. He doubted she'd had much planning time.

Not to mention, Lilith wasn't even topside, yet. And outside of Cas and her angel blade, they didn't have a way to kill Lucifer's first born, anyway.

(And, also, there was that whole idea where he just wouldn't let Sammy die this time, so there'd be no point in selling his soul, so no Apocalypse or first or last seals to even bother with and therefore Lilith and her entire posy could just fuck off for all he cared. Personally, that was still Dean's go-to plan: Don't Let Sammy Die. Then it wouldn't matter that everyone and their mother doubted whether or not he could keep himself from making a deal to save Sammy, cuz Sammy wouldn't need saving. See? Bullet proof plan, right there.)

"A reason like what?" he asked, almost cautiously. It was possible Cas had a plan his younger counterpart hadn't come up with yet. Sitting in a Dean Sternum Condo with nothing to do, he had a lot more time on his hands (at least when he was 'stable'. Sometimes this Cas wasn't always as present as he had been so far today). Plus, he had a lot more knowledge of future events to work with. Probably made, uh, pruning that whole garden thing easier, or something.

The angel eyed him for a moment, like he was sizing him up. Dean narrowed his eyes in return, immediately wary of what was coming next. "Like freeing a contract she's holding, Dean."

And rightly so, apparently.

"Oh, come on!" Dean had to resist chucking the bottle in his hand at the nearest wall. Waste of good beer, he told himself (even if it was Dreamland beer and he could just replace it). "All any of you have said since I got back to this time was not to sell my soul, damnit. Now you're telling me to do it just so we can take Lilith out before I go to hell and break the first seal!"

"Hardly." Cas rolled his eyes about as hard as Dean had, pinning him with that scary ass angel look that told him to shut up and stop being stupid before he got himself smote. "You're not the only contract she held in those days."

Dean frowned sharply at the angel. His first thought (being, 'What the hell?') was quickly overrun by his second thought ('Who else did we know back then that-') and then his brain short-circuited and green eyes went wide.

"Bela."

Bela freaking Talbot.

God, what a pain in his ass she had been. But, admittedly, quite an interesting pain. And none too hard on the eyes, either. Dean honestly couldn't tell if he was looking forward to or dreading running into that woman again.

…Little bit of column A, little bit o' column B, probably.

"Why can't we just stop the hellgate from ever opening?" was what came out of his mouth instead of anything remotely in line with Cas's plan. Because his plan was stupid. They hadn't managed to kill Lilith the first time around until she'd let them. Yeah, Dean had ten years more experience and was a badass (translation: terrifying, borderline serial killer that Hell should be a lot more afraid of this time around, but, ya know, details), but even he had his limits. Lilith was Lucifer's first born; she was more powerful than Abaddon, and Dean didn't want to think about the lengths he'd gone to in order to defeat a Knight of Hell. (He did not slide a hand up and over his arm, covering the clear, unblemished skin of his right forearm.) "If Lilith can't get topside, then there's no last seal, no Apocalypse."

In addition to his own promise that he wouldn't sell his soul, well, shit, they'd be golden. Double golden.

(Only he knew, he knew, it would never be that easy.)

"It's not that easy, Dean."

Copy cat. (Copy Cas. Heh. Get it? See what he did there? Copy-nevermind, you get it.)

"There are hundreds of hellgates and Team Free Will, no matter how it's expanding, doesn't have the resources to guard them all. Regardless of whether or not Sam is killed or you sell your soul, Lilith will make it to Earth." Cas sighed, dropping the 'judgmental teacher dealing with his most difficult kid in class' look and going back to his hunched shoulders and bowed back. "That's kind of my point, Dean. Trying to avert your soul-deal, or stop Sam from dying, or a hellgate from opening is far more complicated than killing Lilith."

The hunter gave him a look that clearly questioned whether he had his head on straight. (This was Lilith. Lucifer's first born they were talking about here. Had he mentioned they hadn't been able to kill her first time around until she wanted them to?) The angel ignored it.

"Trying to stop any one of those things would mean covering every possible way they could go down. It's pure defense, and it just won't work. You need to go on the offense."

Dean heard the words, even recognized the logic in them somewhere deep down inside his brain, but he was busy focusing on the one small, little, infinitesimal detail. One little detail that had turned his entire chest, his soul, to ice. "Cas…are you saying I'm going to sell my soul again? That that's- that's a…a what? An anchor point?"

Because- because up until that point, he hadn't been planning on it. Yes, everyone seemed to doubt his ability not to sell his soul if it meant saving Sam (even Dean himself, were he being honest). And yes, not doing that was going to be the damn hardest decision of his life (which is why Plan A was: Don't Let Sammy Die In The First Place). But if Cas was talking about it like it was inevitable, like selling his soul as inevitable, then…then….

(Only he knew. He'd always known, he'd just never wanted to know that he knew. Hell would get their way; they were always going to get their way. It was only a matter of leverage. If it Sam alone wasn't enough, then it would be Sam and Bobby. Then Sam and Bobby and Andy. If Dean wasn't broken by that point, it would be Ellen and Jo and the whole damn Roadhouse. How many bodies would Dean let pile up beside his brother's before he did what they wanted? And if he knew that was going to be the end result, then what was the point of letting those bodies pile up to start with? Sam would hit the ground, cold and grey, and Dean, seeing the whole future painted out before him in a pile of people he loved, would sell his soul just to keep it from happening.)

Fuck. Fuck!

He didn't- he wasn't- …Dean didn't actually know if he had another forty years in the Pit in him. If he could survive it. He'd joked and he'd put on that same brave face as he had the first time around, but Dean hadn't actually thought it would come to that. He wasn't going to let it come to that. Except…maybe he didn't have a choice. IN which case…

God, he was screwed. The world was screwed. He didn't have forty years in him. He just didn't. There was a lot less of him left now, and what was left was shattered and broken, held together by duct tape, guilt, and a little bit of familial love that would mean damn next to nothing down in the Pit.

It wouldn't be enough to see him through to the other side this time. Not a second time.

"No," Cas answered immediately, firm and forceful despite the eternity that could exist in a single second when it came to Dean's spiraling thoughts and what was quickly amounting to an anxiety attack. "That is not a guarantee. I promise, Dean. But…if Lilith is allowed to live, the odds of Hell claiming its Righteous Man for the Pit do increase. Um…a lot."

Which was Cas's way of saying no, it wasn't a guarantee, but it was really, really, really, really likely.

Dean swallowed roughly. Great. Great! So now they had to kill Lilith or he was going to be dragged back down as hellhound food. No pressure there, at all.

(Fuck fuckity fuck fuck!)

Dean didn't want to think of forty more years in the pit, so he didn't. "Okay, so we kill Lilith as soon as she's topside. Only, the hellgate opened after I sold my soul the first time, Cas."

"That doesn't mean it will happen in the same order this time, Dean."

Which made…no frigign' sense when he wasn't allowed to change anything, but hey, nothing did anymore, so at least that was familiar territory (yeah, right).

"Great. So, do we just open the hellgate ourselves?" After all, the sooner Lilith was topside, the sooner they could kill her and de-rail the entire Apocalypse (including his soul deal) apparently. And, at least she already had Bela's contract, considering she'd made her deal when she was a child. Which meant all they needed now was the Colt or Ruby's knife.

Which…was a problem (and also hadn't worked all that well for them the first time, remember?)

"Or do we not fight Azazel when he goes for it?" Dean reasoned out loud, since it was the Yellow Eyed bastard who had the gun right now, and short of trying to bribe Crowley into getting it for them (which… yeah right, there probably wasn't enough gold in China to get that bastard to do anything so risky), they had no way of getting it except to wait for Yellow Eyes to show up with it. Of course, Azazel hadn't gone for Fossil Butte until after he'd had Sammy iced and guaranteed Hell its Righteous Man.

(Again, how exactly were they going to change that this time around? Cas wasn't actually answering any of Dean's questions, here and the circles were just giving him a headache.)

"No. You would never let the gate just open if you didn't know the future." The angel shook his head, and Dean kind of wanted to hit him for how calm he was. Did he not see that this was insane and totally hopeless? "It's best to act as you would if you don't know what will happen next."

"Except for when I'm trying to change it," Dean bit out caustically, because different versions of this angel kept telling him that and it didn't make any damn sense. He couldn't change anything if he acted the same exact way as last time. Couldn't do anything different if he didn't do anything different! How did they not see that?!

Cas shrugged, and this time Dean wanted to pull his hair out or punch his best friend in the face. He settled for draining his beer, which didn't do much to make him feel better at all when it immediately refilled itself. He glared down at the thing like he might just take his anger out on it instead.

"That's also kind of the point, Dean." The angel reached over to his forgotten beverage, passing it to Dean in exchange for his bottle, like Cas was somehow saving the beer from certain death. Like they were in the real world and Dean had drained his beer in exchange for another. Like…like Cas had known he'd needed some sort of normalcy right now. Which was really friggin' thoughtful, Den supposed, fidgety with the realization and the feels that came with it. Damnit.

Cas set Dean's beer down on the table and Dean took a sip from Cas's, frowning around the lip of the bottle. "You need to change it without acting any differently than you would if you didn't know what was coming and weren't trying to change it."

"How- How does that make any sense, Cas?" Dean threw his arms out to the side, beer and all, and was lucky when he didn't slosh the nearly full bottle all over the floor. Cas sent him an admonishing look, the one that said he wasn't thinking hard enough. He hated that look. It was like Sam was here and the two of them were tag-teaming him, all in one little look.

"Would you save Bela Talbot if you didn't know what was coming? Would you try to kill Lilith to free her from her contract, not knowing what Lilith's death might also save?"

Dean stilled, staring almost dumbly at his friend. That… Yeah, he would. He'd offered to do just that, once upon a million years ago, but by then it had been too late. There hadn't been time, but now…now there was. And Dean was starting to see what the angel – both angels – were talking about.

Okay, so there might be some wiggle room in the way he responded to events (if he was trying to respond in the 'same way' as last time). He could still do what needed to be done to change the future, but only if he could make it look like that wasn't what he was trying to do at all.

Great, it was technically possible but god, what a friggin' headache.

Dean drained Cas's beer too, handing it back to him (rather needlessly. He could set the bottle on the table just as easily as the angel could) even as it refilled itself. He'd had his fill of never-ending beer. Today, it just didn't have the same satisfaction as finishing one off. "How the hell am I supposed to do this without you, man? Don't suppose we could work on getting communication going between us that doesn'trequire the two of us being passed out? Cuz that's gonna make things difficult and I tried policing my actions and thinking every little step through the first couple months here. It did not go well."

Although he said it mostly in jest (a bitter, self-deprecating, only-half joking sort of jest), Dean's grin dropped the second he realized Cas was looking at him with the kind of look that meant absolutely no good ever.

"Cas?" It was a warning tone. A warning that the angel better speak up pretty damn fast about what that look was about, and one that also said that look better be about abso-friggin-lutely nothing at all.

"You need to trust yourself more, Dean," the angel repeated without answering that warning in the slightest. "And stop overthinking it."

"Cas." Dean stepped up the warning as he stepped up to the angel, who lifted his head from his seated position to stare up at the hunter less than a foot in front of him.

Those blue eyes stayed locked on his, but eventually the angel sighed and Dean got the distinct impression of him looking away, even if his gaze never shifted. "I…may not always be here, Dean."

"What?" Dean blinked at him. And then he got angry. "What? The hell are you talking about, Cas?"

Cas finally dropped his gaze and Dean realized he was less than a foot from the guy and most definitely looming. Angrily, he flopped down into the chair next to Cas, eyes never leaving the angel who glanced at him but didn't hold his gaze.

"Eventually, this…afterimage will fade out."

His friend gestured almost offhandedly at himself, like he was nothing but an afterthought and Dean felt his blood boil. Not just at his friend casually referring to himself as a- a- what? A shadow? The human was freakin' sick of hearing people call the angel that. But also, to hear Cas (again) sound so- so- so calm about his own demise. It just- it pissed him off, is what it did.

"No." Dean shook his head, causing the angel to give him the side-eye for thinking he could change facts with a little adamancy and a whole lot of stubborn. But Dean had done more with a hell of a lot less. "No. I know enough about angels and grace to know you're like a nuclear power plant. You're self-sustaining or, you know, whatever."

The look got worse because Cas added a huff and some of that fond exasperation into the mix. Dean was really starting to detest that combo. "Self-sustaining merely means you produce more or equal to the amount of energy you use, Dean."

Oh, good. There was that Warrior-of-God-Eight-Years-After-Dealing-with-Dean-Winchester-so-Now-He's-a-Warrior-Who-Lectures-Like-a-Preschool-Teacher-Instead. Dean sure hadn't missed that version of Cas.

"So?"

"So," Cas mimicked, nailing the impertinence perfectly, "that sliver in your chest is not producing more grace than it took to keep you alive in the hospital in Michigan, or aid Castiel in exorcising Azazel."

"Wait, what?" Dean pulled his head back, full frown in place as the words hit home. They- they'd been killing him doing those things? Granted, Dean had kind of already thought they'd killed him once, after Rivergrove, but Lady Cas had very clearly said that only an angel could kill another angel. Which meant Chest Cas would be fine. Was fine. Would stay fine, damnit.

"It's possible the power Castiel drew from me in Rivergrove has triggered a…end process of sorts." He said it casually. Casually like they were talking about the batting average of the New York Yankee's weakest player. Not that Dean knew anything about baseball. Or New York.

"Then friggin' reverse it!" the hunter yelled in retaliation, having absolutely none of this. He wasn't losing Cas after he'd just spent a week thinking the dude was already dead. He wasn't.

"It can't be reversed, Dean." His angel eyed him, still way too fucking calm.

"Then stop using your grace, damnit!"

The angel didn't say as much, but he was very certain that was the one thing Dean could ask of him that he simply couldn't agree to. Not if it meant saving Dean. Saving the people he loved. And the hunter could see it in his eyes.

"Come on, man, I can't…I can't lose you."

"If I am fading, which I believe I am, the process will still take time. Years, possibly." Cas tried for a smile, but it was weak and they both knew it. The words were supposed to be a comfort, but all Dean was hearing was that he was going to lose his friend. Again. ('Always' a caustic voice whispered in his ear, bitter and dark and sounding like the Mark and a Damned soul all in one.) "I will stay for as long as I can, Dean, but…I'm hardly myself most days. That will get worse. Eventually, I won't be much help to you."

"Doesn't matter," Dean insisted adamantly. "I don't need you to help, Cas, I just…I…"

Dean hesitated for only a moment before he reached out. His initial aim was for Cas's hand, dangling next to his knees, but he aborted at the last moment and curled his fingers around Cas's forearm. The angel glanced down at the hand, smiling warmly at the contact, and Dean found himself swallowing through a giant lump in his throat.

"I need you, okay?" The words were like razor blades being pulled up through that lump and out his mouth, leaving nothing but wreckage behind. Why was just telling someone how he felt so damn hard? This was Cas, damnit. He deserved to know he was lo- needed, wanted. "I can't do this without you, Cas."

Those blue, blue eyes slid away from him, looking over his shoulder to the dormitory wing they'd left behind what already felt like a lifetime ago. Then that intense gaze slid back to focus solely on his charge. "You have me, Dean."

The other Cas. He was talking about the Castiel sleeping it off in the dormitory wing. Dean swallowed roughly again, for entirely different reasons, and slowly withdrew his hand from his friend's arm.

"She's not you," he muttered, not quite able to meet his eyes as he said it and feeling guilty as hell about it.

Because she wasn't. She was…she was fine, she was good, and Dean was glad to have her on their side. He knew they couldn't do this without the angel. But she wasn't his angel. She wasn't the Cas he knew, had gone through Hell with (had been pulled out of Hell by). And he didn't want to trade one for the other.

He knew it was selfish, but he wanted – he needed – both of them.

He needed the physical angel who would stand by his side, who would choose humanity over her home, her family, and everything she'd ever been told, everything she ever knew. He needed that loyalty, that stalwart support. That friendship.

But he needed his Cas, too. The one that knew him, the one that knew when to pull his head out of his ass and tell him he was being an idiot. Sam was good at that, but Dean didn't always listen to his brother. For some reason, the older Winchester had a better track record of actually hearing it when his angel said it in the same words. It might be because this was the same angel who'd told him to start respecting him or he'd get his ass thrown back in Hell. More likely, though, it was because Dean knew it was Cas who'd come charging in after him when he royally screwed up against their advice, the angel who'd end up pulling both him and Sam out of the fire (because of course Sam would be right there next to him), and likely the angel who'd come out injured because of it.

(Dude…that pattern sucked. Dean made a mental note to work on that with Lady Cas.)

"Not yet," Cas responded quietly, voice even in that gravelly way that usually spoke of things Dean wasn't gonna want to hear. "Maybe not ever. But she's still me. Give her time."

The hunter's gut clenched, realizing for the first time (in words, at least. He suspected he'd known for a while and didn't know how to put that tense feeling in his stomach into something identifiable), that Cas was right. If he waited, if he gave it time and kept doing what he was doing, if he stuck to the timeline (even an accelerated one), than he would have that version of his Cas back, or one that was pretty close to it. Maybe not the eight-years-and-how-many-ends-of-the-world-later friendship he had with the angel sitting next to him, but it would still be close. It would be the apocalypse version, this time without all of the ups and downs, betrayal and lies and mistakes they'd both made afterwards.

Maybe…it wouldn't be so bad not to have those other things. Yes, what they'd gone through together in Purgatory, what Cas had suffered under Naomi and Metatron, what Sam had suffered under Cas's hand… Maybe they could skip all that this time, and Dean could still have his friend. The one he needed, even if it wasn't the one he already had.

Somehow, Dean doubted he'd get all of it, simple and neat and tied up with a bow. He'd always been a selfish bastard when it came to Castiel. That hadn't changed with a ten year time jump.

"I…I shouldn't want her to," Dean finally admitted, the words dragged out of his mouth like sandpaper over a bed of tacky glue. "I shouldn't want her to be you."

Cas stared at him for a moment and was quiet for even longer. In an abstract way, the angel could appreciate his friend recognizing the hardships he had faced over their years together. Better late than never, he knew, and Dean had done a lot of reflection in this past year, forging his way in another time, much of those months spent thinking he was alone. However, more than anything, Castiel wished he could convey how little those hardships mattered, in the scheme of things. Cas had been honest when he'd told Dean he could not picture this tale told any other way. But perhaps he should have been more specific; he could no longer picture a world without the Winchesters in his life.

He doubted any other version of himself would feel differently, given the opportunity.

Eventually, once the silence had stretched and the hunter beside him got fidgety, Castiel sighed softly. His hands were clasped lightly in front of him, fingers idly rubbing over one another.

"She won't regret it. It won't be easy, the road ahead, but…" Blue eyes met Dean's once more, and the human was taken back – like he was always taken back, something that ten years of friendship hadn't ever friggin' dulled – by being the sole focus of that attention. "It's a road worth traveling."

Dean hung his head. He knew, he already knew that he would ask her to travel it. Hell, he wouldn't even ask. That implied giving her the option not to, and like Dean had already said, he was friggin' selfish when it came to this particular angel, this particular friend.

"You confuse the hell out of me, man." The words slipped out before he could wrangle them back in, before he could realize he was saying them out loud. Beside him, Cas huffed something like a laugh and smiled at him with just the corner of his mouth.

"Just me, or us?" Like he knew what Dean was thinking and, fuck, they were in dreamland in Dean's head, for Christ's sake. Not to mention this damn angel was curled up to his friggin' soul, so hell, he might just. Double fuck.

"All of it. It's messing with my head. Putting things in my head!" And not just the Cas'es. But that was another topic Dean was not thinking about in dreamland sitting next to the angel curled up to his soul, damnit. His eyes flickered over to his friend, who just looked amused at his personal struggle and…

Screw it.

If asked, Dean could not say why he did it. Why he let himself go there. But now that it was in his head, he couldn't let it rest. Not when he might have the answer sitting right next to him. Not when it was his friend, and…well, if Cas was right (which he friggin' wasn't, damnit), then there might be a number placed on how many of these conversations they had left.

(But he wasn't right, Dean was gonna make sure of it.)

"Cas…" The angel glanced over at him, his smile fading into concern at the weight and guilt of Dean's expression, and he straightened a little under the sudden shift. Dean could hardly keep eye contact. "Do I…look at you differently than everyone else?"

His friend went from straightening to stiffening, back rigid in his chair. It was all the answer Dean ever needed and not the one he remotely wanted (not that he'd really been expecting a different one, but he had hoped). That intense gaze shifted away. "You don't need to worry about that."

Shit. That most definitely was not a 'no.'

"Kinda feeling like I do." His friend's eyes flickered back to his briefly, and Dean's heart sunk somewhere into his toes, plowing right through his stomach and leaving a mess of shredded knots in its wake. "Shit, I-I never meant…"

"I know," Cas cut him off before he had to say the words (and what words, exactly? Dean didn't even know what he would say. He considered himself lucky his friend seemed to). The angel looked away again, staring off at the far wall in a distant, but not entirely absent way. "It used to confuse me. You always told me my stare was…'intense.' But you'd stare right back at me, so I didn't understand." The angel laughed, and something in Dean's shoulders – something he didn't know he was holding so tight his muscles were shaking and his back ached – loosened a little. "I like to think you did it for payback those first few years. A very Dean Winchester form of challenging my authority."

Dean snorted because, uh, yeah, that sounded like him. It even explained, somewhat, why he might be doing it all over again with Lady Cas. She was that same old Cas, stick-of-authority-and-holy-righteousness-stuck-up-her-butt.

"I noticed it more once I became human. The first time, during the Apocalypse." Cas shrugged his shoulder a little, like a bad memory he was trying to flick away. He knocked his head towards Dean, meeting his eyes again. "I was trying to fit in. To belong. Poorly, I might had." Dean huffed but didn't argue. Cas had been…painfully awkward back then, even if the fault was hardly his own. "My observations of the humans I knew – you, Sam, Bobby – increased exponentially."

Inexplicably, Dean found himself struggling with that whole swallowing and breathing thing again. (Stupid, god damn, feely conversations.) He might not know the words that were coming next, but the curl in his stomach was not so different from sitting in the front seat of the Impala, Angela Garrett in the back, telling him he gave off 'I'm hot for an angel' vibes to everyone within visual range of his friggin' eyeballs.

"You show your emotions in your eyes, Dean. You always have, though it took me many years to learn how to read them correctly."

Was the air getting increasingly drier in the bunker? Dean swallowed again, throat scratchy and sore. Allergies maybe? Could there be allergies in a dream? Hell yes, if he imagined them, then there could be and he'd have a reason for why he felt all hot and bothered and feely right now. Dean narrowed his eyes and thought about pollen, pollen, pollen.

Damn, but he could use another beer right now.

"You looked at me with anger a lot of the time." Dean flinched when Cas handed him a new beer, freshly uncapped, still cold and dewy like it had popped right out of an ad for the stuff, and he didn't know if the wince was from Cas's words or the fact that he could very clearly hear Dean's wants and needs right now (and that…that was so…so not okay.) "But often with you, anger hides something else. Something that makes you feel vulnerable."

The hunter flinched a second time, definitely from the embarrassing words this time. It was his turn to avoid eye contact, burying his attention into the bottle in his hand.

Cas wasn't trying to catch his eye, though. He had his thumbs hooked together, hands hanging loosely between his legs, as he stared at the floor a couple feet away from them with a distant expression. "I guess I never did find out what that was. If I had to call it anything, I would say…expectation. But I never found out what it was you expected of me."

I was never able to fill that expectation.

Dean didn't hear it in so many words, but he remembered his last couple chats with the Cas that sat in his chest. The Cas that had almost died sending him back, that would have died if Dean's soul wasn't a clingy, life-saving mother effer. The same Cas that had volunteered to be Lucifer's vessel because he needed to be useful, because he hadn't expected to survive and was somehow okay with that.

The air around them might as well have been on fire for how Dean's blood boiled and skin burned, for how dry his throat was and how it seared with every swallow. The hunter sighed, fighting back a wave of anger with a wave of guilt instead, because the second one was so much easier.

"Maybe because I never realized I was expecting- uh, asking for anything." Angela seemed to think he had been asking (unintentionally!) for a lot more than he'd intended. Cas seemed to think Dean had wanted, well, everything else. A tool against the Apocalypse, against the Leviathans, against the Mark and the Darkness after that. Dean didn't know which was worse.

(A lie. A total lie. He sure as shit knew which one was worse, just like he knew which one made him the shittier friend and which one was just embarrassing.)

"How do I-" Dean's voice broke and he had to clear his throat, cheeks flushing with heat. He doubted it showed – he rarely blushed visibly anywhere but the tips of his ears (although, this was friggin' dreamland, so all bets were off) – but that didn't stop it from being embarrassing all the same. "How do I stop doing that with her? With, uh, Lad- I'm mean, erm, the other Cas?"

Because he couldn't put her through it, too. His hand to (a) God (he didn't believe in), he hadn't known he was doing it. Hadn't known he was leaving Cas to think he always wanted something more of him (or her). But he knew it now, and it wasn't fair to keep doing it, even if he had no idea how to stop it. Especially since everyone else interpreted that look entirely differently. He didn't want that either, even if was weirdly less embarrassing and more…just…inappropriate with Lady Cas.

(And it was not because he was homophobic. It wasn't, alright? Gays were fine. And damnit, calling them 'gays' probably wasn't helping his cause here. Man-on-man love was fine, just as long as he wasn't a part of it (damnit, he wasn't making this better, was he? Man-on-man love? Really?).)

"Don't worry about it, Dean." The hunter's head snapped up at that, going from berating himself internally for sounding like a dick who couldn't put two words together (like a ten year old boy. Jesus.) to staring at his best friend because…because that couldn't be right. But Cas met his stare evenly. "Don't do anything differently. Stick to the timeline."

Dean's stare faltered. His just-about-everything-else faltered too as he realized what Cas was saying. Dean's heart kind of sank somewhere into his only-barely-healed-up-from-the-last-heart-sinkage-disaster-of-a stomach. He was saying…if Dean wanted the younger version of Cas to turn into the one he knew – to be what Cas had been for him ('still is, damnit. He's not dying. Not if I have anything to say about it.') – than he couldn't change anything.

And…and…he wanted that. God, but he did want that. He couldn't do this without Cas, his Cas.

Why? Why did he want that, when he wanted nothing but the opposite for Sam? He'd do anything, right this second, anything that was asked of him, to keep his brother from walking the path he'd seen him walk once before. To keep that light and innocence in his eyes, even if it faded a bit every day. To save him from all that pain and suffering coming straight at them like a freight train they had so, so little chance of de-railing? Even if it meant permanently losing the brother he loved, the one he knew that existed only nine years and some change from now. He'd sacrifice that brother to save this one.

Why didn't he want to save Cas, too?

Dean swallowed, dropping his eyes to floor.

Because this Sam, even though it wasn't the brother who lived ten years more with him, who knew everything about Dean, was still his brother. It was still a version of Sam that he knew well, and who knew him, even if he didn't know everything. He was still Sam. In so many ways, that brother was a better version; a version that still had hope for a future that wasn't constantly stained with blood and death and friggin' misery. A version before Dean screwed up the one job John Winchester had ever given him. A version that wasn't broken, that didn't have the history of lies and the weight of Dean trying to make up for that mistake ever since.

But that's not what he had with Cas. He didn't have a Cas he knew. Who knew him. Castiel was trying and Dean appreciated that she was with them, had chosen them, repeatedly over the last several months, but they still only barely knew each other. The angel especially didn't know him and Dean, well, on more than one occasion he'd already stepped in it thinking he knew her. They had years to go – and more than a couple painful happenings in between – to get them to best friend status. And he'd need that best friend before the end, which meant Dean couldn't change any of those events, no matter the pain they caused, the home and family they cost, the life they altered.

If he was going to stop the Apocalypse, he needed Cas. Couldn't do it without him. He couldn't live without Cas. Like he couldn't live without Sam. Which he'd…he'd kind of known for years now. But his brain had never bothered to put it into words.

"Here." It seemed like Cas realized he was at his limit of thinking and feels for the day, because the angel reached his trenchcoat and pulled out an angel blade, offering it to Dean as a very efficient change of topic. Dean's eyebrows went up at the sight of it. Cas spun the blade, handing it over hilt first to the hunter. "Uriel's blade. You and Sam should keep it. It will give you a weapon to use against Lilith, once she's topside. And, I imagine Heaven will continue intervening."

Castiel knew both versions of himself would rest better knowing the Winchesters had the ability to defend themselves against whatever schemes Zachariah would surely come up with. Not to mention, the blade would suffice in any hunt. If Cas could not be present to keep them safe while she was healing, then at the very least they would be far better armed with this.

Dean reached for the blade automatically – that would be a hell of a thing to have on hunts this early in the game, not to mention it solved the whole Colt-slash-Demon-Blade dilemma with Lilith – only to pause when he remembered Cas (a different Cas) so hesitant to take it off her brother's corpse.

But this wasn't that angel. Dean knew instinctively that his Cas already understood. Otherwise, he wouldn't be offering the blade he'd clearly taken off his sleeping counterpart at some point (How…did that even work in dreamland?). That…that kind of sucked, actually.

For them both. All three of them, actually. Dean wrapped his hand around the sword, taking it none too lightly and tucking it inside his jacket.

"I'm sorry," he apologized and, given the confused look Cas sent his way, it must have seemed out of the blue for him. (Ouch. Not untrue, but still. Ouch.) "Not for killing Uriel – I'm not sorry that bastard's dead – but for… for the other you, uh…losing a brother." The human turned away, adding in a muttered, "Even if he was a total dick."

Cas seemed to understand both sentiments, smiling sadly (sweetly, not that Dean would ever admit to thinking that) at the hunter. "I appreciate that, Dean. You're right. Uriel was a…a 'winged dick.'"

Dean hid the practical flinch that rippled through him at the air quotes. God, the air quotes. How they could ruin the perfection that was his angel calling another angel a winged dick was…was…well, it was a goddamn tragedy, was what it was.

"And he needed to be taken care of. You should tell the other Castiel that, as well. It will….help. I'm afraid she has many more brothers to lose in the coming years."

Dean scowled at that, as well as the downturned gaze. The angel might not be wrong but that didn't make it okay. "Hey." He waited until he had that intense gaze locked on his. "None of that inevitably crap. We're Team Free Will! Right, man?"

He got a peak of that smile – sad and sweet again – and it was enough. Cas nodded, even if it was rather placating. "We're re-writing the book."

"Damn straight." Dean nudged him with his shoulder, having to scooch almost off the chair to do it. It wasn't like they were exactly side by side. It was worth it for the slight smirk he got in return, though. Which meant, of course, that his throat dried up like the damn Sahara. Goddamnit. "And…I'm not gonna let you die, Cas. I'll find a way to fix it. I swear."

The angel looked away, but only for a moment. When he looked back, he reached out and laid his hand directly on top of Deans. The hunter blinked, staring down at in in nothing short of confusion, tips of his ears burning red.

"Uh…Cas?"

"You might not be able to stop it this time, Dean. But if you can't, it's okay. Really." The hunter looked back up, frown firmly in place. "I'm just a shadow. There was never enough of me left to be here to begin with."

Dean's scowl instantly worsened, and he found himself scooting all the way to the end of chair, ass precariously perched right on the edge, but he didn't care. What mattered was getting right up in Cas's face to let him know he meant business, those big blue eyes wide and locked on his. "Bullshit. Sure feels real to me, Cas."

To prove his point, he flipped his hand over so he was practically entwining fingers with an Angel of the Friggin' Lord, and he gripped that hand hard enough for his friend to damn well feel it. Cas looked town between amused and annoyed, and Dean just stared and stared, having himself a point to prove, and thought, 'Deal with it. You're not getting rid of me easily.'

Cas could doubt him all he wanted, but he was gonna find a way to save him. He always did.

Eventually, that look shifted completely into the amused category, and Cas glanced up at him with a raised eyebrow. "You're still holding my hand, Dean."

And now he was releasing it like a cursed object. "Shaddup."

But Cas was smiling affectionately as he took his hand back. So Dean counted that as the friggin' win it was and decided to ignore all the other stuff. Means to an end, and all that. "There's still time, Dean. Even if I am fading, it won't happen instantly. We have time."

He didn't know if the angel did it on purpose, using those same words he'd spoken a lifetime ago in a cemetery facing the end of the world before jettisoning one measly hunter back through time in a Hail Mary act of desperation, or if it was just a coincidence. And he honestly didn't know if hearing those words again should make him feel better or worse.

"Yeah, right. Time." Dean shook his head. "Speaking of…"

The hunter had to concentrate again to get another beer to appear, and he handed it over readily to his friend (okay, he could admit, this part of dreamland he could get used to). "You got some to spare?"

Cas reached out with the neck of his beer to meet Dean's mostly undrunk one with a hearty clink. "For you? Always."

And hell, for once, Dean didn't even mind the dangerously chick-flick line, even if had been delivered more as a joke (and thank god for that). It sort of fit, actually (even if Cas was about as good as delivering a one-liner as he and Sam had been at acting that one time).

"Dude, can we talk about something happy for once? Like, anything. Anything at all, man. It can be depressing as shit and it would still be happier than-" he waved his hand between them and the silent revelation that Cas might be fading and the dreamworld around them that still made his heart ache with homesickness every time he dwelled on it for too long- "this."

He got another tentative grin out of the angel for that. "Did I imagine you and Sam teaching my younger self about Star Trek, or did that really happen?"

"Oh, man!" Dean lit up like the vacancy sign at a haunted hotel. "It was awesome. She lies like a Vulcan now! You shoulda seen her, man. A natural. And I got her to watch Jaws, too. Next on the list is Star Wars. I'm debating the order to show my young Padawan."

Cas seemed to give it actual thought for a second, which was ridiculous, because while Dean was completely serious, it really wasn't the sort of thing worthy of the strategic mind of an Angel of the Lord. "Start with the first three. Numerically."

Especially not when that was the answer he came up with.

The hunter speared his friend with narrowed-eyed suspicion. "Those're terrible, Cas."

Cas shrugged, that shy smile growing. "I liked them. She will too. They were very…shiny."

"Ugh." Dean hung his head back like he'd just found out his best friend was a fan of the first three Star Wars movies. Which, he had. "Of course you like them. You and Sammy, man. You two have no taste. How did you live with a guy for years and not rub off on him at least a little?"

The man from the future suddenly sat stick-straight up in his chair, spilling a bit of his beer and actually managing to make his angel look concerned.

"Holy shit." He grinned wide, turning to Cas who looked equally confused and wary. "Holy shit, Sam doesn't know there are gonna be three more movies! Oh, oh! Andy doesn't either!"

-o-o-o-

Dean woke up with warmth in his chest, an evil plan in his mind to ruin the next three Star Wars movies for his brothers (not that he'd gotten to see anything but the first of those three, but they didn't need to know that), and cold steel in his hand.

The hunter sucked in a slow breath, feeling his lungs expand almost to the point of pain before he let it back out. Uriel's angel blade was firmly gripped in his dominant hand, laying across his chest where Cas's hand had been before he'd fallen asleep. Dean raised his arm to stare at the silver, unearthly metal that still managed to glint in the low light.

He rolled his head to the side, staring at Angela and Lady Cas both sleeping soundly next to him, the dream still fresh in his mind. Dean blinked, suddenly realizing just how next to him the angel was. Like v*ery* next to him. Like…almost on top of him. And breathing away on a newly inserted ventilation tube (which was great, that meant someone had come in and finished the job he'd barely started), pooling body heat beneath the blanket that was draped over them both-

Wait. What?

Dean jerked upright, taking half that old quilt with him as he did, staring at the thing in horror. It hadn't been there when he'd fallen asleep. It most definitely had. Not. Been. There. Its presence now met someone else had been. There. In the room. With him and a cuddly Cas.

It didn't even matter whether it had been Sam, Bobby, or (god forbid) Andy. Because any of the three of them all meant the same thing. It meant someone had seen him practically spooning in the tiny twin hospital mattress with Cas. Which meant everyone in the housenow knew about it.

"Son of a bitch!"

-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-

A/Ns: Good god. This chapter fought me almost as hard as the last, only *this time it was trying to write itself in places I did not want it to go. That chat about Time and Bela was NOT in the blueprints (any of the, like, twelve that existed for this chapter, sheesh), and the Muse just typed it up and away. So I deleted it and told her we had a million other things to focus on. And she RE-WROTE IT on the next attempt. So I sidelined it for a deleted scene, reminding her we'd already had this chat with Chuck, we didn't need to repeat it with Cas. Yet, lo and behold, it made the chapter anyway. Because of course it did. The Muse always gets her way (why do I even bother?!)*

(The first ten pages, guys. The first TEN pages of a chapter that is usually only ten pages, and none of it was supposed to be there. SIGH.)

*(You guys remember Jo and Asa? Ava and Cold Oak? That thing we had going for us called a plot? Yeah, I do too. But the MUSE SURE DON'T. head thud)*

*It's not even that I don't like this chapter. I do (I think. Mostly, like, that very last end bit. Head thud and a sigh). It's just…I'm used to being very in control of what I'm writing (control freak) and having everything clearly laid out (OCD control freak). But ever since Quarantine, my brain has been foggy and totally unfocused. I'm writing in circles and it's leaving everything just…jumbled and all over the place. (Like, yes, Muse, that's a fascinating way to bring in Bela. Awesome sauce, let's totally use it. But do we have to use it RIGHT THIS INSTANT?! Yes. Yes, apparently we do.)*

So…yeah, I don't completely know how to feel about this chapter. It is a puddle of goo and feels and angst and, oh, yeah, also completely side-tracked by a plot about Time. I'm really hoping it didn't feel repetitive to you guys (the Chuck-Time-Chat was quite a while ago, at least). Sigh.

Ugh, whatever, it's fine!

Moving on!

Requests: I had several requests to shine some more light on how Dean might miss the Sam from his time and mourn the death of that version of his brother. I tried to sneak some of that into this chapter, along with (my personal viewpoint) on why Dean hasn't reacted as strongly to his dead-and-gone brother as he has to his dead-and-not-quite-gone angel (for reasons that aren't just Desitel, because I don't believe in over-balancing character interactions just to favor a ship XD)*

Please keep requesting things! I really do try to squeeze them in whenever they line up with the story :)

Star Wars *: I tend not to like when Authors interject their own opinions about Real World things (like movies) onto their characters because it feels faked/forced/and usually not on-character, so I usually avoid the kinds of discussions that involve opinions (because it's hard enough to nail a character's opinion, let alone keep yours out of it). But, once again, the Muse decided I don't get a say (head thud). So, personally, I don't really like the first three Star Wars (numerically), but I am a story snob and a romance-hater, so…I was never gonna like those movies XD Also, as someone who works in VFX, omg, Lucas went over the top. So…So shiny. So much shiny. So pretty but so, so much.*

*Anyway, hazarding a guess (because the show is much, much smarter than me and has STAYED OUT OF THIS by not having characters give their opinions on such things), I think Dean loves the originals, and begrudgingly accepts the prequels because he's a fanboy and it takes a lot to knock a hardcore fanboy/girl off his/her fandom (sure, he'll gripe and whine, but he's still loyal and was therefore excited when they announced three more), which is why he would insist on showing them to Lady Cas regardless of said griping. While Cas, who does not understanding fandom or fan-ning, would think the first three were acceptable forms of art and story-telling, he would not see why there was much difference between the first three and the second three, and he would marvel at the technology that humans had developed to create such visual virtual worlds from pure imagination (while also asking a thousand questions and pointing out fallacy or misplaced logic in every possible plot hole, but in a curious, I-don't-understand-what-am-I-missing-to-make-this-make-sense sort of innocent way that you would have to give him rather than get annoyed over because he's Cas)*

And all that could have been avoided if I'd just left the entire Star Wars chat out. Ugh. Stupid. Damn. Pushy. Muse. Stupid. Friggin'. Quarantine. Brain.

(Okay, but I did line it up for a future conversation in which Dean ruins the next three Star Wars movies for Sam XD Uh…whenever we get to that.)

Side Movie Note: I have been trying to work in a scenario where lady Cas would say "I think we need a bigger boat" in the middle of a crisis and Dean would straight up stop and grin at her and be like "Did you just quote Jaws?!" and Sam, amid a hail of bullets or whatnot, would be yelling, "CAN WE PLEASE FOCUS?!" And Dean would return to the crisis but be all, "Sammy, I think I'm in love." And Sam would roll his eyes and mutter, "That's what clued you in?" and wonder how this became his life.

Alas. Such a scenario has yet to line itself up. Le sigh.

Up Next: The Supernatural Family decide to hold an intervention (uh, sort of) where Sam's kind of clueless but onboard, Dean's in for some stubborn family members who have* opinions*, Asa Fox and Bucky Sims get dragged into it because, uh, they were there to be dragged? Jo and Andy re-unite (and Andy totally thinks he has a shot. Like a lost puppy), and, if there's time leftover after all that, we're gonna catch up with Hell, Chuck, and Persephone (but it's still not written yet, so tune in next week (possibly two weeks from now) to see the stunning conclusion! (Not a conclusion. Just… the next chapter…we're a loooong way from a conclusion. I- I really need to go to bed now.))*

*(That…that was a lot of author's notes. That was almost as long as the damn chapter. HEAD THUD)*

Reviews: Last thing, I swear. Please do not feel the need if you review to assuage my worries and fears and jumbled dislike of this chapter. I will be very pleased if you enjoyed it, but I mostly rant and rave because I like to babble, occasionally in all caps screaming, and we know this :D*

.

Night, Cheers, and 'Till Next Time,

Silence

Chapter 103: Season 2: Chapter 70

Chapter Notes

Prepare: for a looooot of author's notes. Lockdown's getting to me. I gotta talk. I gotta taaaaaaalk talk talk talktalktalk!

A/Ns: Guys. Guys guys guys. I needed to rewatch some season 2 for a couple Ash-related things and ended up letting Netflix play through like five episodes, including Folsom Prison Blues and The Djinn episode. (God, I missed American Netflix. Not all of it, cuz I'm already missing Canadian Netflix, but I missed easy access Supernatural soooo much) And I- I am so pumped right now. Like SO on board the Supernatural fan train. Funny how some episodes just get you :D

(I've been avoiding watching episodes past where I'm writing so I don't distract myself. Um. Oops?)

(Side A/N: I- I cannot wait to get to those episodes in this story XD)

(Side Side A/N: I…don't actually know if we'll manage Folsom Prison Blues. It's on the hopeful list, but also on the 'only if we have time and it works out' list of episodes I want to cover. So… no promises but man, after watching it again, I so wanna do it)

(Side Side Side A/N: Omg and now I want to write a story where Dean stayed in the Djinn dream and became that brother he should have been and totally let himself get lost in it, cuz it wasn't perfect but he knew he could make it perfect, he could make it right. And that means it's up to Sam to somehow wake him up. Ooooooooh.

((How lovely that this would all be so good for this story since I am conveniently doing a re-write. Only, 2016!Dean would not make that mistake. He especially wouldn't leave Sam to face an Apocalypse alone. SIGH.))

(((I can't…I can't start another story. There's already that friggin Little Mermaid Destiel parody that won't leave me alone that I absolutely do not have time for. DOUBLE SIGH.))))

Actual Story A/Ns: Alrighty then! Is it story time? Are we back to regular plot now? Thank Chuck for that. I usually love the dreamscape and the feels and all the angst (chef's kiss and one very bad French accent later my favorite) but for some reason, my head is just not in that game right now. Luckily, I am doing way better now that I'm in the plot chatter rather than angst chatter.

Editing Quality: Uh, well I had all day today to edit, and I started off strong. Then, around one in the afternoon, my dad suggested a board game and…uh…then it was eleven thirty at night and I still had a whole half a chapter to edit (a chapter the length of two chapters. Yaaaaaaay). Soooo, the edit was a speedy one done through tired eyes and a brain that kept saying "can't we finish this in the morning?"

Translation: The grammatical side of this chapter may be a bit rough XD

(Somewhat) Important Timeline Note: It has been less than 24 hours in story time since Gordon Walker was arrested and Ava Wilson went missing.

Chapter Warnings: Well, we've definitely got nothing coming up that has anything to do with Gordon Walker or Ava Wilson. Not at all. We're just gonna have ourselves a little hunter's picnic and when that doesn't work out (cuz, really. You ever heard of a hunter's picnic? I didn't think so) we'll try an intervention instead, and the whole Scooby Gang's invited.

See the end of the chapter for more notes

-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-

The Road So Far (This Time Around)

Season 2: Chapter 70

-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-

Gordon was escorted from his holding cell at the Tippecanoe County Jail where he was awaiting arraignment for the weapons charge while Detectives at the LPD continued pressuring him for information concerning the photographs on his phone. The prison guard led him to an empty room, usually reserved for visitations but currently occupied by only one other person. Likely a cop from the Lafayette Police Department. Oh, sorry, detective. Gordon resisted the urge to snort. He had been less than impressed or intimidated by the Lafayette Police Department's performance so far. He hardly doubted another interview would change that.

The guard pushed him another step further into the room (and he was lucky Gordon didn't want to deal with an assault charge on top of everything else, or he would have decked the guy just to teach him a lesson about keeping his hands to himself), and then closed the door, leaving Gordon alone with his newest interviewer. Holding back a sigh – this really was tedious – Gordon crossed over to the empty chair plastic chair across the table from the guy, waiting just for him. He reached for the back of it with handcuffed wrists, flipping the thing around so he could straddle the seat, arms over the back and metal cuffs clinking loudly on the table in front of the detective.

No, Gordon realized as he stared at the guy across from him with ever so slightly narrowed eyes. The clean, pressed white shirt, but not so clean or so pressed that it wasn't the shirt of a working man. Tie around his neck, loose enough that he wasn't a pencil-pusher or a stickler for rules. An air of authority behind the tight-lipped, grimace of a smile he presented the prisoner in front of him. That and the manila folder sitting just off to his right – a pretty thick one, Gordon noted, so unlikely to be his own – all suggested more than a detective.

A federal agent. Gordon wondered what about an illegal weapons possession charge and a couple of headless vamps could possibly be of interest to the FBI.

"Mr. Walker," the agent began with a small nod, but that little smile playing at his mouth reeked of condescension. Gordon ignored it. Feds were worse than cops. They didn't do their job any better, but they certainly had the attitudes that would make you think they did. "I hear you're in a tight spot."

Gordon resisted rolling his eyes, but it was a close thing. He tilted his head to the side, staring right back at the guy with the same smile mirrored on his face. "You gonna get me out of it, Fed?"

"Agent Henrisken," the man corrected. That tight-lipped smile got a little tighter. "And that depends."

"On what?" Gordon leaned forward into the back of the chair, cuffs scraping against the tabletop as he let his shoulders slump and settled his chin onto the plastic lip. Not a care in the world, really. At least, not one this Fed could do anything about.

"Dean Winchester."

Gordon picked his head up, for once actually surprised by something that had come out of a law enforcement official's mouth in this town. So, the FBI was here for the Winchesters. How did the Feds know about the brothers? Had they managed to get caught before they could get away? Didn't sound like the pair of hunters he'd dealt with.

Henriksen slid his little folder across the table until it rested in front of him, flipping it open and peeling a photograph off the top page. He spun it around to Gordon, pushing it towards his side of the table. The hunter sat up, actual interest piqued, and grabbed the photo with wide spread fingers, pulling it towards himself with the clink of chain links.

His intrigue immediately flat-lined. It was the photo he'd taken of Dean at the gas station, sprawled on the uneven cement. The green were eyes lifeless, blood pooled on black asphalt, single bullet to the head and resulting damage to prove it. Gordon pushed the glossy print back, returning to his bored slump, staring at the agent if only to dare him for something more interesting. Something better.

"You want to tell me where you got this photo?"

"I took it." Gordon shrugged his shoulders with every ounce of nonchalance in his body. No point lying about that; photography wasn't a crime. Not reporting a dead body was a slap on the wrist, at best, and his lawyer – a sleaze of a man he'd saved a couple years back from a female vamp posing as a prostitute to score her next meal – would easily get it dismissed.

"Where?"

The hunter stared at the Fed, contemplating why he wanted to know. So the FBI was after Dean Winchester, specifically. Sam remained only a maybe at the moment. Gordon was hardly surprised, although he did itch to know why. What was it in particular that this Fed was after? Agent Henriksen didn't seem particularly pleased Dean was dead. Ego, perhaps? Not being the one to catch the criminal himself? Well, there was still plenty of time for that, it turned out, because Dean wasn't dead.

He thought about lying, leading the guy on a goose chase, but it didn't feel like the right play. There was something about this that Gordon was sure he could spin to his advantage, something about the dark glint in this agent's eyes. Obsession maybe? Or just that deeply seated, self-righteousness stick cops – sorry, law enforcement – always had stuck up their ass. No, lying wasn't the right angle to play here, Gordon just wasn't sure what was. Yet, at least.

"Gas station off 25, just past Shadeland road."

Agent Henriksen jotted that down on one of the papers in his little folder and Gordon's fingers twitched, wondering what else was in there. "And I'll find a body there?"

This time, he couldn't stop the snort. He shoved up off the table, sitting in his chair with his wrists resting against the back. The Fed looked less than amused at the physical power play Gordon was keeping up, but then, he'd looked like that since Gordon walked into the room. The hunter would look like that too, if he had to spend eight hours a day investigating the Winchesters.

"Oh, there's no body."

Henriksen's eyes narrowed and he leaned back, tossing his pen onto the open file. He looked annoyed, more than anything. Like he knew he was going to have to go through the steps of a game when he'd rather skip to the end. "What did you do with it?"

"Me? Nothing. Far as I know, Dean Winchester got up and walked away."

The Fed let out an exaggerated sigh, emphasizing his exasperation. Yeah, he definitely thought Gordon was playing a game. Probably the I-didn't-kill-that-guy-honest-he-walked-away-unharmed game a lot of cocky killers played with him. He gestured with his chin to the photograph, still lying in front of Gordon. "He looks pretty dead there."

"Yeah," Gordon agreed, letting some of that insincerity and sarcasm slide away, sounding pretty damn honest. His honesty had never been particularly endearing to others, though. Most people labeled it smug at best. He wondered what Agent Henriksen would do with it. "He looked pretty dead to me too when I took it."

The man across from him stared in silence, head falling a little to the side as he clearly contemplated Gordon's words. His angle, whatever it was. (At the moment, his angle was actual honesty. Go figure.) Finally, the Fed sat up, folding his hands on top of the table, over that open file and his forgotten pen. "Are you saying he faked his dead? And, what, someone helped? You, maybe? That the whole point of these photos?"

Agent Henriksen spread out several more of the photos the LPD had recovered from his phone. Gordon barely even looked at them.

"Oh, it wasn't me." Gordon shook his head, letting all his disregard and disdain for Dean Winchester show openly. He didn't care if this Fed knew he wanted the man dead. In fact, he was pretty sure it was his 'in' with this particular agent. He just had to play it right. "But he's got someone on his side, alright."

A real monster, in Gordon's opinion. One that needed to be taken out right alongside Sam and Dean Winchester.

Henriksen appraised him again, looking him up and down as he took his time. Finally, he glanced around the interrogation room, making a play for detachment, but Gordon already had his number. "You got intel on any of this?"

Gordon smiled, all teeth and negotiation. "Depends. You gonna get me out of here?"

The FBI agent huffed, clearly amused in a not-good way. He closed the folder, capping his pen and setting it back on top. "You got yourself into this. Best I can do…minimum security prison, if your intel is good."

Oh, Gordon very much doubted that was all Henriksen could do. Big bad Fed like him? He could offer so much more. And he would. To catch the Winchesters, Gordon had no doubt. How convenient that their goals lined up so prettily.

But Gordon was nothing if not patient. The best hunters always were. You had to let your prey come to you.

The hunter leaned forward on his chair again, arms crossed, handcuffs jingling against the plastic backing. "Well, when you change your mind, you know where I'll be."

Henriksen let out a harsh laugh, head shaking in disbelief. He stood, gathering up the file and tucking the pen in his pocket. They were clearly done here. "What makes you think I need your help to do my job?"

Gordon just watched him, dark eyes glittering. "Because I know how the Winchesters think. I know how they work. I'm one of them."

The Fed stilled. He didn't quite pause and he hid it well, but Gordon knew he'd sunk that hook in. It wasn't time to reel in the fish yet, because he knew this one would come swimming to him freely. The Winchesters were too good at what they did for this man to ever catch them. Not without help.

"So. You're one of these so-called 'hunters,' I take it?" It was obvious from the derision on his face that Henriksen had no idea who it was he was actually chasing. Who it was he stood in a room with. Probably thought they were crazy. Not that it mattered. Most people did. They were all idiots, lucky Gordon and others like him – even the Winchesters, regardless of whether or not they now needed to be taken out – were around to save their useless asses.

The hunter smiled widely, this time all teeth and charm, Ted Bundy charm though it may be. Gordon had lured plenty a pretty vamp girl to their deaths with that smile, playing their game right back at them. He could play Agent Henriksen's game too.

The agent smiled back, a biting, bitter thing. He shook his head again, tapping the edge of his folder on the table with another disbelieving laugh. Then he headed for the door back out of the prison without a word.

"Be seeing you, Agent." Gordon nodded, completely confident in his words, and that clean-shaven head turned his way, half a glance over a rigid shoulder. Then the Fed was gone, replaced with the guard who would escort Gordon back to his cell. But the hunter wasn't worried. He knew he was right. He would be seeing Agent Henriksen again. It was only a matter of time.

-o-o-o-

Dean scrambled out of the hospital bed the minute he realized that the light filtering in through the closed blinds of Bobby's guest bedroom was a hell of a lot lower than it had been when he'd first brought Angela and Cas in here. Which meant he'd been asleep for a lot longer than the hour he'd planned, and that meant they were already late meeting Jo in Cold Oak.

Climbing out of the bed wasn't as easy as he thought it'd be. Whoever had hooked Angela's body back up to the machines had done it around Dean, leaving the hunter in a weave of tubes and wires that he had to extricate himself from before he could be free (he'd already been paranoid enough about messing up all that technology keeping Angela alive, and that was before he'd tried playing cat's cradle with it). Needless to say, it was several minutes before he was actually standing on his own two feet.

He took a moment to double check Angela was still breathing on her own – or, uh, well, the machines were breathing for her, at least – before he headed into the hallway, pulling the door mostly closed behind him. Figuring Sammy must have overslept as well (otherwise his brother would have come and woken him up), he headed for what they largely considered 'their' room in Bobby's house. The older hunter had warned them Andy had taken over one of the beds, but Dean figured Sam was probably catching z's in the other one.

Only the door was three quarters of the way open when he got there and there wasn't much inside except two empty beds; one neatly made up, the other one clearly Andy's. With a frown pulling between his eyebrows, Dean turned and headed for the stairs at a decent pace. Maybe Sam had slept on the couch in the Den.

Bobby's study was empty when he got to the bottom of the stairs and Dean started looking around with less certainly and more wariness. Nothing in his gut was screaming at him and he usually trusted that. But Sammy hadn't woken him up and obviously hadn't overslept himself, and Bobby wasn't at his desk surrounded by books. Which was weird enough to raise alarm.

Noise from the kitchen – the splash of water and clatter of dishes, along with the low background din of someone trying to keep their voice down – drew Dean to the kitchen. He was surprised to find Sammy, perfectly fine and upright, doing dishes at the sink with an energetic Andy waving his phone practically beneath the Winchester's nose trying to show him something.

Sam looked better. Rested, at least, not dead on his feet and pale from recovering blood loss. There was a new square of padded gauze taped across the skin just above the shoulder blade, peeking out of the neckline of his t-shirt. Dean assumed there was a matching one on his front, around his collar bone. Bobby had patched him up proper, at least, so that was good.

Still, though.

"What the hell, Sammy?" Dean groused, crossing his arms over his chest, because it was still way past the hour either brother had agreed upon for sleep. They needed to be on the road toward Cold Oak, not playing Susy Homemaker in Bobby's kitchen.

The sudden interruption was enough to make both kids jump, Sam smacking the plate he was holding against the rim of the sink with a sharp clack (luckily not breaking it) and Andy spinning around with the kind of jitter that suggested a lot of caffeine and not a whole lot of sleep.

(Which, to be fair, was probably Sam and Dean's fault. Waking up in the middle of night to an angelic vessel – not the angel, but Angela – raising hell for a cell phone, followed by radio silence for hours would be enough to keep anyone up worrying.)

"Jeez, Dean, did you have to sneak up on us?" Sam whined right back even as Andy broke into a wide grin beside him while less-than-subtly hiding his phone from view behind his back.

"I'm not the one sneaking. Or letting people over-sleep while playing maid!"

Sam gave his brother a narrow-eyed look, which Dean only felt slightly bad for. Yeah, yeah, cleaning up after themselves in Bobby's house was a given (one they, uh, weren't always the best at) so he probably shouldn't be digging into his brother for doing the dishes. But seriously, what the hell! The clock on the oven said it was after four pm, which meant he'd slept a hell of a lot longer than just an hour. More like six.

"Relax, Dean," the younger Winchester went back to the dishes petulantly (okay, maybe only petulantly in Dean's version of events). "Jo called hours ago."

Dean frowned immediately, dropping his arms to his side. "She did? They alright? What'd they find?"

Sam put the last plate into the drying rack and turned off the water. The stillness in his shoulders despite all that movement was a dead giveaway that Dean wouldn't like the answer any more than Sammy had.

"Nothing."

Dean pulled his head back. "What?"

Sam turned around, shrugging his shoulder helplessly, and Dean could see the mix of anguish and anger in his brown eyes. "They didn't find anything, Dean. There was no one at Cold Oak. They searched the whole town; it was empty."

"But, that doesn't-" Dean shook his head. That didn't make any sense. "Then where's Ava?"

His brother sighed, head dipping down until his chin practically rested against his chest. He shrugged again, and Dean could just picture that helpless look, even if he couldn't see Sam's face. Helpless and angry. "She's missing."

Just like last time. His fingers curled into fists by his side and Dean clenched his jaw till his teeth creaked in his mouth. They'd changed nothing. Again.

Beside them, Andy, who'd so far stayed out of the conversation, having been caught up by Sam on the events in Lafayette as well as having been in the room when Jo called, now waved his arms to get their attention. He made a series of motions with his hands that meant absolutely nothing to Dean, though Sam at least followed the gestures like he was maybe picking up one or two here and there. Andy didn't wait for the two of them to tell him they didn't understand (that much was obvious pretty much from the get-go) and switched over to mental images almost in tandem.

Flashing red and blue lights, police tape, and a newspaper article about the bodies found at Cold Oak.

"Yeah, you're probably right, Andy." Sam nodded, crossing his arms over his chest with slumped shoulders. "The police activity could have tipped the demons off that we'd found their dumping ground. They know Cold Oak is compromised now."

Andy hid the flinch well, but Sam winced regardless, realizing all on his own how the words had likely affected Andy, who'd lost two friends to that graveyard. He sent an apologetic look his way, but their resident Jedi waved it off.

"Which means they'll have picked somewhere new. Somewhere we don't know about." Dean said it through teeth that were still creaking and Sam met his gaze briefly – half in assessment, half in warning – but it didn't matter. His anger still boiled over and Dean lashed out, knocking the nearest thing – a heavy book lying open, little post it notes acting as bookmarks – off the kitchen table and onto the floor with a thud. "Damnit! We should have burned that town to the ground, Sammy."

"We don't know what that would have done, Dean. What it would have changed. We stilldon't!"

"If yer gonna be destroying things, better do it in your own damn house, boy."

All three boys turned to find Bobby standing behind them at the entrance to the kitchen with two armfuls of groceries and a narrow set to his eyes beneath the ever-present ball cap. He very pointedly looked at Dean and then down to the book still lying on the floor. The older Winchester looked away guiltily, sighing as he bent over to pick the tome back up and replace it on the table.

"Sorry, Bobby."

The old hunter harrumphed, but apparently deemed the apology and fix good enough because he pushed past the boys to set his grocery bag full of food on the counter next to Andy. The kid started digging into it immediately. It earned his hand a swat and glare from Bobby, at least until Andy glared right back and gestured with the box of butter sticks towards the fridge.

"Use your words, kid," Bobby growled, already pulling the rest of the stuff from the bag.

Andy glared and set the butter down on the counter a little harder than necessary to use both hands to tell the old hunter off. Dean had no idea what was said, but by the way Bobby nodded in concession and started handing the kid more stuff to go in the fridge, it was clear Andy's intention had been to help put things away the entire time.

Well, those two seemed to be getting along like two old hens in a henhouse. Which was a terrifying thought, really. At Least they hadn't killed each other.

"That's enough food to feed an army, Bobby," Dean commented on the two stuffed bags for lack of something better to say in a kitchen filled with tension (that he'd more than helped put there). "You expecting company?"

Bobby huffed. "Your brother didn't tell you?"

Green eyes shot over to Sam, narrow and accusatory. The younger Winchester just shrugged as Andy tossed him two bags of potato chips that he tossed into the upper cabinets over the fridge.

